guardianship. And the possibility that the Qur’an might sanction domestic violence or that husbands might be allowed to beat their wives into obedience is seen as entirely out of the question. In the light of Shahrur’s interpretations, verse 4:34 should then be read as follows:

People lead other people, who follow them, because Allah has given some of them more talent and competence than others, and because they have more financial power (than others). Hence righteous women are those able and competent women who guard their talents of leadership (for the good of society), which Allah has asked them to guard. As to those women whose incompetence and lack of good leadership you fear, warn them first, then reduce intimate contact with them and, finally, resist firmly but nonviolently the abuse of their position of leadership (before you withdraw leadership from them). Should they then comply (with what you are saying), do not seek a way of harming them; for Allah is Sublime and Great![61]

This interpretation of 4:34 shows that for Shahrur the morality of the al-qur”§n is not—as with quite a number of so-called modernist interpretations of the Qur’an—limited to only a select few legal enact ments, while women’s human rights remain severely compromised. His understanding of the al-qur”§n’s universal moral message tells him that the female is an autonomous moral being who has a direct relationship with God who is her only guardian. He wants this to be adequately preserved in his legal interpretations of umm a l-kit§b, in which no limitation or advance privilege is ascribed to any gender group under any circumstances, and in which individual morality is recognised as more important than the preservation of different or reciprocal social roles on the basis of sex or gender. Shahrur’s reading of 4:34 also shows to what extent he is prepared to go in finding a semantic congruence between the legal verses of the divine text and what he sees as the eternally valid laws of God’s ethical code. As for any other structuralist interpretation, the meaning of 4:34 is not encapsulated in its individual words (al-nis§” does not always and essentially refer to ‘women’, nor does a l-rij§l intrinsically mean ‘men’) but is construed through the relational properties of words within a particular set of reading conventions which, in Shahrur’s case, departs from every single customary rule in the study of the Qur’an. Here his stern anticlericalism finds itself utterly vindicated since any reliance on traditional tafsÊr would have drawn him back into a discourse that attempts to rationalise sexual discrimination in one form or another. This is the reason for his defence of his main methodology of sola scriptura, that is, complete reliance on the Qur’anic text alone: no other text/authority of the past can stand between him and the text in front of him—it is “as if the Qur’an was revealed last night”.

Shahrur’s ultimate concern when applying his philosophical ideas to the sphere of Islamic law is to accomplish that semantic congruence between the ethical and legal verses of the Qur’an, symbolising God-given morality and humanness in a legal system. And it is this concern which motivates him to prove to his secularist critics that the ethical concepts of rational philosophy are not entirely incompatible with the legal notions of Islamic jurisprudence. In fact, he does not completely abandon the tools and even rhetoric of the fuqah§”, but often retrieves suppressed or marginalised legal interpretations, while revealing a remarkable knowledge about the ‘orthodox’ positions which he then begins to amend. And since it is not easy to deal in detail with Islamic law from a purely philosophical point of view, and since his philosophical views are all outlined in Qur’anic v ocabulary, one occasionally gets the feeling that he applies to universal ethics, religion, and law a still dominantly ‘Islamic’ rather than purely philosophical or scientific perspective. Ironically, in Shahrur’s effort to fit the God of the Qur’an or of sharÊ#a law into the mould of a neo-Whiteheadian system, parts of the latter’s truly and uncompromised universality seems to have been lost.

On the whole, though, Shahrur’s attempt to set up the universally human aspects of the Qur’an and then to apply these to his legal exegesis is eminently successful. No other modern Muslim writer, except perhaps Fazlur Rahman, has managed to combine both a theoretical critique and a concrete analysis of the Qur’anic text that covers such a large area of Islamic law. Indeed, Shahrur’s writings on the rules of bequests and inheritance law, polygyny, women’s dress codes, and personal status law, all developed on the basis of his theory of limits, constitute a landmark in the development of modern Islamic thought and deserve broad attention. Moreover, his compelling fusion of European philosophical concepts with a Qur’anic worldview has not only achieved the establishment of a ‘theory’ which Shahrur saw as vital for overcoming the intellectual crisis of Arab nationalism, but also forcefully addresses the current crisis provoked by radical Islamism.

True, much of the idealism, scientific positivism, and high-flown enthusiasm for evolutionary progress that characterised nineteenthcentury European philosophy seems a bit alien to the disillusioned, postmodern spirit of our current time. Undoubtedly, what was then called rational, universal and moral may be seen now as irrational, context-bound, and interest-driven; and the ideal of an irreversible progress of human knowledge climaxing in a total grasp of absolute knowledge may seem to some either as too simplistic or entirely anachronistic. Shahrur's conviction that the ethical ideals of al-isl§m are indivisible and eternally valid will be unacceptable to those who deconstruct this as just another product of a monotheistic worldview in the tradition of Judeo-Christian-Islamic theology, ignoring nonmonotheistic and nontheistic/nontranscendent ethical models (e.g., choice theory or situation ethics). His faith in the incorruptible rationality of modern philosophy and in the moral efficacy of the modern sciences may appear too naïve to those more critical in their appraisal of what philosophers and scientists have contributed to what is irrational and evil in the modern age. Many of Shahrur's own interpretations will be seen as too subjective and arbitrary, or incompatible with a rigorous, falsifiable, and verifiable system of textual analysis. And his absolute trust in the essential goodness of secular, parliamentary legislation and his unbroken optimism that this embodies the humanness of society much better than the #ulam§"s uncodified religious law, might be untenable to those who seriously question the political implications of such a concept (e.g., after the British parliament in 2003 sanctioned an unjust war in Iraq).

And yet, none of this has deterred ten thousand and more readers in the Arab-Muslim world from being 'hooked' by what Shahrur has written. The core meaning of his work is not so much determined by the novelty or originality of individual ideas or approaches as such, but by its boldness and power to suggest an alternative way to what is assumed to remain as 'orthodox'. The appeal of his call for rationality and scientific objectivity lies in the readers' exposure to a religious climate of an incredible anti-intellectualism spread from thousands of pulpits throughout the Middle East. Shahrur's stress on the priority of ethics over rituals find its significance against the background of thirty years of public debate about the full implementation of sharÊ#a law in Muslim countries and the devastating spirit of overzealous legalism that accompanied it. His emphasis on a strictly contemporary reading of the Qur’an and the accent he lays on a progressive trajectory of human development have their bearing in what critics of the Islamist movement see as an absurd obsession with the past and the cultural details of seventh-century Mecca and Medina. And his call for a return to the universal, ethical objectives of Islam (al-isl§m) is important in the light of the excesses of religious fundamentalism and Islamic radicalism which have existed in the Arab Middle East since as early as the mid-1970s. The ultimate relevance of Shahrur’s books for Muslim readers, however, originates in the fact that he manages to synthesise critical reasoning with religious thought, which for both his secular as well as his traditionalist opponents is anathema. Instead of citing numerous authorities of medieval legal schools as the best proof for the quality of an argument/interpretation, Shahrur suggests shifting the emphasis from ‘borrowed authority’ to the authority of one’s own rational faculty. Instead of memorizing an ultimately amorphous corpus of ÈadÊths in order to produce a tolerable rendering of a Qur’anic passage, Shahrur encourages individual’s critical thought—however subjective or idiosyncratic—in order to make the text meaningful to Muslims today. For those Muslims who want to apply their critical reasoning, which it is increasingly encouraged to use elsewhere in society, to their own religion and yet still maintain their religious identity as ‘good believers’ and in full harmony with their critical mind, this approach appears to be conclusively attractive.

 Introduction by Muhammad Shahrur

Since the beginning of my attempt to reunderstand and reread the Qur’an I have published five books in Arabic. This volume seeks to convey my thoughts in one concise volume especially prepared for an English-speaking audience. The main intention of my work is to go beyond the epistemology of traditional Islamic scholarship. What is too often hailed as either inimitable or unsurpassable holds us in fact back when we attempt to reach new insight. In order to achieve genuine renewal and lasting reform we cannot rely on the solutions of bygone eras. As Einstein once said, “The world we have made as a result of the level of thinking we have done thus far creates problems that we cannot solve at the same level at which we have created them…We shall require a substantially new manner of thinking if humankind is to survive.” In order to solve the current problems of the Arab-Muslim world we are required to use the ideas and thoughts of our most creative minds even if their proposals appear unusual or unfamiliar. But the familiar and the well-acquainted are often insufficient to solve the challenging problems of our ever-more-complex world. We want this volume to be perceived as a relentless critique of all attempts to reform Islam by a return to seventh-century Arabia and through an adoption of the archaic worldviews of our salafÊ forefathers. Such reforms, we believe, are utterly fruitless and bound to fail because they possess an inherently atavistic nature that is incompatible with the modern episteme that demands plurality, tolerance, and progressive thinking.

Allah’s Book teaches us to divide human history into two historical epochs. The first epoch is the period of prophets and messengers, which ended with MuÈammad’s (ß)[62] mission. The second epoch began after MuÈammad’s (ß) death, and is the epoch in which we still live today. In this second epoch, humankind no longer requires God’s[63] prophets and messengers because human beings have matured to such an extent that they can, without direct interventions from God, confidently explore the laws of the universe. This allows human societies today to issue legislations without the instructions from living prophets or messengers. Think of the creation of human rights, the abolition of slavery and the emancipation of women, all of which are indications that a new level of civilisation has been reached as the result of a postprophetic way of legislation. It would be an extreme regression if we tried to establish a modern society on the basis of premodern values and bygone norms. Our task today is not to regress to a state of society that is less complex than the previous one but to develop the most advanced forms of civil society whose impact can be felt by every despotic ruler in this world.

In this volume, Allah’s Book is presented as the seal and ultimate expression of the first epoch of humankind, the period of prophetic guidance. This confronts us with the question of how to read and understand it from the perspective of those who live in the second epoch in which direct prophetic guidance is neither necessary nor longer available. Just as in the seventh-century people understood Allah’s Book with the help of what was then contemporary knowledge, in the twenty-first century we must understand it with what is now contemporary knowledge. Only through such a truly contemporary rereading of Allah’s Book can we succeed in achieving real reform and a successful renewal of Islamic thought.

We offer a radically new interpretation of Allah’s Book (al-kit§b)[64] which fundamentally questions the so-called sacred certainties of Islamic theology and the so-called fundamentals of Islamic jurisprudence. However, we do not claim that this is the only correct interpretation or the only possible way to understand the text. We reject the dogmatism of the salafÊ traditionalists and their claim to be in the possession of absolute knowledge about the Qur’an. Such claim is a violation of Allah’s oneness, as it presupposes that humans can be equal to God in His knowledge, which to claim is—as verse 43 of Sårat al-Ra#d states —truly blasphemous: ‘Say, “God is sufficient witness between me and you: all knowledge of the Scripture comes from Him”’ (Al-Ra#d 13:43, AH).[65]

Our study is concerned with the exposition and fresh interpretation of God’s revelation to humankind. It is vital for the reader to understand that we follow a different methodology in reading the divine text of Allah’s Book and that we do not stand in the tradition of scholarly disciplines such as #ulåm al-qur”§n or tafsÊr al-qur”§n. Our methodology will be laid out in the separate chapters of this volume, but some of the most important linguistic and philosophica lhermeneutical aspects that underlie our approach are summarised in this introduction.

 Linguistic Principles

We understand the process of reading texts, of whatever type or format, as a process of communication between the author and the reader/listener via the medium of the text. We believe that it is possible for the reader to learn about the author’s intention by reading the text alone. There is no need to go back to the author and ask what the meaning of the text is. However, no reader can ever claim to have fully understood the text because this would imply that in terms of the acquired and transmitted knowledge of the text reader and author have become absolutely identical. As for the Book, which embodies the ultimate level (of knowledge), its author is Allah who alone possesses absolute knowledge about it. While the text of the Book is of divine origins, all its readers/listeners are humans like you and me whose knowledge is not absolute. Human knowledge of the divine text is partial, limited, and relative. Therefore, people understand the text in different ways according to their historically conditioned, context-based perceptions of the text's meaning. Until the coming of the Last Hour this will be the unchanging hermeneutical condition in reading the divine text, because the human reader will always be influenced by the time and historical context in which he or she lives.

Because no revelation has occurred after the last one to MuÈammad (ß), who hence completed all previous chains of prophethoods, every prophecy has its fixed time and cannot be infinitely extended. We also argue that since Allah alone has absolute knowledge of the text we human beings only possess relative knowledge that aspires to reach towards the unattainable absoluteness of Allah's knowledge. If it is true that the era of revelations has come to an end with MuÈammad (ß) and that only Allah enjoys absolute knowledge, then the divine text must possess the quality of 'assimilatability' (al-tash§buh). This means that even if the form of the text in its literal substance is fixed, its content (that is, its meaning) moves. This movement means that the rules and injunctions of the text have the flexibility to be applied according to the changing circumstances of human societies, a flexibility that is the core element of ÈanÊfiyya, which we define as the curved movement of human legislation within the straight lines that God has set up. We do not mean by flexibility moral and legal relativism but rather a greater amount of responsiveness to the needs of human societies. This can be achieved by applying divine norms within the boundaries of upper and lower limits that the text provides. It implies that Allah has left it to us to make sense, by way of our relative and context-related knowledge, of the many injunctions in the text, and to fill the gaps that the text has left—all of this strictly within the constraints of the divine boundaries (or limits).

In our linguistic analysis of the divine text we start with the premise that words cannot be meaningless. This is a departure from traditional exegesis which claims that some words in Allah’s Book have no meaning or that their meanings cannot be grasped by the human mind. Such a claim entirely ignores the purpose of Allah’s revelation because it was sent down ‘so that [we] may understand’ (Yåsuf 12:2). It ignores that words, in their phonetic and grammatical expressions, always serve their (intended) meanings or, put differently, that the meaning of a word is determined by the linguistic structure into which it was purposefully embedded. The function of language is therefore to serve the communicative purposes of those who speak this language and who want to convey their thoughts and ideas to their readers/listeners. No word can thus become meaningless. To claim that some of God’s words are semantically obscure or cannot be understood by humans is to deny the communicative purpose of revelation and contradicts its explicit aim to be understood. It is to deny that language is a carrier of thoughts through which it acquires meaning. Only language outside any human thought at all (the language of animals, for example) is incomprehensible (to us), but in this case such language will also be entirely insignificant as ‘text’. This is certainly not the case with Allah’s Book. Its language does fully function within the constraints of the human intellect. To claim that its language (Arabic) is so ‘sacred’ that it cannot be understood by the human mind is irrational and also contradicts everything we know about how languages work.

If the meaning of a word is determined by the communicative purpose that a speaker/author gives to it, it implies that meaning only exists within the structure of any given language and any concrete historical context. It does not reside within the word itself. If we want to make sense of a person’s speech we do not analyse each individual word separately and in isolation from its place in the sentence structure or the entire system of a language. We follow in this al-Jurj§nÊ who maintained that words in isolation, that is, words purely as lexical items, do not make sense until they are constructed in a certain way, and arranged and harmonised in one pattern rather than another. Al-Jurj§nÊ believed that isolated words have no communicative or expressive value, and that the only possible way to mean anything is for words to be included into sets of relations which dramatically change the way the single word is to be understood.[66]

When we say that the meaning of a single word is derived from the composition and the grammatical structure of a certain text we also imply that its explicit meaning is derived from what is implicit, that is, not explicit or ‘silent’. When someone says, for example, that ‘Joe ate a red apple’ we realise that the meaning of the colour red is established through the fact that other colours exist that are not red. Or if we hear in Allah’s speech that ‘these are the sins that are inexcusable’ we understand its meaning, and the significance of stressing that these sins are inexcusable, only because of our implicit knowledge that other types of sins might exist that are not inexcusable but good and justified. Since Allah’s Book avoids tedious elaboration as well as elliptic terseness, it is of paramount importance, in particular in our legal interpretations of the verses, to read the explicit as well as the implicit in the text. When we hear, for instance, in Sårat a l-Nis§”, verse 11, ‘if there be more than two females, then they should receive two-thirds of what he (the deceased father) leaves’, or ‘but if there is only one female, she is entitled to one half’ [FM], we realize that in both instances the existence of a male heir is implied even if the text does not explicitly refer to male heirs.

The Book expresses its structure, composition, and meaning with utmost precision, a precision comparable to the structural perfection that one finds in nature and that is studied in chemistry, physics, biology, medicine, and mathematics. This is because the Creator, who has created the universe with its smallest atoms and particles and who has created human beings with their organs, bones, arteries, eyes, ears, and noses, He is the same who also authored the Book. We therefore need to acknowledge the unity of the Creator and the unity of universal laws, expressed both in nature and the Book. As in nature, every letter of His words has a specific function and meaning. As in nature, the Book does not contain anything that is semantically redundant or superfluous. Some grammarians have called repetitive features of the text ‘matters of emphasis’ and have claimed that such features affect the style but not the meaning of the text. We, however, believe that a concession of redundancy undermines the divine authority of the Book. We believe that it is impossible to take away a single word or to even remove a single particle from the text without seriously damaging the integrity of its meaning. Likewise, every attempt to restructure the syntax of the text, for example by moving a word forward or backward, would significantly alter the intended sentence structure. This would not only change the aesthetic effect and the musical rhythm of the verse but also quite substantially its meaning. In our interpretation of the Book we must therefore strictly observe the unity between form and content, that is, a harmony between the linguistic expression and its semantic content. If we violate this unity and study a word’s meaning separate from its lexical form, for example by disregarding its tense, gender, or number, we will produce more confusion than clarity, and ambiguities will obfuscate the actual clear intentions of the text.

If the Book does not contain anything redundant or superfluous, it follows that the significance of a single word cannot be conveyed by another word. Two or more different words cannot express the same idea, because if they did we could replace one word with another and could claim that the meaning has not changed or that the expressive power of the construction is still intact. But this is impossible because God’s speech is never redundant or arbitrary. It is precise and purposeful. One cannot remove a single dot in the text without corrupting its meaning. This implies that absolute synonymity does not exist in Allah’s Book—neither in the form of individual words nor whole idiomatic phrases. The often-assumed synonymity between, for example, a l-kit§b and a l-qur”§n, between lawÈ maÈfåí and im§m mubÊn, or between al-ba#l and al-zawj is unsustainable. If al-qur”§n meant exactly the same as al-kit§b why did Allah not drop one of the two and why did He not continue to use just al-qur”§n? Why did His revelation continue to use both a l-kit§b and a l-qur”§n? We believe that the two terms are indeed semantically distinct. Each embraces a different range of potential meanings whose disclosure has enormous implications for our perception of Allah’s revelation. Also, the word al-ba#l should not be perceived as completely synonymous with the word al-zawj, meaning ‘husband’, since in the context of verses 24:31 and 4:31, which discuss behavioural codes for women and men, they are definitely not synonymous, and their semantic distinction is crucial for a proper understanding of the social and legal issues involved.

To allow synonymity in the Book would imply that we allow the principle of substitutability in Allah’s revelation. If a l-kit§b can always be substituted for a l-qur”§n without changing the meaning or the truth of the verses, then we would concede that Allah’s speech is imprecise, indistinct, and full of conceptual fuzziness. The Book says: ‘These are the verses of al-kit§b and a qur”§n that makes things clear.’ (A l-\ijr 15:1) The doctrine of synonymity led to the erroneous view that al-kit§b and qur”§n in this verse express an absolutely identical meaning, ignoring the fact that both terms possess two entirely different linguistic forms and etymologies and that they are linked by the conjunction and (-wa), indicating an addition (+) and not an equation (=). If both words were synonymous one of the two would be superfluous and the verse could, for example, stop earlier: ‘These are the verses of al-kit§b’. Or the two words could be swapped around: ‘These are the verses of a qur”§n and a l-kit§b’. This however—in both cases — would change the meaning of the verse significantly. The fact that the verse contains both words and connects them with the conjunction wa- cannot be explained away by the argument that they are synonymous and cannot be justified only by a reference to poetic licence imposed by the rhyme or metre of the verse. Assessed as single, isolated words (that is, in isolation from grammatical and syntactic relations) the two terms do share a similar semantic field and can be used in some instances of everyday speech as synonyms. But the point is that as soon as these two isolated words have been inserted into the grammatical and syntactical construction of a concrete verse (15:1), connected by the conjunction wa-, they do mean two different things and the one cannot be substituted by the other. This underlines the argument, held by the majority of modern linguists, that perfect synonymity is impossible in concrete syntactic and grammatical relations of human speech (and this is different from words in isolation).

If there are terms, for example, the fifty or more words in Arabic for a she-camel, which are treated as synonyms (that is, all referring to the same semantic core, i.e., the she-camel), we should not regard this as an argument against nonsynonymity. Firstly, it shows that everyday life of nomadic Arab tribes demanded that nomads communicated the subtlest differences of the appearance of a she-camel with the help of a variety of different terms. To substitute one with another would have meant a loss of precision and clarity and could have led to potentially serious misunderstandings. Secondly, it does not disprove our point that these fifty or more words for she-camel are synonymous only because they are isolated words, for example as they appear on a list of terms for she-camel or as they are listed in a dictionary. If they enter into the construction of a phrase or sentence they become part of a syntactical pattern whereby they lose their synonymity. This applies to all the words in the Book which we do not read as isolated words but always in a concrete syntactical arrangement. For example, when we come across the following verse: ‘For Muslim men and women (al-muslimÊn wa’l-muslim§t) and for believing men and women (a l-mu”minÊn wa’l-mu”min§t)…’ (A l-AÈz§b 33:35), we realise that the two terms al-muslimÊn and al-mu”minÊn, even if they, as isolated words, may be seen as near-equivalents, cannot exactly mean the same. Why would Allah repeat the same concept twice and then link them with the conjunction wa-? We realise that the text indeed refers to two different types of believers, one called al-muslimÊn and the other al-mu”minÊn. This requires us to uphold this distinction and then search for a terminological clarification in other verses of the Book. As another example, if we read in verse 11 of Sårat al-Nis§” ‘to each of his carer parents [li-abawaihi], one sixth of what he leaves’, we should not assume that li-abawaihi can be replaced by li-w§lidaihi, ‘to each of his biological parents [li-w§lidaihi]’, because abaw§n and w§lid§n, even if both mean ‘parents’, are different, nonsynonymous terms that refer to two different kinds of parents (carer parents do not necessarily have to be the biological parents of a child, that is, its ‘birth-givers’), and this terminological distinction is significant in the discussion of inheritance laws.

The assertion of nonsynonymity lies at the heart of our methodology. This is one of the reasons why our approach is different from that of traditional exegetes who all operate on the assumption that synonymity exists in Allah’s speech. We believe that for a truly modern understanding of the text it is necessary to leave behind the era of #ulåm al-tafsÊr which is based on the doctrine of synonymity. Our aim is to reach for a more subtle and precise understanding of the divine text in which every word in the Book expresses a unique meaning. It is also our aim to leave behind the dichotomy between grammar and rhetoric in Arabic linguistics that we have inherited from medieval scholarship. In the history of Arabic linguistics we saw how grammarians such as al-KhalÊl[67] and SÊbawayh[68] developed different positions from those of rhetoricians such as Abå #AlÊ al-F§risÊ,[69] Ibn JinnÊ,[70] and a l-Jurj§nÊ.[71] We witnessed how their debates initiated a great amount of hostility and eventually created a sharp divide between Arabic grammar and rhetoric. We today who live in the twenty-first century must overcome this divide and combine in our reading of the Book both grammatical and rhetorical analysis. We should also not forget that in the meantime, other disciplines such as mathematics, physics, chemistry, astronomy, and medicine have advanced on an unprecedented scale which gives us the opportunity to go beyond the narrow range of the philological disciplines and include, in a measured way and only if it is absolutely appropriate, the insights of the social and natural sciences. We deem it as inexcusable that some current scholars still interpret the Book solely on the basis of medieval sciences, ignoring the need to apply the latest findings of modern sciences.

Finally, it is our intention to read Allah’s Book not in isolation from social reality. It is a scandal how little traditional exegetes cared for the societies in which they were born and bred, and whose subsidies they enjoyed in order to interpret the divine text for their people. It is also a scandal how dogmatic they read the text and how often they projected their preconceived ideas of Islam, revelation, and Arabic grammar on the text and distorted what the Book actually says. We should always remind ourselves that the rules of Arabic grammar and lexicography were fixed only after the Book was revealed to humankind, not before. When, for example, the linguist SÊbawaih described the grammatical rule that noun and verb in a sentence must be congruent in gender and number, it contradicted Allah’s speech in verse 19 of Sårat al-\ajj: ‘Here are two adversaries who dispute about their Lord…’ [FM][72], because the dual form of the noun does not correspond with the nondual, plural form of the verb. And yet, we must not assume that Allah made a grammatical mistake because of SÊbawaih’s rule. Instead, we shall assume that the rule was not laid down with absolute precision. The many disputes about this and the emergence of different linguistic schools debating the correctness of this rule prove our point. Grammatical rules and theories of language must be derived from the actual usage of the language, and these rules and theories must be based on the Arabic usage of the Book—it should not be the other way around. What is right and wrong must not be declared by Arabic grammarians but by the actual language use of Arabs. The text will always rule over theory, not theory over the text.

 Philosophical Principles

As for the philosophical premises of our rereading of Allah’s Book, we first of all need to refer to our tripartite concept of existence with which we aim to illustrate our thinking about the dynamics of d evelopment and progress. This explanatory tripartite model will be used both for the description of the universe as a whole and for the analysis of human societies in particular. In this philosophical model we also employ mathematical terminology and explain the dialectical relationship between movement and stasis in cosmos and society on the basis of three coordinates: 1: ‘being’ (al-kaynåna), 2: ‘progressing’ (al-sayråra), and 3: ‘becoming’ (al-ßayråra). Let us begin by exploring the characteristics of these coordinates by referring to a more general theory of existence. The first coordinate, ‘being’, is defined as the material existence of our universe. Such ‘being’ filled the realm of the empty space of the cosmos even before it turned into the material world we now know. It is therefore true to say that such material ‘being’ exists whether we human beings can perceive it or not. It exists outside of our human consciousness. The second coordinate, ‘progressing’, refers to time. It denotes movement, process, and motion. Time is intrinsically linked to the first coordinate, to the extent that ‘progressing’ is the signifying force of ‘being’, that is, the material existence. In other words, only through movement, process and motion—that is, time—do the manifestations of the material world come into existence (and are visible, audible, touchable and such). ‘Becoming’ is the indispensable third coordinate that denotes change, alteration, and transformation. Existence would be incomplete, or two dimensional, if this third evolutionary dimension, which attributes purpose to ‘being’ and ‘progressing’, was excluded. Without this dimension of ‘becoming’, objects of the material world would wander randomly and aimlessly through time and space. It would lead to self-destruction and eventually nonexistence. Conversely, no item could change or move if it did not exist materially in the first place. In short, no ‘becoming’ and ‘progressing’ without ‘being’, and no purposeful ‘being’ without ‘becoming’ and ‘progressing’.

The Book emphasises the need to unite the three coordinates and stresses the mutual inclusiveness of ‘being’, ‘becoming’, and ‘progressing’. The best example we can give is this:

O people, if you are in doubt regarding the resurrection, We have indeed created you from dust, then from a sperm, then from a clot, then from a little lump of flesh, partly formed and partly unformed, in order to show you. (Al-\ ajj 22:5)[73]

In this verse, ‘being’ is expressed in the sentence ‘We have indeed created you from dust’. ‘Progressing’ is discernable in the transformation of dust into water (sperm). And, finally, ‘becoming’ takes place in several chains of existential transmutations, that is, the change from dust to sperm, from sperm to a clot, from a clot to a little lump of flesh, each chain representing different levels of ‘being’.

The two dimensions of ‘being’ and ‘progressing’ can be described as the upright or vertical coordinates of existence, representing existence in all its material and temporal manifestations. The third dimension, ‘becoming’, can be seen as a horizontal coordinate that displays the extent to which existence is developing and changing. If we take this model into the earliest possible time period, we observe that all three dimensions were manifested during the Big Bang at the beginning of our world. After the explosion, the first material components, the photons, turned into hydrogen; hydrogen then turned into helium; helium into nonorganic beings; nonorganic beings into organic beings; organic beings into living creatures of primitive, protoplasmic cells; primitive cells into animals; and finally animals into human beings. Such chains of transformations point to a continuous process of ‘becoming’ which has, since then, become a constant feature of nature’s two other dimensions: ‘being’ and ‘progressing’.

If we take our model into the future and see what will happen at the end of this world, we recognise a rather two-dimensional existence: ‘being’ and ‘becoming’ will exist without ‘progressing’, existence in all its manifestations will freeze in time: ‘being’ comes to a standstill and time, as we know it, will cease to exist. Existence will degenerate as its outward manifestations infinitely regress. Such a situation is manifest in the Book’s description of Hell and Paradise, where time is nothing but an accumulation of eternally fixed realities. Existence in the fire of Hell, for example, will be frozen, the outward manifestations of suffering and pain will not change, and the souls of the sinners will be tortured forever. In verses 106–7 of Sårat Håd we hear:

As for the wretched, they shall be in the Fire; they shall have therein groaning and moaning; abiding therein forever, so long as the heavens and the earth shall endure, except as you Lord pleases. [MF]

This new life (in Hell or Paradise) requires, however, a prior transformation of existence from a state in which time is a factor of material existence into a state in which time has come to a standstill. The Book refers to this when it predicts the coming of the Last Hour. It predicts that the end of this world leads to an acceleration of ‘progressing’, at the end of which, upon the debris of the old world, a new kind of existence will be born wherein no ‘progressing’ exists any longer. This is a form of negation or destruction mentioned in the following verse:

Do not call, besides Allah, upon any other god. There is no god but He. Everything will perish save His face. He is the judgement, and unto Him you shall all be returned. (Al-Qaßaß 28:88, MF)

Destruction does not mean nonexistence. It implies a new form of existence through a different ‘becoming’; this new ‘becoming’ in the Afterlife will be fixed and stable because of the lack of ‘progressing’. The end of this world and the creation of the Afterlife are, we might say, a second Big Bang which follows the first at the beginning of this world. Since ‘becoming’ represents the purpose of any existence, the purpose of the first Big Bang was to eventually lead to the second Big Bang, to the creation of the Afterlife and a new existence after death.

What happens if we take one dimension out of this tripartite concept of existence? We have said that ‘being’ and ‘progressing’ without ‘becoming’ is existence without purpose; it is senseless and aimless. If we took ‘being’ out of the tripartite structure and leave ‘progressing’ and ‘becoming’ on their own, it would imply a logically and ontologically impossible fixation upon any point A on the coordinates of ‘becoming’ and ‘progressing’. On the coordinate of ‘progressing’, that is, the dimension of time and movement, any point A would remain A, as movement is frozen, and on the coordinate of ‘becoming’, that is, the dimension of purpose and aim, our point A would turn into A’, which is self-contradictory, in the sense that A is A and yet not A—according to the dialectical logic of ‘negation’ or ‘negation of negation’ this would be impossible. This notion of an antagonistic struggle between internal contradictions leads us to think that ‘becoming’ and ‘progressing’ necessitate the dimension of ‘being’. The dimension of ‘being’ is then expressed or manifested through movement and development. The colour red, for instance, if we take it as an example of ‘being’, exists only through the things that are red, such as a rose, a shoe, or a hat; it only exists through its manifestation in things that make it visible. Without such things the colour red would not exist (for us) visibly.

We are now able to describe the following constellations with regards to the interplay among the three dimensions or coordinates of existence:

1. ‘Being’ (existence) and ‘progressing’ (time) without ‘becoming’ (trans formation):

This constellation indicates motionless, purposeless existence. Even if equipped with time, there would be no change or alteration. Development and selective evolution would become impossible. If we had such a constellation we would never arrive at the Last Hour; this world would never end. But since verse 5 of Sårat Al-\ajj proves the truth of the resurrection (and thus of a preceding Last Hour), Allah unmistakably added the dimension of ‘becoming’ to ‘being’ and ‘progressing’. Even theoretically, the laws of dialectical logic would render a constellation in which ‘becoming’ is missing as inconceivable. Thus, whoever believes in the existence of a Last Day through his belief in the existence of God has therefore already fulfilled the fundamental pillar of al-isl§m, as we will explain in chapter 1. Belief in Allah and in the Last Day represents the lowest possible limit of a l-isl§m, and this excludes the possibility of perceiving ‘being’ and ‘progressing’ without ‘becoming’.

2. ‘Being’ (existence) and ‘becoming’ (transformation) without ‘progressing’ (time):

This constellation pertains to timeless transformations, that is, motionless change of existence. This, however, can only be possible at the time of the Last Hour. Within our existing world the quality of nontemporal and yet transformable existence is only possible in the sphere of pure light.

3. ‘Progressing’ (time) and ‘becoming’ (transformation + purpose) without ‘being’ (existence):

This simultaneous constellation of existence and nonexistence is inconceivable in terms of dialectical logic. Instead, we have a series of ‘beings’ where one existence negates the previous ones. The first Big Bang and the creation of our world negated a previous existence, most probably a substance out of nothing. The second Big Bang, the coming of the Last Hour, will negate our existing world and create a new world. From the very first moment of the initial explosion the purpose of our world has been to move to a second big explosion at the time of the Last Hour as the Book describes it. The next world, in contrast, will have no such purpose; it will be nonteleological, that is, it will be aimless since it lacks ‘becoming’.

Moving on to the level of human society, ‘being’ refers to the basic biological existence of human beings, ‘progressing’ means advance in history, and ‘becoming’ is civilisational development and social change. Point zero, where the three coordinates of human existence originated, was Adam, the father of humankind and the starting point of human history. Similar to life on a cosmological macrolevel, human life is deficient or even unsustainable if one dimension is taken out of the tripartite structure. If, for example, ‘being’ was removed, human life would simply cease to exist. In this scenario, history would stop, time would disappear, and human life would regress to an animalistic stage; the evolutionary process would be reversed, back to the period of primitive forms of biological existence. This, however, is ontologically inconceivable.

If ‘progressing’ is removed, time will be abolished. But since time exists whether we want it to or not, a negation of time is also inconceivable. History implies a conscious acknowledgement of time, since human beings, in contrast to the animal world, are able to locate temporal succession in their brains.

With ‘becoming’ we face the biggest challenge to human existence. The dimension of human will and self-determination allows development and change. ‘Becoming’ produces a development that varies from one culture to another and from one historical period to another even within the same culture. We call the first variety historical difference, the second historical development. To sum up, ‘progressing’, or time, cannot be removed from human existence, ‘being’ can ontologically not not exist, and ‘becoming’ is historical change (a l-ßayråriyya al-ta”rÊkhiyya) which human beings, in exercising their free will, either accelerate or slow down—but can never fully stop.

On the level of ‘becoming’ human beings realise their full potential and assume responsibilities. Reading the Book, we realise that every Qur’anic story deals with this problem. We learn through these stories that an act of a human being, before its actual execution, belongs to the world of possible acts, whereas after its execution, it belongs to the world of determined acts—and this is because time can never regress. [74] We also realise that choice and purpose are intrinsically part of every human act, as are the reward and punishment that human beings receive for what they do. Their acts are therefore always voluntary and not predetermined. On this we hear in the Book:

In these narratives about them [i.e., the messengers], there is a lesson for people of understanding. (Yåsuf 12:111)

Say: “Travel in the land and look what was the fate of those who disbelieved (the messengers).” (Al-An#§m 6:11)

Furthermore, in ‘becoming’ and the dual process of time movement and development, we see the dialectical law of the negation of negation fully realised. The Book contains several examples, of which we will discuss the three most important:

1. ‘Becoming’ in the belief of God’s unity (al-tauÈÊd):

Belief in the unity of God passed through several stages due to an increasing human capacity to believe: from belief in a personified, concrete godhead to belief in an abstract, invisible God; or from belief in many different goddesses to belief in only one God. There we recognise different periods of religious history: from astral worship (stars and planets) to nature cults (trees and rocks), and then from idolatry (statues and idols) to the worship of saints (salaf forefathers and ßåfÊ sheikhs). We recognise in each of the subsequent periods a trace of the previous ones, but we also acknowledge an evolutionary progressing from a more primitive to a higher stage of religious belief. The credo ‘there is no god but God’ is the most advanced and most abstract form of expressing belief that can be shared by everyone, philosophically minded or not, and is also the ultimate expression of al-isl§m (see chapter 1).

2. ‘Becoming’ with regards to morality and ethical ideals (muthul #uly§ li’l-akhl§q):

We will show in chapter 1 that the history of ethics is accumulative. Human ethics has evolved from the simple forms of respect for parents to the more advanced forms of the ‘ten commandments’ which finally culminated in the messengerhood of MuÈammad (ß) which represents an extended and most sophisticated version of previous ethical codes.

3. ‘Becoming’ in human legislation (al-tashrÊ#):

Evolution and progress to higher forms of legislation, negating previous ones, is expressed in the concept of ‘abrogation’ (al-naskh). As will be explained later, it implies the abrogation of earlier messengerhoods by later ones; it does not imply an abrogation of legal verses by other verses of the same messengerhood.

We explained macrocosmic ‘being’ and ‘progressing’ without ‘becoming’ as existence without change or development, and as an aimless and purposeless progressing of time. ‘Being’ and ‘progressing’ without ‘becoming’ is deficient existence. The same applies to human societies: the most advanced societies possess all three dimensions since they progress on all three coordinates of existence. Less advanced or stagnating societies are two dimensional. We might call them ‘flat’ societies as they are missing a third dimension that gives them depth and width.

In a direct confrontation between three-dimensional and twodimensional societies the former always win. The Book, in its insistence on a unity of all three dimensions, reminds us that a two-dimensional existence, a ‘flat’ society, is only legitimate in the Afterlife, that is, in Hell, and that a society in this world should be three dimensional. It prophesizes terrible affliction on every society that has neglected its third dimension: by having lost their purpose or aim in this world such societies have lost their place under the sun and will eventually perish.

We now realise the danger of saying that ‘becoming’ in Islamic societies has happened only once, namely in seventh-century Arabia, and that it should never happen again—until the Day of Resurrection. It will be a tragic mistake to say that until the Last Hour no further development or renewal should ever take place again. It would be fatal to insist that societies should always be modelled according to MuÈammad’s (ß) state on the Arabian Peninsula 1,400 years ago. It would mean defeat and stagnation if his words and deeds remain the highest ideal of human behaviour, so all-embracing that they cover all spheres of life until the coming of the Last Hour. To do so would give MuÈammad’s (ß) words and deeds, including the way he ate, the way he dressed, and the way he used his toothpick, the same sanctity as the injunctions of the Book. It would also mean to accuse everyone who does not behave like MuÈammad (ß) of heresy or even apostasy.

We have said that the precision of nature and universe can also be found in the text of the Book. As humankind has become very advanced in all spheres of the natural and social sciences, we are today much better equipped in the study of the textual subtleties of the Book. It will be the ultimate concern of our contemporary reading (qir§“a mu#§ßira) of the Book that we facilitate it with the most advanced techniques and scientific methods of our age and that we come up eventually with meaningful knowledge with which we are able to establish human legislation within the boundaries that God has set for all humankind.

Muhammad Shahrur

 1. Al-isl$m and Al-^m$n

Why the Conventional Understanding of al-Isl§m and al-^m§n is not Adequate Traditionally, the term al-isl§m stands for the religion of those who are commonly known as Muslims, the followers of Prophet MuÈammad (ß). In this traditional understanding, the term al-Êm§n has been used to also describe the ‘faith’ of these Muslims, the adherents of a l-isl§m. The result of linking al-Êm§n to a l-isl§m was that the followers of MuÈammad (ß) were thought to be both the Muslims (Ar. al-muslimån) and the believers (al-mu”minån), while it was ignored that there is a big difference between al-isl§m and al-Êm§n. In the books of the \adÊth scholars both terms have also been treated as more or less synonymous (see al-Bukh§rÊ; Muslim, ‘aÈÊÈain, chapters on al-Êm§n).

However, the assumption of synonymity in Allah’s Book has been a fundamental flaw in traditional scholarship. As we will prove in this chapter, it has obscured the fact that the two terms are neither semantically nor etymologically identical. It is the aim of this chapter not only to explore the semantic differences between a l-isl§m and al-Êm§n but also between terms such as al-kufr, al-shirk, and al-jir§m, which were (all) thought to be synonymous terms contrasting with a l-isl§m and a l-Êm§n (see the works of our honourable scholars in tafsÊr, uß å l a l-fiqh, lugha, and so forth). This study hopes to demonstrate the distinct universal nature of the term al-muslimån (those who assent to God), which can be (generically) applied to all believers in this world, and this in contradistinction to the term al-mu”minån (those who believe), which, because it describes a more particular type of religious belief, must be used only for the followers of Prophet MuÈammad

(ß).

Let us first revisit how al-isl§m and al-Êm§n have been traditionally understood. Al-isl§m is commonly perceived to be based on the following five pillars:

1. The shah§da: the creedal statement that ‘there is no god but God’ and that ‘MuÈammad is the Messenger of God’;

2. ßal§h: the ritual to pray five times a day;

3. zak§h: the duty to donate money as a ‘poor due’ or #alms tax’;

4. ßaum: the fast during the month of Ramadan;

5. Èajj: the pilgrimage to Mecca ‘for those who have the means to do so’ (3:97).

The common description of a l-Êm§n is that it is based on the following five tenets of belief in:

1. Allah;

2. His angels;

3. His books and messengers;

4. The Hereafter;

5. Allah’s divine predestination and His power over good and evil.

It is immediately clear from these (quite dubious) lists, the pillars of al-isl§m and the tenets of al-Êm§n, that they are either based purely on ritual practice (al-isl§m) or on theological doctrines (al-Êm§n). Ethical and moral rules have been entirely excluded from either category. As a consequence, secularists, nationalists, and Marxists have (wrongly) perceived the religion of Islam as fundamentally flawed and incapable of providing moral guidance for people in modern societies—a perception that has relegated Islam to the scrap heap of history. What has been ignored in such often anti-religious propaganda is the fact that moral teachings were always an inseparable part of al-isl§m and that it was only because of our honourable scholars’ ignorance that ethics was excluded from religion. It is the aim of this chapter (and indeed the entire book) to reconnect ethics to religion and to present an interpretation of al-isl§m in which the moral teachings of the Qur’an are rediscovered for the benefit of an Arab civil society, which gets its priorities right and places enlightened civility before stupefying ritualism and mindless doctrinism.

 Disproving the Conventional Understanding

We will now turn to the text of the Qur’an, which—according to our terminology—is called the Book.[75] Let us first agree that Allah’s revelation is free from error and (human) interpolation. Let us also agree that we must identify the meaning of the terms al-isl§m and al-Êm§n by locating them in the context in which they appear in the Book. It will then immediately become clear that the traditional definitions of al-isl§m and al-Êm§n do not make sense, and that those who insist on the old definitions actually deviate from the Book. The results of our findings can be summarised as follows:

1. Based on 33:35, ‘men and women who assent to God’ (al-muslimån and al-muslim§t) are both terminologically and conceptually separated from ‘men and women who believe’ (al-mu”minån and al-mu”min§t).[76]

2. Based on 49:14,[77] al-isl§m precedes al-Êm§n —chronologically (in terms of its appearance in human history) as well as biographically (in terms of the individual’s spiritual progress and transition from al-isl§m to al-Êm§n).

3. Muslims are not the followers of Prophet MuÈammad (ß)! Instead, the Jinns, Abraham, Jacob, the tribes of the Israelites, Joseph, the magicians of the Pharaoh, the disciples of Jesus, Noah and Lot—they are the actual Muslims; and when the Pharaoh saw the splitting of the sea he also became a Muslim. Historically speaking, none of them could follow the Prophet MuÈammad (ß). Instead, they followed other messengers: for example, the disciples followed Jesus (r) and the magicians of the Pharaoh followed Moses (r). If we keep postulating that the shah§da is the first pillar of a l-isl§m and the ultimate criterion for adherence to al-isl§m, we would deny—since the shah§da demands that one must follow MuÈammad as the Messenger of God—not only that the Pharaoh had converted to al-isl§m by following Moses (r) but also that the disciples of Jesus adhered to a l-isl§m by following the prophet Jesus (r). We would negate their adherence to al-isl§m on the grounds that they did not follow Prophet MuÈammad (ß). Other so-called pre-Islamic prophets, their families, and tribes, who could not yet have known MuÈammad (ß) but whose strong adherence to al-isl§m is well-attested in the Book, would also be excluded from being attached to al-isl§m. Surely, our honourable scholars do not want us to believe that they were not Muslims only because they never fasted during the month of Ramadan and never did the pilgrimage to Mecca![78]

4. The rituals of prayer, alms tax, fast, and pilgrimage are not pillars of al-isl§m. This is because the Book demands that these rituals be practised only by the Muslim-Believers (a l-mu”minån) and not by the Muslim-Assenters (al-muslimån).[79]

5. The pillars of a l-isl§m cannot be reduced to religious rituals because the Book mentions other things that are absolutely essential to a l-isl§m, for example, the injunction to fight, to kill, and to seek consultation, to fulfil contracts and obligations, and many, many other moral and legal responsibilities.[80]

6. To interpret the words ‘Allah only accepts al-isl§m’ and ‘The followers of al-isl§m will enter Paradise’ as a reference only to those who adhere to MuÈammad (ß), and thus reduce al-isl§m to the prayer, alms tax, fasting, and pilgrimage of only one part of all humankind, contradicts the spirit of the Book. Such an exclusivist claim by one specific religious community has been repeatedly rebuked by the Book. For example, it fiercely criticised those Qur’anic Jews and Christians who had desired God’s favour solely for themselves:

They also say: ‘No one will enter Paradise unless he is a Jew or a Christian.’ This is their own wishful thinking. [Prophet], say, ‘Produce your evidence, if you are telling the truth.’ In fact, any who direct themselves wholly to God and do good will have their reward with their Lord: no fear for them, nor will they grieve. (Al-Baqara 2: 111–2, AH)

7. The narrow definition of al-isl§m referring only to prayer, alms tax, fasting, and pilgrimage deviates from the most fundamental teachings of the Book. To say, for example, that Allah approves of only one religious community (and its specific rituals), Islam in its narrow [conventional and historical] sense, contradicts Allah’s notion of a l-isl§m as a religion that is inherent in human nature (a l-fiãra al-ins§niyya) and that Allah has bestowed upon all of His creation.

So [Prophet] as a man of pure faith, stand firm and true in your devotion to the religion [li’l-dÊn ÈanÊf [an]]. This is the natural disposition [fiãra] God instilled in mankind—there is no altering God’s creation—and this is the right religion [al-dÊn al-qayyim], though most people do not realize it. (Al-Råm 30:30, AH)

The implication of this verse is that the pillars of al-isl§m must be consistent with the natural disposition that ‘God instilled in mankind’. It implies that nothing of this religion must contradict human nature. But do the rituals of (historical) Islam really conform to the natural instincts of all human beings? In other words, are humans naturally inclined to perform these rituals? Of course not. To pay alms tax (zak§h), for example, means to give away money and part of our possessions, which undoubtedly goes against human instinct!! Allah has ordered His creation to care for property and to ‘love wealth with a passion’.[81] Likewise, to fast (ßaum) contradicts our natural disposition because it undermines the human instinct for survival.

The basis of human nature is to eat and drink and to satisfy hunger and thirst; it is not to fast. It is to reveal emotions and even to shout insults as a spontaneous expression of anger and provocation, and not to hold back because of Ramadan’s sacredness. In contrast, the specific rituals of MuÈammad’s community are all against human nature. If these rituals were part of our human nature we all would perform them naturally (like drinking and eating) and we would not need explicit commands from God to do so (as they are given in the Book!)—we would act perhaps similar to a herbivorous cow which instinctively eats only grass because Allah made this the inherent disposition of cows. We, however, do not perform any of these rituals by instinct or on impulse, which means that the specific forms of prayer, fasting, and pilgrimage and so on cannot be part of al-isl§m, the religion of all humankind. Instead, they are only part of the definite (and hence more particular) section of Allah’s Book.[82] They were stipulated only for the Muslim-Believers (al-mu”minån), not for all Muslim-Assenters (al-muslimån) who, by their natural disposition, instinctively follow the religion of al-isl§m, and not of al-Êm§n.

 Towards a New Understanding of al-isl§m and al-Êm§n

So far we have shown that the traditional definitions of al-isl§m and al-Êm§n are incompatible with Allah’s text. What we need to do now is to explore the definitions that are more faithful to the Book. We need to explain the differences between ‘those who assent to God’ (muslimån) and ‘those who have faith’ (mu”minån). This implies a redefinition of the pillars of al-isl§m and al-Êm§n, for which the concepts of ‘doing what is fair and just’ (al-iÈs§n) and ‘doing what is righteous’ (a l-#amal a l-ß§liÈ) will be introduced. ‘Doing what is righteous’ (a l-#amal a l-ß§liÈ) will be defined as a pillar of a l-isl§m, while a l-iÈs§n (‘doing what is fair and just’) will be defined as a pillar of al-Êm§n. We will also deal with two often-misunderstood verses in the Book. These verses say that ‘the religion before Allah is al-isl§m’ ($l #Imr§n 3:19) and that ‘if anyone desires a religion other than al-isl§m, never will it be accepted of Him’ ($l #Imr§n 3:85). In order to interpret these verses correctly we need to ask: what is meant by the phrase ‘a religion other than al-isl§m’? How is this religion defined and why it is so special? The answers to these questions will eventually help us to put our priorities right, to place morality and ethics above ritualism, and, finally, to achieve a truly sustainable ‘Islamic awakening’.[83]

Instead of returning to the notion of synonymity in the Book, we set out to find subtle differences of meaning between terms such as al-isl§m and al-Êm§n or between al-shirk and al-kufr that only look similar on the surface. We have already seen how the Book displays an astonishing precision, reflecting the majesty of its divine Maker, in distinguishing between al-muslimån (those who assent to God) and al-mu”minån (those who have faith in MuÈammad). In the same manner, it also subtly distinguishes between al-mu”minån (those who have faith) and different categories of ‘unbelievers’ such as a l-k§firån (those who reject God), a l-mushrikån (those who violate God’s unity) and al-mujrimån (those who dissent from God).

It is absolutely vital for our reading of the Book to negate synonymity and to identify even the smallest semantic variation in the Book. And yet, our claim that there is no synonymity in the Book does not mean that we insist on an absolute difference between these terms. What we mean is that there are subtle semantic variations between these words that are by no means oppositional or antonymic. For example, the Arabic words al-jazm and al-jurm, al-jazz and al-Èazz, a l-batt and a l-qaãã, a l-batr and a l-shaãr, all connote the same root meaning, which is ‘to cut off’ (al-qaã# —yet another term); however, minor additional layers of meaning make each word unique and different from the others in this group.[84] Ignoring such subtle differences while writing or reading newspapers is bad enough, but we should not ignore them while reading Allah’s Book!

* Al-isl§m and al-muslimån

Now that we have established that al-isl§m and al-Êm§n are two different concepts and that the traditional understanding of al-isl§m’s five pillars is inaccurate, we can now redefine al-isl§m and its pillars according to the Book, applying the method of tartÊl,[85] that is, a thematic arrangement of the verses that contain the terms in question.

1. The term al-isl§m refers to an ‘assent to God’:

We learn that al-isl§m means belief in the existence of God, in His unity and in life after death; we learn that this belief contains an absolut4e, axiomatic truth, insofar as these articles of faith can neither be proved nor disproved by empirical evidence or scientific tests; and we learn that such beliefs are equally shared by all people in this world and are, as they are based on natural reason and instinct, intelligible to both common people and the intellectual elite (al-r§sikhån bi’l-#ilm).[86]

2. Al-isl§m (‘assent to God’) is a religion shared by the entire universe (and not just by the inhabitants of our globe):

We read in Sårat $l #Imr§n, ‘All creatures in the heavens and on earth, willing or unwilling, bowed to His will [aslama lahu],’ (3:83). We hear that these are rational beings that live in the many galaxies of this universe who—according to the Book—not only heard of God, the only One, but also assented to Him, subjectively and willingly because of God’s divinity (al-ulåhiyya) as well as objectively and dispassionately because of His sovereignty (a l-rubåbiyya). We also learn that this religion is called al-isl§m, meaning ‘belief in His existence and His unity’. This belief is a matter of utmost logic because Allah, the Highest, is our Lord, that is, the Lord of the sky and the earth, the Lord of what is in the sky and the earth, and what is between the sky and the earth.

3. The religion of al-isl§m and life as a muslim cannot be identified with MuÈammad’s (ß) messengerhood, nor with any other prophetical message:

We hear that Noah was a muslim, as were Abraham, Joseph, Jacob, Solomon, Moses, and Jesus. They all were muslims in spite of the fact that they were not contemporaries of MuÈammad (ß) and never performed the rituals he prescribed. Their faith was confined to belief in God and His unity. Everyone who believed in the existence of God and the Hereafter (the absolute, axiomatic truth) was a muslim, regardless of the individual messenger he followed, and regardless of the name of the religious community to which he belonged.

4. Al-isl§m is the only heavenly religion that humankind has ever known:

It has been transmitted by different messengers, each in his own way. A l-isl§m began with Noah and culminated in the Noble Prophet (ß), passing messengerhoods from Abraham, Jacob, Moses, and Jesus, undergoing several developments and passing through several periods, while facing a growing intellectual and material capability that its human recipients developed in dealing with subsequent messengerhoods.[87]

* The Definition of al-isl§m

Let us read again the words of the Book:

The believers, the Jews, the Christians and Sabians—whoever believes in Allah and the Last Day and does what is good, shall receive their reward from their Lord. They shall have nothing to fear and they shall not grieve. (Al-Baqara 2:62, MF)

Who is fairer in speech [aÈsana qaul[an]] than one who calls unto Allah and performs the righteous deed [#amila ß§liÈ[an]] and says: “I am one of those who submit [min al-muslimÊn]”. (Fußßilat 41:33, MF)

41:33 tells us that al-isl§m is based on the axiomatic truth of Allah’s existence and belief in the Hereafter. It is linked to ‘doing what is righteous’ (al-#amal al-ß§liÈ) and, because al-isl§m is the generic term that includes the particular, to ‘doing what is fair and just’ (al-iÈs§n), the pillar of al-Êm§n. If someone ‘does what is righteous’ he is one of the muslimån (‘those who assent to God),[88] and it does not matter whether he is—as 2:62 says—a follower of MuÈammad (ß) (‘the believers’), a follower of Moses (‘the Jews’), a follower of Jesus (‘the Christians’), or whether he follows any other religious creed or religious community of whatever name (‘the Sabians’).[89] The existence of Allah and the Hereafter—and that includes the resurrection of the dead—is an axiomatic truth that is indisputable for every muslim. If we accept this premise it will be clear what is meant by the phrase ‘the religion before Allah is al-isl§m’ and ‘if anyone desires a religion other than al-isl§m, never will it be accepted of Him’. It means that the only religion God can accept is the one inherently linked to belief in Him, which is a l-isl§m. A l-isl§m, in this context, means the opposite of disbelief, and it is disbelief (that is, a religiously held form of disbelief) which Allah cannot accept. It is only logical that Allah cannot accept from His creation a religion that refuses to believe in God altogether.

Dissent from God

In order to better understand the terms al-isl§m and al-muslimån in the Book we hence also need to study the term opposite to al-isl§m, which is a l-ijr§m (connoting a dissent from God) and the opposite term to al-muslimån, which is al-mujrimån (those who dissent from God). The Book says: ‘Shall we treat those who are [a l-muslimÊn] in the same way as those who are [al-mujrimÊn]?[] What has come upon you that you judge in such a wise?’ (A l-Qalam 68:35–36, AhA).[90] The root of the word al-mujrim is j-r-m whose basic meaning is ‘to cut off’. In modern Arabic we call a thief or a murderer a mujrim (i.e. culprit or criminal) because a mujrim has cut off his ties with law and order and has given free reign to his instincts and desires. This is exactly how the Book uses the term, because a ‘culprit’ in this context is someone who has cut off his ties with God, who denies His existence, who does not believe in the Hereafter, the resurrection of the dead, and the Day of Judgement. Unlike a muslim, who freely assents to God, a mujrim is someone who (freely) dissents from Him. In modern parlance, a mujrim would be called an ‘atheist’, a dissenter from God. In the Book ‘those who cut off their ties with God’ are defined as those who reject the possibility of a resurrection after death, who deny the existence of God, and who tell lies about the Hereafter. They are also described as those who, with their own eyes, suddenly will come to see what they have always denied: they will come out of their graves and be dumbstruck, while their astonishment will increase even more when they realise that they are, without being interrogated by Allah, being sent straight to Hell (whose existence they had always denied).[91]

Why are they not interrogated by Allah?[92] It is because a mujrim, a dissenting atheist, does not believe in the existence of God. This alone sends him straight to Hell. He will not even be asked by God about his acts in this world. The reason is that he has no account with God. The omission of prayer, the breaking of the fast, the tampering with weights and scales (corruption in trade and commerce) and such, which are all sins that Allah might forgive an assenter (muslim)[93], will not even be mentioned in the case of a dissenter, because a mujrim has cut off his ties with God. A person cannot be made accountable for things whose consequences for the Afterlife have never been acknowledged by him in the first place. The Book says:

Except the companions of the right hand. (They will be) in gardens (of delight): they will question each other, and ask of the sinners: “What led you into Fire?” They will say: “We were not of those [mußallÊn], nor were we of those who fed the indigent; but we used to talk vanities with vain talkers, and we used to deny the Day of Judgement.” (Al-Muddaththir 74:39–46)

We learn that the ‘companions of the right hand’ will ask the mujrimån what had led them into Hell. They will reply that they had not assented to al-isl§m—in belief and practice: they did not accept the existence of God and had cut off their ties with Him (‘We were not of those who [are connected to God]’); they also denied the Hereafter (‘we used to deny the Day of Judgement’), and they did nothing that was good for His creation (‘nor were we of those who fed the i ndigent’); instead, they did what was bad and harmful (‘we used to talk vanities with vain talkers’). Then came, all of a sudden, the Last Hour and they ended up in the Fire.

Some misguided exegetes interpreted the words ‘those who are connected to God’ as ‘those who prayed the ritual ßal§h prayer’. However, the Arabic term al-mußallÊn in 74:43 does not refer to the ritual prayer. Otherwise it would mean that those who omit the ritual prayer or a fasting day also deny the existence of God, which is simply not the case. It would be a gross injustice to call them ‘those who cut off their ties with God’ (a l-mujrimån) only because they missed a prayer. Evidence for this can be found in the following verses:

[Prophet], have you considered the person who denies the Judgement? It is he who pushes aside the orphans and does not urge others to feed the needy. So woe to those […] who are heedless of their [ßal§tihim], those who are all show and forbid common kindness. (A l-M§#ån 107:1–7, AH)

In these verses we hear that those who deny the Day of Judgement and those who deny the existence of God are regarded as those who have left the realm of al-isl§m and have instead entered the realm of al-ijr§m. We therefore do not interpret the expression ‘those who are a l-mußallån’ in both såras as literally ‘those who perform the ritual prayer’, in the sense of a prostration of the body, but more figuratively as ‘those who connect themselves to God’

(ßila).[94] Surely, one does not need rituals if one wants to strengthen one's ties with God. One may perhaps say 'Oh Lord, help me!' or 'Praise and Glory be to God', but no specific bodily gesture is needed to enhance one's spiritual attachment to Allah. There is clearly a difference between a person's individual attachment to God and a ritualised way to express it. This distinction is evident in the way the Book uses words derived from the triliteral root ß-l-w. If it wants to refer to the connection between the believer and God by way of rituals, it uses ßalawa, with the letter waw (as in Al-Når 24:37), [95] but if it refers to the personal, spiritual link with God which does not need to be o utwardly expressed by any conventional ritual, it uses ßal§h, with the letter y§ (as in A l-Når 24:41)[96]. We must never ignore these subtle differences, and if the text employs two derivatives of the same lexeme, when it could have used an identical expression, it indicates a difference. It indicates that we are meant to clearly distinguish between 'prayer' in the sense of a ritual, and 'prayer' in the sense of a spiritual connection between God and the believer, giving praise to Allah, mentally or verbally, but not by a movement of the body.

In sum, the term al-isl§m expresses a connection to God, a belief in Allah and the Hereafter; those who establish that spiritual connection (al-mußallån) are 'those who assent to God' (al-muslimån),[97] while those who perform the ritual prayer of rak#a and sujåd, that is, a l-ßal§h, are 'those who believe' (al-mu"minån).

The Pillars of al-isl§m

We are now in a position to redefine the three pillars of al-isl§m as they are presented in the Book. Let us begin with the first two pillars:

1. Belief in the existence of God

2. Belief in the Hereafter

As we said before, these two pillars contain elements of an axiomatic, indisputable truth which, once it is accepted, initiates a believer into the religion of al-isl§m. The first part of the shah§da, ‘There is no god but God’, is already the most elaborate expression of a theological doctrine in al-isl§m as it follows naturally from the more fundamental belief in the existence of God and the Hereafter. This doctrine was first expressed by the prophet Noah, and then reaffirmed by several messengers and prophets until it was finally sealed by MuÈammad

(ß).[98]

3. ‘Doing what is righteous’ (al-#amal al-ß§liÈ).

* The Good Work

Since the ethical fundaments of al-isl§m have always been ignored by our honourable scholars the following section is dedicated to studying the third pillar in more detail. The #ulam§“s negligence of ethics meant that it was excluded from both the pillars and tenets of al-isl§m and al-Êm§n, which is the reason why we should not brush over this important duty too quickly.

‘Doing what is righteous’ (a l-#amal a l-ß§liÈ) refers to the entire body of teachings, instructions, moral commandments and ethical ideals that all religions have issued throughout human history. We might call this body the common denominator of all existing heavenly religions on earth. A person who ‘does what is righteous’ is a muslim per se—regardless of whatever specific creed he or she upholds —on condition that this is based on belief in the existence of God and the Hereafter. Such general, absolute teachings and moral commandments were conveyed through the books and messages of previous prophets, starting with Noah and ending with MuÈammad (ß), a chain of prophetical instructions that absorbed a steady growth of ethical norms and an increasing accumulation of moral values. The reward for acting in accordance with these ethical ideals will be, as the Book promises, blissful life in the gardens of Paradise.[99]

In terms of their hierarchy, these ethical ideals are placed as the third pillar of al-isl§m after the statements of belief in God and the Hereafter. Ethical ideas are referred to by the Qur'anic phrases 'do worship God' (a#budå All§h) and the 'straight path' (a l-ßir§ã a l-mustaqim)[100], insofar as the worship of Allah (#ib§da) is the 'straight path'—see Y§-SÊn 36:61.[101] Ethics incorporate a system of human values that has binding force upon believers of every religion.[102] Consider the following verse:

In matters of faith [al-dÊn], He has laid down for you [shara#a lakum] [people] the same commandments [waß§] that He gave Noah, which We have revealed to you [Muhammad] and which We enjoined on Abraham, Moses, and Jesus: 'Uphold the faith and do not divide into factions within it'—what you [Prophet] call upon the idolaters to do is hard for them; God chooses whoever He pleases for Himself and guides towards Himself those who turn to Him. (Al-Shår§ 42:13, AH)

From this we learn that the religion (al-dÊn) which Allah 'has established for you' is al-isl§m, authorised by Him. It is the only religion that Allah will ever accept. It is a religion of guidance, of truth, and of moral values, finally revealed to the Prophet MuÈammad (ß) but with a history of constant maturation via previous prophets the first of which was Noah. We hear in this verse that Allah enjoined this religion on Noah, then on Abraham, Moses, and Jesus—He wanted them to 'remain steadfast in it'. We also learn that this enjoinment, or better these enjoinments, were jointly shared by all prophets, including MuÈammad ('the same religion has He established for you'). And yet, each of their enjoinments had been adapted to the historical circumstances in which the prophets lived, as a result of which their messages underwent a process of acculturation and proliferation.

What exactly were these enjoinments? According to the Book they came down in the form of commandments that are summed up by the term al-furq§n, to be rendered as ‘moral guidance’. Over time, the commandments increased in number, from Noah to Moses, until they reached ten. The ten commandments are called the ‘general or universal ethics’ (al-furq§n al-#§mm) and form the foundation of al-isl§m.

From Moses onwards they matured further and accumulated more commandments, until they were finally perfected in MuÈammad’s (ß) message. They are what we call ‘particular ethics’ (al-furq§n al-kh§ßß) and form the ethical foundation of al-Êm§n (and also of al-isl§m since al-isl§m is the general type of religion for al-Êm§n).

Al-isl§m and Universal Ethics

I will now explain both types of ethics. Let us first focus on what we call the ‘general’ or ‘universal’ ethics of al-isl§m and quote from the Book:

Say: “Come, I will rehearse what God has (really) prohibited you from”: Join not anything as equal with Him; be good to your parents; kill not your children on a plea of want. We provide sustenance for you and for them. Come not nigh to shameful deeds, whether open or secret; take not life, which God hath made sacred, except by way of justice and law: thus does He command you, that you may learn wisdom.

And come not nigh to the orphan’s property, except to improve it, until he attain the age of full strength; give measure and weight with (full) justice. No burden do We place on any soul, but that which it can bear. Whenever you speak, speak justly, even if a near relative is concerned; and fulfil the covenant of God: thus does He command you, that you may remember.

Verily, this is My way, leading straight, follow it; follow not (other) paths: they will scatter you about from His (great) path; thus does He command you that you may be righteous. (Al-An#§m 6:151–53)

These verses provide us with ten commandments (of which nine are moral orders and one a religious creed). Although many readers will know these ten commandments by heart it will be worth listing them one by one in order to emphasise their importance for the religion of al-isl§m (and al-Êm§n because al-Êm§n is the particular religion of al-isl§m). They can be summarised as follows:

1. ‘Join not anything as equal with Him’:

This religious creed refers to the witness of Allah’s unity (al-tauÈÊd) expressed in the formula ‘there is no god but God’. This is, as we saw above, the most important pillar of al-isl§m. It is the next step after accepting the existence of God and the Hereafter. A person might believe in God and the Hereafter but still remain in a state where he or she violates God’s unity

(a state which is defined as shirk).[103] The prophet Noah was the first to live up to this first (religious) commandment. According to the Book, after Noah, it was enjoined by other prophets, such as Abraham and Jacob, upon their tribes, families and all of their descendents.[104] This pillar is so fundamental that its rejection would be an unforgivable sin. This would turn a person into someone ‘who cut off his ties with Allah’ and into someone who denies the existence of God, the resurrection after death, the Day of Judgement, and the duty of ‘doing what is righteous’. It is a heinous crime which actually, according to the Book, is the only transgression for which no pardon can be expected from God.[105] What is also indeed ‘a sin most heinous’ is to make an image of God (to make Him anthropomorphic, hence the Arabic term altajsÊd), which is to give God a concrete, temporal, spatial, and material dimension, forgetting that He is beyond any such dimension or description. As we heard, Noah was the first prophet who prevented such a violation of God's unity. Other prophets followed suit, and MuÈammad (ß) finally completed this prophetical mission. But be assured that no compulsion is allowed (l§ ikr§h fÊhi) to achieve this goal.[106]

2. 'Be good to your parents':

This refers to your respect for your parents. It is, in principal, the first moral commandment which was first given to Noah,[107] and then passed on as Allah's revelation to MuÈammad (ß).[108] We gather from the text of the Book, in particular from 31:14 and 46:15,[109] that Allah addresses all human beings because He appeals to their general innate disposition of kindness. It implies that this injunction enjoys universal validity.

3. 'Kill not your children on a plea of want':

This third moral commandment is a ban to kill children out of a desperate financial situation. It was first stated as general ethics and then confirmed as particular ethics in MuÈammad's (ß) message (17:31).[110] However, we recognise that the Book clearly indicates a difference between general and particular ethics when it talks about the killing of children. In Sårat al-An#§m it says 'on a plea of want' (6:151), while in 17:31 it says 'for fear of want', indicating that in the first instance the situation of the people was actually really miserable, a very concrete case of economic crisis ('on a plea of want'), while in the second instance the prohibition was less specific as it referred to a situation in which people only feared or anticipated future plights due to the burden of having children ('for fear of want'). Also, Allah says first: 'We provide sustenance for you and for them' (6:151) but then changes it to 'We shall provide sustenance for them as well as for you' (17:31). In the first instance, Allah provides sustenance firstly for the parents ('for you') and then for the children ('for them'), whereas in the second instance, it is the other way around: God gives firstly sustenance to the children ('for them') and then feeds the parents in honour of the children they have raised (‘for you’). In the latter sequence of provision, the killing of children would deprive their parents of God’s sustenance, which is not the case according to the sequence of 17:31. In other words, the general prohibition to kill children ‘for fear of poverty’ has become even sharper in particular ethics. And yet, we should not see this as a command to have as many children as possible and not to introduce birth control and family planning. This is because nowhere does Allah link his assurance of sustenance with the number of children parents raise. There is absolutely no connection between the number of children and God’s provision of help and support; in fact, one child would be enough to secure God’s sustenance.

4. ‘Come not nigh to shameful deeds, whether open or secret’:

This fourth moral commandment perhaps illustrates best the evolutionary development of moral values and ethical ideals. Sexually ‘shameful deeds’ were first defined in the messengerhood of Lot through the prohibition of homosexuality. This was expanded by the prohibition of fornication by the Prophet Moses and finally further expanded by a ban on public acts of homosexuality by the Prophet MuÈammad (ß). Similarly, the lessening of the punishments for these sins evolved, as they underwent several changes from, for example, the most severe form, execution, to lighter ones such as flogging. What we also learn from this commandment is that chastity is one of the highest moral ideals, and that it lies at the root of human nature and the innate disposition (al-fiãra) instilled into humans by God.

5. ‘Take not life, which God has made sacred, except by way of justice and law’:

In the fifth moral commandment we notice that to kill another person is against the natural instincts of human beings. It implies that, unless provoked, humans will always refrain from such acts of violence. We know from psychological research that soldiers who have returned home from war face enormous difficulties in readjusting their daily life to the normality of human society. It shows how extraordinary was their life as soldiers.

6. ‘And come not nigh to the orphan’s property, except to improve it’:

The sixth moral commandment is further elaborated in Sårat a l-Nis§”, for example, by the instruction that one is only allowed to marry more than one wife if it is the intention of a man to better care and protect the life and property of orphans. This is fully explained in chapter 5.

7. ‘Give measure and weight with (full) justice’:

This seventh moral commandment implies that one should impose control and restrictions on how to set up the standard measures in trade transactions, and that one should impose harsh penalties against those who transgress against the officially accepted limits (of weights and measures)—as we hear in the Book: ‘Woe to those who give short measure, who demand of other people full measure for themselves, but give less than they should when it is they who weigh or measure for others!’ (Al-MuãaffifÊn 83:1–3, AH).

8. ‘Whenever you speak, speak justly, even if a near relative is concerned’:

The eighth moral commandment is a powerful call to give testimony truthfully and in all sincerity. This commandment has been given an even stronger note in MuÈammad’s (ß) message: ‘O you who believe! Stand out firmly for justice, as witnesses to God, even as against yourselves, or your parents, or your kin’ (Al-Nis§” 4:135).[111]

9. ‘Fulfil the covenant of God’:

The ninth moral commandment requires believers to avoid perjury or disloyalty against a person’s individual beliefs and, most naturally, against the covenant between God and humankind. Loyal believers are ‘those who fulfil the covenant of God and fail not in their plighted word’ (Al-Ra#d 13:20). The covenant of God consists of an alliance that people—by swearing an oath—publicly agree to act upon. Most importantly, this refers to the covenant of a l-isl§m but can include others, for example, the covenant of faith (a l-Êm§n), a marriage contract, the covenant of a nation state (the oath of citizenship), or the covenants of an occupational association (guild), a political party, or a sports club.

10. ‘Verily, this is My way, leading straight, follow it; follow not (other) paths’:

The tenth and last moral commandment urges people to follow the path of God and to fulfil the divine commandments unharmed by friction, animosity, and sectarian strife. It implies that unity, agreement, and concord between religions and denominations is a law of human nature and that it is a great offence to violate this law by stirring up animosity and hatred between religious communities. As the tenth commandment it comprises all other nine commandments as it urges the muslimån to fulfil them all and not to be content with only adhering to a few of them.

These are the commandments, or universal moral laws of al-isl§m, which we call general ethics (al-furq§n al-#§mm). Revealed long before the seventh century they were further elaborated and fully perfected in the form of MuÈammad’s (ß) messengerhood. We will now turn to the moral values that constitute what we call the particular ethics (al-furq§n al-kh§ßß) of al-Êm§n and that were revealed to seal the chains of messengerhoods. They fully established ‘faith’ (al-Êm§n) and completed al-isl§m.

* Al-Êm§n and Particular Ethics—The Straight Path

The Book contains several moral injunctions and ethical guidelines that, even though dispersed in many different såras, outline a consistent model of ethical behaviour, called the straight path of God (al-ßir§ã al-mustaqÊm). The most important injunctions are, in terms of their social impact, the call to spread peace (al-sal§m) and to speak in a mild-mannered way (al-lÊn fi'l-qaul). We learn from the Book that the meaning of al-sal§m is 'peace' (salm), that is, the avoidance of war and conflict. It is not—as our honourable scholars have it—just a form of greeting (as in 'peace be with you'). But let us provide some more examples of such moral injunctions as stated in the Book. For the good-hearted and well-mannered reader these rules may look trivial and rather obvious, but given that in the recent past we have seen scandalous degrees of immorality committed by Muslim-

Believers who have abandoned morality in favour of fanaticism and mindless ritualism we believe it is worth spelling them out here:

1. O you who believe! Let not some men among you laugh at others: it may be that the (latter) are better than the (former). Nor let some women laugh at others: it may be that the (latter) are better than the (former). Nor defame nor be sarcastic to each other, nor call each other by (offensive) nicknames… (Al-\ujur§t 49:11).

– This verse prohibits us from pouring scorn on fellow human beings (friends, neighbours and colleagues).

2. And do not speak ill of people behind their backs… (Al-\ujur§t 49:12, AH)

– This is a clear prohibition of calumny.

3. And do not spy on one another… (Al-\ujur§t 49:12, AH)

– This injunction includes all forms of spying and espionage, including the clandestine tapping of telephone calls, the opening of letters, and the bugging of flats and cars by state security services.

4. Do not follow blindly what you do not know to be true: ears, eyes, and heart, you will be questioned about all these. (Al-Isr§” 17:36, AH)

– This verse prohibits us from accusing other people (of a crime or sin) without clear evidence and hard (empirical) facts.

5. O you who believe! Enter into [a l-salm][112] whole-heartedly… (Al-Baqara 2:208)

Say not to any one who offers you [a l-sal§m][113]: “You are none of a believer!”… (Al-Nis§” 4:94)

But if the enemy incline towards peace, do you (also) towards peace [li’l-salm], and trust in Allah… (Al-Anf§l 8:61)

Therefore if they withdraw from you but fight you not, and (instead) send you (guarantees of) peace [al-salam], then God has opened no way for you (to war against them). (Al-Nis§” 4:90)

– These verses, inter alia, urge believers to spread peace and avoid war by pursuing a policy of peace and of resolving conflicts rationally and effectively by addressing adequately the needs of all involved parties.

6. Believers, do not enter other people’s houses until you have asked permission to do so and greeted those inside… (Al-Når 24:27, AH)

– This injunction refers to the duty to respect the property and privacy of houseowners.

7. If you find no one in, do not enter unless you have been given permission to do so. If you are told, ‘Go away’, then do so—that is more proper for you… (Al-Når 24:28, AH) – To enter and stay in a house requires the permission of its owner. If permission is not given one has to leave immediately.

8. You will not be blamed for entering houses where no one lives, and which could provide you with some useful service… (Al-Når 24:29,

AH)

– No one is allowed to move into an unoccupied house and stay there if it is not equipped with all the necessary household appliances.

9. Those who have been graced with bounty and plenty should not swear that they will [no longer] give to kinsmen, the poor, those who emigrated in God’s way: let them pardon and forgive… (Al-Når 24:22,

AH)

When death approaches one of you who leaves wealth, it is prescribed that he should make a proper bequest to parents and close relatives—a duty incumbent on those who are mindful of God. (Al-Baqara 2:180,

AH)

– This refers to the act of ‘doing what is fair and just’ (iÈs§n) to our closest relatives.

10. Alms [ßadaq§t] are for the poor [al-fuqar§”] and the handicapped [al-mas§kÊn]… (Al-Tawba 9:60)

– This refers to the act of ‘doing what is fair and just’ (iÈs§n) to the poor and the handicapped people.

11. …and do good to parents, kinsfolk, orphans, those in need, neighbours who are near, neighbours who are strangers, the companion by your side, the wayfarer (you meet)… (Al-Nis§” 4:36)

– This refers to the act of ‘doing what is fair and just’ (iÈs§n) to our next-door neighbours and to neighbours and acquaintances who live farther away. It also urges us to be kind to the traveller and wayfarer, that is, people ‘on the move’ who stay with us as guests.

12. [It is righteous] to spend of your substance, out of love for Him, for friends and acquaintances who are not blood-related [dhawÊ ’l-qurba], for orphans [al-yat§mÊ], for the handicapped people [al-mas§kÊn], the ‘men of the road’ who, while on travel, stranded because of mishaps such as robbery or car accidents [ibn al-sabÊl] … (Al-Baqara 2:177)

Alms [ßadaq§t] are for the poor [al-fuqar§”] and the handicapped [al-mas§kÊn], and those who administer the zak§h tax [al-#§milÊn #alaih§]; people whose work has a positive impact on public life [a l-mu”allafa qulåbuhum]; the financially enslaved [fi’l-riq§b] and people in debt and imprisoned because of their insolvency [al-gh§rimÊn]; those who sponsor the foundation of universities, schools, hospitals [fÊ sabÊl All§h]; and travellers in need of help [ibn al-sabÊl]. … (Al-Tawba 9:60)[114]

– This refers to the act of ‘doing what is fair and just’ (iÈs§n) to people in need.

13. Those who, when they spend, are not extravagant and not niggardly, but hold a just (balance) between those (extremes). (A l-Furq§n 25:67)

– This verse urges us to be prudent in what we spend, in private or public.

14. The duty of spending (zak§h) refers to the realm of al-isl§m, but it is an amount on top of what has already been spent within the realm of al-Êm§n. Zak§t al-isl§m may be given to anybody, not just to the followers of MuÈammad (ß). In contrast, zak§t al-Êm§n is given only to the followers of MuÈammad (ß)—the minimum amount is 2.5 percent of accumulated profit.

O you who believe! Fulfil (all) obligations! (Al-M§“ida 5:1)

– This is a moral obligation to fulfil all our contracts and written agreements.

15. You who believe, when you contract a debt for a stated term, put it down in writing: have a scribe write it down justly between you… (Al-Baqara 2:282, AH)

– This is, finally, an obligation to write down ‘in black and white’ what money or property we owe, as well as what we have lent to other people.

These are only a few examples of the many injunctions and ethical guidelines for a l-Êm§n that can be found in the Book. Every moral guideline or ethical teaching that existed before MuÈammad's messengerhood and which contradicts the above list of injunctions must be seen as repealed or abrogated. This is because the ethical rules of al-isl§m were subject to abrogation, a process that started—as we heard—with Noah and ended with MuÈammad (ß). As for MuÈammad's (ß) messengerhood, it was not subject to abrogation, therefore there is nothing in it that can be classified as abrogating or abrogated. His message has, instead, confirmed certain rules that were sent before, and has added rules or abolished others in order to complete al-isl§m. In doing so, it abrogated other previous messages that were revealed to prophets before him (i.e., before al-Êm§n). MuÈammad (ß) sealed (or put an end to) this successive, continuous abrogation whereby each new message abrogated the previous, older ones.[115]

The following explanations are intended to clarify the nature of the universal ethical laws of al-isl§m which are shared but not exclusively embodied by al-Êm§n:

1. These ethical guidelines are meant to restrain human behaviour. One may call them our inner conscience (al-·amÊr), something we attain through education.

2. They are essential, innate moral values that exist only within our human consciousness. One can easily transgress ethical rules and violate moral injunctions because they are, insofar as they do not objectively exist, inherently weak. Therefore, every civilized society is compelled to firmly establish them as social rules by way of reward and sanction. Those who dare to undermine these values by reckless, unsocial behaviour must be prosecuted without mercy.

3. In principle, these guidelines do not need to be explained to people nor should they be imposed upon people by force, because they are part of a human's innate disposition, and people therefore absorb these moral values naturally and instinctively. Thus, sincerity and honesty are natural virtues, while fraud and deceit are despicable. These things are neither culturally nor historically conditioned.

4. These moral injunctions are social obligations that cannot be disputed or become the subject of public referenda. They are social facts whose content and meaning are unambiguous. Lies or disrespect of parents will always be seen as repulsive behaviour and cannot be reinterpreted as honesty or respect. To establish these moral values as social norms does not imply a denial that immorality and evil exist in this world. Al-isl§m is a realistic and pragmatic religion in which there is no room for beatified, unreal visions or fantasies. It knows how to accept both good and evil in this world, in the same way as it acknowledges the existence of death. We hear it in the Book: ‘Every soul shall have a taste of death; and We test you by evil and by good by way of trial. To Us must you return’ (Al-Anbiy§” 21:35).

5. These guidelines reflect universal values that encompass all periods of human history. This means that their ethical truth is hidden beneath their explicit expressions in the Book. The vast potential of ethical truth is not exhausted by explicit expressions of moral guidelines. In other words, one may add other moral guidelines and expand on those that already exist. What is required is human wisdom, not divine revelation. Moral guidelines are formulated by the most astute people of a society who know how to harmonise ethical rules with the life experiences of the common people and how to link them to the accumulated wisdom of their cultural past. Undoubtedly, history offers people much wisdom and is, at the same time, their fiercest admonisher, since it relentlessly mirrors the real experiences that people have in their daily lives.

6. All these moral guidelines are firmly interlinked, forming a holistic net of strings and connections; no partition or division is allowed, because there is only one, undividable path. The Book puts it like this: ‘Verily, this is My way, leading straight, follow it…’ (A l-An#§m 6:151–53).

7. To adhere to these moral guidelines does not depend on the individual’s strength and human capability. To believe in God and to follow these moral commandments requires neither special skills nor high intelligence. One does not need to be exceptionally gifted in order to know that the killing of other people is wrong. Such an aversion is engrained in human nature. One may, perhaps, compare the pillars of a l-isl§m and its commandments to what we know from counting goals in football: it is, for example, either 1 or 0 but never anything in between. The Book says: ‘O believers, fear Allah as He should be feared, and do not die except as Muslims [ill§ waantum muslimån]’ ($l #Imr§n 3:102, MF). It means that al-isl§m and its pillars demand that we fear Allah as He should be feared. And everyone who thinks this verse has been abrogated by verse 64:16 has been spitefully deceived.[116]

Morality (a l-akhl§q) is here understood as a sociospiritual law that lays the foundation of the relationship between the members of the human race. It distinguishes human beings from animals and it is effective, regardless of the economic structure in a society. The morality of al-isl§m is characterised by universal validity. It achieves its characteristic as ‘general ethics’ through its status as divine revelation. This morality differs from mere custom and tradition, which, although mentioned in the Book, were neither stated as precise rules nor—because of their nature as constantly changing social practice— explicitly particular norms. In contrast, social ethics were revealed in the form of commandments, the a l-furq§n, from Noah onwards until MuÈammad (ß). They are still valid at the present time and are shared by many different cultures in the world; they are enforced regardless of the nature of the economic system or social environment. In sum, they are the common (human) denominator which unites cultures, political systems, race, class, and gender. They directly influence the individual’s social behaviour once they have been institutionalised as a cultural norm or common practice. What every Arab Muslim must realise is that, contrary to what is currently believed, social obligations towards society are first and foremost moral obligations and only secondarily religious duties or politica llegal obligations.[117]

The traditional understanding of al-isl§m has seriously corrupted our minds and has caused us to stagnate in our thinking of al-isl§m. The fateful error of defining religion exclusively in terms of the performance of the rituals of a l-Êm§n, and the false labelling of these rituals as pillars of al-isl§m, has meant that religion was defined in isolation from ethical laws that are universally applicable. It meant that a person’s religiosity was measured solely by his or her fulfilment of ritual obligations, regardless of that person’s moral or social behaviour in society. The confusion of al-isl§m with al-Êm§n has produced other conceptual difficulties, for example, the confusion between several different degrees of ‘permission’ and ‘prohibition’, such as, a) a l-Èal§l / a l-Èar§m, what is absolutely allowed / absolute taboo (and which can only be decreed by God), and b) al-masmåÈ / al-mamnå#, what is permitted / forbidden (which is decreed by positive law), c) al-ma#råf / al-munkar, what is prescribed as right / proscribed as wrong (the result of popular practice and social conventions), d) al-Èasan / al-qabÊÈ, what is good or bad (and which is subject to the personal taste of each individual). This confusion between legal, social, and moral rules, and the muddling of the many different levels of jurisdictions, has created this dreadful current trend among many Muslims to excessively label things as absolute taboos (i.e., Èar§m), for which there is no evidence in the divine text of the Book. We hear, for example, that for a woman to show her face in public, to hear a woman’s voice, to play musical instruments, to make sculptures, to take photographs, or, for fear that the devil might slip into someone’s mouth, to yawn with one’s mouth open, even to clip one’s fingernails at night, all things that are normal everyday activities, have suddenly become absolute taboos! We should remember that the great sins in al-isl§m are only those acts that transgress the ten commandments of the universal furq§n. Everyone who claims that there are seventy major sins, or even seven hundred, has been thoroughly misled.[118]

* Faith and Believers

The Term al-Êm§n (Faith) in the Book

Let us come back to the main topic of this chapter, which explores the distinction between al-isl§m and al-Êm§n. So far we have defined al-isl§m and its fundamental pillars, so now we need to do the same with al-Êm§n. The following list of characteristics of al-Êm§n has been derived from our systematic search through the Book, in which we analysed every single verse that is relevant to the topic. The outcome of this analysis can be summarized as follows:

1. Al-isl§m always takes precedence over al-Êm§n:

Historically and conceptually al-Êm§n proceeds from al-isl§m or, to put it the other way, a l-isl§m always (and necessarily) precedes al-Êm§n.

The desert Arabs say, “We believe.” Say, “You have no faith; but you (only) say, ‘We have submitted our wills to God [aslamn§]’, for not yet has faith [al-Êm§n] entered your hearts. (Al-\ujur§t 49:14)

2. Al-isl§m and al-Êm§n mean two different types of faith:

The first, a l-isl§m, contains the tripartite belief in a) the existence and oneness of God, b) the Hereafter, and c) God’s command to ‘do what is righteous’. Al-isl§m commands and incorporates all other types of faith, including a l-Êm§n. It implies that any form of particular religious faith must conform to these three general pillars of belief. Verse 4:137 below states that a system of faith that omits these pillars basically rejects beliefs and is called kufr.

Those who believe, then reject faith [kafarå], then believe (again) and (again) reject faith [kafarå], and go on increasing in unbelief [kufr [an]]—God will not forgive them nor guide them nor guide them on the way. (Al-Nis§” 4:137)

The second, al-Êm§n, is defined as belief in MuÈammad (ß) and his messengerhood, including belief in the Book and its message as well as the books that were revealed before the Apostle (ß)—as stated in 4:136 addressed to ‘those who believe’ (alladhÊn §manå).

O you who believe! Believe in God and His Apostle, and the scripture which He has sent to His apostle and the scripture which He sent to those before (him).... (Al-Nis§” 4:136)

Whereas the adherents of al-isl§m are the Muslim-Assenters (a l-muslimån), the followers of a l-Êm§n are Muslim-Believers (al-mu”minån).[119]

3. Al-isl§m and a l-Êm§n combined receive a ‘double portion’ of God’s mercy:

According to verse 57:28, Allah promises to bestow on ‘those who fear God’ (the Muslim-Assenters) and on ‘those who believe in MuÈammad (ß)’ (the Muslim-Believers) a double share of His mercy.

O you who believe! Fear God, and believe in His apostle, and He will bestow on you a double portion of His mercy: He will provide for you a light by which you shall walk (straight in your path), and He will forgive you (your past)... (Al-\adÊd 57:28) In a more abstract way it looks like this:

Those who assent to God—first type of faith— al-isl§m—the first share of mercy;

Those who believe in His Apostle—second type of faith— al-Êm§n—the s econd share of mercy.

4. Divine reward is given to both types of believers:

Those who believe in God and the Hereafter (the muslimån) will receive God’s reward, and those who in addition believe specifically in the Book revealed in Arabic (the mu”minån) will be rewarded twice:

And when it is recited to them, they say: “We believe therein, for it is the truth from our Lord: indeed we have been Muslims (bowing to God’s will) from before this.” Twice will they be given their reward, for that they have persevered… (Al-Qaßaß 28:53–54)

5. The term al-Êm§n is always linked to a relationship with a specific messenger:

Whenever it is said in the text that someone ‘believed’ (§mana) in a specific messenger, it implies that this person followed this messenger as a disciple, novice, or member of a specific religious community:

And when Our Decree came, We saved Hud and those who believed with him, by a mercy of Ours… (Håd 11:58, MF) And when Our Decree came, We delivered Shu#ayb and those who believed with him by a mercy of Ours… (Håd 11:94, MF)

The Book calls ‘those who believed in Moses’ Jews, members of the Jewish community. It calls ‘those who believed in Jesus’ a l-naß§r§ (Christians), either because they supported and protected (naßarå) Jesus and became his followers (anß§ruhu), or because they were from the city of Nazareth (al-n§ßira)—in either case they were members of the Christian community.

<right>

When the text mentions ‘those who believed in MuÈammad

</right>

(ß)', they are referred to as the 'believers':

O Prophet! Allah is Sufficient for you and so are the believers

[al-mu"minÊn] who follow you. (Al-Anf§l 8:64)[120]

6. Al-Êm§n is a specific type of piety:

There exists three types of piety. The first type is the piety of al-isl§m, expressed as belief in Allah, the Hereafter, and 'doing what is righteous'. Muslims all over this world, including Christians, Jews, New Age groups, and followers of MuÈammad (ß) and so forth, practise this type of piety. The second type is the piety of faith (a l-Êm§n), expressed as belief in a specific messenger and the book that was revealed to him; the 'Muslim-Believers' embody this type of piety. The third type is a combination of the first and second types of piety (al-isl§m + al-Êm§n) that can be practised through al-iÈs§n (particular ethics), because the Book states Allah's love for those who practise the piety of 'doing what is fair and just':

On those who believe and do deeds of righteousness there is no blame for what they ate (in the past), when they guard themselves from evil, and believe, and do deeds of righteousness, (or) again, guard themselves from evil and believe, (or) again, guard themselves from evil and do good. For God loves those who do good [All§h[u] yuÈibb[u] al-muÈsinÊn[a]]. (Al-M§"ida 5:93)

* The Pillars of al-Êm§n

The tenets a l-Êm§n (faith in MuÈammad (ß) and in his messengerhood) allow a gradual growth of piety from the fundaments of al-isl§m to a higher form of belief. The Book reflects upon the spiritual development of those who already have a firm belief in Allah, the Hereafter and 'doing what is righteous', in sum, al-isl§m. The following pillars of a l-Êm§n are built—perhaps similar to the sublime top floor of a massive building—upon the pillars of al-isl§m:

1. The witness (al-shah§da) that MuÈammad (ß) is Allah's apostle:

But those who believe and work deeds of righteousness, and believe in the (revelation) sent down to Muhammad… (MuÈammad

47:2)

Only those are believers who have believed in God and His apostle, and have never since doubted, but have striven with their belongings and their persons in the cause of God: such are the sincere ones… (MuÈammad 47:15)

2. The prayer 'at stated times':

For such prayers are enjoined on believers at stated times. (Al-Nis§" 4:103)

3. The giving of alms tax (spending). Note that spending (al-inf§q) is a pillar common to both a l-isl§m and a l-Êm§n because spending has a social (care for other people) as well as a spiritual dimension (the wish to come closer to God). The difference, however, is that spending in a l-isl§m is a natural act ensuing from the humans' innate disposition (a l-fiãra) —'Whatever good you give, shall be rendered back to you…' (Al-Baqara

2:272)—while spending on the zak§h tax in al-Êm§n is a social burden that does not come naturally:

[How] prosperous are the believers! […] who pay the prescribed alms. (Al-Mu”minån 23:1, 4, AH)[121]

4. The fast in the month of Ramadan:

O you who believe! Fasting is prescribed to you… (A l-Baqara 2:183)

5. The pilgrimage to Mecca by ‘those who can afford the journey’:

…Pilgrimage thereto is a duty men owe to God—those who can afford the journey… ($l #Imr§n 3:97)

6. Consultation:

[Those who] respond to their Lord; keep up the prayer; conduct their affairs by mutual consultation… (Al-Shår§ 42:38, AH)

7. The fight in God’s way (note: ‘there is no compulsion in religion’, Al-Baqara 2:256) for freedom, justice, and equality:[122]

Fighting is ordained for you, though you dislike it… (A l-Baqara 2:216, AH)

These seven pillars of al-Êm§n are not exclusive but also include the pillars of al-isl§m, such as belief in Allah, the Hereafter, and ‘doing what is righteous’. Muslim-Assenters (al-muslimån) who, in addition, seek to become Muslim-Believers (al-mu”minån) are therefore fully obliged not to forget their commitment to fulfilling al-isl§m’s three pillars of faith. As we laid out above, the fundamental difference between the two kinds of faith is that al-isl§m is the innate (natural) disposition of all people in this world, while a l-Êm§n is a form of ritual worship that contradicts humans’ innate disposition. Through these rituals, adherents of al-Êm§n differ from those who are not ahl al-Êm§n, but they do not differ in their moral behaviour (respect for parents, avoidance of fraud and perjury, etc.), which is universally articulated in similar ways.

As for the problem of disbelief (al-kufr), we have said that the Book correlates two kinds of disbelief to the two types of faith: disbelief in the realm of al-isl§m and disbelief in the realm of al-Êm§n. The first kind of disbelief negates the existence of God, the Hereafter and ‘doing what is righteous’; it undermines the fundaments of al-isl§m. Al-k§fir bi’l-ll§h is, in short, an atheist who has dissented from God. The second kind of disbelief rejects belief in MuÈammad (ß) and his book. It refers to someone who refuses to acknowledge both MuÈammad’s prophethood (al-k§fir bi-nubåwatihi) and his messengerhood (al-k§fir bi-ris§latihi). Both kinds of disbelief must be expressed in deliberate, fully articulated, and publicly stated views by which the disbelievers antipathetically oppose either kind of faith. Only those who have declared their disbelief in such an open and antagonistic manner, like for example Abå Lahab who became a k§fir because he was openly hostile towards MuÈammad (ß), shall be declared infidels. Others who did not openly contradict MuÈammad’s message even though they did not believe in it, were—quite rightly so—not regarded as k§firs.

O you who believe! Believe in God and His Apostle, and the scripture which He has sent to His apostle and the scripture which He sent to those before (him)… (Al-Nis§” 4:136)

‘Those who believe, then reject faith, then believe (again) and (again) reject faith, and go on increasing in unbelief—God will not forgive them nor guide them nor guide them on the way.’ (Al-Nis§” 4:137)

* Al-isl§m and al-Êm§n

Having established the true pillars of al-isl§m and al-Êm§n we can now extend our study of the differences between the two realms of faith: Al-isl§m means faith that entails belief in Allah, the Hereafter, and ‘doing what is righteous’; al-Êm§n, in contrast, pertains to faith in the truth of messengerhoods, that is, divine revelations put down in heavenly scriptures and transmitted by God’s apostles, and finally in ‘doing what is fair and just’. A Muslim-Assenter (al-muslim) can also be a Muslim-Believer (al-mu”min), but not all Muslim-Assenters are Muslim-Believers. One might, for example, believe in God, the Hereafter, and ‘doing what is righteous’ and still not believe in MuÈammad’s (ß) messengerhood. However, a Muslim-Believer is, by definition and self-designation, a Muslim-Assenter too, since a believer always assents to God.

Al-isl§m is the more general type of faith. It is the universal, human religion of all people on earth. That is the reason why it is called ‘Islamic religion’ (a l-dÊn a l-isl§mÊ), not ‘religion of faith’ (a l-dÊn a l-Êm§nÊ). We also remember that God said: ‘the religion before Allah is al-isl§m’ ($l #Imr§n 3:19) and ‘if anyone desires a religion other than al-isl§m, never will it be accepted of Him’ ($l #Imr§n 3:85). Al-Êm§n, in contrast, is a very specific term for those who follow MuÈammad (ß).[123] Allah has coined the term ‘believers’ (al-mu”minån) to refer to those who believe in His Prophet (ß). The term ‘commander of the faithful’ (amÊr al-mu”minÊn) has been specifically created for Muslim-Believers. It was first used during the reign of #Umar b. al-Khaãã§b; note that the Caliph was not called ‘commander of the Muslims’ (amÊr a l-muslimÊn). Also, the wives of the Apostle MuÈammad (ß) were called ‘mothers of the believers’ (ummah§t al-mu”minÊn) and not ‘mothers of the Muslims’!

Al-isl§m is consistent with human nature (al-fiãra), but al-Êm§n is not. To believe in God—and only one God—can be compared to the natural instinct of an ant that cannot help but be trampled underfoot by its fellow ants or with a tortoise that digs holes in the banks of a river or the seashore to hatch its eggs there. In other words, we are naturally disposed to believe in God and ‘do what is righteous’. The Book says:

Say: “I am but a man like yourselves, (but) the inspiration has come to me, that your God is one God: whoever expects to meet his Lord, let him work righteousness, and, in the worship of his Lord, admit no one as partner. (Al-Kahf 18:110)

And your Lord taught the bee to build its cells in hills… (Al-NaÈl 16:68)

The natural disposition of humans was created by God Himself. Nobody else interfered in this process of creation. That is the reason why we read:

Indeed We showed you favour before. We inspired your mother… (•§-H§” 20:37–38, AH)

We also read that when the Arabs came to tell MuÈammad (ß) that they had embraced a l-isl§m, God ordered MuÈammad (ß) to let them know that their assent to God was not his (MuÈammad’s) doing but rather because of ‘God’s favour He conferred upon’ them:

They think they have done you [Prophet] a favour by submitting. Say, ‘Do not consider your submission [isl§makum] a favour to me; it is God who has done you a favour, by guiding you to faith, if you are truly sincere’. (Al-\ujur§t 49:17, AH)

In al-isl§m, human nature does not need instructions from heavenly scriptures, but in contrast a l-Êm§n, containing ritual performances, codes of human behaviour, and ethical rules, does require guidance from divine scriptures. By Allah’s grace, messengers were sent to the peoples to bring them the light of the truth and instructions on how to worship God. Now we understand why God has said, in chastising those who disbelieved in MuÈammad’s messengerhood, that al-isl§m must still be the minimum (the lowest limit) of belief that is required of them. He said:

Again and again will those who disbelieve wish that they had bowed (to God’s will) in Islam [lau k§nå muslimÊn]. (Al-\ijr 15:2)

Piety in al-isl§m means ‘to fear God as He should be feared’, while piety in al-Êm§n is ‘to fear God as much as you can’. We read in the Book:

O you who believe! Fear God as He should be feared, and die not except in a state of Islam. ($l #Imr§n 3:102)

So fear God as much as you can; listen and obey and spend in charity for the benefit of your own soul… (Al-Tagh§bån 64:16)

On no soul does God place a burden greater than it can bear…

(Al-Baqara 2:286)

We learn from 2:286 that Allah set the task of fulfilling religious obligations in accordance with the strength and ability of each believer. We know from experience that human beings differ in their abilities and that some people are more pious than others because they are given greater spiritual strength.

Such diversity, however, contradicts verse 3:102, which orders the believer to ‘fear God as He should be feared’. No allowance is given for varying degrees of piety. But a contradiction between text and reality is inconceivable. How can we solve this problem?

The exact wording of the first verse provides an answer. It begins by addressing those ‘who believe’ (alladhÊna §manå). Given that the Book distinguishes between two kinds of faith we need to ask which of the two is meant here. The way the verse ends provides a clue. It refers to ‘a state in Islam’, that is, to those who believe in God, in the Hereafter, and in ‘doing what is righteous’. We infer from this that these are the Muslim-Assenters and that the verse addresses only the muslimån, whereas the second verse (64:16), ‘fear God as much as you can’, is addressed to the mu”minån, the believers who believe in MuÈammad (ß).

The difference is that in a l-isl§m faith needs to be rigorously implemented, whereas al-Êm§n allows different degrees of piety and spirituality. In al-isl§m:

a) One possesses belief in the existence of God regardless of one’s strength or abilities;

b) It is inconceivable that one believes in God for an hour and then stops doing so in the next;

c) It is impossible to practise falsehood or commit adultery because of a lack of strength or ability; for example, it would be frivolous if someone claimed that he did his best not to fornicate but could not help it or, even worse, that he tried very hard not to kill someone but in the end could not avoid it happening. We would certainly never respond to such acts by saying to the perpetrator: ‘Never mind, on no soul doth God place a burden greater than it can bear….”!

Therefore, the command to ‘fear God as He should be feared’ belongs only to the pillars of a l-isl§m and is part of the innate disposition of humans that guides moral behaviour. This is the reason why the verse ends by saying: ‘die not except in a state of al-isl§m’.

As for the pillars of a l-Êm§n, we fear God according to our strength and ability (‘On no soul does God place a burden greater than it can bear’). It is important to note that the previous verse, 2:285, starts with the phrase ‘The messenger believes in what has been revealed to him from his Lord, as do the men of faith [al-mu”minån]’. In al-Êm§n, the sick believer is exempted from fasting because he is not strong enough to do so; pilgrimage is subject to the ability of the pilgrim to do the journey; jih§d is no obligation for those who are unable to practise it; no alms tax is required from those who cannot afford it; and consultation is subject to historical circumstances since no absolute model is given of how to conduct it. All religious obligations of al-Êm§n are not absolute but relative and subject to historical change, and since they are not part of the human innate disposition (al-fiãra) they are practised in accordance with an individual’s strength and ability.

The overarching capital of all pillars of al-isl§m is → to witness that ‘there is no god but God’ → that is, the worship[124] of Allah (performed by the Muslim-Assenters or al-muslimån);

The overarching capital of all pillars of al-Êm§n is → to witness that ‘MuÈammad (ß) is the messenger of God’ → i.e. the obligatory rituals (performed by the Muslim-Believers or al-mu”minån).

Those who jump directly into the realm of al-Êm§n without having passed the stage of al-isl§m are called ‘hypocrites’. The Book says:

When the hypocrites come to you [Prophet], they say, ‘We bear witness that you are the Messenger of God.’ God knows that you truly are His Messenger and He bears witness that the hypocrites are liars. (Al-Mun§fiqån 63:1, AH)

This verse teaches us that if someone performs the ritual prayer as part of al-Êm§n, but ignores the ethical commands as part of al-isl§m, he is a ‘hypocrite’, even if he rigidly observes the prayer times, the duty of the fast, and the \ajj rite.

The following chart demonstrates how the Book distinguishes between the two types of faith—even within one single verse:

| Faith: Type 1 (the Muslims) | | Faith: Type 2 (the Believers) |

| ‘But those who believe and work deeds of righteousness…’ (1) | → | ‘…and believe in the (revelation) sent down to

Muhammad…’ (2)

(MuÈammad 47:2) |

| ‘O you who believe!

Fear God…’ (1) | → | ‘…and believe in His apostle…’ (2) (Al-\adÊd 57:28) |

| Allah’s first portion of mercy (1) | ‘…He will bestow on you a double portion of His mercy…’ (Al-\adÊd 57:28) | Allah’s second portion of mercy (2) |

| ‘O you who believe!…’

(1) | → | ‘…Believe in God and His Apostle…’ (2) (Al-Nis§” 4:136) |

| ‘Those who believe, then reject faith…’ (1) | → | ‘…then believe (again) and (again) reject faith…’ (2)

(Al-Nis§” 4:137) |

| ‘On those who believe and do deeds of righteousness…’ (1) | → | …when they guard themselves from evil, and believe, and do deeds of righteousness, (1 + 2) (or) again, guard themselves from evil and believe, (or) again, guard themselves from evil and do good (2) (Al-M§“ida 5:93) |  A Moral Understanding of al-iÈs§n

Finally, we turn to the concept of ‘doing what is fair and just’

(al-iÈs§n), the crucial moral term for al-Êm§n. In short, ‘doing what is fair and just’ means doing good deeds that fight evil acts and misdeeds. Hence, good and bad deeds stand in a dialectical relationship. Good deeds are for the benefit of humankind and other creatures, while bad deeds bring them harm. This is, in simplest terms, the general definition of al-iÈs§n. It has nothing to do with human behaviour in the eyes of God, because He, in His omnipotence, sublime majesty, and perfection, is above human deeds and misdeeds. Al-iÈs§n is purely defined by the way we interact as human beings in this world.

Worryingly, the lack of clarity in defining the term a l-iÈs§n has always been the Achilles heel of the way moral ethics have been conceptualised in Islam. By describing it purely as a Sufi term (‘to act as if God sees you’, etc.), we forget that al-iÈs§n actually means that we should respect one another and care for those close to us, that is, our spouses, children, neighbours, and parents, as we are told by the Book:

…and do good [iÈs§n[an]] to parents, kinsfolk, orphans, those in need, neighbours who are near, neighbours who are strangers, the companion by your side, the wayfarer (you meet), and what your right hands possess… (Al-Nis§” 4:36)

If we do something bad we are requested to do something good in compensation for the bad deed. We are reminded that we should judge others by their deeds and good work, not their outward appearance. It is like a warning that we should not judge, for example, a woman by what she wears or whether she is veiled or not, but by the deeds she has done for others and for society as a whole. This means that we act righteously and justly by working for others and not by following rigid dress codes or other shallow norms of external religious correctness. The moral aspect of al-iÈs§n has been tragically ignored by contemporary Arab believers, to the point where people are now more obsessed with appearance than with good deeds.

But do our physicians not do good deeds by taking care of their patients? And do not lawyers, teachers, builders, farmers, and so on do al-iÈs§n by being good and professional in their work? Is it not high time to open a completely new chapter of fiqh and write it under the title ‘Good deeds at work”? In that chapter, we would talk about competence and excellence in performing good deeds in all spheres of life, perhaps one section for each sphere (good work at home; good work in our neighbourhoods; good work for the environment; good work for spiritual happiness; good work as citizens, etc.). What would be important to write is that all good deeds are firmly located in this world. We cannot ignore the fact that this world is the field where the seeds of the Afterlife grow, even if we acknowledge the existence of the next world. But without life in this world Hell and Paradise would not make sense, neither would the Day of Judgement or the concepts of reward and punishment. Once we have grasped the dialectics between this world and the Next, we are able to nourish this life and give it meaning. We will then be able to fully participate in establishing a prosperous human society that can positively influence the course of events in history.

Let us look at these two verses from the Book:

Nay, whoever submits his whole self to God and is a doer of good [muÈsin], he will get his reward with his Lord… (Al-Baqara 2:112) Who can be better [aÈsana] in religion than one who submits his whole self to God, does good [huwa muÈsin], and follows the way [milla] of Abraham the true in faith [ÈanÊf [an]]? For God did take Abraham for a friend. (Al-Nis§” 4:125)

In both verses the category of a person who is a ‘doer of good’ (a l-muÈsin) is discussed. We hear in the first verse (2:112) that the Afterlife is intrinsically linked to ‘doing what is fair and just’ in this world. As we have said above, this world lays the foundation for our life in the next world where we will reap the fruits of our work in this world. We learn that good deeds are recorded by Allah for each individual soul, because the Book says ‘he will get his reward with his Lord’, using the singular (his), which indicates an individual account with God, and not the plural form (their), that is, a collective account. When it uses the plural form as in ‘on such shall be no fear (for them), nor shall they grieve’[125], it is directed to the entire group of muÈsinån in the next world, reminding us in more general terms that ‘doing what is fair and just’ in this world does not entail losing sight of the Next. In the second verse (4:125) we hear that ‘who can be better in religion than one who submits his whole self to God’. We learn that every religious community, of whatever name or title, in which there is a person who assents to God (and who is someone who is ‘doing what is fair and just’), will find God’s approval.

The same verse clarifies the dialectics between the individual and society in terms of ‘doing what is fair and just’. The verse links the opening part that talks about al-iÈs§n with the concluding part that talks about the ‘way (milla) of Abraham’ who is called a ÈanÊf. We gather from this link that ‘doing what is fair and just’ is part of ‘the true way of faith’ (al-ÈanÊfiyya)[126] which is embodied in the community of Abraham (millat Ibr§hÊm).[127] Note that the text does not say ‘religion of Abraham’ but ‘community of Abraham’, because ‘religion’ (dÊn) is different from ‘community’ (milla). Religion consists of all those civil and ethical rules which are upheld by ‘doing what is fair and just’ and which define the relationship between individuals and society. The Book tells us that there is only one religion in this world—and this is al-isl§m. As for the term ‘community’, it refers to the assembly of like-minded people who translate these ethical rules into concrete norms of behaviour that are obligatory for the members of this community. Their sociocommunal behaviour is based on the principle of ÈanÊfiyya, which means that in the way they formulate and translate these ethical rules they are influenced by the historical context in which they live. Allah has given us rules that are fixed, the ‘straight path’ and His commandments, but He left us to deal with ÈanÊfiyya, the task of allowing and constantly absorbing diverse developments.

The principle of ÈanÊfiyya is embodied in MuÈammad’s message of a theory of limits (al-Èudåd).[128]

As for the problem of historical change and the potential constant evolution of what is ‘fair and just’, we need to recall that historical circumstances govern most ethical rules. New, unprecedented ethical rules will have to be introduced in the light of new developments in human society, and new ethical rules, of which we have yet no knowledge, will have to be created in the future. Today, we are asked to apply the principle of ÈanÊfiyya to our contemporary community (milla), which we do by following the example of the community of Abraham. In order to achieve this, Allah has given us the principles of moral behaviour, its foundation and ethical boundaries, but He has left it to us to formulate ethical rules according to the idea of ÈanÊfiyya.

Exactly how this is done is a matter of historical variance and differs from one place to another and from one historical period to the next. ‘Doing what is fair and just’ in terms of working in a factory, for example, depends on the existing conditions of production. And the conditions of production are often troublesome and oppressive; so we hear the Book calling: ‘So establish weight with justice and fall not short in the balance.’ (Al-RaÈm§n 55:9). This implies, however, that the conditions of production might change and develop, primarily because of the effects of scientific and technological progress. Means of transport and the driving conditions differed tremendously between the late and the early twentieth century. We need to be aware that if we applied the same old rules of driving today with our current means of transport and much-improved infrastructure, we would be in danger of ceasing to be ‘those who do righteous things’ because, as we said before, this would not apply the principle of ÈanÊfiyya of Abraham’s community. Its core message is to take historical change into consideration and to adapt the concept of ‘doing what is fair and just’ to the actual conditions of the time and the place in which it is to be practiced.

The two verses of Sårat al-Baqara and Sårat a l-Nis§” stipulate that whoever submits his whole self to God is ‘doing what is fair and just’ on condition that the principle of ÈanÊfiyya is applied to his ethics. The following verse articulates this idea nicely by giving us the example of a prosperous, thriving person who has a firm grip on the rope that Allah has given him:

Whoever submits his whole self to God, and is a doer of good, has grasped indeed the most trustworthy hand-hold; and with God rests the end and decision of (all) affairs. (Luqm§n 31:22)

Finally we want to stress again that the need to develop an understanding of ‘doing what is fair and just’ (fiqh al-iÈs§n) for all spheres of life is the biggest challenge that contemporary Arab believers face. As believers we need to be familiar with ‘doing what is fair and just’, its underlying principle of ÈanÊfiyya and its fundamental condition to believe in Allah and the Hereafter. We need to realize that such familiarity is the only way to avoid remaining isolated and outside history, outside civilisation and outside the centre of the world’s creative powers. If we continue to give priority to our prayers and the fast of Ramadan, to hide our women behind the Èij§b, and to grow our beards, that is, if we continue to be obsessed with the superficialities of external behaviour and appearance, we will stay backward and remain a miserable, humiliated nation. If we do not implement the concept of ‘doing what is fair and just’ and the principle of ÈanÊfiyya with all its different practical implications in our daily life, if we do not socialise our youth in this spirit, and if we do not replace the traditional manuals of religious rituals (fiqh a l-sha#§“ir) with the new practices of fiqh a l-iÈs§n we will, in the long run, achieve absolutely nothing.

* Conclusion: Getting Our Priorities Right

The rediscovery of a clear distinction between al-isl§m and al-Êm§n in the Book requires us to revise how we are used to set our priorities:

 Top Priority

Our top priority must always be a l-isl§m, belief in God, the Hereafter, and ‘doing what is righteous’ (our ethical norms). Al-isl§m must be the shared platform upon which we cooperate and interact with the rest of the world. Most of the inhabitants of this earth are M uslim-Assenters in the sense that they naturally accept a l-isl§m’s beliefs and ethical values, even though they are shaped and articulated differently in each state and society. As for the practice of rituals and belief in messengers, al-Êm§n, it is evident that they are (ethically) neither self-sufficient nor self-explanatory. They need to be authenticated by the moral ethos of al-isl§m. It is our task to inform Arab Muslims about the real understanding of al-isl§m and tell them that they are not just followers of MuÈammad (ß) but that they are first and foremost Muslims, that is, assenters to God, as we hear in the following verse:

And they say: “None shall enter Paradise unless he be a Jew or a Christian.” Those are their (vain) desires. Say: “Produce your proof if you are truthful.” Nay, whoever submits His whole self to God and is a doer of good, he will get his reward with his Lord; on such shall be no fear, nor shall they grieve. (Al-Baqara 2:111–12)

It is our responsibility to advise people of the importance of ‘doing what is righteous’ and ‘doing what is fair and just’ and to tell them that these are fundamental pillars of al-isl§m and al-Êm§n. Every Muslim on this earth is called upon to fulfil this duty. It is the only criterion in judging a person’s righteousness. The gates and avenues of ‘doing what is good’ are many and they will be kept open until the Day of Resurrection. Innovation and diversity in ‘doing what is good’ is of high priority and will be rewarded by God because everything that is of benefit to His creation is registered with Him for all eternity.

 Second Priority

Second on the list of priorities are the religious obligations of al-Êm§n (prayer, alms tax, fasting, pilgrimage), which are entrusted to the mu”minån who follow the Prophet MuÈammad (ß). This does not mean—as we have said several times—that the religious obligations are detached from a l-isl§m and from ‘doing what is righteous’. It only implies that they are particular obligations which do not enjoy u niversal validity or political significance. They are ritual obligations that do not permit alteration or diversity. Innovations—either by adding new rituals or removing old ones—are illicit acts (bid#a). In the realm of a l-Êm§n, innovations are impudent and reprehensible. In the realm of al-isl§m, however, innovations are good and laudable.

Until now, we have not gotten our priorities right. Absolute priority is given to things that are, in fact, of minor importance, as a result of which we let the top priorities slip into second place. Inexplicably, we have given absolute priority to the pillars of al-Êm§n rather than to the pillars of a l-isl§m, resulting in our minds being completely preoccupied with the most insignificant details of ritual performances. A slip in the fast during Ramadan is to us more scandalous than the widespread corruption in our society, and the question of how to make up for a missed prayer is given more attention that the question of how to stop the fraud and deceit that cripple our societies and make life unbearable.

 Islamic Revival (al-ßaÈwa al-isl§miyya) and the Reawakening of Faith (al-ßaÈwa al-Êm§niyya)

Once we have accepted that a l-isl§m is the natural religion of all human beings (dÊn al-fiãra), enjoying universal validity and applicability, we are able to sustain a true Islamic revival. The following observations will help the reader to understand why the implementation of a l-isl§m—a proper Islamic revival—will be beneficial to all societies. Since al-isl§m means wealth and welfare (al-isl§m bi’l-khayr) for everyone, we observe that in every society on this globe:

– Employment is higher than unemployment. This shows that human societies advocate a culture of work ethics, a commitment to labour, and striving for the better. The concept of predestination and fatalism by which individuals’ lives are once and for all predetermined is utterly un-Islamic.

– Health care and medical treatment are provided in order to prolong life and sustain health. The thought that each individual’s life span has been predetermined, that the duration of life should not be ‘artificially’ prolonged by medicine, is fundamentally un-Islamic.

– The fight for justice is essential for the proper functioning of human societies. The existence of fraud and deceit undermines the social and moral fabric of society and, hence, committing these things is relatively heavily sanctioned by the legal systems of most countries.

– Orphans are normally taken care of by orphanages and other welfare organisations regardless of the children’s ethnic or national origins.

– Sophisticated guidelines are laid down for the production of consumer goods and deviations are harshly punished. In most countries, the main objective of the economy is the production of food, clothes, furniture, and luxury goods.

– Simple rules are given for the interaction between men and women. Most importantly, the inheritance of property by male and female descendants is regulated by testaments—not by complicated, gendered, and unjust inheritance laws as they are cherished by our honourable fuqah§”.

In short, a true Islamic revival means endorsing moral and social values that foster civil society, in the shape of welfare organisations, trade unions, NGO’s, community groups, business associations, selfhelp groups, coalitions, and advocacy groups. Unfortunately, generations of #ulam§” have failed to turn al-isl§m into a universally applicable and practical religion. Instead, they have promoted the values of slavish ritualism and a mentality of flight from this world to the Next, that is, a form of escapism that left them unable to give common people guidance on how to fulfil their aspirations in this world. We believe that this mentality of escapism and slavish ritualism is the reason why political Islam and the Islamist movement will fail to get overwhelming support of the majority of the population in most countries of this world.

A true reawakening of faith (a l-ßaÈwa a l-Êm§niyya), a revival that does not exhaust itself by an increase in ritualistic performances through prayer, fast, and pilgrimage, is characterized by:

1. An increase in the number of people who fast during the month of Ramadan and who disburse the month-specific voluntary donations because al-Êm§n (in this respect) means (also) wealth and welfare.

2. An increase in the number of people who pay alms tax because a l-Êm§n means wealth and welfare. Since voluntary donations and the ritual of zak§h are essentially social activities uniting society by means of charity money, it is—unlike prayer, fasting, and pilgrimage—also an activity of al-isl§m, and not just exclusively of al-Êm§n.

3. An increase in the number of people who take part in the burial prayer for deceased fellow believers, showing their condolence, compassion, and commiseration because al-Êm§n means wealth and welfare.

4. An increase in love for the Messenger (ß).

Every true moral act that is achievable by everyone everywhere in the world belongs to the realm of al-isl§m. The followers of MuÈammad's messengerhood do not possess a monopoly over moral righteousness. We know that high moral virtues existed before the life of the Prophet (ß), who embodied some of these noble virtues, hence they are not essentially grounded in his sunna. The fact that they were also embodied by people before him shows us that they can be found outside the realm of al-Êm§n. In contrast, the (very specific and particular) rituals practised by the followers of MuÈammad's messengerhood belong exclusively to the realm of al-Êm§n. Al-Êm§n came after a l-isl§m, not before. It is not correct to say that a l-isl§m was imposed on earlier religions because we know that there was no other religion that existed before al-isl§m. It is, however, correct to say that a l-Êm§n was imposed on earlier religions. Sårat MuÈammad states that people had faith in MuÈammad (ß) (al-Êm§n) after they had believed in something else ('He will remove from them their ills and improve their condition', MuÈammad 47:2). Al-isl§m, with its belief in the existence of God and good deeds, is firmly placed in this world and yet also leads into the Next. As for al-Êm§n, its place is also in this world but, unlike al-isl§m, it is separated from the state and the organisations of civil society. This aspect will be further explained in chapter 6.

To talk about a currently ongoing Islamic revival is nonsense. If we take the example of Egypt and look at what has happened in this country between 1970 and today, we see that a l-isl§m has almost entirely disappeared. We are observing a deep slumber, not an awakening! In contrast, in other so-called non-Islamic countries we recognise that al-isl§m is everywhere because in those countries wealth and welfare are ever growing, bypassing the so-called Islamic countries by a hundred miles.

The current reawakening of faith (al-ßaÈwa al-Êm§niyya), it is sad to say, will not feed us, will not eradicate hunger and poverty, and will do nothing to reform state and society. Its focus on prayer, dhikr, recitation, death, Paradise and Hell, that is, on life in the next world, will only improve the state of the individual’s soul, it will do nothing for society at large. It replaces a life-affirming attitude with an obsession with death and the Afterlife. It will keep the believers unsympathetic to the plights and sufferings in this world as it will shut their eyes to the glaring despotism and autocracy of the political tyrants who seem to have been installed everywhere. It is a sobering thought that the impact of an increase in prayer, fasting, and pilgrimage on political culture is laughably negligible, and the political regimes will feel its weight like that of a dust speck.

 2. The Sunna of the Prophet (‘)

 Introduction

Islamic jurists’ excessive fixation on the life of MuÈammad (ß) has led to the unfortunate result that the sunna of the Prophet (ß) not only became theoretically the second most authoritative source of Islamic law but practically also very often the primary source of legislation. When issuing their fatw§s—in particular on legal issues with farreaching social and political implications—Islamic jurists very often ignored the rules of the Book or had them replaced by the sunna, which over time became their ultimate—and often only—point of reference. By focusing on the sunna of the Prophet (ß) as a major source of Islamic legislation, our honourable scholars clearly overstepped the mark when they began to treat it as the principal and most authoritative source of truth, equal if not superior to the word of God in the Book. Their theologically most detestable step was to regard the Book as incomplete and in need of the elaborations and specifications of the sunna, implying that a divine text needs to be completed and confirmed by a human source—which is a truly blasphemous thought!

In order to understand what went wrong in Islamic law and why we ended up with a mindset focused on analogies that constantly forces today’s Muslims to bring their behaviour in line with minute details of the sunna, leaving no room for innovative thinking, reform, or renewal, we need first to establish what in Allah’s Book enjoys universal validity (and is part of MuÈammad’s prophethood), and what was and has been of particular relevance (and is part of MuÈammad’s messengerhood). For this discussion the universal norms of human existence and the dialectics between social development and civilisational progress need to be fully considered.

Contemporary Islamic discourse lacks philosophical depth. The ignorance of modern philosophical thinking is the root cause of the almost primitive reflex by our honourable scholars to treat everyone who is blessed with the tiniest spark of originality and creativity as a subversive renegade or even an enemy of Islam. It is a real scandal that people are mobbed and treated as pariahs if they dare to unmask the datedness of the salaf heritage, and it is outrageous that they are ridiculed if they apply modern critical methods to unravel the mysteries of the divine text. And it is an even greater scandal that people are accused of apostasy when they rely on the truth of Allah’s words, which state that MuÈammad (ß) became God’s messenger not through personal sanctity but due to the mercy of the Almighty; and also when they believe that the message of the Book—and not the sunna of MuÈammad (ß)—is the seal of all prophetic messages.

 Prophethood and Messengerhood

It is our aim to show that the sunna of the Prophet is culturally and historically conditioned, and that it lacks the universality of Allah’s Book. While MuÈammad’s sunna cannot be perceived as being outside the law of historical development and needs to ‘stay’ in seventhcentury Arabia, MuÈammad’s messengerhood in the Book needs to be understood according to the dialectics between form and content, insofar as its text is fixed but its content moves. Let us therefore first turn to Allah’s Book and introduce two fundamental categories: MuÈammad’s prophethood and MuÈammad’s messengerhood. We start out from the premise that Allah revealed the Book to MuÈammad (ß) as text (naßß) and content (muÈtaw§). As text it consists of all the revealed verses, from the first Sårat al-F§tiÈa to the last Sårat a l-N§s, and as content it covers the entirety of themes and topics that have ever been addressed in revealed scriptures or books. These themes and topics can be classified under two major categories whose characteristics can be derived from the following two verses:

This is the Book which cannot be doubted and is a guidance to the God-fearing. (Al-Baqara 2:2) Who are these ‘God-fearing”?

Those who believe in the unseen [al-ghayb]... (Al-Baqara 2:3)

→ this refers to the ‘book of the unseen’ (kit§b al-ghayb) = category I

And ‘[who] perform the prayer and give freely from what We pro vided for them.’ (Al-Baqara 2:3, MF)

→ this refers to the ‘book of conduct’ (kit§b al-sulåk) = category II These two different categories (book of the unseen / book of conduct) indicate a distinction between prophethood and messengerhood. Prophethood (nubåwa) is derived from the Arabic root n-b-#, which means—in its second verb form (nabba”a) —‘to announce’ or ‘to disclose’,[129] and in the context of the Book it refers to those parts of the text that announce or disclose the themes of universal—and sometimes, historical—‘truth and falsehood’ (a l-Èaqq wa’l-b§ãil). The verses of messengerhood (al-ris§la), in contrast, contain concrete moral, social, and ritual instructions, that is, precepts of correct and praiseworthy behaviour, to be followed by the believers in their daily life. The verses of prophethood talk about the essential questions of human existence: about life and death, about the beginning and the end of the world, Hell and Paradise, and such; they form the ‘book of prophethood’ (kit§b al-nubåwa). The verses of MuÈammad’s message or messengerhood, in contrast, talk about religious practices: about rituals, prayer, fasting, pilgrimage, prohibitions, social duties, welfare obligations, and the like. They represent the ‘book of messengerhood’ (kit§b al-ris§la). The book of prophethood deals with the reality of our objective existence; it distinguishes between true and false, real and illusory; it possess the quality of being ‘ambiguous’ (mutash§bih), and it is located in the textual (or existential) subcategories of al-qur”§n and sab# al-math§nÊ. The book of messengerhood, that is, the book of conduct, possesses the quality of being unambiguous or ‘definite’ (muÈkam) and is located in the umm al-kit§b, the ‘mother of the book’. In short, MuÈammad (ß) is a messenger of God and a prophet, but both roles contain different tasks and themes. The Book acknowledges MuÈammad’s dual role by clearly distinguishing between verses of messengerhood and verses of prophethood.[130]

For the purpose of further exploring the difference between prophethood and messengerhood we must now define how we understand prophethood and the role of a prophet. In order to do this we need to introduce the categories of naba” and khabar which designate two different types of ‘news’:

1. Naba”: refers to an event in the unseen or unknown world which has either already taken place in the near or distant past or will take place in the near or distant future. MuÈammad’s (ß) role as a prophet (naby) was to disclose to his fellow men these events which were hidden to them but which, through his announcements, became discernable. These announcements form the book of prophethood which does not contain any legal injunctions. In terms of style and rhetorical expression prophetic announcements are short, crisp, and concise. A reference to them can be found in the following verse:

Those cities, We relate to you [i.e., MuÈammad] some of their [anb§“ih§];[131] their messengers came to them with clear signs, but they would not believe in what they had denied earlier. This Allah seals the hearts of the unbelievers. (Al-A#r§f 7:101)

2. Khabar: refers to an event in the past or immediate present (not the future) in the tangible or known world which can be empirically seen or reconstructed (if it happened in the distant past) by the people. However, such khabar events may turn into naba” events with the passing of time. For example, what happened to Noah and his people were khabar events for those who personally witnessed them. But over the centuries they turned into naba” events as they became unknown or indiscernible to subsequent generations. In terms of style and rhetorical expression they are elaborate, lengthy, and detailed. Both categories of ‘news’, naba” and khabar, pertain to the content of a l-qur”§n and form the Qur’anic stories; they belong to the book of prophethood and do not contain legal injunctions.

With this in mind we say that the miraculous nature (al-i#j§z) of the book of prophethood is defined by the quality of knowledge it contains; it is i#j§z #ilmÊ, or an ‘epistemological miracle’. Not only does it contain precise knowledge of the universal laws that govern the entire universe and nature, but it also hosts historical stories which had either already happened before MuÈammad’s time (naba” events to him) or which he himself witnessed (khabar events). For us today, such khabar events have now become naba” events.

The miraculous nature of the book of messengerhood, in contrast, is defined by the soundness and righteousness of its legal instructions: they are valid until the Day of Judgement. It enjoys everlasting validity because it is based on the principle of ÈanÊfiyya and because its injunctions are applied within the legal framework of Allah’s limits (see chapters 4 and 5).

The Book, directly revealed into MuÈammad’s brain, holds prophethood and messengerhood. It came down as the last of the many messages of al-isl§m which history had accumulated over time and with which Allah has sent his prophets and messengers to all peoples in this world. A l-isl§m, as we said in chapter 1, started with Noah and found its perfect expression with MuÈammad (ß). Since MuÈammad’s (ß) death our knowledge of the universe has increased and our legal systems have improved. Humankind as a whole has greatly advanced, so much so that we no longer need another prophet or another revelation as we can now rely on reason and our matured experiences of this world. The scientific institutions of the modern era have inherited prophecies and prophethoods, and the new legislative assemblies and parliaments have inherited ancient messengers and their messengerhoods. In other words, with the ‘seal of the prophets’ ended too the period of external, moral intervention and consequently also the role of religious experts.

If the Book is Allah’s revelation as text and content from its first to its last letter, we would need to specify what makes it so different from the other messages and prophecies that have previously been revealed. We believe that the special nature of the Book lies in its sacredness as the last and final revelation. But what do we mean by sacredness?

We take our clue from one of the ninety-nine names of Allah in the Book, al-qudus, which we translate as ‘the one who governs over the living’. We read in the Book:

We also gave Jesus, son of Mary, clear signs and strengthened him with the [råh al-qudus][132] (Al-Baqara 2:87)

We know that the miraculous ability to reanimate the dead was one of God’s gifts to Jesus. We infer from this that ‘holy’ or ‘sacred’ (muqaddas) means to live, and that a sacred text is a text that shows signs of life or is living. Accordingly, the Book is a sacred text because it is a living text, a text of life, and a text for the living, not the dead. Even if we find in the Book things about people who belong to a different historical period, and who were therefore subject to the ‘becoming’ and ‘progressing’ of their times, it can still be read as if they belonged to the time of our reading of the text—as if the Book was revealed only yesterday! How is this possible?

We find the answer in the ontological quality of the text as ‘being’ in-and-for-itself, and of being originated in Allah who is also pure ‘being’ in-and-for-itself. Both God and text can only be understood by looking at their outward signs and external manifestations, by the ninety-nine names that manifest themselves in the externalities of our existence. As created beings, we will never fully understand the entirety of this universe because only God can do this. What we can do is to gradually comprehend it by a continuous ‘becoming’ of our relative and contingent knowledge. The ultimate aim is to come closer to God even though we will never fully reach Him. But to facilitate this process of coming near Him we are allowed to make everything in nature subservient, whether we use it wisely and for the benefit of humankind or foolishly and even to the detriment of society and the environment.[133]

No one, we repeat, is able, nor should be allowed, to claim total knowledge of the Book in its entirety or its single parts, even if he is a prophet or messenger. If someone claimed to have such total knowledge he would commit the crime of shirk, as he would become a partner of God in His knowledge and His ‘being’ in-and-for-itself. If MuÈammad (ß) had total knowledge of the Book, in its entirety or its single parts, and his interpretations and ijtih§ds had all the flavour of absolute truth, it would make him a partner of Allah in divine knowledge and, even more ridiculously, the author of the Book. By God, we cannot accuse MuÈammad (ß) of shirk regarding Allah since he never claimed to possess absolute knowledge of Allah’s Book. But because our honourable scholars overrated the sunna to such an extent that they began treating Allah’s Book as if MuÈammad (ß) had been able to write it himself, Muslim believers were given the impression that MuÈammad (ß) possessed superhuman knowledge.

How does the Book constitute its ‘being’ in-and-for-itself? We believe it is because of the stability or firmness of the text, or better: the stable nature of al-dhikr, which is the linguistic, that is, phonetic/ lexical, format of the Book. The text’s dhikr, which we have in front of us today, is exactly the same dhikr that existed in the seventhcentury. And it is the same text that Allah revealed into MuÈammad’s brain from where it was then transmitted ad verbum ipsissimus to his fellow men. The text of al-dhikr does not possess ‘becoming’ or ‘progressing’, hence its textual format is fixed forever. On that we hear:

It is truly We who have revealed [al-dhikr],[134] and we are truly its guardians.[135] (Al-\ijr 15:9)

If the Book possesses the quality of ‘being’ in-and-for-itself, how are human beings supposed to deal with it? How should we, being subject to ‘becoming’ and ‘progressing’, read the divine text? And how should future readers, whose ‘becoming’ and ‘progressing’ will have inevitably moved on to a more advanced level of knowledge, understand the Book? We believe that readers of different historical periods will have understood different things from the text. Readers of the eighth, ninth, twelfth, eighteenth and twentieth centuries have differed from one another in terms of their intellectual capacities and methodologies. Some have discovered things that others have overlooked, and a third group of readers may have elicited things from the text that the other two groups have completely ignored. This is because despite its fixed ‘being’, the Book is a text of life into whose ‘becoming’ and ‘progressing’ the reader has been absorbed according to his own degree of ‘becoming’ and ‘progressing’. This fundamental hermeneutical principle underlines our dictum that ‘the text is fixed but its content moves’, expressing a subtle dialectical relationship between textual structure and meaning.

The messages that readers receive from the text and the messages that they might overlook depend on the epistemological context in which they read the text. In this regard, every reading is bound to be contemporary. A reader of the twelfth century approached the text with the scientific and social awareness of his time, his reading being the most contemporary reading possible at that time; we in the twenty-first century apply the scientific and intellectual level of our own age, turning our reading into the best possible contemporary reading. A reader in premodern times will have used the most upto-date knowledge available to him to understand the text’s explanation of life on earth. He would have used the model of the four elements of water, earth, air, and fire which scholars at that time employed to explain nature and life. In the modern age, however, we apply the findings of laboratory experiments that explain life as the basic transformation of hydrogen into uranium, that is, we are using an altogether different explanatory model. In both cases the most contemporary forms of knowledge have been applied and yet two different interpretations have resulted. This is because the scientific and intellectual horizon of the prescientific reader simply was not as advanced as ours, by which we recognise the unstoppable, relentless progress of ‘becoming’ and ‘progressing’ in our scientific knowledge.

We now understand much better why the Book is the only and ultimate source of prophethood and messengerhood (not the sunna!). It is the only text that possesses the quality of ‘being’ in-and-for-itself, and therefore the only text that is sacred. No other text by a human being, whether prophet or messenger, can ever claim to possess the same level of sacredness as the Book.

 A Critique of the Traditional Understanding of the Sunna

In this section we refute the traditional understanding of the sunna which has caused serious damage to Arabic civilisation. Because ‘becoming’ has been forced to stay locked in the period of the first three centuries of Islamic history, the traditional fixation on the sunna of the Prophet (ß) has made Arab-Muslim societies—philosophically speaking—flat, two dimensional. In contrast to other more threedimensional civilisations, Arab-Muslim societies have remained backward and still display symptoms of cultural decay and intellectual stagnation. A traditional understanding of the sunna forces today’s jurists to make their legal decisions strictly analogous to those issued between the seventh and the ninth centuries.

The traditional view has it that the sunna relates to us the words, acts, good deeds, statements, and decisions of MuÈammad, God’s Messenger (ß). It requires us to emulate the example of the Prophet (ß) as rigidly as possible in our daily conduct. The following verse 21 of Al-AÈz§b and two ÈadÊths[136] have often been cited to convince and discipline us:

You have indeed in the Apostle of God a beautiful pattern (of conduct) for any one whose hope is in God and the Final Day, and who engages much in the praise of God. (Al-AÈz§b 33:21)

The Messenger of Allah, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, said, “I have left two things to you. As long as you hold to them you will not go astray: these [two things] are the book of Allah and the Sunna of His Prophet.”[137]

“Behold, I have been given this book together with something similar/ equal.”[138]

Based on the dubious notion of MuÈammad’s sanctity as prophet and messenger, the sunna, that is, the collective body of all ÈadÊths that capture the words and deeds of a supposedly über-human being, has gained an authority that intrudes into the daily life of every Muslim-Believer. General issues of religious belief and specific questions of social conduct are indiscriminately treated as equally authoritative and binding on us all. Every little detail of the Prophet’s life has been defined as equally sacrosanct, whether it concerned questions of universal, objective laws (nubåwa) or legislation (ris§la), whether it referred to prophetic knowledge (#ilm) or to legislation (aÈk§m shar#Êyya). The ÈadÊths of the sunna have thus acquired the status of sacred texts whose authority cannot any longer be questioned. As a result, the ÈadÊths, regardless of their often dubious origins and weak chains of transmitters, were given priority to the divine text even when they contradicted the verses of the Book.

Neither MuÈammad (ß) himself nor his companions would ever have approved of such notions of sanctity. On the contrary, we hear that MuÈammad (ß) explicitly forbade his followers from compiling anything but the words of God. The oft-heard argument that the collection of ÈadÊths enabled the Prophet’s companions to better distinguish between MuÈammad’s words as a prophet (and human being) and the words of God (the divine author), and thus protect the latter from being mixed with the former, can be refuted by quoting verse 9 of Sårat al-\ ijr that rebukes such efforts. In this verse we are assured of the fact that Allah Himself will take care of His words as the sole and best protector of the Book, and that He would not need ÈadÊth compilers to do so:

We have, without doubt, sent down the Message; and We will assuredly guard it (from corruption). (Al-\ijr 15:9)

The truth is that after the prophet’s death in 632 his companions were preoccupied only with the task of producing an authoritative collection of divine revelations. They did not bother at all about prophetic ÈadÊths. They started collecting the divine §y§t under the caliph Abå Bakr and completed the task under the caliph #Uthm§n b. ‘Aff§n, who eventually compiled the written mußÈaf, the copy we hold in our hands today. This is what has become known as the codex of #Uthm§n. It is said to have abrogated all other codices that existed at that time and which were subsequently all destroyed. The Prophet’s (ß) companions had realised that whatever MuÈammad (ß) said or did as a human being could not have originated from a divine source and thus was strictly related to the politica l-historical context in which he lived. Even though they could have started to collect ÈadÊths they continued to rely exclusively on the divine text. Knowing the Book very well they realised that to collect ÈadÊths in order to complete divine revelation would have contradicted Allah’s words in verse 3 of Sårat al-M§“ida:

This day have I perfected your religion for you, completed My favour upon you, and have chosen for you al-isl§m as your religion… (A l-M§“ida 5:3)

It was clear to them that the religion of al-isl§m was perfected even without the existence of a single ÈadÊth. It was indeed inconceivable to think that Allah has given them an incomplete religion of which half, the ÈadÊths, was still missing. And it would also be inconceivable to think that they, after having successfully collected all existing divine revelations, could have been so neglectful of not having exhaustively collected all existing ÈadÊths (a process that lasted several centuries), therefore embarrassing generations of future Muslims by having secured only half of al-isl§m.

The collection of ÈadÊths and the process of turning them into sacrosanct texts is undoubtedly a later development. The following aspects have triggered this fateful turn towards the sanctification of the Prophet's sunna. We have identified six major errors which all occurred because of a wrong interpretation of a verse in the Book. In dealing with these errors, we quote the verse first, highlight the mistakes made, and then introduce our own reading of the text.

1. The first one concerns the belief that MuÈammad's (ß) words were inspired by God:

And he [MuÈammad] does not talk [yanãiq] capriciously. It is only a revelation [waÈy[un]] being revealed [yåÈ§]... (A l-Najm 53:3–4, FM)

It was thought that the two verses equate what MuÈammad (ß) said (yanãiq) with divine revelation (waÈy). This led to the erroneous view that the Qur'an and the sunna are two categories of revealed or inspired word. It has been overlooked that Al-Najm 53:3–4 were revealed in Mecca at a time when MuÈammad (ß) was confronted by strong opposition from the Ahl a l-Quraish. They had questioned the validity of MuÈam mad's (ß) claim to have received revelations from God. They did not question MuÈammad's (ß) own words but only what he presented as divine revelation. Verses 3 and 4 were revealed as an assurance of the divine origins of his revelations from God, not an assurance of the sacrality of MuÈammad's sayings as prophet and human being.[139]

2. The second error concerns the belief that MuÈammad’s (ß) acts and deeds are sacrosanct, that is, unblemished by mistake and hence infallible. This view can easily be rejected by reading the following verses of Sårat #Abasa in which Allah unambiguously reprimands MuÈammad (ß) and concedes his fallibility:

He frowned and turned away when the blind man came to him— for all you know, he might have grown in spirit, or taken note of something useful to him. (#Abasa 80:1–4, AH)

This is a clear rebuke by God because MuÈammad was so impertinent to have turned away from Ibn Maktåm, an old, blind beggar, in order to address instead the notables of the Ahl a l-Quraish in the hope that they would accept his call and convert to Islam. Criticising such snobbishness, Allah asks MuÈammad (ß) to change his attitude and turn back to the beggar, for the old man might spiritually benefit enormously from the Prophet’s attention. In the following verse we hear another rebuke of MuÈam mad’s action:

Prophet, why do you prohibit what God has made lawful to you in your desire to please your wives? Yet God is forgiving and merciful. (Al-TaÈrÊm 66:1, AH)

And another time:

It is not fitting for an apostle that he should have prisoners of war until he has thoroughly subdued the land. You look for the temporal goods of this world, but God looks to the Hereafter: And God is exalted in might, wise. (Al-Anf§l 8:67)

3. The third error has occurred by inventing the notion of the Prophet’s (ß) impeccability (a l-#ißma). This view can easily be rejected by reading the following verse of Sårat Al-M§“ida:

Messenger, proclaim everything that has been sent down to you from your Lord—if you do not, then you will not have communicated this message—and God will protect you from people. God does not guide those who defy Him. (Al-M§“ida 5:67, AH)

The verse makes it clear that MuÈammad (ß) was not infallible as a prophet per se. His impeccability as a prophet is qualified by, a) his infallible delivery of the revealed text of al-dhikr al-ÈakÊm (because he transmitted the message without adding or taking away a single letter and without letting any human being interfere in the process of transmission); and by, b) his moral perfection, in the sense that he did not violate an absolute taboo of God or transgress a limit set by God.

His moral perfection lied in the fact that he never ventured to perform ijtih§d in anything that God had explicitly forbidden. Instead, in everyday life he performed practical ijtih§ds within the parameters of what God had allowed (al-Èal§l). His ijtih§ds were never fixed once and for all and were never declared absolute as they changed and developed according to historical circumstances. In other words, by his sunna he impeccably specified what Allah had allowed in His Book. But such impeccability does not imply that the Prophet’s (ß) specifications are absolute and to be enforced in other regions of this world or in other sociohistorical contexts of human history.

4. The fourth misunderstanding pertains to the common exaggeration of MuÈammad’s prophetic role:

(We sent them) with clear proofs and scriptures; and We revealed to you the reminder, so that you may make clear [li-tubayyin] to mankind what has been revealed to them, and that, perchance, they may reflect. (Al-NaÈl 16:44, MF)

This verse of Sårat Al-NaÈl has led to much confusion among Muslim commentators. This confusion produced the outrageous view that the Sunna is superior to the Qur’an,[140] in the sense that the Sunna overrides the authority of the Qur’an if the latter contradicts the former, which basically amounted to an abrogation of the divine text.

The problem lies in a too literal understanding of verse 44 of Al-NaÈl and the phrase ‘that you may make clear to mankind what has been revealed to them’. It was thought that this refers to textual ambiguities in the divine text which MuÈammad (ß) was meant to clarify, or to too generally formulated injunctions that he was sent to specify. In other words, the sunna of the Prophet (ß) was seen as a pragmatic specification and perfect exemplification of Allah’s rather ambivalent legal injunctions. Legal experts had forthwith to use the instrument of analogy in applying MuÈammad’s decisions in order to find and establish their own. In the end, the ÈadÊths were believed to be the perfect filter through which one could explain an obscure divine text, while the sunna became the absolute yardstick of the ‘real’ legal intentions by the divine text. To read the Book without the filter of the ÈadÊths became increasingly difficult, resulting in the fatal thinking that the sunna overrides the Qur’an’s authority and that ‘the Qur’an needs the sunna more than the sunna needs the Qur’an’. And yet, ‘Allah, the Highly exalted, is above what they ascribe to Him’![141]

Confusion occurred over the correct interpretation of the Arabic phrase li-tubayyin and its root words bay§n or tiby§n. The verb bayana was often thought to mean ‘to explain clearly’ or ‘to make clear’ and was identified as the main task of the sunna. The following verses of the Book, however, show that bayana rather denotes ‘to make evident’, or to bring out what is hidden (i.e., not yet discernible):

Those who conceal the clear (signs) We have sent down, and the guidance, after We have made it (known) [bayyan§hu][142] for the people in the Book—on them shall be God’s curse, and the curse of those entitled to curse. (Al-Baqara 2:159)

And remember God took a covenant from the People of the Book, to make it known and clear [la-tubayyanunnahu] to mankind, and not to hide it… ($l #Imr§n 3:187)[143]

O people of the Book! There has come to you our Apostle, revealing to you [yubayyinu lakum] much that you used to hide in the Book…

(Al-M§“ida 5:15)[144]

‘And eat and drink, until the white thread of dawn appear [yatabayyina] to you distinct from its black thread…’ (Al-Baqara 2:187)

It is clear that in this context the root meaning of b-y-n is ‘to make apparent’, that is, visible to the eyes, something that is hidden, obscured, that is, invisible to the eyes. We hear further proof in the following two verses:

And Abraham prayed for his father’s forgiveness only because of a promise he had made to him. But when it became clear to him [tabayyana] that he was an enemy to God, he dissociated himself from him: for Abraham was most tender-hearted, forbearing. (Al-Tawba 9:114)

He has created man; He has taught him speech (and intelligence) [al-bay§n]. (Al-RaÈm§n 55:3–4)

In 9:114 we learn that tabayyana refers to the moment when the enmity of Abraham’s father to God became evident to Abraham— perceived by his senses and understood by his rational mind: [145]

When we have recited it, repeat the recitation and We shall make it clear [bay§nahu]. (Al-Qiy§ma 75:18–19, AH)

We have sent down to you the Book [revealing][146] all things [tiby§n[an]], a guide, a mercy, and glad tidings to Muslims. (Al-NaÈl 16:89) There is, in their stories, instruction for men endued with understanding. It is not a tale invented, but a confirmation of what went before it—a detailed exposition [tafßÊl[a]] of all things, and a guide and a mercy to any such as believe. (Yåsuf 12:111)

<right>

This is the way of your Lord, leading straight: We have detailed

</right>

[faßßaln§] the signs for those who receive admonition. (A l-An#§m 6:126)

The Book says it over and over again: the divine text is clearly visible to the eyes and audible to the ears; in all its details it is unobscured, uncovered, and unambiguous. Such a cryst al-clear text does not need clarifications by the sunna: it has already been explained and made clear, and all the necessary details have been given. Why should there be a need to lessen the confusion if there is no confusion in the first place?

An example taken from contemporary politics can illustrate what is really meant by bay§n. Just imagine that two heads of state come together to negotiate a new bilateral treaty. At the end of their meeting a joint communiqué is prepared with a summary of the talks, and this is distributed among the accompanying press journalists. What happens is that the spokesperson announces all the details of the negotiations even though he did not take part in them. Furthermore, he does not know what else has been discussed and what the communiqué does not mention. The spokesperson’s only task is to read the communiqué to the press, and make its points audible and visible, that is, known to his audience; a clarifying commentary by him is neither requested nor expected.

This example illustrates the role that MuÈammad (ß) played. His role as a messenger of God was to make Allah’s revelation known to people. It was neither requested nor expected that he change the form or shape of the revelations (the dhikr al-ÈakÊm), nor that he reformulate them in his own words. Some Muslim scholars have claimed that MuÈammad (ß) merely received inspirations from God and that he put them into his own words which he then announced as divine revelations. If this is true, it would mean that MuÈammad (ß) possessed all the superhuman capacities necessary to formulate such sublime speech, and that he had completely understood all the divine instructions. It would mean that the Prophet’s ‘being’ is the ‘being’ of the most praiseworthy, but surely Allah, the highly exalted, is above what they ascribe to Him!

Let us repeat the fundamental truth that in front of us is the Book, the unaltered, unfiltered, and untampered word of God that came down to MuÈammad (ß) in its final format and complete in content. It was delivered to the people without the need for clarification or specification, and without the need for protection or guardianship (see Sårat Al-\ijr 15:9). Such protection has since been achieved by written copies of the original manuscript, first as scrolls, then, after the invention of the printing machine as books and, nowadays, as computer files or audio/video CDs and DVDs. Before all of that was possible, the Prophet MuÈammad (ß) was in this respect the most reliable, most trustworthy, and most perfect transmitter of the divine text.

A final thought: if it is true that the Book is ambiguous and the sunna unambiguous, and that one always has to go back to see how the sunna has specified the general rules of the Book, it would leave no room for human reason, experiment, reflection, or independent thinking. It would disqualify verse 2 of Sårat Yåsuf as being entirely meaningless:

We have sent it down as an Arabic Qur’an, in order that you may learn wisdom. (Yåsuf 12:2)

5. The fifth problem occurred because of a wrong understanding of Sårat Al-\ashr:

Whatever the Messenger gives you [m§ at§kum], take; but whatever he forbids [m§ nah§kum], refrain from. Fear Allah, for Allah is terrible in retribution. (Al-\ashr 59:7, MF)

In verse 59:7 we notice the usage of the verb a-t-§, ‘to come’ or ‘to arrive’, which implies that the Book deliberately avoids the verb j-a-”, which also means ‘to come’ or ‘to arrive’. The reason for this is that the two verbs connote two different origins for what ‘comes’ or ‘arrives’. Whereas a-t-§ is (semantically) reflexive and connotes an origin that lies in the source (item or person) itself, the verb j-a-” is transitive as it connotes an origin that lies outside a source (item or person). This difference is best illustrated by verse 43 of Sårat Maryam:

“O my father! To me has come [j§“anÊ] knowledge which has not reached you [ya”atik]; so follow me: I will guide you to a way that is even and straight.” (Maryam 19:43)

We notice here that the text uses first j§“anÊ in order to indicate that Abraham, the speaker in this verse, has received divine knowledge from Allah, that is, from somewhere outside himself, whereas in the case of his father, who has not received such knowledge, the verb ya”atik is used, hence Abraham’s command to his father to follow him. As for the verb a-t-§ in general, the Book employs it only if it refers to actions, never to speech acts or communication by words.

If we apply these insights to 59:7, we can now explain why the verb a-t-§ (m§ at§kum), is used and not j-a-”, or j§“akum. M§ at§kum refers to knowledge that MuÈammad (ß) gained from human experiences, that is, from human origins, sources that lie within himself. The Book deliberately avoids the term j§“akum in the phrase ‘so take what the apostle assigns to you (m§ at§kum)’ because if it had used j§“akum, it would mean that MuÈammad’s (ß) (human) knowledge is derived from an (outside) divine source—surely Allah, the Highly exalted, is above what they ascribe to Him—or, at least, it would give the impression that MuÈammad (ß) might even be the author of the Book.

In sum, ‘what the Apostle assigns to you’ is taken from within MuÈammad (ß) as a human being, while the Book came down (j§“a) from outside MuÈammad, both in shape and content. If we apply this more specifically to the phrase ‘so take what the apostle assigns to you’ and link it to the question of human legislation in the form of the sunna of the Prophet, we must then regard MuÈammad’s efforts to govern seventh-century Arabian society and to establish a new, centralised state on the Arabian Peninsula as his efforts and as contingent to his historical context. Every human society is asked to do exactly that (‘take what the apostle assigns to you’), to govern society and build a state according to the conditions of the present time.

On a different note, we see how verse 59:7 employs the term n-h-y in the phrase ‘refrain from what he forbids you (nah§kum)’. This usage is deliberate because it avoids the term È-r-m. MuÈammad (ß) was only required to permit or prohibit (ya”amur wa-yanh§) but never to absolutely allow or forbid (yuÈallil wa-yaÈram) since the latter is the prerogative of Allah alone. The difference is far-reaching: whereas the area of permission/prohibition is part of human legislation and is contingent, relative, flexible, and changing, the area of absolute permission and taboo (Èal§l and Èar§m) is divine, fixed, absolute, and everlasting. Whereas Allah allows or forbids and permits or prohibits, human beings can only permit or prohibit but not absolutely allow or forbid.

The divine absolute taboos (al-muÈarram§t) are sufficient for creating and sustaining the inner core and consciousness of human beings, but alone they would not be enough to run a state and govern society with all its political, economic, and social complexities. But this is exactly what MuÈammad (ß) did when he created a state under the conditions of life in seventh-century Arabia. In doing so he applied what we may call the principle of 'tying and loosening' (taqyÊd wa-iãl§q),[147] which means that he introduced legislations and legislative bodies on the Arabian Peninsula that aimed at either 'loosening' the areas of divine permissions (to give them general applicability) or 'tying' them due to specific circumstances (to make them only particularly applicable). His applications reflect the dialectical relationship between the limits that Allah has set and human legislation that manoeuvres between God's boundaries. Such manoeuvres, we must stress, are subject to human error.

6. The sixth and final error was to equate obedience to Allah with obedience to Allah's Apostle:

First, it needs to be pointed out that the Book demands obedience to MuÈammad (ß) only as a messenger (rasål) but never as a prophet

(naby):

And obey God and the Apostle [al-rasål]; that you may obtain mercy. ($l #lmr§n 3:132)

This verse stands for many others of similar wording. The Book never uses the phrase 'And obey God and the prophet'. Second, prophethood is faced with either acceptance or disapproval, and a typical response would be 'Yes, it could be' or 'No, it can't be', whereas messengerhood is faced with either obedience or disobedience, typically expressed in ‘Yes, I assent’ or ‘No, I dissent’. When, for example, MuÈammad (ß) announced, as Prophet, the verse: ‘for the convulsion of the Hour (of Judgement) will be a thing terrible!’ (Al-\ajj 22:1), the reaction of his listeners was either: ‘Yes, I think this is true’, or ‘No, this is a lie’, whereas when he, as Messenger, said: ‘anyone who is ill or on a journey should make up for the lost days by fasting on other days later.’ (Al-Baqara 2:185) [AH], the likely response was surely not ‘Yes, I think this is true’ but either ‘Yes, I will follow that instruction’ or ‘No, I reject it’. Third, when Allah addresses MuÈammad (ß) in the Book as prophet, in the manner of ‘O you prophet’, the instructions that follow are of general guidance, advice, or admonition issued because of very concrete instances in the life of MuÈammad. They are not meant to fall into the category of legal permissions or prohibitions. In sum, the call for obedience to MuÈammad (ß) is restricted to his role as Messenger, not as a prophet. And his messengerhood, as we have explained earlier, consists of legal injunctions, moral rules, and ritual obligations.

In order to avoid the confusion that is so common in dealing with MuÈammad’s sunna we need to introduce two different types of obedience:

A. ‘Combined obedience’ (al-ã§#a al-muttaßila): obedience to Allah and His Messenger (ß):

And obey God and the Apostle; that you may obtain mercy. ($l #Imr§n 3:132)

All who obey God and the Apostle are in the company of those on whom is the grace of God—of the prophets (who teach), the sincere (lovers of truth), the witnesses (who testify), and the righteous

(who do good): Ah! What a beautiful fellowship! (Al-Nis§” 4:69)

In those two verses, Allah, the Living and Everlasting, connects obedience to God to obedience to His Messenger. If obedience is demanded in this manner, it becomes obligatory for everyone who lived at the time of MuÈammad (ß) or after his death. Ritual and moral obedience is expressed by performing the rituals that MuÈammad (ß) practised[148] and by respecting the absolute taboos that Allah has set. The taboos are clearly laid out in the Book and are, as explained in chapter 1, part of the innate disposition of human beings and an essential element within our consciousness. No shackles or bonds are necessary in order to accept them.

MuÈammad's (ß) infallibility consisted in his perfection of never having violated any of these taboos, and our obligation is to at least try to imitate him in that. Our obedience to MuÈam mad's (ß) legal injunctions is expressed in practising ijtih§d within the limits set by Allah, which allows us to 'turn and bend sideways', that is, to follow the principle of ÈanÊfiyya. It is not expressed in following his ijtih§ds to the letter because the legal limits (al-Èudåd) are Allah's limits, not MuÈam mad's limits. When verse 14 of Sårat a l-Nis§" says, 'But those who disobey God and His apostle and transgress His limits…' (Al-Nis§" 4:14), the possessive pronoun 'His' refers to Allah, not to MuÈammad. If the Book had wanted to refer to both Allah's and MuÈammad's limits it would have used the Arabic du al-ending hum§, 'transgress their (both) limits'.

MuÈammad (ß) himself practised ijtih§d within Allah's limits and it is our obligation to follow him in this. Several times he cautioned his companions not to apply the highest possible legitimate penalty (the upper limit), the death penalty, in cases where there was doubt and uncertainty about the guilt of the accused. He said: 'Repeal the Èudåd due to uncertainty, and overlook the offence of the righteous person unless it occurs in one of Allah's Èudåd.' He also said: 'Repeal the Èudåd from Muslims as much as you can. If you can find a way out for a Muslim then apply it. For it is better for a ruler to make a mistake in forgiving someone than to make a mistake in punishing someone."[149] He did not urge his companions to implement the Èudåd penalties if doubts persisted. He urges us to describe and define the crime before exacting penalties, and he calls upon us to be p articularly vigilant the nearer we approach the upper limit of Allah's punishments, allowing us to move away from it due to the circumstances of a specific case and the contingencies of objective reality.

As for the obedience concerning ritual practices we distinguish between two types:

a. Absolute obedience: believers follow the instructions as given in the Book, for example, ‘So establish regular prayer and give regular charity; and obey the apostle; that you may receive mercy…’ (A l-Når 24:56), or as a ÈadÊth puts it: ‘Pray as you saw me praying.”[150] Obedience here is absolute so, for example, a prayer will be rejected if it is done in a way that differs from MuÈammad’s behaviour. It will also be rejected if it is outwardly performed according to this model while it is not directed to Allah. The same applies to the pilgrimage—a ÈadÊth requests: ‘From me take your rituals’.[151] It also applies to the fast. However, even if one has to fast as MuÈammad (ß) did, there is no injunction that demands also to break the fast as he did.

b. Relative obedience: this requires ijtih§d within the limits set by Allah with regards to these rituals. For example, the lower limit of alms tax is 2.5 percent of our income but it might not always stay as low as this. If economic and financial circumstances dictate, one may raise the alms tax and increase the financial burden for the benefit of those who receive our charity. This increase can be decided by a proper ijtih§d. But note that one must never go below the lower limit of 2.5 percent— obedience to MuÈammad (ß) in this is also obedience to God.

B. ‘Separate Obedience’ (al-ã§“a al-munfaßila): eternal obedience to Allah and time-restricted obedience to MuÈammad (ß):

O you who believe! Obey God, and obey the apostle, and those charged with authority among you. If you differ in anything among yourselves, refer it to God and His apostle, if you do believe in God and the Last Day: That is best, and most suitable for final determination. (Al-Nis§” 4:59)

Obey God, and obey the apostle, and beware (of evil): if you do turn back, know you that it is our apostle’s duty to proclaim (the message) in the clearest manner. (Al-M§“ida 5:92)

These verses refer to a second type of obedience to MuÈammad (ß) which, to us today, is separate from obedience to God. It was a combined form of obedience only during MuÈammad’s (ß) lifetime. It designates the obedience of his followers to what he had decided, based on the principle of ‘tying and loosening’. While creating the foundations of a new state amidst the political and cultural turmoil of his time, MuÈammad (ß) continuously exercised ijtih§d, sometimes loosening up to a maximum of permissibility, sometimes tying it up to an absolute minimum. He was by no means infallible in his ijtih§ds, while his decisions reflected the conditions of his time. His ijtih§ds were historical, relative, and contingent.[152] The decisions he took fell into the categories of situational permissions and prohibitions and had, since they were not explicit rules (aÈk§m) of the Book, only regional and temporary significance. As historically contingent rules which reflected the breadth and width of the limits that MuÈammad (ß) himself had set, they do not fall within the sphere of Allah’s limits. Unlike the limits of Allah, MuÈammad’s limits and the rules he ‘placed in between’, for example, the prohibition of music, dance, singing, the visual arts, and such, enjoy neither absolute validity nor eternal authority. If MuÈammad’s decisions were necessary at the time he took them, they had all the flavour of the ancient society in which he lived.

His prohibitions of music, dancing, singing, painting, sculpturing, for example, can be explained—only, of course, if one wants to explain and justify them—by the prevailing idolatry of Arabian society. They were however never inserted into the text of the Book and hence cannot be regarded as permanent injunctions. The concrete measures that MuÈammad (ß) took against the idolatry of his time, originating in human (not divine) legislation, cannot be equated with the universal and eternal limits that Allah has set and which are binding for us today. What we hear, instead, is the admonition to keep away from the ‘filth of the idols’ (al-rajas min al-auth§n), not from the idols as such.[153] The ÈadÊths, reflecting the cultural milieu of ancient societies, certainly will not help to identify measures and rules that are appropriate for our contemporary period. We will have to do without them.

How Shall We Understand What Is Known as ‘The Sunna of the Prophet”?

You have indeed in the apostle [rasål, i.e., not prophet or nabÊ] of God a beautiful pattern (of conduct) [uswat[un] Èasanat[un]] for any one whose hope is in God and the Final Day, and who engages much in the praise of God. (Al-AÈz§b 33:21)

It is generally agreed that Verse 21 of Sårat A l-AÈz§b declares God’s Messenger to be our ultimate role model. We do not deny this. But the question is for what exactly is MuÈammad (ß) our role model? What are the areas of belief and practice concerning which God requires us to emulate MuÈammad’s (ß) example? We know that belief in the oneness of God (al-tauÈÊd) is the indisputable essence of Islamic doctrine. It is also, as we said in chapter 1, the backbone of al-isl§m, next to belief in the existence of God and the Afterlife. And it is, as we saw, the first and principal commandment of al-furq§n. Following from this we suggest that the answer to the above questions can be found in the following verses of the Book:

There is for you an excellent example [uswat [un] Èasanat [un]] (to follow) in Abraham and those with him, when they said to their people: “We are clear of you and of whatever you worship besides God: we have rejected you, and there has arisen, between us and you, enmity and hatred for ever, unless you believe in God and Him alone”… (A l-MumtaÈana 60:4)

“Our Lord! Make us not a (test and) trial for the unbelievers, but forgive us, our Lord! For you are the exalted in might, the wise.” There was indeed in them an excellent example [uswat [un]

Èasanat [un]] for you to follow, for those whose hope is in God and in the Last Day. But if any turn away, truly God is free of all wants, worthy of all praise.

(Al-MumtaÈana 60:5–6)

They think that the confederates have not withdrawn; and if the confederates should come (again), they would wish they were in the deserts (wandering) among the Bedouins, and seeking news about you (from a safe distance); and if they were in your midst, they would fight but little. You have indeed in the apostle of God a beautiful pattern (of conduct) [uswat [un] Èasanat [un]] for any one whose hope is in God and the Final Day, and who engages much in the praise of God. When the believers saw the confederate forces, they said: “This is what God and his apostle had promised us, and God and His apostle told us what was true.” And it only added to their faith and their zeal in obedience. (Al-AÈz§b 33:20–22)

The first two verses from Sårat al-MumtaÈana tell us that, in His quest to implant tauÈÊd in us, Allah has made Abraham a role model. It says ‘there is for you an excellent example (to follow) in Abraham and those with him’. In verse 33:22 we hear that Allah has made MuÈammad (ß) a role model for exactly the same reasons: to implant tauÈÊd in us. In both cases the text addresses the same people for whom MuÈammad (ß) and Abraham are role models: ‘for any one whose hope is in God and the Final Day’; it confirms the same identity of those who should emulate Abraham and MuÈammad. It is undeniable that the Book stresses a similarity between the two prophets and between those who follow them. We hear that the reason why Abraham turns away from his peoples is their shirk of Allah because they worship idols. And we learn that the root cause of conflict between MuÈammad (ß) and his peoples is exactly the same.

Allah wants us to take MuÈammad (ß) and Abraham as role models in our fight against idolatry and in our efforts to plant tauÈÊd in our souls. The similarity of MuÈammad and Abraham as role models, as given by the Book, does not allow us to define the exemplary behaviour of MuÈammad (ß) exclusively through the ÈadÊths, because they give MuÈam mad (ß) a separate identity (from Abraham) and do not contain anything about Abraham that we could emulate.

The call for tauÈÊd, following the examples of Abraham and MuÈammad, is the only reason why we should confront our fellow brothers and sisters. They should never be challenged because they do not wear the Èij§b or because their beards are too short. We distance ourselves from any attempt to define MuÈammad's role model in terms of how we should dress, eat, drink, sleep and talk. It is unacceptable that people form groups and sects because of such trivial issues, sow enmity and hatred, and even go as far as to kill people because they dress and behave differently.

This is certainly the case with the so-called Islamic revival. The so-called revivalists have completely forgotten the tauÈÊd principle, the basic moral commandments of God and Allah's dictum that 'there shall be no coercion in religion' (Al-Baqara 2:156). Instead, they focus exclusively on matters of ritual purity and what could go wrong while praying or fasting: how our ablutions might be polluted, how our prayers can become corrupted, how our fast is invalidated, and so on. We can buy hundreds and hundreds of books that deal with our mortal sins, the punishments of the grave, and stories that sow fear and aggression. Such gloomy stuff will certainly not heal our societies. By any leap of the imagination, this is neither a revival nor is it Islamic.

It is truly regrettable that the Islamic doctrine of tauÈÊd has been distorted to such an extreme degree. The noble example of Allah's Messenger has been unbelievably vulgarised. It has been detached from its true intention as stated by God, to the extent that we now emulate MuÈammad (ß) as Prophet and human being and not—as demanded by God—as Allah's Messenger (ß). As a result, the ÈadÊths of the sunna have become eternally valid legislation. The words and deeds of MuÈammad's (ß) companions, because of their noble reputation, have turned into the eternal basis of analogical jurisdiction, and the scholarly discipline of uß̊ål al-fiqh, while forgetting the rationale for its contingent existence, has become the yardstick for legal debate for all times.

We do not dispute the possibility that ablutions for prayer, a fast, or a supplication might become invalid, and do not deny the existence of mortal sins and vicious acts of obstinacy. What we do dispute, however, is that these things are perceived as the totality of our religion and that our minds are completely occupied by these topics. We criticise the fact that people, intentionally or not, are forced to deal constantly with these secondary issues, while being increasingly drawn away from the truly significant issues of their existence. The Book repeatedly mentions the truly important things of life, as for example:

O mankind! We created you from a single (pair) of a male and a female, and made you into nations and tribes, that you may know each other (not that you may despise (each other). Verily the most honoured of you in the sight of God is (he who is) the most righteous of you. And

God has full knowledge and is well acquainted (with all things). (Al-\ujur§t 49:13)

Exalted is He who holds all control in His hands; who has power over all things, who created death and life to test you [people] and reveal which of you does best—He is the mighty, the forgiving. (Al-Mulk 67:1–2, AH)

Here we hear that togetherness, piety and good work are the fundamental aims of Allah’s creation. Togetherness is achieved through cooperation, mutual help, and assistance in order to achieve cohesion in whatever social unit we live, be it the unit of the family, a team at work, or the state at large. Piety is achieved through knowledge and fear of Allah, by doing what He has ordered and avoiding what He has forbidden. Good work consists of the deeds and righteous acts that are beneficial to our fellow brothers and sisters. One may, for example, strive for perfection at work or abstain from fraud in trade transactions; one may build a school, a mosque or a hospital; or one may simply pray, fast and perform all the other rituals. The only thing one should not do is only to pray or fast or only to build mosques and nothing else. Surely, these actions alone do not really qualify as the righteous deeds that Allah wants us to do.

What about this murderous tendency among so-called revivalists to categorize every little transgression as a mortal sin?

Those who avoid the greater crimes [kab§“ir a l-ithm] and shameful deeds

[al-faw§Èish], and, when they are angry even then forgive. (Al-Shår§ 42:37)

If you (but) eschew the most heinous of the things [kab§“ir] which you are forbidden to do [m§ tuhaun[a]], we shall expel out of you all the evil in you, and admit you to a gate of great honour. (Al-Nis§” 4:31) Those who avoid great sins [kab§“ir a l-ithm] and shameful deeds [al-faw§Èish], only (falling into) small faults; verily your Lord is ample in forgiveness… (Al-Najm 53:32)

O you who believe! Let not some men among you laugh at others: It may be that the (latter) are better than the (former); nor let some women laugh at others: It may be that the (latter are better than the (former); nor defame nor be sarcastic to each other, nor call each other by (offensive) nicknames… (Al-\ujur§t 49:11)

O you who believe! Avoid suspicion as much (as possible), for suspicion in some cases is a sin; and spy not on each other behind their backs… (Al-\ujur§t 49:12)

In these verses Allah tells us that there is a clear difference between an absolute taboo (Èar§m) and a prohibition that is not absolute (nahy). We hear that He prohibits us from spying on each other.

We shall not defame or be sarcastic to each other, nor shall we insult others by offensive name-calling. We also notice that the text calls suspicion a sin (al-ithm) and that in the first three verses the terms ‘greater sins’ (kab§“ir al-ithm) and ‘shameful deeds’ (al-faw§Èish) are used—sins that ‘shall be avoided’. These are prohibited (nahy)—see 4:31 m§ tahaun[a]—but are not absolute taboos (Èar§m). We infer from this that there are greater and smaller sins (53:32: ‘only small faults’), but in terms of those acts that violate absolute taboos, ‘capital crimes’ (a l-muÈarram§t), no qualitative distinction is made between great and small. A small ‘capital crime’ is a contradiction in terms and does not exist. Al-muÈarram§t are ‘capital crimes’ that are to be equated with ‘major sins’. They are absolutely forbidden and must be avoided.

Let us examine the two acts that Allah prohibited in these verses: spying on each other and slander. We deduce from this that spying on your neighbour and your friends and identifying their weak points for public slander is unacceptable. These things do, indeed, lead to serious friction in society and an acute deterioration in social relationships. That is the reason why He ordered us to abstain from them and why He categorized spying and slander as unjustifiable sins. However, if one has to spy on the enemy of a country by collecting intelligence from abroad, this constitutes, in contrast, a necessary and useful activity or is, as we call it, a justifiable sin that is not included in Allah’s sanction.

The same applies to slander. If we gather information about someone’s shortcomings and imperfect character traits in order to defame this person, it is, even if true, an abdominal act or an unjustified sin that Allah has prohibited. But if a person enquires about someone’s life and character because of an intention to marry into the family or a desire to start a business with someone, speaking openly about moral or social deficiencies might be necessary in order to prevent great harm. In this case, calumny is a justifiable sin since it has at least some merit. We learn from Allah’s differing treatment of sins that prohibition can be either absolute or conditional, depending on the intention or purpose behind the sinful act.

The same applies to the problem of drinking alcohol. Some jurists have said that alcohol inevitably implies a state of intoxication, even though the drinking of alcohol does not necessarily always lead to drunkenness. These jurists have completely forbidden alcohol under the pretext that an absolute taboo helps to prevent further harm. In their eyes, the conditioned prohibition (nahy) of alcohol in the Book justifies their absolute prohibition (taÈrÊm) of it. Our position, however, is that a conditioned prohibition does not justify an absolute taboo since a taboo implies, as we have explained earlier, a different quality of scope, validity, and authority. No one can possibly deny the fact that alcohol can be potentially beneficial, for example if it is used as an anaesthetic in surgical operations. In these c ircumstances the use of alcohol is a justified sin. If it is used, however, in order to induce drunkenness it is clearly an unjustified sin.

We must stress that only Allah, who can order temporary or conditioned orders, can issue absolute taboos or permission, while His Messenger (ß), who may also give temporary or conditioned orders, cannot issue absolute taboos or permission. He can only pass on the taboos and permissions contained in Allah's Book. As for 'those of authority', that is, the parliament of the country, it may also legislate temporary or conditioned orders, but it cannot issue absolute taboos or permission. This distribution of legal authority is based on the fundamental distinction between human and divine interdiction. Divine interdiction enjoys universal validity while its implementation is historically conditioned (intention, purpose). Human interdiction is always historically conditioned and never enjoys universal validity. Divine interdiction contains a universal moral ideal, whereas human interdiction does not possess such a moral core. If we ignore these differences and place MuÈammad's (ß) all too human interdiction on the same level as absolute taboos, we risk attributing to them universal, eternal, and indisputable validity. If we added to his rulings the interdictions of his companions and the interdictions of the Imams of the Sunni and Shi#i legal schools, we would suddenly be faced with a huge number of absolute taboos that would make our lives a misery.

The irony is that this is exactly what is about to happen in our societies: the most trivial acts of daily life are interpreted as capital crimes against the religion of Islam: to play a game of backgammon is now tantamount to shirk against Allah, to wear a silk tie is now as serious a crime as killing one’s soul, and to compose eloquent poetry is now considered as reprehensible as stealing the property of orphans. It is not enough that such thinking displays a condemnable frivolity of the human mind, but such punitive rulings in fact compete with Allah’s authority since they forbid things that Allah has not forbidden. The ridiculous outcome of linking the major sins with our private lives is that we are almost inevitably bound to commit a major sin every day of our life. And once we realise that the way we eat, drink, sleep, and dress is judged by the parameters of major, mortal sins, as traditional tafsÊr suggests, we may legitimately ask, when did we lose the kindness and generosity of Islam and where has its sincerity and authenticity gone? Is the essence of MuÈammad’s message not lost when we turn every little misdeed of ordinary life into capital crimes? Have we not completely missed the point of MuÈammad’s mission when we enslave humankind with such onerous bonds and shackles in their daily life? I say: ‘there is no power save in

Allah’.[154]

With this in mind we propose to follow an alternative route. We propose to regard the sunna as nothing but the Prophet’s ijtih§d in applying the rulings of the Book according to the social reality of seventh-century Arabia. MuÈammad (ß) placed his ijtih§ds between the boundaries of God, while at other times he created new boundaries if they had not been provided by God. As MuÈammad’s exemplary model, valid until the Last Day, we propose this: his exegetical moves between Allah’s limits and his pragmatic creation of new limits if no divine order is given. About this Allah said: ‘I have brought to you the book and with him [MuÈammad] is something similar.”[155] And MuÈammad (ß) said: ‘The disagreement of my community is a blessing”[156] which, in our interpretation, means that it is a blessing that we differ in our ijtih§ds and move like the Prophet between Allah’s limits. If we take this to heart we will eventually be able to return to the authentic hermeneutical principle which says that the ÈadÊths need to be interpreted in the light of the Book and not the other way around.

 The Specific, Circumstantial Nature of the S_{UNNA} of the Prophet

The core activity of MuÈammad's sunna was to 'restrict the released' and to 'release the restricted', to allow greater or lesser freedom in applying what Allah has permitted (al-Èal§l). His legal decisions were also intended to regulate the affairs of his society and to modify its development within the parameters created by Allah's absolute taboos and permissions. Based on these premises we can summarise the characteristics of MuÈammad's sunna as follows:

1. His decisions were conditioned by the circumstances of life on the Arabian Peninsula in the seventh century.

2. His ijtih§ds in restricting the allowed (al-Èal§l) did not need divine revelation.

3. MuÈammad's restrictions of the 'unrestricted permissions' (Èal§l muãlaq) were subject to constant corrections due to changing circumstances in his life.

4. His ijtih§ds were not infallible and can therefore, unlike revelations, be corrected.

5. His ijtih§ds, prophetic or not, do not constitute Islamic legislation. Instead, they reflect his applications of civil law arising from the historical conditions of seventh century Arabia. In administrating the state and society of his time, MuÈammad (ß) applied a specific civil law (q§nån madanÊ) suitable for his time which, by reason of its historical contingency, has no transhistorical validity—even if the reports about it, the ÈadÊths, are totally accurate.

The best example we can give to illustrate the specifity of MuÈammad's ijtih§d is his interdiction against visiting graves. We notice that MuÈammad (ß) first 'restricted the released' and then, after much deliberation, reversed his decision and 'released the restricted'. Whether one is allowed to visit graves or not was not explicitly decided by divine injunction in the Book; it, therefore, fell into the category of the absolutely allowed (al-Èal§l). MuÈammad (ß) was free to allow such practices. But in order to combat superstitious practices of j§hiliyya Arabia, MuÈammad (ß) exercised legitimate 'restriction of the released' and forbade the practice. This did not reflect divine legislation, nor did it forbid such visits for all time. In fact, after the ideas and moral principles of the new faith had been planted in the hearts of most Arabs, MuÈammad (ß) reversed his decision and allowed women to visit the graveyards again. This reversal has confused generations of Muslim jurists since, in their understanding, MuÈammad (ß) had first created an 'absolute' taboo and then abandoned it. And since everything what MuÈammad (ß) did, carried—in the eyes of the #ulam§"—legislative significance (a misconception that, fatefully, became the whole rationale of Islamic fiqh), it led to great confusion in deciding whether visiting graves was allowed in Islam or not.

We know that the jurists' solution to the dilemma was to invent a doctrine of abrogation—and God knows where they got that from! Instead of acknowledging that MuÈammad (ß) simply decided what was best for his society at a specific time of his life, they tried to prove the existence of abrogated and abrogating ÈadÊths, from which they then deduced the existence of abrogated and abrogating verses in the Book.[157] Instead of wasting our time and exploring what is abrogated and what not, it is more important for us today to commission our parliaments and ask them to 'release the restricted' and to 'restrict the released' in what Allah has permitted—and do this strictly in accordance with the conditions of contemporary societies. In doing so we would follow the sunna of the Prophet and emulate his example in the best possible and most authentic way.

 The Content of Prophetic \adÊth s

The prophetic sayings of MuÈammad (ß) can be divided into two categories: words of wisdom and prophetic statements.[158]

A. Words of Wisdom

A reference to such words of wisdom can be found in the following verses of the Book:

God has sent down the scripture and wisdom to you, and taught you what you did not know… (Al-Nis§” 4:113, AH)

He gives wisdom to whoever He will. Whoever is given wisdom has truly been much good, but only those with insight bear in mind. (Al-Baqara 2:269, AH)

And recite what is rehearsed to you in your homes, of the signs of God and His wisdom: for God understands the finest mysteries and is wellacquainted (with them). (Al-AÈz§b 33:34)

We bestowed (in the past) wisdom on Luqm§n: “Show (your) gratitude to God.” (Luqm§n 31:12)

A person who speaks words of wisdom does not need the help of divine revelation, not even of prophethood or messengerhood. Luqm§n was not a prophet, and yet we hear in verse 31:12: ‘We bestowed (in the past) wisdom on Luqm§n’. In the Book we find many such ‘precepts of wisdom’ which, incidentally, proves that MuÈammad IdrÊs al-Sh§fi#Ê’s view that ‘wisdom’ is primarily represented by the sunna of the Prophet is totally wrong:[159]

Do not follow blindly what you do not know to be true: ears, eyes, and heart, you will be questioned about all these. Do not strut arrogantly about the earth: you cannot break it open, nor match the mountains in height. The evil of all these actions is hateful to your Lord. [Prophet], this is some of the wisdom your Lord has revealed to you… (A l-Isr§” 17:36–39)

The essential feature of words of wisdom is that they contain moral sayings that are universally understood and shared by all people. Let us quote some examples from a variety of ÈadÊths:

There [should be] no harm [to anyone], and there [should be] no harm in retaliation [if someone was harmed before].[160]

Leave behind what gives you doubt for what does not give you doubt.[161]

Begin with yourself, only then with your brother.[162]

The one who believes in God and the Last Day, he shall speak nicely or not speak at all.[163]

No one is truly a believer unless he desires for his brother what he desires for himself.[164]

A Muslim is one from whose hand and tongue people are safe.[165]

Wisdom is the believer’s lost property; wherever he finds it he takes it.[166]

Another feature is that words of wisdom are formulated from the pool of human experiences and hence come from within human beings. They may be perceived by revelation but revelation is not necessary in order to speak words of wisdom. The following ÈadÊth makes it clear that wisdom is of a distinct quality to revelation:

Wisdom is harmful to the believer when he finds it [and it is] taken away [again].[167]

No religious or civil law should be based on words of wisdom. One of the above-mentioned ÈadÊths states that ‘the one who believes in God and the Last Day, he shall speak nicely or not speak at all’. Such prophetic statements cannot be turned into a doctrine or religious law, because if they were, every believer who is very talkative and sometimes prattles utter nonsense must be imprisoned or called a k§fir, that is, someone who, because of his talkative nature, is a renegade and a disbeliever in Allah and the Last Day. God forbid that words of wisdom are turned into law or doctrine. What this ÈadÊth wants to teach us is that a good believer is moderate in his speech, chooses his words carefully, and tries to be as exact and precise as possible when he describes things or talks about other people.

B. Statements of the Prophet

Prophetic statements are divided into five categories:

6. Statements about rituals:

These are the aÈ§dÊth al-sha#§“ir, MuÈammad’s (ß) instructions, comprising his messengerhood, on how to perform the ritual obligations of the Book. Believers of MuÈammad’s (ß) message have to obey his orders; their adherence to them is what we have called ‘combined obedience’.

7. Statements about the unseen world:

These are the aÈ§dÊth a l-akhb§r bi’l-ghayb, MuÈammad’s (ß) speculations about the unseen world. Because of the fact that he, as a prophet, had no special knowledge about the unseen world, it would be improper for us to take his words as truth. Like every human being, he could only believe in the existence of the unseen world and, like every human being, could only confirm things of the unseen world if they became empirically perceptible, for example, by scientific research. If such things had not been sufficiently researched, he—like everyone else—had to rely on what the Book says about it. Moreover, since the things of the unseen world are part of the ontological reality of the cosmos they were above and beyond the sphere of al-Êm§n and hence, strictly speaking, not in MuÈammad’s area of expertise (see chapter 1).

8. Statements about legal injunctions:

These are the aÈ§dÊth al-aÈk§m which comprise every legal injunction and every piece of legislation that MuÈammad (ß) issued. They are in strict compliance with the verses of the Book and between the limits that Allah has set. They are, as we have pointed out, only informative for us, since, as orders of his time, they show us how MuÈammad (ß) applied the divine injunctions to the contingent social and political problems that he faced in ancient Arabia. His statements have nonnormative value for us because they merely reflect his activities as a mujtahid who responded to the needs of his time and who applied rulings that the objective conditions of his society made necessary. Due to their historical contingency our ijtih§ds may considerably deviate from his ijtih§ds—even if this does not diminish our love for the Prophet MuÈammad (ß)!

9. Sacred statements:

This category refers traditionally to the aÈ§dÊth al-qudsiyya about the unseen world which, as the name indicates, were thought to be inspired by divine revelation. However, we cannot accept them as sacred or divine for the same reasons as given for the aÈ§dÊth a l-akhb§r bi’l-ghayb: MuÈammad (ß), as Prophet, simply could not have spoken such words, as his knowledge of the unseen world amounted basically to nothing. Moreover, we reject the existence of such sacred statements because they imply that the Book was in some way ambiguous or needed further elaboration or additional explanations.[168] We believe that if Allah had thought it necessary to add explanations He would have given them within the Book. This was, of course, not necessary as we hear in the following two verses:

“Shall I seek for judge other than God? When He it is who has sent unto you the book, explained in detail [mufaßßal[an]].”… (A l-An#§m 6:114)

And if the apostle were to invent any sayings in our name, We should certainly seize him by his right hand, and We should certainly then cut off the artery of his heart. (Al-\§qa 69:44–46).

From the second verse, taken from Sårat Al-\§qa, we realise that fabricating lies about Allah includes words of defamation and slander as well as words of praise and glorification. But even if these fabrications contain praise and glorification they still remain spurious words put into the mouth of Allah. Even if positive and well-intended, they are still fabrications for which Allah’s punishment is, as we hear in 69:46, very severe. God forbid that the Prophet might have done such a thing!

10. Personal statements:

These are the aÈ§dÊth al-Èay§t al-ins§nÊ which cover the sayings about MuÈammad’s personal life, his eating and sleeping habits, his favourite pastimes, his way of dressing, speaking, travelling, walking, running, hunting, and so on. They also include his kindness, good-naturedness, tolerance, courage, and his feelings about justice and injustice, truth and falsehood, hardship and welfare, and so forth. We hear and thoroughly absorb all these biographical details of MuÈammad’s daily private and public life so that our souls are polished, our spirits uplifted, and our virtues strengthened. But we deny the legitimacy of turning such personal matters into normative behaviour to be emulated by everyone on this planet at all times and throughout every period of human history.

 Conclusion

The aim of this chapter has been to solve one of the most complex problems of Islamic history, that is, to define the form and essence of the sunna of the Prophet (ß). We have demonstrated that it is necessary to place the sunna into the epistemological, cultural and political context of seventh-century Arabia. We showed that we, living in the twenty-first century, must be critical of the sunna's contingent and context-bound nature as well as of formulations and definitions of the sunna that Islamic fiqh invented during the seventh to the ninth centuries.

We have made it clear that MuÈammad b. #Abdall§h (ß) was a human being. What made him different was his reception of divine revelation, as we hear in verse 110 of Sårat Al-Kahf:

Say: "I am but a man like yourselves, (but) the inspiration [waÈy] has come to me… (Al-Kahf 18:110)[169]

Revelation came down to MuÈammad (ß) complete in form and content, which means that he delivered it to his people exactly as he heard it. His great mission was to make it public, that is, to 'unhide' what was hidden and to make clear what was unclear. On this we hear the Book:

And remember God took a covenant from the People of the Book, to make it known and clear to mankind, and not to hide it… ($l #Imr§n 3:187)

Through his transmission of the divine text—and here we compare MuÈammad (ß) to a conductor transmitting an electric current—the Prophet became a messenger of Allah. It was this mission that distinguished him from all the other prophets and messengers that humankind had seen before. We learn that prophets and messengers who preceded MuÈammad (ß) had been equipped with special gifts of miraculous power that they possessed independently from the messages they carried to the people. MuÈammad's (ß) mission as a prophet and messenger, in contrast, was solely authorised by Allah's order to deliver the text of the divine revelations exactly as he heard it.

It is because of this mission that Allah asks the Muslim-Believers to be obedient to MuÈammad (ß) as messenger (rasål), not as prophet (nabÊ) or human being (a l-bashr a l-ins§n). Why? Because obedience requires the impeccability of the one whom we obey, and MuÈammad (ß) was not in any way impeccable either as human being or as prophet—only as messenger (within the boundaries that the Book stipulates). Numerous passages in the Book could be quoted to illustrate this truth.

As for the thorny problem of how to correctly follow MuÈammad's sunna we conclude that we should emulate not his rules as such but the manner in which he harmonised with the Book the 'becoming' and 'progressing' of his society on the Arabian Peninsula in the s eventh century. In other words, we should follow his model and also apply the divine rules but this time within the politic al-historical context of our own time. He presents to us the first and most authentic model of how to transform the 'being' of-and-in-itself of the Book into concrete realities of society, state, family, and such, a model ijtih§d which we have to emulate for our own times, the twenty-first century.

This insight allows us to conclude that MuÈammad (ß) was a pragmatic leader who received the 'absolute' and applied it to the 'particular' of his time. As we have seen, he was certainly a wise man, but, as we have also seen, the wisdom of his sunna was not derived from a divine source. This implies that our philosophical and theological knowledge, which should be anchored in divine knowledge, can only be derived from the Book alone. It cannot come from the words and statements of MuÈammad (ß) even if he was God's most perfect Messenger. Only Allah alone, not His Messenger, should be the ultimate source of knowledge. Nor shall the words of his companions and contemporaries be the inspiration for contemporary thought.

Finally, let us assure the reader that we are committed to following the sunna of the Prophet but only to the extent and degree we defined in this chapter. We are indeed willing to emulate the example of MuÈammad (ß) but only within the parameters of a new Islamic jurisprudence that we propose in this volume. The following six principles summarise our definition of the sunna of the Prophet:

1. The oral tradition, that is, the entire collection of ÈadÊths, whether classified as reliable or weak, as supported or singular, has no binding authority. The reason for this is that the sunna consists of human legislation, and human legislation, as the #ulam§” themselves told us, changes according to the historical context in which it is passed. The key criterion for their implementation (or modification) is the extent to which they are (or are not) in harmony with the Book and social reality. If they are in harmony they should be implemented, if they are not in harmony then they should be modified. We do not follow the tradition of overriding the authority of the Book, so bluntly expressed in the tradition of some \anafÊ scholars: ‘If the views of the Sheikhs [of our school] contradict the views of the Qur”§n, we adhere to what the Sheikhs say’.

2. The sunna of the Prophet is the first ijtih§d, that is, one out of many alternative options that MuÈammad (ß) exercised in order to issue concrete injunctions that embodied his application of the divine absolute idea. His sunna is the first ijtih§d, but not the last and not the only one. It is the first successful attempt to adapt divine law and order to social reality.

3. The sunna of the Prophet authentically reflects MuÈammad’s (ß) magnificent ability to create—while receiving the revelations of the Book—a legal, social, and political reality in full congruence with the divine text.

4. The legal injunctions of MuÈammad’s messengerhood (a l-ris§la) have only limited validity. One has to bear in mind that he received these verses within a period of only ten years while he lived in Yathrib (Medina). Surely, the social and political situations he faced in those ten years cannot possibly constitute the only situations that people faced at that time all over the world. And given that there will be no further revelation and no new messengerhood until the Last Day, surely MuÈammad’s ten years in Yathrib cannot possibly cover all the circumstances that we will encounter now and in the future. The emergence of different and novel situations, which need to be handled by Islamic law, will make obsolete the method of analogical reasoning that takes its basis in MuÈammad’s ijtih§d. Our ijtih§d should be based on reason and modern scientific thinking in full compliance with the Book and objective reality.

5. The tradition and customs of the companions of the Prophet have no binding authority. They only have value as historical information. In Islamic fiqh, the consensus of the fuqah§” should be replaced by the consensus of living people who issue laws through contemporary institutions such as legislative assemblies and parliaments. We believe that living people are far more competent to solve current social and economic problems than MuÈammad’s (ß) companions and their successors who lived 1,400 years ago. However, if by chance, their decisions happen to be suitable for some of our current problems we would, of course, not be foolish enough to reject them. But they should not to be applied in principle, and in any case only after a search for more contemporary solutions has failed.

6. Ijtih§d, qualified and within well-defined boundaries, is not only legitimate but also necessary. We reject all claims that an ijtih§d of so-called naßß verses[170] is forbidden and that ijtih§d is only allowed if a verse does not contain an explicit ruling, that is, a non-naßß verse. But what is the purpose of an ijtih§d outside the realm of such explicit naßß rulings? Outside the realm of naßß, that is, outside the legal verses that possess legislative significance, the law-giver may legislate whatever he wants (because it would have no legal relevance). We aim to introduce a new Islamic philosophy and a new Islamic jurisprudence. We want to secure an historical continuity with previous generations of Muslims by maintaining the shah§da of ‘there is no god but God, MuÈammad is the messenger of God’, by maintaining the fundamental ethical principles and by maintaining the fixed forms of ritual obligations as they were taught by the Prophet (ß). All other areas of religious and social conduct do not need to be maintained, since our ‘becoming’ requires an adaptation of the message to the needs of our own time which are different from the needs of our forefathers in seventh-century Arabia. The sole criterion of exercising a legitimate ijtih§d is, hence, not the existence or nonexistence of a naßß text, but the degree of c ongruence between the outcome of the ijtih§d and the circumstances of our objective reality. If the mujtahid’s decision is fully in accord with the realities around him, or her for that matter, at the time of his or her ijtih§d, the decision is right; if it contradicts social and political realities, the ijtih§d is wrong.

Someone might look at these five points and ask ‘what about the details of rituals, where shall we learn about the exact way to pray, to fast, and do the pilgrimage, and how will we know about the minimum amount of charity if the Book does not provide us with such details? Should we not consult the sunna for that?’ Our answer to this is ‘yes’: the Book teaches these things only in a general, absolute manner which the greatest of all messengers (ß) put into practice by his concrete, ritual performances. A theoretical, verbal, or oral specification of the details of his rituals was not needed.

MuÈammad’s (ß) practical sunna, reflecting the exact details of rituals, is the only part of his messengerhood (al-ris§la) which we today wholeheartedly accept both in form and content. It comprises, as we defined in chapter 1, the pillars of al-Êm§n. They define the identity of the Muslim-Believers (al-muslimån al-mu”minån), those who are Muslims and believers in MuÈammad’s messengerhood and who express their faith through the pillars of a l-Êm§n. We consider the form and content of these rituals as fixed. In spite of their stable form, they do not obstruct historical ‘becoming’ and ‘progressing’.

However, we should not forget that due to their manifest religious and spiritual nature, rituals are inappropriate for the task of forming a society and controlling state institutions. Religious rituals can be practiced in any political system, democratic or not, and given that people agree that as long as a despotic ruler does not prohibit rituals they have to obey him, the performance of rituals has no significant impact on the political culture of a country. Rituals are not part of civil society and hence, in this respect, need not to be changed, modified, or intensified.

Having said this we should be wary of unnecessary complications in the performance of rituals. It cannot be right that, after having practised these rituals for over 1,400 years, people are still in need of prayer manuals and instruction by legal scholars. The rituals should be simple and straightforward and easy to practise; there can never be any cultural or civilisational value in the infamous casuistry for which our fuqah§” are so well-known.

A final word: all social legislation needs to be based on the knowledge which humans have derived from modern social, human, and natural sciences. In order to gain such knowledge, human beings need to enjoy maximum freedom—the highest and most sacred good on earth. Restrictive legislation, however, restricts human freedom. A healthy society can exist with less restrictive legislation. The reverse situation makes people not only less free but also mentally and physically ill. With this in mind we have come to the decision to separate the legislative aspects of the Book, where there is room for manoeuvring in order to be less restrictive, from the moral and ethical ideals, the ethical ideals of the al-furq§n or ‘the straight path’ (al-ßir§ã al-mustaqÊm), where there is no room for manoeuvring.[171]

 3. Revelation

The previous two chapters have made it clear that our analysis of Allah’s Book is based on the understanding that its text is divided into two basic units: the ‘book of messengerhood’ (kit§b al-ris§la) and the ‘book of prophethood’ (kit§b al-nubåwa). This chapter is dedicated to a full exploration of this division. Its aim is to show how Allah has split up the different parts of these two books and shared them out between the såras of the written text. We believe that the miraculous nature (al-i#j§z) of the text lies precisely in the Book’s dual nature and that its protection against any tampering with the text’s meaning must be secured by keeping verses of prophethood apart from the verses of messengerhood. All of this is based on our notion that Allah’s words are nonsynonymous, in the sense that no word shares exactly the same meaning with another word regardless of how close their semantic core may be. This point will be demonstrated by a detailed comparison between verses that are believed to contain synonymous words. The semantic differences between these words will be shown by an analysis of their specific location and concrete context within a såra.

Let us first quote some of these verses of the Book and begin by asking questions that are meant to raise some doubts about how they are conventionally understood. The answers to these questions will be provided later in the chapter.

– First, we observe that the text uses several different terms in referring to Allah’s revelation. Apart from terms such as a l-qur”§n, a l-kit§b, and a l-furq§n we also find a l-dhikr, as in the following verse:

It is We who have sent down the remembrance [al-dhikr];[172] and We watch over it. (Al-\ijr 15:9, AA)

Do all these supposedly synonymous terms carry the same meaning? If not, how and why are they different?

– Second, when the text refers to ‘book’ we find that the noun is qualified by two different attributive phrases:

(This is) a book, with verses basic or fundamental (of established meaning) [kit§b uÈkimat §y§tuhu]… (Håd 11:1)

…a book, consistent with itself [kit§b[an] mutash§bih[an]]… (A l-Zumar 39:23)

Is it correct to say that in the first instance the text refers to a book that contains all ‘definite verses’ (§y§t muÈkam§t) of the Book,[173] whereas in the second instance a different book is mentioned which contains ‘ambiguous verses’ (§y§t mutash§bih§t)?[174] Is it feasible to assume that the text contains two different categories of verses, each of which are assembled in two different books, that is, two smaller units within the larger unit of the Book?

– Third, we observe in the following verse that the term al-qur”§n is juxtaposed with the term al-kit§b, connected by the conjunction wa.

A. L. R. These are the ayats of revelation [a l-kit§b]—of [and][175] a Qur’an that makes things clear. (Al-\ijr 15:1)

Are we right in saying that two words in a divine text cannot be juxtaposed unless they are purposefully thought to contain different meaning? If so, is it not logical to assume that the term qur”§n adds something different to the term al-kit§b first mentioned? And if we agree on this, would we not have to find out whether al-kit§b and al-qur”§n are two distinctly different terms or, since qur”§n is placed after the term al-kit§b, whether their juxtaposition yields a relationship of subordination? If the latter is correct would it not imply that al-qur”§n is the more specific of the two and an integral part of the more generic al-kit§b?

– In the text it is said that al-kit§b is ‘guidance for the pious’ [Al-Baqara 2:2], whereas al-qur”§n is ‘guidance for the people’ [Al-Baqara 2:158]. Does this not indicate that the divine message is intended for two different groups of recipients? Of the two, ‘people’ is certainly the more generic term as it includes both ‘pious’ and ‘non-pious’ persons, whereas addressing ‘the pious’ excludes people who are not religious. Is it right to infer that since al-qur”§n means ‘guidance for the people’, referring to both religious and secular people, it cannot contain verses that address issues of religious practice? If that is correct, to what exactly does al-qur”§n refer?

– A clue is given in the following verse:

It is a confirmation [taßdÊq] of (revelations) that went [with] it [alladhi baina yadaihi]… (Yånus 10:37)

The qur”§n is a confirmation of what ‘went with it’. But what does the phrase ‘what went with it’ mean? Does it refer, as the traditional exegetes thought when they rendered alladhi baina yadaihi as ‘what went before it’, to the Torah and the Gospel? This would imply, to the greatest delight of some Jews and Christians, that the qur”§n was revealed only in order to confirm previous scriptures. Or does it instead refer to the fact that MuÈammad’s (ß) prophethood in seventh-century Arabia was supposed to confirm a new legislation, different from the Torah and Gospel? If so, what was the new legislation that MuÈammad (ß) was asked to confirm by the qur”§n?

– The qur”§n mentions the term ‘words of God’ (kalim§t All§h). Are words of God words in the sense that they can be written down or orally recited? Are divine words similar to human speech? If they are, would that not inevitably turn God into someone who, by speaking Arabic, shares human attributes of race, gender, and language? And would this not contradict the following verse?:

Say [Prophet], ‘If the whole ocean were ink for writing the words of my Lord [kalim§t rabbÊ], it would run dry before those words were exhausted’—even if We were to add another ocean to it.

(Al-Kahf 18:109, AH)

– The following three verses tell us that:

His word is the truth [al-Èaqq]… (Al-An#§m 6:73)

And God by His words [bi-kalim§tihi] does prove and establish His truth… (Yånus 10:82)

A.L.M.R. These are the signs (or verses) of the book [a l-kit§b]: that which has been revealed unto you from your Lord is the truth [al-Èaqq]; but most men believe not. (Al-Ra#d 13:1)

What does the verse mean when it states that Allah’s words are the truth? And why do we not once in the entire text find the expression: ‘Allah said “Perform the prayer!”’ or ‘Allah said “Keep the fast!”’? Or, put differently, why are ‘His words’ (kalim§t All§h), referring to the truth, never stated in connection with ritual and legal commands?

– Two important terms in this respect are ‘spirit’ and ‘soul’:

[Prophet], they ask you about the spirit [al-råÈ]. Say: ‘The spirit is part of my Lord’s domain [amr rabbÊ]. You have only been given a little knowledge.’ (Al-Isr§” 17:85, AH)

It is God that takes the souls (of men) [al-anfus] at death… (Al-Zumar 39:42)

How does ‘spirit’ (al-råÈ) differ from ‘soul’ (al-nafs)? It is incorrect to interpret ‘spirit’ as the ‘secret of life’ as many traditional exegetes have claimed because this implies that all living creatures—animals, plants, and humans—share God’s ‘spirit’. But if Allah has ‘breathed his spirit’ only into Adam, the ‘father’ of humankind, would that not exclude animals and plants? Is it correct to associate ‘spirit’ with ‘God’s command’ simply because it is mentioned in the same verse (amr rabbÊ)? Are they not two separate terms, connoting two different concepts that should not be confused? Did traditional exegesis not simply err here because it did not fully engage with a thorough study of the term ‘spirit’ (al-råÈ)? To simply define it as ‘secret of life’ seems to be highly inadequate, given the depth and complexity of this term. But, if ‘spirit’ is different from ‘soul’ and ‘command’, what exactly does it mean?

– Also, what is the difference between ‘Lord’ and ‘God”? Why does the text always use the term ‘God’ (All§h) when it refers to ritual duties of worship? Why does it not contain a phrase such as: ‘Do not worship anyone but the Lord’ (al-rabb)? In what context does the text use ‘Lord’ and when does it use ‘God’?

The following verse, for example, uses the term ‘Lord’. Revealingly, it does not command a specific ritual but a decree about general human behaviour:

Thy Lord [rabbuk[a]] has decreed that you worship none but Him, and that you be kind to parents. Whether one or both of them attain old age in your life, say not to them a word of contempt, nor repel them, but address them in terms of honour. (A l-Isr§” 17:23)

Does the verse state a decree that contains objective reality unrelated to the human mind? Is this a command that human beings can fulfil regardless of their actual mindset and behaviour? Does ‘worship of Him’ describe an objective fact of human nature regardless of human intention and consciousness? Does someone worship Allah if he, in practice, worships the moon or the sun because, objectively, one always worships Him even if, subjectively, something else is worshipped? Can ‘His words’ never be replaced by something else as, for example, Ibn ‘ArabÊ claimed? Of course, if it was like that then why did Muslims never theless drift into practices of tawakkul, superstition and scientifically absurd folklore?

– On a different topic, why, in the traditional interpretation of the following verse, was the descriptive negation (‘nobody touches’) changed into a prescriptive negation (‘none shall touch!’)?:

That this is indeed a qur”§n most honourable * in a book wellguarded * which none shall [sic][176] touch [l§ yamass[u]] but those who are clean. (Al-W§qi#a 56:77–79)

How could the traditional exegetes ever say that the phrase ‘those who are clean’ refers to the pure and sane, thereby excluding menstruating women, women in childbirth, and people in a state of major ritual impurity from being allowed to touch the qur”§n? Do these verses really refer to a written copy of the qur”§n, written down by a human being on a piece of wood or camel skin, or recorded on a tape? Is this really the rule not to touch a copy of the qur”§n in a state of impurity? If not, what could be the alternative?

 Al-kit[§]b and Al-qur”[§]n

Let us first explore the two terms al-kit§b and al-qur”§n and establish how they are related to each other. The following three verses will guide us on this:

A. L. R. These are the §y§ts of revelation [al-kit§b] —of [and] a Qur’an that makes things clear. (Al-\ijr 15:1)

This is the book [a l-kit§b]; in it is guidance sure, without doubt, to those who fear God [li’l-mutaqÊn]. (Al-Baqara 2:2)

Ramadan is the (month) in which was sent down the qur”§n, as a guide to mankind [hud§ li’l-n§s], also clear (signs) for guidance and judgement (between right and wrong). (Al-Baqara 2:185)

In verse 1 of Sårat a l-\ijr the term qur”§n is added to the term a l-kit§b through the conjunction ‘and’ (wa). A conjunction is employed in Arabic to either connect two distinct lexical units or to add a new semantic property to a preceding term. If al-kit§b and al-qur”§n were two completely different categories, it would be as if someone said: ‘AÈmad and Sa#Êd’, referring to AÈmad and Sa#Êd as two different persons. If, however, al-qur”§n was a more specific unit of al-kit§b, it would either corroborate al-kit§b or introduce a different nuance to it. Surely, we need to establish which of the two possibilities is correct. But first we maintain that, based on the reading of the following two verses, al-qur”§n contains ‘clear signs’ (§y§tun§ bayyan§t[in]), and that these ‘clear signs’ represent the truth (al-haqq). And if the qur”§n contains clear signs, and if the clear signs represent the truth, then al-qur”§n means truth:

But when Our clear signs [§y§tun§ bayyan§t[in]] are rehearsed unto them, those who rest not their hope on their meeting with Us, say: “Bring us a reading other than this, or change this.” Say: “It is not for me, of my own accord, to change it: I follow naught but what is revealed unto me: if I were to disobey my Lord, I should myself fear the penalty of a great day (to come).” (Yånus 10:15)

When Our clear signs [§y§tun§ bayyan§t[in]] are rehearsed to them, the unbelievers say, of the truth [al-Èaqq] when it comes to them: “This is evident sorcery!” (Al-AÈq§f 46:7)

As for the relationship between a l-qur”§n and a l-kit§b, verse 31 of Sårat F§ãir provides a clue:

That which We have revealed to you of [from] the book [min al-kit§b] is the truth [al-Èaqq], confirming what was (revealed) [with] it: for God is assuredly—with respect to His servants—well acquainted and fully observant. (F§ãir 35:31)

If it says that the qur”§n was revealed from the book,[177] it means that the qur”§n does not cover the entire book but only one part of it. We will prove further below that al-qur”§n represents that part of the Book which is the truth (al-Èaqq), embodied in the ‘ambiguous verses’ (§y§t mutash§bih§t), i.e. the verses of prophethood. In this specific capacity as the truth, it is attached to the more generic term a l-kit§b. Conversely, a different part of al-kit§b will then embody the ‘definite verses’ (§y§t muÈkam§t), i.e. the verses of messengerhood which do not specify the truth (even if, in being more generic, it does participate in the truth by being controlled or monitored by it). Whereas the former refers to objective reality, revealed as ‘knowledge’, in its totality the latter represents a much narrower glimpse of that reality and is dependent on its ‘corroboration’ by the qur”§n.

(1) Al-kit§b (the Book)

The word kit§b is derived from the Arabic root k-t-b which literally means ‘to collect or compose things’ in a coherent and comprehensive manner. The derivative kit§ba means ‘writing’ and refers to the process of composing a series of sentences for the purpose of dealing with a specific subject matter. It always denotes ‘writing’ of more than one line or less. The term a l-k§tib refers to the author of a book. If the term kit§b is indefinite, meaning

‘a book’, it always requires a genitive compound to qualify what kind of book it is: ‘a book of physics’, ‘a book of medicine’, or ‘a story book’.

In the Book, the many topics revealed to MuÈammad (ß) are called ‘books’ (kutub), as in:

An apostle from God, rehearsing scriptures kept pure and holy * wherein are laws [books] [kutub][178] right and straight. (A l-Bayyina 98:2–3)

Prayer, for example, constitutes one book, a ‘book of prayer’; all verses that deal with the topic of prayer are contained in this book, such as:

For such prayers are enjoined on believers at stated times. (Al-Nis§” 4:103)

Other books are the ‘book of fasting’, the ‘book of pilgrimage’, the ‘book of inheritance’, the ‘book of death’, and so forth; every subject matter is arranged as a book. Not a single thing exists in nature, in the cosmos or in society that is not kept in a book—as in the following verse:

And all things have We preserved on record [in a book] [kit§b[an]][179]. (Al-Naba” 78:29)

The definite term a l-kit§b, the Book, refers to the entire body of all subject matters that exist. The Book has been revealed in individual ‘books’ to MuÈammad (ß), but these books are scattered throughout the text. Books have been revealed as ‘words’ with ‘meaning’, thus representing the complete textual corpus (al-mußÈaf)—from the first Sårat al-F§tiÈa to the last one, al-N§s. The indefinite term kit§b, a book, refers therefore only to one subunit within the larger unit of ‘the book’; kit§b[an] mutash§bih[an][] (39:23), for example, the book of ambiguous verses, does not refer to the entire revelation (i.e., the Book) but only to a smaller component of it. Humankind explores the universe through the study of these verses. The same applies to kit§b[un] uÈkimat §y§tihi (11:1), the ‘book whose verses are definite’, which covers only the definite part of the Book. The believers explore the etiquette of human behaviour through the study of these verses.

A look at verse 3 of Sårat $l #lmr§n reveals what exactly is covered by the term al-kit§b:

He it is who has sent down to you the book [al-kit§b]: In it are verses basic or fundamental (of established meaning) [§y§t muÈkam§t]; they are the foundation of the book [umm a l-kit§b][180]—others are [ambivalent] [mutash§bih§t]. [181] But those in whose hearts is perversity follow the part thereof that is allegorical, seeking discord, and searching for its hidden meanings, but no one knows its hidden meanings except God. And those who are firmly grounded in knowledge [al-r§sikhån fi’l-#ilm] say: “We believe in the book; the whole of it is from our Lord”—and none will grasp the message except men of understanding [ålå ’l-alb§b]. ($l #lmr§n 3:7)

I) The Definite Book (al-kit§b al-muÈkam):

The definite book contains all ‘definite verses’ (§y§t muÈkam§t) of Allah’s revelation to which the term ‘mother of the book’ (umm a l-kit§b) has been given to designate the origin or source of this book. The ‘definite verses’ address the rules and principles of human behaviour within the spheres of ritual worship, economics, the community, politics, and social and personal ethics. They embody MuÈammad’s messengerhood (al-ris§la).

II) The Ambiguous Book (al-kit§b al-mutash§bih):

The ambiguous book contains all ‘ambiguous verses’ (§y§t mutash§bih§t) of Allah’s revelation, pertaining to the universal laws given by Allah to His Prophet MuÈammad (ß). Universal laws explain processes of nature in the unseen world, those parts of the universe that had not yet been discovered by the human mind when Allah’s revelation occurred. In embodying the signs of the objective reality, ‘ambiguous verses’ separate truth from falsehood—they represent MuÈammad’s (ß) prophethood (al-nubåwa). Unlike the ‘definite verses’, they do not contain rules of human behaviour and hence are purely descriptive. They contain ‘news’ about the universe, and not prohibitions or permissions.

The ambiguous book is divided into two parts: a) the seven oftrepeated (verses) and b) the grand qur”§n—as we hear in the following verse:

And We have bestowed upon you the seven oft-repeated (verses) [sab#[an] min al-math§nÊ] and the grand qur”§n [al-qur”§n al-#azÊm]. (Al-\ ijr 15:87)

III) Explanation of the Book:

This is inferred from the above phrase: ‘other [than the] ambiguous verses’ (ukhar mutash§bih§t). Note that the text does not say ‘the others are ambiguous verses’ (al-§khir mutash§bih§t), as many exegetes suggest.[182] It rather points to the existence of a third verse-type that is neither definite nor ambiguous. In the following verse we come across a special term for this type which is ‘explanation of the book’

(tafßÊl al-kit§b):

This qur”§n is not such as can be produced by other than God; on the contrary it is a confirmation of (revelations) that went [with] it, and a fuller explanation of the book [tafßÊl al-kit§b]— wherein there is no doubt—from the Lord of the worlds. (Yånus 10:37)

Sårat Yånus refers to all three categories of books in just one verse:

– al-qur”§n (the truth);

– [rules] ‘that went with it’ (explained further down as umm al-kit§b);

– tafßÊl al-kit§b (the explanation of the book or literally: ‘a fuller explanation of the book—wherein there is no doubt—from the Lord of the worlds’).

The Definite Verses—The ‘Mother of the Book’ (umm al-kit§b)

The definite verses (§y§t muÈkam§t) of the Book for which a special term was given: ‘the mother of the book’ (umm al-kit§b), are contained in the definite book and cover the rules and principles of human behaviour in all spheres of life—they are representing MuÈammad’s (ß) messengerhood (al-ris§la). We have established seven subcategories of definite verses:

1. Rituals;

2. The limits of God (al-Èudåd), defining ways of non-ritual worship

(al-#ib§d§t);

3. General ethics (a l-furq§n), moral codes given as commandments, and absolute taboos (al-muÈarram§t);

4. Temporary rules (only valid for MuÈammad’s (ß) time);

5. Circumstantial rules (e.g., prohibition), only enforceable if a specific historical situation emerges that is similar to the one prescribed in the Book;

6. General notifications, nonbinding instructions in the Book introduced by the phrase ‘O you Prophet!’ (e.g., instructions for the dress code of women);[183]

7. Specific notifications, likewise nonbinding as they were specifically and exclusively revealed for MuÈammad’s (ß) time (e.g., rules of behaviour for the Prophet’s wives).[184]

MuÈammad (ß) received the umm al-kit§b from God and, by way of his sunna, applied it immediately to the historical context of seventhcentury Arabia. Unlike the other part of the book, al-qur”§n, it does not require a theoretical understanding but allows for a practical exegesis that considers the needs of society. Such exegesis however requires the qur”§n to approve and confirm it. Unlike the verses of the qur”§n, the verses of umm a l-kit§b do not contain Allah’s words that are eternally valid and to be enforced by necessity. Nowhere in the Book do verses of the ‘definite book’ start with the opening phrase ‘And God said:’ (q§la All§h); therefore the verses of umm al-kit§b are:

A. A moral commandment:

God commands [All§h ya”amur[u]] justice, the doing of good, and liberality to kith and kin, and He forbids all shameful deeds, and injustice and rebellion. He instructs you, that you may receive admonition. (Al-NaÈl 16:90) B. A prohibition stated as an imperative:

‘Do not come close [fa-l§ taqrabåh§]…’ (Al-Baqara 2:187) C. A legal rule:

God (thus) directs you [yußÊkum All§h] as regards your children’s (inheritance): to the male, a portion equal to that of two females… (Al-Nis§” 4:11)

The Ambiguous Verses

Again for recapitulation, we said: The ambiguous book contains all ‘ambiguous verses’ (§y§t mutash§bih§t) of the Book which reveal the universal laws given by Allah to His Prophet MuÈammad (ß). The ‘ambiguous verses’ separate truth from falsehood. They represent MuÈammad’s prophethood (a l-nubåwa). The ambiguous book is divided into two parts: a) the seven oft-repeated and b) the majestic al-qur”§n.

Al-qur”§n (the Truth)

Al-qur”§n contains ‘the truth’. It consists of those verses that reveal what is reality and those that explain it. It embodies MuÈam mad’s (ß) prophethood and provides such deep insights into universal realities that those who listen to it shout admiringly, ‘This is nothing but sorcery!’ The qur”§n’s ‘ambiguous verses’ occupy more space in the Book than those of the umm al-kit§b.

The miraculous nature or inimitability (al-i#j§z) of the qur”§n lies in its dual nature of expressing the truth in a total, comprehensive, and absolute manner, on the one hand, and of allowing the possibility of understanding it in a relative, contingent, and subjective manner, on the other. This duality of containing both the totality of the qur”§n’s truth and the relativity of humans’ perception of it, is what makes the qur”§n both eternally valid and historically viable. Human understanding of the eternal truth will always be relative, that is, short of the absolute. One may read the qur”§n from all possible angles, philosophical, scientific, historical, linguistic, religious, and such, but human interpretations will always remain partial and relative. Therefore, the qur”§n is the subject of successive, continuous, and progressively improving rational interpretations (al-ta”wÊl), in contrast with traditional verse-by-verse exegesis (al-tafsÊr). And because of its partiality and relativity, it is bound to attract a multiplicity of interpretations due to the sheer diversity of human perception and of the subjective ways to understand objective reality.

The qur”§n consists, primarily, of narratives about the truth and its laws in reality. But it also weaves these together (note the etymological root of q-r-n: ‘to bind together’) with narratives (ÈadÊth) about events that occurred in human history (it never predicts or predestines such events but records them only after they have occurred). It thus links (qarana) the laws and events of objective reality together with the laws and events of human history. In its capacity as the source of both the cosmic and historical truth it confirms ‘what went with it’ (alladhi baina yadaihi), that is, the umm al-kit§b, and functions as the latter’s ultimate protector and guardian.

The Seven Oft-Recited (sab# al-math§nÊ)

<right>

And We have bestowed upon you the seven oft-repeated (verses)

</right>

[sab#[an] min al-math§nÊ] and the grand qur”§n. (Al-\ijr 15:87)

1. In verse 87 of Sårat al-\ijr the conjunction ‘and’ connects the term a l-qur”§n to the preceding term sab# a l-math§nÊ. Since the terms cannot be synonymous and since al-qur”§n is preceded by sab# al-math§nÊ, the latter must be a separate term and cannot be explained by al-qur”§n. Because sab# al-math§nÊ is mentioned first this also indicates that it enjoys greater significance than the qur”§n in Allah’s act to bestow upon humankind divine instructions about the universe.

2. The number ‘seven’ in the term sab# a l-math§nÊ [lit. ‘the doubledseven”] is further proof of our thesis that the term sab# al-math§nÊ is different from al-qur”§n, as the qur”§n consists of more than just seven verses.

3. In spite of their separate nature, the two terms still share one generic root. One may compare this verse to another in which it is said that there are women who are ‘[either] previously married or virgins’ [TaÈrÊm 66:5]. Despite their different social status wives and virgins have something in common because they are both women. Likewise, the common denominator between a l-qur”§n and umm a l-kit§b is their shared origin of being both revealed from God, even though they designate two different realms of the divine text. What links sab# al-math§nÊ and al-qur”§n is that both reveal the same information about the universe, although they do it in entirely different ways:

God has revealed (from time to time) the most beautiful [event] [aÈsan al-ÈadÊth] in the form of a[n ambiguous] book [kit§b[an] […] mutash§bih[an]], (yet) repeating (its teaching in various aspects) [math§nÊy[a]]. The skins of those who fear their Lord tremble thereat; then their skins and their hearts do soften to the celebration of God’s praises. Such is the guidance of God: He guides therewith whom He pleases, but such as God leaves to stray, can have none to guide. (Al-Zumar 39:23)

In the above verse, the term kit§b is indefinite, ‘a book’, implying that in this instance the text does not refer to all revealed verses of the Book. It is qualified by the two adjectives ‘ambiguous’ (mutash§bih) and ‘repeated’ (math§nÊ), from which we infer that the book of sab# al-math§nÊ consists of both ‘ambiguous’ and ‘repeated’ verses. It proves once more that sab# a l-math§nÊ differs from a l-qur”§n, because the qur”§n consists only of ‘ambiguous’ verses. Moreover, the first line of the verse defines sab# al-math§nÊ as ‘most beautiful’ [or the ‘best narrative”], implying that the qur”§n is only ‘narrative’, whereas sab# al-math§nÊ is the ‘best narrative’.

What, then, is sab# a l-math§nÊ exactly? It contains the number seven (sab#a) and the adjective math§nÊ, ‘repeated’, and indeed it literally means ‘seven times twice-repeated’. But it also connotes the sense of something that ‘holds two different things together’, ‘from two ends’ or ‘two borders’. It points to the ability of connecting ‘one end to the other’. Since each chapter of the Book has a beginning and an end, that is, is located between two borders, the term points us to the chapters’ two ‘ends’. What we find there is what is conventionally called the ‘abbreviated’ or ‘disconnected’ letters (al-muqaããa#§t). Interestingly, they occur in seven different combinations, which are as follows:

1) Alif-L§m-MÊm-R§” (which also occurs as Alif-L§m-MÊm and Alif-L§m-R§), 2) Alif-L§m-MÊm-‘§d, 3) K§f-H§”-Y§”-#Ain-‘§d, 4) Y§”-SÊn, 5) •§”-H§’, 6) •§”-SÊn-MÊm (which also occurs as

- §”-SÊn), 7) \§”-MÊm

The so-called abbreviated letters, introducing their chapters, are correctly numbered either as verse one or as one and two. It is either: a) Nån. By the [identification] [qalam] and the (record) which (men) write. [Al-Qalam 68:1] or b)

\§-MÊm * #Ain-SÊn-Q§f. [Al-Shår§ 42:1–2]

The second verse in b), in which the letters are both verse 1 and 2, demonstrates that these letters are not just cut off from the rest of the chapter, and should not be seen as cryptic initials or meaningless Arabic signs which are there for no apparent function. Instead, we should regard them as expressing the chapter's message, in a different linguistic format.

If we count the number of letters in these seven combinations, we arrive at the number eleven:

1- Alif 2- '§d 3- K§f 4- Y§" 5- •§" 6- •§" 7-\§" 8-MÊm 9-R§" 10-H§" 11-SÊn

Our thesis is that these eleven letters are not just letters of the Arabic alphabet, or any other alphabet, but are rather graphemes of phonetic utterances that can be found in all other languages that exist on earth. Human language, in general, is based on eleven basic forms of laryngeal or labial sounds that human beings can utter. As pure utterances they do not carry a specific meaning; hence, the exclusion of the letter D§l which, at least in Arabic, is not meaningless if uttered but, because it is homonymic to d§ll, may connote 'significant'. If these utterances were letter combinations of the Arabic language, we would surely find among the many million Arabic native speakers at least one who could provide us with an explanation of them. But the truth of the matter is that they do not mean anything in Arabic or any other language since they are simply utterances of the human voice. Strictly speaking, one should change their transcriptions: from, for example, Alif-L§m-MÊm (for _{الم}) to Aa-Ll-Mm, since Alif-L§mMÊm still associates a combination of alphabetical characters of the Arabic language (that connote verbal meaning). But this association is, as we have shown, unfounded.

The Explanation of the Book (tafßÊl al-kit§b)

We have said that the ‘explanation of the book’ refers to a third category of verses: those that are neither ambiguous nor definite. These verses were revealed directly from Allah and, because of their in-between status, they transcend the division between ‘definite’ and ‘ambiguous’. The following verses show how this category is connected to the other parts of the book:

This Qur’an is not such as can be produced by other than God; on the contrary it is a confirmation of (revelations) that went [with] it, and a fuller explanation of the book [tafßÊl al-kit§b]—wherein there is no doubt—from the Lord of the worlds. (Yånus 10:37)

There is, in their stories, instruction for men endued with understanding. It is not a tale invented, but a confirmation of what went [with] it—a detailed exposition [tafßÊl] of all things, and a guide and a mercy to any such as believe. (Yåsuf 12:111)

A-L-R. (This is) a book, with verses basic or fundamental (of established meaning), further explained in detail [fußßilat]—from one who is wise and well-acquainted (with all things). (Håd 11:1)

Say: “Shall I seek for judge other than God, when He it is who has sent unto you the book, explained in detail [mufaßßal[an]]?” They know full well, to whom We have given the book, that it has been sent down from your Lord in truth. Never be then of those who doubt. (Al-An#§m 6:114)

According to the dictionary of Ibn F§ris,[185] the Arabic term tafßÊl can mean both ‘elaborate exposition’ and ‘to set apart’. As for these two meanings we come across two further subdivisions:

1. Exposition as ‘commentary’:

Verses that do not contain general laws of the universe or rules of human behaviour but which provide information about either of the two, are ‘explanatory’ and function as a running commentary on other verses. For example, verses that elucidate that the qur”§n came down in Arabic, or that the Book contains ambiguous and definite verses etc., are commentaries on either the nature of the qur”§n (revealed in Arabic) or the composition of the Book (types of verses). Thus, they provide further information. One might say that these are the self-reflective verses of the Book.

2. Setting apart in the sense of ‘to contextualize’:

Verses that place a specific event in a concrete, historical context will set that event apart from other events that occurred elsewhere and at other times. Such verses help to establish a chronological sequence as they distinguish between earlier and later events.

In both functions, the ‘explanatory’ verses interrupt the flow of verses that are either ‘ambiguous’ or ‘definite’. They also put the different chapters into a specific order as they structure and subdivide the various categories of verses. This is particularly significant as the Book does not provide a thematically or chronologically coherent exposition of its topics. Instructions concerning issues of family law, for example, are scattered throughout different chapters (e.g., Al-Baqara, A l-Nis§”, A l-M§“ida) without attempting to introduce either a systematic order or consistent argument. To identify the ‘explanatory’ verses is, therefore, an important exegetical operation so that gaps of information, created by the scattered nature of the book’s line of argument, can be closed.

If these verses are neither ‘ambiguous’ nor ‘definite’, and if the Book knows only these two types of verses, ‘book of prophethood’ and ‘book of messengerhood’, to which of the two should one allocate ‘explanatory’ verses? As they do not contain any rule, commandment, or moral instruction, they are clearly not in the book of messengerhood. By exclusion, they are part of MuÈammad’s (ß) prophethood, even if they are not ambiguous. But since MuÈammad (ß) held only two offices, of prophet and messenger, there cannot be a third category. And yet, even as nonambiguous verses of MuÈammad’s (ß) prophethood their origin is still different: they were revealed directly from Allah; the explanatory verses do not originate from either lawÈ maÈfåí or im§m mubÊn as do the other prophetical verses.

Why is the Book composed in such a multistructured way, containing so many different types of books and categories of verses? The answer lies in the history of revelation. Until the revelation of the Book, Allah had sent down revelations to the Jews and Christians which only consisted of rules and commandments, that is, revelations came down as books of messengerhoods and definite verses. As it happens, human beings transgressed against the commandments, divine instructions were ignored and new rules were added and declared as divine:

Then woe to those who write the book with their own hands, and then say: “This is from God.” (Al-Baqara 2:79)

In order to prevent a recurrence of this calamity, Allah’s last revelation was equipped with the criterion of truth, the qur”§n. It not only confirms ‘what went with it’, the ‘definite verses’ of the umm al-kit§b, it also controls and monitors their application. That is why the two books and the three categories of verses are so harmoniously intertwined in the text, and why they are so precisely, mathematically arranged in a manner that has, until now, escaped the penetrating view of so many commentators on the divine text. But just as modern medicine explores further and further the c omplexities of the genes, tissues, and organs of the human body, and just as the natural sciences correlate more and more the different signs of changes in the weather, climate, and human habitats, so does a contemporary reading of the Book. The One who created the human body and nature in such a complex manner will do the same with His revealed words—to perceive the Book in a simpler way would not do justice to God’s power.

Remembrance (al-dhikr)

We have, without doubt, sent down the [remembrance][186] [a l-dhikr]; and We will assuredly guard it (from corruption). (Al-\ijr 15:9) They say: “O you to whom the [remembrance] [al-dhikr] is being revealed! Truly you are mad (or possessed)!” (Al-\ijr 15:6)

‘§d. By the qur”§n, containing the remembrance [al-qur”§n dhÊ ’l-dhikr]. (‘§d 38:1, AA)

If we now turn to the term al-dhikr (the remembrance) which, as in the two verses of Al-\ijr above, is stated in its definite form, as the remembrance, we notice that in verse 1 of Sårat ‘§d, al-dhikr is the possessive attribute of al-qur”§n, connected to it by the conjunctive particle dhå (of). It means that the qur”§n possesses ‘remembrance’.[187] But what exactly is remembrance?

We have said that the qur”§n represents the totality of objective, universal laws that govern every event in the cosmos, nature, and human history. By means of revelation these laws, which used to exist outside the human mind, were then expressed in human language:

We have made it a qur”§n in Arabic… (Al-Zukhruf 43:3)

Only because of this transformation into a linguistic format did it become possible for human beings to participate in knowledge of the qur”§n and to ‘remember’ it spiritually as well as intellectually:

We have raised onto you your remembrance [dhikrak]... (Al-SharÈ 94:4)

We therefore define al-dhikr as the result of transforming the qur”§n from a nonlinguistic, naturalist state into words of Arabic:

Now We have sent down to you a Book [kit§b[an]] wherein is your remembrance [dhikrukum]; will you not understand? (A l-Anbiy§” 21:10, AA)

This implies that al-dhikr was a revived or renewed form of what had existed before in our universe. Notice in the following verse the precision of the Book when it refers to the renewal of a l-dhikr and not al-qur”§n:

Whenever any fresh revelation [dhikr[in] muÈdath[in]] comes to them from their Lord, they listen to it playfully with frivolous hearts... (A l-Anbiy§” 21:2, AH)

Once we realize that al-qur”§n and al-dhikr are not identical, and that al-dhikr is only an attribute of al-qur”§n (after it had been transformed into Arabic), the dilemma of Mu#tazilÊ theology should no longer haunt us. We are now able to say that Allah did not create the qur”§n as such but only its verbal format, that is, al-dhikr. This allows us to state that the qur”§n has existed since eternity and has been an integral part of Allah’s primordial nature. We can also say that, by creating the linguistic format of books (kutub), Allah provided the grounds on which the signs of the qur”§n can be rationally understood:

And We sent none before you, but men to whom we made revelation—question the people of the remembrance [ahl a l-dhikr = those who speak Arabic], if you do not know—nor did We fashion them as bodies that ate not food… (Al-Anbiy§” 21:7, AA)

After the transformation of the qur”§n into Arabic it had become objectified, it entered into the realm of human texts (oral or written) and thus could become part of people’s ritual practices. The recitation of the qur”§n could then become one of the central features of religious life. Believers are now able to recite the Arabic text whether they understand its content or not:

And to rehearse the qur”§n… (Al-Naml 27:92)

And We have indeed made the qur”§n easy to understand and remember [li’l-dhikr]: then is there any that will receive admonition? (Al-Qamar 54:17)

The linguistic format of an Arabic text also exists for the other parts of the book. We hear the proof in verse 29 of Sårat F§ãir:

Those who rehearse the book of God [yatlån kit§b All§h], establish regular prayer… (F§ãir 35:29)

Since no human being can rehearse, or better, recite something that does not exist as a text, we conclude that all verses of the book must have been transformed into al-dhikr. This is significant because if we, as believers, recite the verses of al-kit§b we do so by reciting the transformed parts of al-dhikr. And when MuÈammad (ß) was given the Book, he received it as al-dhikr, that is, as oral lecture that he only needed to hear (and not necessarily to understand), so that he was able ‘to pronounce it clearly to men’:

We have revealed to you the reminder [a l-dhikr], so that you make [known] to mankind what has been revealed to them, and that, perchance, they may reflect. (Al-NaÈl 16:44, MF)

(2) The qur”§n

The qur”§n embodies MuÈammad’s (ß) prophethood. It provides the reason for distinguishing between truth and falsity. Together with the ‘seven oft-repeated’ (sab# al-math§nÊ) it constitutes the book of ambiguous verses. The qur”§n reveals the ‘clear signs’ which represent the truth (10:15; 46:7). The qur”§n is the truth.

The Words of God (kalim§t All§h)

Before we are able to define what Allah’s words are we need to distinguish between the different categories of human speech. In Arabic, words that are spoken but not understood (aßw§t) are distinguished from words that are spoken and understood (qaul). If one overhears a conversation in Chinese and does not understand a word, the spoken utterances are just incomprehensible ‘sounds’ (aßw§t). If one is Chinese and understands every word of the conversation, the words we hear would be classified as ‘meaningful’ (qaul). Furthermore, if the words are spoken with fluency and clarity, the words are defined as ‘good speech’ (faß§Èa).[188] If words are used eloquently and their meanings well expressed, they are called ‘intelligent speech’ (qaul).[189] Intelligent speech (qaul) is the realm of ‘rhetoric’ (al-bal§gha),[190] whereas good speech is the realm of language fluency or competence (al-lis§n). We therefore distinguish between ‘sounds’ that exist objectively but make no sense and ‘sounds’ as words, whose meaning is perfectly clear. As for the latter category, we distinguish between words whose meanings are registered but not pondered upon by their receivers, on the one hand, and words which are ‘food for thought’, words meant to evoke conscious reflections in the receivers, on the other. Such reflections can be stimulated either by oral speech or by a written presentation of the (silent) word.

If we apply these categories of human speech to the qur”§n we are faced with a dilemma, because if we claim that the words of the Qur’anic text, written or orally recited, are the words of God, we would turn His words into human speech, and Allah would become an Arabic native speaker. But since this would violate God’s unity (‘Say: “But in truth He is the one God…’ A l-An#§m 6:19) and His uniqueness (‘Say: “He is God, the one and only”’ A l-Ikhl§ß 112:1), Allah is neither Arab nor of any other nationality. An analogy between God’s words and human speech must be rejected. In the Qur’anic text, the signified (divine) meaning of words must be found outside the text, not in human speech. The word ‘sun’, for example, signifies—if understood as Allah’s word (kalima)—the sun itself, not just the meaning of the word ‘sun’. The word ‘moon’ signifies, or better is, the moon in space, not just the signified meaning of ‘moon’. Allah’s word ‘nose’ is the nose, not just the signified meaning of ‘nose’, and so forth. In other words, the essence of Allah’s words cannot be found in the Qur’anic text but in the objective, material existence of the universe, that is, in the general laws that govern the cosmos, nature and human history. Or, if put dialectically, the words of God are the essence of the entire universal existence which, in its status as the divine signified, is the essence of God’s words (kalim§t All§h).

Because of this extra-textual link between Allah’s words and their signified essence, we are assured that His words cannot be changed or modified. Since nobody can interfere with the course of nature and since nobody can turn the clock back, human beings can only accept or ignore God’s words but they cannot be changed.

And recite (and teach) what has been revealed to you of the book of your Lord: none can change His words [la-mubaddil li-kalim§tihi], and none will you find as a refuge other than Him. (Al-Kahf 18:27)

This verse proves that the essence of Allah’s words reside outside the text. Just imagine someone reading the following verse as representing (essentially) the word of God:

God (thus) directs you as regards your children’s (inheritance): to the male, a portion equal to that of two females… (Al-Nis§” 4:11)

Imagine further that someone came along and a) ignored this instruction and gave his daughters twice as much as his sons, and b) tampered with the text by changing its words around, then verse 27 of Sårat a l-Kahf (‘none can change His words’) would actually be contradicted by what this person just did. And if someone is able to change ‘His words’ so easily, the self-definition of the text that it cannot be changed would actually be a lie. But to find a lie in Allah’s text is, categorically, impossible. We have to accept the fact that Allah’s words encompass more than what any human language can ever express (as text). If He were to express His words, that is, the totality of objective reality, in written (human) text, ‘oceans of ink’ would not be enough to exhaust Allah’s knowledge:

Say [Prophet], ‘If the whole ocean were ink for writing the words of my Lord [kalim§t rabbÊ], it would run dry before those words were exhausted’—even if We were to add another ocean to it. (Al-Kahf 18:109, AH)

The Truth (al-Èaqq)

Allah is the truth and His words are the truth.[191] He establishes what is true through His words.[192] The existence of the universe, which is outside the human mind, is the sacred abode of God—He is the reality.[193] This all-encompassing existence is expressed in His words which are thus also true.[194] Hence, Allah is the truth, and His words are the truth.[195] His words are rooted in the truth, not in human language. Among the ninety-nine beautiful names of Allah you will not find the attribute ‘the speaker’. But in order to instruct humankind about the truth, God transformed the laws of objective reality into human language. The ninety-nine beautiful names are therefore derived from human concepts. Human beings understand the truth of objective reality according to what their limited minds can grasp. Such understanding is relative and confined to what the dominant episteme allows us to comprehend. The language of the qur”§n must therefore allow such piecemeal understanding, inasmuch as it must guarantee an ever-growing awareness of objective reality because human societies develop and the intellectual horizon of people broadens day by day. The qur”§n does allow such relative and gradual understanding because of its revelation in Arabic which has the quality of ‘ambiguity’ (al-tash§buh). God has chosen Arabic as the vessel for His divine references to objective reality because it provides the necessary dialectics between the absolute objective truth of God and its relative, subjective understanding by human beings. This dialectic guarantees that human societies, in spite of their diversity and multiplicity of interpretations, participate equally in the divine truth and take from it what they can comprehend. This is the true explanation of why the qur”§n is called inimitable and why its opponents were overwhelmed when they heard it:

When Our clear signs are rehearsed to them, the unbelievers say, of the truth [al-Èaqq] when it comes to them: “This is evident sorcery!” (Al-AÈq§f 46:7)

The Content of the qur”§n

In the Book the term qur”§n appears both in its definite as well as in its indefinite form:

a) definite:

Ramadan is the (month) in which was sent down the Qur’an… (Al-Baqara 2:185)

<right>

And We have bestowed upon you the seven oft-repeated

</right>

(verses) and the grand Qur’an. (Al-\ijr 15:87)

b) indefinite:

Nay, this is a glorious Qur’an [qur”§n[un] majÊd[un]], * (inscribed) in a tablet preserved! (Al-Buråj 85:21–22)

If an article determines the noun, it refers to the qur”§n as we have defined it so far. If the noun is undetermined, however, it refers to a subcategory of ‘a qur”§n’, which means that there are several (sub-) qur”§ns within a larger unit called ‘the grand qur”§n’ (al-qur”§n al-#aíÊm). The qur”§n, revealed in the month of Ramadan, belongs to the former category, whereas the qur”§n, inscribed on a ‘tablet preserved’, is of the latter. Therefore, the content of the qur”§n must be subdivided into two classes:

1. A fixed part:

This class appears in verses 1–2 of Sårat al-Buråj (‘Nay, this is a glorious qur”§n (qur”§n majÊd), * (inscribed) in a tablet preserved!’). In this class we group all those universal laws that will never change or be abolished: the certainty of death, the coming of the Last Hour, the resurrection of the dead, the existence of Hell and Paradise. These things exist or will occur independent of any human interference and are, thus, certainties that cannot be questioned, even if all the prophets of this world want it (because ‘none can change His words’ [Al-Kahf 18:27]). These are the laws of objective reality that are ‘inscribed in a tablet preserved’ (lawÈ maÈfåí), a tablet that controls all changes within the universe, holds all information, and instructs the ‘glorious qur”§n’ (a l-qur”§n a l-majÊd). It holds the highest authority and represents the ultimate complexity of knowledge that can ever be grasped—by a gradual epistemological progress in al-tash§buh—through philosophy, the mother of all sciences.

2. A changeable part:

Referred to in verse 12 of Sårat Y§-SÊn (‘Verily We shall give life to the dead, and We record that which they send before and that which they leave behind, and of all things have We taken account in a clear book (of evidence) (im§m mubÊn)’ [Y§-SÊn 36:12]). Two further subcategories are mentioned in this verse:

a) Events in nature:

Unpredictable occurrences of floods, earthquakes, hurricanes, and such; the sudden changes of colours in trees, exceptional growth in plants, sudden changes of health in animals and humans, and such; nothing of that is prefixed. Yes, death is certain but its arrival is not predestined—one may prolong or shorten life by one’s own actions. The generic term for the changeable parts of nature is ‘sign of God’ (§yat All§h), see: ‘And among His signs (min §y§tihi) is the creation of the heavens and the earth, and the variations in your languages and your colours…’ [Al-Råm 30:22] and ‘Such are the signs of God…’ [Al-J§thiyya 45:6]. These ‘signs of God’ are kept in a ‘book manifest’ (kit§b mubÊn), see: ‘With Him are the keys of the unseen, the treasures that none knows but He. He knows whatever there is on the earth and in the sea. Not a leaf does fall but with His knowledge: there is not a grain in the darkness (or depths) of the earth, nor anything fresh or dry (green or withered), but is (inscribed) in a record clear[196] (kit§b mubÊn) (to those who can read)’ [Al-An#§m 6:59]. None of this is ever predetermined or prerecorded before its occurrence. One might try to influence the course of events, for example, by prayer and invocations of God and He then might or might not send rain by changing the direction of the wind in times of draught or, in cases of childless couples, increase their fertility by granting them better living conditions, and the like. The outcome of this is always unpredictable, but we trust the words saying that ‘nothing turns (back) destiny except the du#§”-prayer’.[197] Moreover, more research in biology, chemistry, medicine, and so on can be undertaken because it will equip us with better ways to change the weather or maintain good health. In doing so we realize the tash§buh of God’s signs, contained in the ‘book manifest’, and this is the true meaning of the verse: ‘When He has decreed a plan, He but says to it, “be”, and it is!’ [$l #Imr§n 3:47].

b) Human affairs:

These are things that can change within human history. The technical term for them is ‘stories’ (qaßaß) because the Book stores such data as stories. ‘We tell you [Prophet] the best of stories (aÈsan al-qaßaß) in revealing this qur”§n to you. Before this you were one of those who knew nothing about them’ [Yåsuf 12:3]. And as verse 12 of Sårat Y§-SÊn points out, such historical narratives are installed in ‘a record clear’ (im§m mubÊn), not in the lawÈ maÈfåí. Their recording takes place only after their historical occurrence. ‘We shall certainly bring the dead back to life, and We record what they send ahead of them as well as what they leave behind: We keep an account of everything in a clear record[198] (im§m mubÊn)’ [Y§-SÊn 36:12]. These stories report how, during the long history of divine revelations, people have responded differently to the messages of the prophets and how, in accordance with their degree of knowledge, they have implemented what they learned from the text. Such accounts are so valuable for later generations to hear that they are, as in Sårat Yåsuf, called the ‘best of stories’, which are stored in the im§m mubÊn but contained in the ‘clear book’ (al-kit§b al-mubÊn), a term that appears in three separate såras.[199] Each story, however, forms a separate ‘book manifest’ (i.e., indefinite kit§b mubÊn), covering one single event in human history or nature. The varying and ever more increasing ability of humankind to learn from these stories provides the basis for their tash§buh: the further advanced our knowledge the better equipped we are to interpret the stories’ lessons for our own time period (=

ta”wÊl).[200]

In conclusion, the qur”§n is either general or particular. In its general form it is stored as qur”§n majÊd in the ‘tablet preserved’, referring to the words of God that are unchangeable and everlasting. It enjoys absolute, unquestionable authority and nobody and nothing can escape its rule. Its authority is eternally valid as it is eternally stored in the lawÈ maÈfåí and, hence, is not subject to occasions of revelation (asb§b al-nuzål). In its particular form, however, the qur”§n responds to change and alterations in nature and records human history reflecting its peculiar fluctuations and unpredictable movements. And yet, the particular qur”§n will never undermine the authority of the general qur”§n. Instead, it works within the limits of the laws and conditions set by the qur”§n majÊd. As it is said in the verse: ‘when he has ordained something, He only says, “be”, and it is!’ [Al-An”§m 6:47]. This connectivity between the general laws of the universe and the particular manifestations in nature and human history defines the core of al-qur”§n (= the one which ‘connects’—qarana).

The Ambiguous Nature of al-qur”§n (al-tash§buh)

Allah represents the totality of objective reality. His knowledge is absolute. He neither requires further knowledge nor needs any form of guidance. But human beings, in their attempt to apprehend Allah’s absolute knowledge, can only do so within the limits of their relative, historical understanding. Allah took this partiality in human understanding into consideration when He decided to impart His knowledge to humankind.

An analogy to this would be the case of a father who wants to teach his five-year-old son the things he has learned about theoretical physics. The father is a trained physicist and an international authority on the subject, whereas his son knows nothing about it yet. He teaches him his expertise in a piecemeal manner over a long period of time, that is, by considering his son’s age and by proportioning the amount he can teach according to what his son has already understood. This approach requires that father and son are in constant contact with each other and that the father never stops teaching his son until he fully understands the entirety of his father’s knowledge. Or, alternatively, the father gives his son a text to read which encapsulates an ultimate summary of his knowledge and never again changes what he has written. Since the son would initially not understand much he will be required to come back to the text year after year and every time absorb a little bit more of it. In this case, even though the text remains fixed and unchanged, its content changes insofar as the son will develop a gradual understanding of it. It is this quality of a text, where the form remains fixed but its content moves, that we define as the text’s ‘ambiguity’, or tash§buh.

Like in the example of father and son, Allah communicated with humankind in two ways: at first, constantly, repetitively, and over a long period of time, but after that only by one single instance. Until His revelation to MuÈammad (ß), Allah repeatedly returned to humankind to renew His message. After the revelation of the Torah, for example, He sent down the Gospel, and after the revelation of the Gospel, He returned again and brought down the qur”§n. But after that He will never return again, nor will any other prophet or messenger ever appear again to renew Allah’s message.

This has serious consequences for the way we understand the Book. With the Torah and the Gospel, Allah attuned His revelations to the actual historical circumstances that formed the intellectual horizon of the Jews and Christians who were the recipients of His message. In other words, God’s revelations showed all the signs of the Zeitgeist that these periods had. It would be seriously anachronistic to go back to the Torah and the Gospel in order to understand the text that was revealed later, the Book. It would be more appropriate, as was done during the European Enlightenment, to regard these texts, which inadequately discuss the laws of nature and the complexities of the cosmos, as historically obsolete. Neither the Torah nor the Gospel possess the universal quality of tash§buh since they are purely historical texts, written for a specific group of people in a narrowly defined historical period. It is no wonder that the Torah and the Gospel have no relevance any more in modern sciences and are only used for liturgical purposes. May God prevent our #ulam§” from inflicting the same destiny upon the Qur’anic text!

Allah no longer communicates directly with human beings. He returns to them solely through the text of the Book, revealed fourteen hundred years ago. And yet, even today we still absorb immense knowledge about objective reality from His text. This can only imply that even if the form of His text is fixed, its content still moves. A miracle! This elasticity of the text allows its readers to relate what is read directly to what is experienced in reality. Generations of future readers will do the same without having violated either the form or the content of the text. No one, of course, will ever be able to fully understand or exhaustively interpret the text; this can only be done by God. Even those ‘who are deeply rooted in knowledge’ (al-r§sikhån fi’l-#ilm) [3:7] will always be restricted in their interpretations due to their limited understanding of the truth. As for MuÈammad (ß), he never actually ventured to interpret a single line of the qur”§n; instead, he interpreted other parts of the Book, for example, the umm a l-kit§b, but not the qur”§n, which he was asked to deliver, uninterpreted, to the people.

The Approving and Controlling Nature of the qur”§n

The scripture We have revealed to you [Prophet] is the truth and confirms the scriptures that [came with] it [m§ baina yadaihi]... (F§ãir

35:31, AH)

The disbelievers say, ‘We will believe neither this qur”§n nor the scriptures that came [with] it [alladhi baina yadaihi].’ (Saba’ 34:31)

Generations of exegetes interpreted the phrase m§ baina yadaihi as ‘scriptures (the Gospel and the Torah) that preceded it (the Qur”§n)’, ignoring the fact that their interpretation seriously undermined the authority of MuÈammad’s prophethood. Having been provided with a revelation that simply confirmed previous scriptures would have dramatically sabotaged the Prophet’s (ß) mission to convince people that he had received a new message from God. They also ignored MuÈammad’s (ß) assurance that he had brought a revelation that abrogated previous scriptures including the Torah and the Gospel. How could they ever think that the qur”§n only confirmed what had been revealed before! The ‘scripture that came with’ the qur”§n was MuÈammad’s (ß) messengerhood (ris§la) that needed to be confirmed by the truth. Verses that instruct people to pray, fast, go on a pilgrimage, arrange divorce and inheritance, and such, are verses that require absolute obedience and therefore need to be authorized. Approval had to come from outside his messengerhood, and it came through MuÈammad’s (ß) prophethood. Objective reality, encapsulated within the qur”§n and the sab# al-math§nÊ, confirms the rules of human behaviour and sanctions what has been declared as allowed or taboo (Èal§l au-Èar§m). Disbelievers are those (see 34:31 above) who believe neither in the qur”§n nor the umm a l-kit§b that ‘came down with it’. In sum, revelation to MuÈammad (ß) in the form of the qur”§n confirmed the umm al-kit§b which had preceded the qur”§n (35:31).

The qur”§n’s ambiguous nature (al-tash§buh) was the ‘miracle’ that MuÈammad (ß) brought to the people. It was the most abstract miracle that God could ever have created. Previous prophets had to rely on concrete miracles which they performed in front of a disbelieving crowd (e.g., when Moses turned a staff into a snake inside the Pharaoh’s palace). Without the performances of miracles prophets could not convince people that they were in the possession of a divine message. Their miracles were nothing but extratextual proof that their message came from God. This happened in humankind’s primitive phase when people thought with their senses and when only phenomena that defied the laws of nature would impress people.

The miracle that MuÈammad (ß) performed occurred on a different, more abstract level. His miracle was the qur”§n itself. No extratextual miracle was required to prove that his message came from God. This miracle, the text’s ambiguous quality, shows three characteristics:

1. MuÈammad’s (ß) prophethood, embodied in al-qur”§n and saba# al-math§nÊ, is the result of a rational deduction based on empirical perception of objective reality. It is inscribed in ambiguous ways inside the textual features of the prophetical verses. As time progresses, the rational deductions of the text mix with the ever more sophisticated empirical perception of reality and produce what is defined as ‘unmediated apprehension’ (al-ta”wÊl al-mub§shir). As Allah says: ‘We shall show them Our signs in every region of the earth and in themselves, until it becomes clear to them that this is the truth (al-Èaqq). Is it not enough that your Lord witnesses everything?’ [Fußßilat 41:53].[201]

2. The qur”§n of MuÈammad’s prophethood possesses the quality of both expressing the entirety of knowledge and allowing a partial understanding of it. It is a truly textual miracle that no human author could ever have produced. It implies, however, that no human interpreter can ever reflect the total knowledge of the qur”§n in his exegesis. Every interpretation reflects, instead, the standards of thinking of the time when the exegesis was written. If we want to see the paradigms of the seventh century, we only need to read Ibn #Abb§s’s commentary. If we want to know the paradigms of thinking in the fourteenth century, Ibn KathÊr’s tafsÊr will tell us. Their understanding of the text was partial, relative, and context related, whereas the text’s knowledge is absolute, total, and transhistorical. This synthesis is the real ‘miracle’ of the qur”§n.

3. The qur”§n combines the perfect style of literary poetry with the accuracy and precision of the best scientific writing. The beauty of its poetic expressions, its melodic rhythm and its rhetoric symbolism is not compromised by its scientific reflections and discursive, objective exposition of scientific laws. In a way, it combines all the poetic masterpieces by Shakespeare, Pushkin, and a l-MutanabbÊ[202] with the sum of scientific genius in the writings of Newton, Einstein, and Ibn a l-Haitham.[203] To write, as traditional exegetes did, about the miraculous nature of the qur”§n only in terms of its literary style and rhetorical beauty is surely a sign of disrespect for and disloyalty towards the much more complex nature of the Qur’anic text.

The Interpretation [or Better: Apprehension][204] of the qur”§n (al-ta”wÊl)

If the qur”§n represents the truth and the totality of knowledge, and if human beings can only partially participate in this knowledge, their human interpretations of the qur”§n will always be limited, selective, and relative, as opposed to perceiving the full truth. With the increase in scientific knowledge, however, they will eventually come closer to the truth, but the entirety of knowledge about objective reality will only be revealed on the Day of Resurrection. Allah says: ‘On the day when it is fulfilled (ya”tÊ ta”wÊluhu),[205] those who have forgotten it will say: “The messengers of our Lord did indeed bring true (tidings) (bi’l-Èaqq)’ (Al-A#r§f 7:53). Until then, human beings will have to rely on the dynamics of tash§buh and constantly attempt to harmonize the absolute nature of the Qur’anic verses with their relative understanding (nisbÊyat al-fahm). This harmony is achieved by synchronizing the text’s content (meaning) with its interpreters’ changing and p rogressing knowledge which they gain from the most advanced scientific achievements of each period, and vice versa, by deducing scientific theories from the text of the qur”§n itself. The ultimate aim of each act of ta”wil is to establish perfect congruence between humans’ sensory perception of objective reality and their interpretation of al-qur”§n.

Ta”wÊl is therefore both a hermeneutical process (reading the qur”§n) and a scientific-philosophical task (exploring nature, the cosmos and history). Since ta”wÊl is only linked to the prophetical verses, the qur”§n, and not to the legal verses of umm al-kit§b, can be interpreted by everyone, believers or unbelievers, Arabic speakers or nonArabic speakers, Islamicists or non-Islamicists. Verse 7 of $l #Imr§n in which Allah says: ‘...for its interpretation (ta”wÊlihi). But no one knows its true meanings except Allah and those who are firmly grounded in knowledge (al-r§sikhån fi’l-#ilm)...’, does not refer, as conventionally assumed, to the most learned and devout among the #ulam§” and fuqah§”, but rather to the scholars and philosophers who occupy the most eminent place in society. It is absolutely vital to invest in the authority of progressive science rather than in regressive tafsÊr (which is based on the assumption that earlier commentaries are more authoritative than later ones). The inclusion of modern science and philosophical theories and the exclusion of traditional exegetes will secure a constant assimilation of contemporary episteme into the text and a progressive extraction of knowledge from the text.

In their vain attempt to protect the qur”§n from the outside world, traditional exegetes have ignored the fact that the qur”§nic text, even in the most sophisticated abstraction, is the entire objective reality revealed as text, which, by definition, cannot be contradicted. In other words, since the qur”§n represents the totality of reality, and since nothing else but this reality is contained in the qur”§n, no single item of this reality could ever occur which is not already apprehended inside the qur”§n. Our honourable scholars have also ignored Allah’s dictum that He has revealed the qur”§n from the intelligible world so that people can understand it. Human reason, again by definition, is therefore unable to contradict the content of the qur”§n.

Based on this insight we conclude this section by proposing two fundamental doctrines and eight principles of ta”wÊl.

The doctrines:

1. Revelation does not contradict reason.

2. Revelation does not contradict reality.

The principles:

1. Interpreters of the qur”§n need to view the text as if MuÈammad (ß) died only yesterday. They also must believe in the eternal validity of its content and that, because of its inherent ambiguity (tash§buh), it is applicable in all times and all places in this world.

2. Interpreters start their exegesis by asking the most pressing questions of their time. They extract answers directly from the text without reference to traditional exegesis and the literature of religious heritage (al-tur§th). This interpretation is the realm of modern philosophy.

3. The qur”§n is to be studied by the human faculty of reason (al-#aql), given that it was revealed to people from the sphere of the intelligible world so that they could comprehend it (‘We have made it a qur”§n in Arabic, that you may be able to understand’ [Al-Zukhruf 43:3]).

4. The aim of interpretation is to establish a constant harmony between objective reality, which we perceive via our senses, and the theories and laws that we derive from reading the qur”§n. Sometimes a complete harmony is achieved (when science has discovered an absolute truth, for example, the earth is a globe and rotates around the sun), at other times, harmony remains deficient (if a scientific theory is not yet fully proven, such as Darwin’s theory of evolution). Total harmony will never be fully achieved—except on the Day of Resurrection.

5. Since revelation cannot contradict reason we have to suspend criticism if we come across a passage that apparently contradicts the laws of nature. Verse 45 of Sårat al-Furq§n, for example,[] seems to suggest that there are shadows that exist without light. According to what we currently know about shadows’ dependency on light, such claims seem inaccurate. Since we cannot say that the text is wrong (it never is!), we need to intensify the study of light and eventually discover a type of shadow that is yet unknown to us.

6. When we deal with future aspects of reality that empirically cannot be known yet, for example, the end of the world, the Day of Judgement, Hell and Paradise, the theories of the qur”§n cannot be supported by empirical knowledge. We can only speculate about such events in the distant future. We can do this on the basis of the verses which the Book provides. We thus assume that the discrepancy between the rational and empirical will eventually be resolved by the occurrence of these events (Day of Resurrection, Day of Judgement etc.), that is, when they become reality. Rational theories will then either be confirmed or contradicted by experiences of the other world. As Allah says: ‘On the day when it is fulfilled, those who have forgotten it before will say: “The messengers of our Lord did indeed bring true (tidings)”’ [Al-An#§m 6:53].

7. No interpretation is ever eternally final or fixed. As human views change with time, certain interpretations will become obsolete. They will be replaced by new ones. To preserve previous interpretations as ‘guardians of the truth’ means, in reality, to preserve the shortcomings and limitations of previous centuries. Interpretation must remain fluid and flexible. We do not expect the generations of interpreters coming after us to deal with our interpretations as if they were the non plus ultra of truth, thus fossilizing what we said as doctrines that can never be challenged.

8. The qur”§n needs to be taken away from our honourable scholars because their attitude towards it is like that of uneducated people: they surrender their brains uncritically in a cloud of piety. They do not ask questions that satisfy the modern, rational mind, nor do they understand the philosophical quest for the truth. They use the qur”§n primarily as a tool for moralistic and ritualistic exhortations to bring the masses in line with their views. The qur”§n needs to be studied by an enlightened, educated, and intellectually open readership. This is the last and most important principle of ta”wÊl.

 Al-inz§l and Al-tanzêl

The study of the two terms al-inz§l and al-tanzÊl will lead to a correct understanding of Allah’s revelation. Our study is based on the principles of interpretation outlined above and on the crucial premise that we do not accept the traditional notion of synonymity between the two terms. We reject the idea that both describe the process of the Qur’an’s ‘coming down’ indiscriminately as revelation to the Prophet MuÈammad (ß). We believe, instead, that both terms support our thesis of the division of the text into many variant sections that differ in theme and status, at the centre of which is the division between verses of prophethood and verses of messengerhood, which, according to our analysis, have been revealed in different ways. References to both words in the Book will demonstrate the considerable extent to which the second form of the verb nazzala (in al-tanzÊl) differs semantically from the fourth form anzala (in al-inz§l).

Verses that use anzala (noun: inz§l):

...and We sent down[206] [anzaln§] iron... (Al-\adÊd 57:25)

O you children of Adam! We have bestowed [anzaln§] raiment upon you to cover your shame, as well as to be an adornment to you...

(Al-A#r§f 7:26)

We have sent it down [anzaln§hu] as an Arabic Qur’an...(Yåsuf 12:2) We have indeed revealed this [anzaln§hu] (message) in the night of power. (Al-Qadr 97:1)

...and sent down [anzaln§] to you manna and quails... (A l-Baqara 2:57)

…and We send down [anzaln§] pure water from the sky. (A l-Furq§n 25:48)

…and We have sent down [anzaln§] unto you (also) the message; that you may explain clearly to men what is sent for them, and that they may give thought. (Al-NaÈl 16:44)

Verses that use ‘nazzala’ (noun: tanzÊl):

It is We who have sent down[207] [nazzaln§] the Qur’an to you by stages. (Al-Ins§n 76:23)

The revelation of the book [tanzÊl al-kit§b] is from God the exalted in power, full of wisdom. (Al-J§thiyya 45:2)

A revelation [tanzÊl[un]] from (God), most gracious, most merciful. (Fußßilat 41:2)

A revelation [tanzÊl[un]] from the Lord of the worlds. (Al-W§qi#a 56:80)

…and We sent down [nazzaln§] to you manna and quails. (•§-H§” 20:80)

And We send down [nazzaln§] from the sky rain charted with blessing… (Q§f 50:9)

We notice that at times the two terms seem to interchange in the text: when it states that ‘manna and quails were sent down’ the text employs both nazzala (20:88) and anzala (2:57). Since a synonymous use must be excluded here, a different reason should be considered. A clue to this can be found in the use of the verb balagha, which, in a similar way as nazzala and anzala, implies processes of communication. The following verses use either ballagha (2nd form) or ablagha (4th form):

The apostle’s duty is but to proclaim [al-bal§gh] (the message) … (Al-M§“ida 5:99)

O apostle! Proclaim [balligh] the (message) which has been sent [anzala] to you from your Lord… (Al-M§“ida 5:67)

So Shu#aib left them, saying: “O my people! I did indeed convey to you [ablaghtukum] the messages for which I was sent by my Lord: I gave you good counsel…” (Al-A#r§f 7:93)

If ballagha (2nd form) is used, a message is delivered whose actual reception by an intended addressee remains uncertain; if, however, ablagha (4th form) is used, a conscious reception is implied. A bulletin announcement of the state treasury, for example, issued in order to explain the new tax allowances for married couples, is delivered (like al-bal§gh in verse 5:99) without the need for feedback from citizens telling the Chancellor that they have received and understood his announcements. If, however, a full recognition by the addressees is intended, the term iblagh (as in 7:93) is used. As for MuÈammad’s (ß) role, the use of the imperative balligh, ‘proclaim!’ (2nd form, as in 5:67), indicates that a straightforward (mechanical) proclamation of the revelation was all that was required of him. The text would have used the term abligh, ‘proclaim”[208] (4th form, as in 7:93), if the i ntention had been to deliver the revelation in such a way that full comprehension by everyone was secured. Prophets other than MuÈammad (ß) had indeed been asked to do exactly this, since in their messages God’s punishment was announced to everyone who did not pay heed to the prophet’s words. And since God would not punish anyone who had not consciously become aware of His revelation, prophets were required to disseminate God’s word to literally everyone. Therefore, whenever the text mentions prophets such as Shu#aib, ‘§liÈ, or Håd, the verb ablagha (4th form) is used:

So Salih left them, saying: “O my people! I did indeed convey to you [ablaghtukum] the message for which I was sent by my Lord…” (Al-A#r§f 7:79)[209]

I [Hud] (at least) have conveyed the message [ablaghtukum] with which I was sent to you… (Håd 11:57)

“That He may know that they have (truly) brought and [made perceived] [210] [ablaghå] the messages of their Lord…” (Al-Jinn 72:28)

This in stark contrast to the much broader mission of MuÈammad (ß) who had been asked to proclaim Allah’s last revelation to all humankind. In his time, surely MuÈammad (ß) did not have the means to reach everyone on earth. Hence, his role was limited to proclaim Allah’s message without the need to reach everyone (acoustically) and without the need to receive confirmation that he had been heard:

O apostle! Proclaim [balligh] the (message) which has been sent to you [unzila ilayk] from your Lord. If you did not, you would not have fulfilled and proclaimed His mission. And God will defend you from men (who mean mischief)… (Al-M§“ida 5:67)

If we apply the above considerations to the two terms of al-tanzÊl and al-inz§l, we may deduce that al-tanzÊl (2nd form) refers to the process of communication that occurs outside the human mind. Al-inz§l (4th form), in contrast, describes the process of recognition inside the human mind. The difference is that in al-tanzÊl ideas are exchanged unrecognized by the human brain, whereas in al-inz§l these ideas are transformed into information that is perceived and understood.

The following example from everyday life will illustrate this point.

Phase 1: al-ja#l

(Creation of information signals)

Football match in Brazil

↓

The live action is being filmed by cameras and sent out into the world; sound and pictures are being transformed into waves

Phase 2: al-tanzÊl

(Transport)

Waves are transporting sound and pictures from Brazil into the world

↓

This transport occurs in the air and completely unnoticed by the human mind

Phase 3: al-inz§l

(Transformation into perceivable information)

The process by which the TV aerials receive the waves and transform them into sounds and pictures

↓

The result is a form of pictures and sounds that is perceivable by the human senses

Phase 4: al-idr§k

(Perception)

Viewers in China can follow the football match in Brazil through their senses.

 The football match enters the viewers’ knowledge.

This example shows that it is possible to distinguish between ways of communication that happen objectively and outside human perception (the transfer of sound and pictures via waves from Brazil to China), or that occur explicitly for the sensory perception of the human mind (the reconversion of the waves back into acoustic and visual signals for the reception of TV viewers). The term al-tanzÊl is assigned to this process of objective, nonhuman communication (reception by human beings is uncertain, impossible, or unintended), while the term a l-inz§l refers to the process of changing unperceivable signals outside the human mind to signals that can be perceived.

In the case of the televised football match, al-tanzÊl occurred first and al-inz§l second. If, however, a sports reporter took photographs of the match in Brazil and then sent these pictures to China to have them displayed at the National Sports Show, the process of al-inz§l (taking pictures) would have preceded al-tanzÊl (transport of pictures to China). Sometimes, a l-inz§l happens without an accompanying al-tanzÊl (e.g., if the pictures had been displayed immediately in Brazil),[211] but in all instances, a l-inz§l and a l-tanzÊl communicate something that exists in reality (e.g., the football players, the ball, the referee, the spectators, etc.) and that exists before the process of communication has been initiated.

Al-inz§l and al-tanzÊl of the al-qur”§n

The processes of al-inz§l and al-tanzÊl in communicating the qur”§n to humankind require that the qur”§n exists prior to its communication (like the football players in the example above). Since the qur”§n contains the objective sources of reality, its revelation to MuÈammad (ß) occurred in a conclusive, unalterable manner, regardless of any circumstances of revelation (hence, the asb§b a l-nuzål do no apply to the qur”§n). Its revelation was inevitable, whether someone required this information or not. Allah even urged people not to ask questions in this respect before the qur”§n was revealed:

Ask not questions about things which, if made plain to you, may cause you trouble. But if you ask about things when the Qur’an is being revealed, they will be made plain to you… (Al-M§“ida 5:101)

We have agreed that the qur”§n’s preexistence, before its inz§l and tanzÊl, could not have been in the form of an Arabic text. This is because if it had been an Arabic text before it was revealed, Allah would be an Arabic native speaker. This, of course, is an absurd idea. What really happened was that Allah changed the qur”§n from something else into an Arabic text, that is, He changed the text’s ‘becoming’ (al-ßayråra), and the following verses attest to this truth:

We have made it a Qur’an in Arabic, that you may be able to understand (and learn wisdom). (Al-Zukhruf 43:3)

Therefore, rather than being an Arabic text the qur”§n was objective reality before its revelation, embodying general, absolute, and eternal laws of the universe, unaltered since the creation of the world. Allah revealed it for the first time in human history as (an Arabic) text, that is, He developed its ‘becoming’ so that it was, by way of al-inz§l, perceivable by the human mind:

We have sent it down as an Arabic Qur’an in order that you may learn wisdom. (Yåsuf 12:2)

According to this sequence, a l-inz§l is the process of transforming (al-ja#l) the absolute laws of life and nature which had been stored primordially in a ‘tablet preserved’ (lawÈ maÈfåí) and in a ‘record clear’ (im§m mubÊn), or which were derived directly from Allah’s knowledge (#ilm All§h), into the linguistic form of the Arabic language so that these laws, which previously existed outside the human mind, could now be perceived, heard, and seen. Al-tanzÊl, in contrast, represents the subsequent objective transfer of the content of a l-kit§b, via the messenger angel JibrÊl, into Muhammad’s brain, from where he delivered it verbatim to the people of Mecca and Medina. Whereas al-inz§l occurred in one single impulse during the laylat al-qadr (‘We have indeed revealed this [al-qur”§n] in the night of power’, A l-Qadr 97:1), al-tanzÊl took twenty-three years to be completed. The reason for this long process of revelation in installments was that Allah wanted to strengthen the hearts of the believers gradually: (‘Those who reject faith say: “Why is not the Qur’an revealed to him all at once? Thus (is it revealed), that We may strengthen your heart thereby, and We have rehearsed it to you in slow, well-arranged stages, gradually', Al-Furq§n 25:32).

In describing the revelation of the qur"§n, the text uses the term a l-inz§l (anzaln§hu qur"§n[an] #arabÊy[an]), in its 4th verb form, not in the 2nd form, that is, it does not say: nazzaln§hu qur"§n[an] #arabÊy[an]. If it had been an objective transfer (al-tanzÊl) of an Arabic qur"§n without al-inz§l, without a prior process of transformation into Arabic, it would imply that Arabic is a nonhuman language, since its existence would be absolute, self-sufficient, and transcendent. That is, Arabic would objectively exist, whether in fact used by human beings or not. Applied to the example of TV transmissions, such a notion of al-tanzÊl without al-inz§l would allow the possibility that waves, beams, and light particles are 'Arabic', since what is being objectively transferred would be immediately perceptible to the Arabic readers/listeners. But who has ever heard of Arabic waves or Arabic molecules?

The qur"§n was revealed orally. It would have been possible to reveal it in written form (as was done with Moses' 'tablets'),[212] but its dhikr, its format of remembrance, was in oral format which did not allow the unbelievers to touch Allah's revelation 'with their hands' and deride its true identity:

If We had sent unto you a written (message) on parchment [fÊ qirã§s[in]], so that they could touch it with their hands, the unbelievers would have been sure to say: "This is nothing but obvious magic!" (Al-An#§m 6:7)

This implies that today when we touch a copy of the qur"§n, we do not actually touch the qur"§n itself (the latter was revealed in one impulse during the night of power and transformed into—oral—Arabic). Instead, we have in front of us a copy of the qur"§n, a parchment (qirã§s) which we can ‘touch with our hands’. Thus, what we touch is ink on paper, not the qur”§n itself.

Should then those ‘who are impure’ be allowed to touch the qur”§n or not?

<quote>

That this is indeed a qur”§n most honourable, * In a book well-guarded, * Which none shall [sic] touch but those who are clean [al-muãahharån] * a revelation [tanzÊl] from the Lord of the worlds. (A l-W§qi#a 56:77–80)

</quote>

These verses state that the qur”§n is in a concealed book (kit§b maknån).[213] It also refers to it as ‘tanzÊl from the Lord of the worlds’, implying that after the original qur”§n had been hidden, it was first translated into Arabic and then transferred by JibrÊl—orally, not in writing—to MuÈammad (ß). Those ‘who are clean to touch it’ (al-muãahharån) are in fact angels processing al-tanzÊl, since no human, ritually pure or impure, could ever touch the original qur”§n.[214] It was a grave mistake of the traditional exegetes to interpret the above verse of Sårat al-W§qi#a within the context of ritual purity:

<right>

If you are in a state of ceremonial impurity, bath your whole body

</right>

[fa-uãahharå]… (Al-M§“ida 5:6)

They ask you concerning women’s courses. Say: They are a hurt and a pollution. So keep away from women in their courses, and do not approach them until they are clean [yaãhurn[a]]. But when they have purified themselves [taãahharn[a]], you may approach them in any manner, time, or place ordained for you by God. For God loves those who turn to Him constantly and He loves those who keep themselves pure and clean [al-mutaãahhirÊn]. (Al-Baqara 2:222)

The error occurred when exegetes treated the term ‘those who are clean’ (al-muãahharån), as in 56:79, as synonymous to ‘those who are ritually pure’ (a l-mutaãahhirÊn), as in 2:222 (note that the former is derived from the 2nd verb form, the latter from the 5th verb form; moreover, whereas the latter connotes the practice of ablution before prayer performed by the believers, the former is the act of purification by Allah which cannot be performed by the believers). But while those ‘who are ritually pure’ can indeed perform the prayer since they have done the ritual ablution, they nevertheless are still unable to touch the original qur”§n because they are not angels. And while those ‘who are ritually impure’ can indeed not perform the prayer since this is prohibited by 4:43 and 5:6, they are nevertheless allowed to touch a copy (!) of the qur”§n and recite it whenever they want. Ritual impurity and touching the qur”§n are simply two different things, conflated together by unscrupulous tafsÊr exegetes.

Al-inz§l and al-tanzÊl of the umm al-kit§b

Allah blots out and confirms what He pleases; and with Him is the mother of the book [umm al-kit§b]. (Al-Ra#d 13:39, MF)[215]

Two important things are stated in verse 39 of Sårat a l-Ra#d:

a) matters of the mother of the book (umm al-kit§b) are either ‘blotted out or confirmed’, and this contains an acknowledgement of possible alterations, and b) the mother of the book is distinct from the qur”§n because the umm al-kit§b is ‘with Him’, that is, in the immediate vicinity of God. From this we deduce that the umm a l-kit§b is not inscribed in the ‘tablet preserved’ (lawÈ maÈfåí) and not stored in the ‘record clear’ (im§m mubÊn); hence, everything contained in the umm al-kit§b, that is, ritual prescriptions and specific rules of social behaviour, are not absolute laws. If the fast in Ramadan, for example, had been inscribed in the ‘tablet preserved’, it would have become a word of God (kal§m All§h). And if it had been stored in the im§m mubÊn, it would have become an objective fact of nature, that is, the truth, and people would instinctively begin to fast, whether they wanted to or not. Fasting, as any other ritual and social behaviour, would become a universal human attitude that recognizes neither modification nor deviation. But this is simply not the case. We know that Allah said:

We have assigned a law and a path to each of you. If God had so willed, He would have made you one community… (Al-M§“ida 5:48, AH)

Instead, the umm a l-kit§b allows human behaviour to change and diversify. It is for this reason that humankind has not become ‘a single people’. Since God has prescribed ‘a law and a path’ (shar#[an] wa-manhaj[an]), the content of the umm al-kit§b is issued directly from God and responds to ‘causes of revelation’ (asb§b al-nuzål). If MuÈammad (ß), for example, had not frowned upon the beggar #Abdall§h b. Amm Maktåb, verses 1 to 4 of Sårat #Abasa would never have been revealed. The same applies to the messages of previous prophets who brought legislation that was entirely geared towards the historical context of their timeperiod and which had to be annulled once this period was over. So, for example, a very strict legal code was prescribed for the Jews ‘in recompense for their wilful disobedience: for We are true (in our ordinances)’ (A l-An#§m 6:146), but once things had improved, Jesus was sent ‘to make lawful to you part of what was (before) forbidden…’ ($l #Imr§n 3:50). Later legislation abrogated earlier ones, and through MuÈammad’s (ß) messengerhood we hear about instructions (ta#lÊm§t) that abrogated earlier messengerhoods. This was possible because revelations of the umm al-kit§b were not taken from the ‘tablet preserved’ but given directly by Allah, transmitted by JibrÊl, and stored in Muhammad’s brain. It implies that a l-inz§l and a l-tanzÊl occurred simultaneously, that is, not separately one after the other like in the qur”§n, and no prerevelation took place, since the revealed messages were immediately available to MuÈammad (ß) in their perceivable (Arabic) version.

As previously pointed out, the umm al-kit§b is ‘with Him’: it comes directly from Allah. It would be more precise to say that the concrete location of the umm a l-kit§b is Allah’s throne. What and where exactly is Allah’s throne? The word ‘throne’ in Arabic (al-#arsh) can either mean literally the ‘chair of a ruler’ or metaphorically the ‘seat of power’. The Book uses the term al-#arsh in both meanings.

a) Throne in the sense of ‘chair’:

And he raised his parents high on the throne (of dignity)[216] [a l-#arsh], and they fell down in prostration, (all) before him… (Yåsuf 12:100)

b) Throne in the sense of ‘authority’ or ‘seat of power’:

He it is Who created the heavens and the earth in six days—and His throne was over the waters… (Håd 11:7)

Your guardian-lord is God, who created the heavens and the earth in six days, and is firmly established on the throne (of authority) [al-#arsh]… (Al-A#r§f 7:54)

And the angels will be on its sides, and eight will, that day, bear the throne [#arsh] of your Lord above them. (Al-\§qqa 69:17) (God) most gracious is firmly established on the throne (of authority) [al-#arsh]. (•§-H§” 20:5)

Say: If there had been (other) gods with Him, as they say, behold, they would certainly have sought out a way to the Lord of the throne [al-#arsh]! (Al-Isr§” 17:42)

In verse 7 of Sårat Håd it is said that ‘His throne was over the waters’. This does not imply that a chair was literally placed over the oceans. It rather means that before this universe was created with all its planets, galaxies, and stars, the world consisted of just hydrogen, water particles, and Allah’s command ruled ‘over the waters’. Then came the period, as verse 54 of Sårat Al-A#r§f says, when God created the heavens and the earth, which became His ‘seat of power’:

He draws the night as a veil over the day, each seeking the other in rapid succession. He created the sun, the moon, and the stars, (all) governed by laws under His command. Is it not His to create and to govern? Blessed be God, the cherisher and sustainer of the worlds! (Al-A#r§f 7:54)

Finally, Allah’s authority will reign over a new world, the Afterlife, or rather: a new ‘becoming’ of this universe, transformed into a new existence with new laws that will host Allah’s ‘seat of power’. On ‘that day’, eight angels will bear the throne, this being a metaphor for Allah as merciful God on the Day of Judgement (69:17; 20:5). In sum, the word al-#arsh is a generic term for the (metaphorical) place where Allah’s power resides. It is dependent on the material state of the universe but has by no means a concrete spatial connotation. This is also true for verse 42 of Sårat a l-Isr§” which refers to the (only theoretical) possibility that other gods, if they were ‘with Him’, would have competed with one another to become the one who commands over right and wrong, that is, to become the ‘Lord of the throne’, Allah. It certainly does not mean a race by those gods to a specific chair!

 Summary of Terminology

A. Transformation into perceptible revelation (al-ja#l):

a. al-qur”§n

We have made it [ja#ln§hu] a Qur’an in Arabic, that you may be able to understand (and learn wisdom). (Al-Zukhruf 43:3)

B. Process of becoming perceptible revelation (al-inz§l):

a. al-qur”§n

We have sent it down [anzaln§hu] as an Arabic Qur’an…(Yåsuf 12:2)

b. umm al-kit§b

Thus have We revealed it [anzaln§hu] to be a judgement of authority in Arabic… (Al-Ra#d 13:37)

c. al-kit§b

Praise be to God, who has sent [anzala] to His servant the book [al-kit§b]… (Al-Kahf 18:1)

Note that the last verse refers to the inz§l of the entire book which includes the qur”§n, the umm al-kit§b, the explanation of the book (tafßÊl al-kit§b), and the seven oft-recited (sab# al-math§nÊ).

C. Transmission of revelation (al-tanzÊl):

a. al-qur”§n

It is We who have sent down [nazzaln§] the Qur’an to you by stages.

(Al-Ins§n 76:23)

b. umm a l-kit§b together with tafßÊl a l-kit§b and sab# al-math§nÊ

The revelation of this book [tanzÊl a l-kit§b] is from God, the exalted in power, full of wisdom. (Al-Zumar 39:1)

The revelation of this book [tanzÊl al-kit§b] is from God, exalted in power, full of knowledge. (Gh§fir 40:2)

The revelation of the book [tanzÊl al-kit§b] is from God the exalted in power, full of wisdom. (Al-J§thiyya 45:2)

As for the seven oft-recited we hear about their inz§l in verse 1 of Sårat al-Kahf (together with the whole Book, see above), but their tanzÊl (as an individual, separate revelation) is stated in the following verse:

God has revealed (from time to time) [nazzala] the most beautiful message in the form of a book, consistent with itself, (yet) repeating (its teaching in various aspects)… (Al-Zumar 39:23)

* Notes:

– The qur”§n was subject to both ja#l and inz§l, and the process of tanzÊl occurred separately (over a period of twenty-three years);

– The umm al-kit§b and tafßÊl al-kit§b and sab# al-math§nÊ were revealed in a simultaneous process of inz§l and tanzÊl (over a period of twenty-three years), ja#l was not needed;

– The book as a whole (a l-kit§b) was revealed over a period of twenty-three years; no specific verse is needed to express the tanzÊl of the umm al-kit§b; all verses only refer to the tanzÊl of the whole book (see above under C.). The reason why the tanzÊl is specifically mentioned for the qur”§n is that such explicitness emphasizes the qur”§n’s special nature and distinguishes it from the other parts of the book.

 The Objectivity of the Qur'an

We define objectivity as a state of existence that has its cause outside the human mind. The sun’s existence, for example, is objective because it exists whether we recognize it or not. Since the sun’s existence is objective (part of objective reality) it is also real or true— one might say that the sun embodies the truth (al-Èaqq). The fact that we have to die is an objective fact, whether we recognize it or not. We do not say: ‘Death is allowed or forbidden’. We say: ‘Death is real’. Death is the truth. The force of gravitation, the end of this world, the Day of Resurrection—these are real, objective facts which occur whether we like it or not. We will die even if we deny the existence of death. We will fall down from the roof even if we deny that the force of gravitation exists. And we will be resurrected from death even if we reject such a possibility. These things will occur objectively: their cause is outside the human mind.

In contrast, we define subjectivity as existence that depends on the state of affairs inside the human mind. The entire field of human behaviour is subjective because it is influenced by what we think and feel. Prayers, fasts, pilgrimages, charity work, games of chance, loans on interests, bad or good governance, and such, the entire sphere of social, political, religious, aesthetic, economic, and other activities does not exist objectively but depends on how we think about it. Whereas the subjective sphere of human behaviour cannot exist without the objective reality, the opposite is not the case. Even if, to take an extreme example, all humankind had been eradicated, by a nuclear inferno, it would not dramatically affect the universal laws of existence and the movements of planets and the expansion of the galaxies. The truth exists whatever we make of it.

As pointed out earlier, the qur”§n represents this objective, absolute reality that exists outside the human mind. The study of this reality can only be done within the parameters of objective, scientific research, such as in physics, chemistry, biology, astronomy, in addition to metaphysics, which is the epitome of objectivity. Humanities and social sciences, for example, religious studies, law, sociology, the political and educational sciences, and psychology, cannot produce anything substantial or beneficial in our endeavour to explore the qur”§n.

In contrast with the objective qur”§n, the umm a l-kit§b expresses subjectivity. Allah’s command, for example, to treat parents with respect cannot be carried out independently of the human mind. If we do not attend to Allah’s command, respect for our parents disappears because we have decided not to treat them respectfully. If we decide not to pray, to fast, or go on a pilgrimage, these rituals will simply not happen. ‘His word (qauluhu) is the truth…’, Al-An#§m 6:73, but nowhere in the umm al-kit§b is Allah’s word (qaul) attached to a command, as for example: ‘He said (q§l [a]): do fast…’ or ‘He said (q§l[a]): do pray…’. Why? Because if He had said so, prayer and fasting would be parts of the objective, absolute truth, and we would pray and fast objectively, that is, automatically, whether we want it to or not, just like the process of digestion starts when we eat or like our pulse increases when we are excited.

If the qur”§n represents the objective reality of the universe, and if the umm al-kit§b embodies the subjective behaviour of humankind, it follows that the qur”§n exists independent of the umm al-kit§b and that it serves to confirm the umm al-kit§b’s subjectivity. Let us explore this relationship a little further by looking at the term ‘spirit’ (al-råh) in Allah’s Book:

[Prophet], they ask you about the spirit [al-råÈ]. Say: ‘The spirit is part of my Lord’s domain [amr rabbÊ]. You have only been given a little knowledge.’ (Al-Isr§” 17:85, AH)

Traditional exegetes thought that ‘spirit’ in this verse stands for ‘secret of life’. We cannot accept this interpretation because it reflects a misreading that was quite common in early tafsÊr. Let us look at verses that contain the term ‘soul’ (al-nafs):

Nor can a soul [li-nafs] die except by God’s leave [bi-ithn All§h], the term being fixed as by writing… ($l #Imr§n 3:145)

<right>

It is God that takes the souls (of men) [al-nafs] at death… (Al-Zumar

</right>

39:42)

“[But] you, soul [al-nafs] at peace: * return to your Lord well pleased and well pleasing.” (Al-Fajr 89:27–28, AH)

If you could only see the wicked in their death agonies, as the angels stretch out their hands [to them], saying, ‘Give up your souls [anfusakum]…’ (Al-An#§m 6:93, AH)

We notice that souls die and souls return to God after a period ‘fixed as by writing’ (kit§b[an] mu”ajjal[an]). Angels will come to the wicked and ask them to give up their souls. None of this ever applies to the spirit (al-råÈ). Life and death cannot affect the spirit. In no way can spirit mean ‘secret of life’, as this would assume synonymity between ‘soul’ and ‘spirit’, and this is unacceptable.

The verses about Allah’s creation of humankind give us a clue as to how to interpret ‘spirit’. They tell us that Adam was chosen by Allah (‘God did choose Adam…’, $l #Imr§n 3:33) to become the ‘father of the human race’; and, indeed, with him human beings were born who differed from animals, plants, and other creatures. The way Allah chose Adam was to ‘breathe spirit (al-råÈ) into him’ (‘and breathed into him of My spirit (min råÈÊ)…’, Al-\ijr 15:29).[217] Equipped with Allah’s spirit, human beings were blessed with two things that other aspects of creation did not have: knowledge and legislation (‘And He taught Adam the names of all things…’ [that is to distinguish the sounds and shapes of everything in nature], Al-Baqara 2:31). It qualified human beings to become God’s vicegerents on earth (“I will [let come forth] a vicegerent (khalÊfa) on earth”, A l-Baqara 2:30) and to build airplanes, submarines, computers, digital cameras, and so forth; also to create nation-states, governments, and civil society. The ‘spirit of God’ (memory) enabled nations to write their history self-reflectively and use historiography to enhance humankind’s historical consciousness. By giving human beings knowledge and legislation, Allah initiated a qualitative jump in history: creatures turned into human beings through the acquisition of God’s spirit.

The following verses show that the spirit came ‘by God’s command’ (amr All§h):

…He casts the spirit by His command [min amrihi] upon whomever of His servants He wishes, to warn of the Day of the Encounter. (Gh§fir 40:15, MF)

He sends down the angels with the spirit by His command [min amrihi] upon whom He pleases of His servants… (Al-NaÈl 16:2, MF)

So We have revealed a spirit to you [Prophet] by Our command [min amrin§]: you knew neither the Scripture nor the faith… (A l-Shår§ 42:52, AH)

[Prophet], they ask you about the spirit [al-råÈ]. Say: ‘The spirit is part of my Lord’s domain [amr rabbÊ]. You have only been given a little knowledge.’ (Al-Isr§” 17:85, AH)

Therein come down the angels and the spirit by God’s permission

[bi-idhn rabbihim], on every errand [min kull amr[in]]. (Al-Qadr 97:4)

We note that the ‘spirit’, unlike the ‘soul’, does not possess any corporality. Allah gave us the spirit from Himself, not from objective reality or the material world of the universe. The umm al-kit§b comes directly from God. The rules, injunctions, and commandments of the umm a l-kit§b are Allah’s spirit. They have no corporal identity but are expressed as human behaviour. They do not exist on their own but are exemplified in our daily social and moral conduct. If the human race disappeared, so would Allah’s spirit in the form of the umm al-kit§b because it can only be manifest in relation to humans’ conscious activities and their efforts to comprehend it.

The spirit is therefore the common denominator between human beings and God. It embodies human capacity to think and legislate on an ever broader epistemological and humanist level. We may thus define a l-råÈ as the ‘secret of human progress’. When Allah ‘breathed His spirit’ into Adam it caused the angels to prostrate themselves in front of human beings, it liberated humans to enjoy their role as God’s vicegerents on earth freely, and allowed them to determine their affairs independently. God knows best—because His knowledge coincides completely with objective reality—but human beings constantly learn to know more and they will come closer to His knowledge.

 The Realms of God’s Divinity and Sovereignty

Why does the text of the Book designate different terms for ‘Allah’? In some instances He is called rabb (sovereign or lord), in others il§h (god).[218] What is the difference between the two terms?

1. Allah as Sovereign (rabb):

(He is) Lord [rabb] of the two Easts and Lord of the two Wests. (Al-RaÈm§n 55:17)

The term rabb in Arabic denotes a form of supremacy as it conveys the notion of a master or lord, even ruler or king, who possesses high status and prestige. We say in Arabic that someone is the ‘master of the house’, which signifies a position of power over the dependents of his family. Applied to the term rabb or lord in the Book, we infer that this stands for the concept of Allah’s sovereignty (al-rubåbiyya), that is, His lordship over the objective reality of existence outside human consciousness. It connotes a relationship of Allah with all of His creation, which is a relationship of dominance, power, and possession. This relationship is objective, absolute, and unalterable. In studying the laws of nature, the cosmos, and history we become aware of the realm of Allah’s sovereignty which governs the universe independent of the human mind. In this capacity, Allah is the Lord of all creatures, be they believers or unbelievers, Arabs or non-Arabs, learned or ignorant, humans or animals.

Allah transferred this sovereignty to humanity when he installed Adam as His vicegerent on earth,[219] indicating that a thorough study of His sovereignty, of objective reality, will enable humankind to rule over His creation, the earth and the skies, the plants and the animals—in His manner. When, for example, humankind learned how to master the force of gravitation they took possession of the moon and Mars, fulfilling His word:

Do you not see that God [All§h] has made subject to you (men) all that is on the earth, and the ships that sail through the sea by His command? He withholds the sky (rain) from falling on the earth except by His leave: for God [All§h] is most kind and most merciful to man. (Al-\ajj 22:65)

Do you not see that God [All§h] has subjected to your (use) all things in the heavens and on earth, and has made his bounties flow to you in exceeding measure, (both) seen and unseen? Yet there are among men those who dispute about God [All§h], without knowledge and without guidance, and without a book to enlighten them! (Luqm§n 31:20)

And He [All§h] has subjected to you, as from Him, all that is in the heavens and on earth. Behold, in that are signs indeed for those who reflect. (Al-J§thiyya 45:13)

The concept of God’s vicegerency on earth is inclusive: it transfers power to both believers and unbelievers. It requires good and responsible governance over the earth’s resources by everybody regardless of their beliefs. It is a universal task for all humankind, unaffected by religious affiliations.

2. Allah as Divine God (il§h):

Know, therefore, that there is no god but God [All§h]... (MuÈammad 47:19)

But your God [il§hukum] is one God [il§h[un] w§Èid[un]]... (Al-\ajj 22:34)

In contrast, the concept of Allah's divinity (al-ulåhiyya), derived from the term 'God' (il§h), refers to Allah's demand to follow His rules and commandments in return for having bestowed upon humankind the freedom of vicegerency. It is less inclusive as it only requests 'those who understand' to witness His unity and to follow His rules:

He [All§h] has commanded that you worship none but Him: that is the right religion, but most men understand not. (Yåsuf 12:40)

Note that this verse acknowledges that most men are ignorant about 'the right religion' and do not worship Him (ulåhiyya). In contrast, His sovereignty (rubåbiyya) is all-inclusive, nobody cannot not worship Him:

"O my two companions of the prison! (I ask you): are many lords differing among themselves better, or the one God [All§h], supreme and irresistible?" (Yåsuf 12:39)

In sum, Allah's sovereignty pertains to a relationship of power and domination that is unchangeable and essentially irresistible. It can neither be undermined nor limited; it is a matter-of-fact substance of reality. Allah's divinity, however, is the realm of voluntary worship by 'those who understand'. It is a matter of choice, since one can choose to opt out or opt in; there is no coercion in matters of worship. As for the relationship between the two realms, undeniably Allah's sovereignty always assumes priority over His divinity, since the latter is dependent on a variable; that is, the existence of rational people. There is no divinity without 'those who understand'. Hence, no verse in the book refers to 'the God of the worlds' or 'the God of the heavens and earth', but only to 'the Lord of the worlds' and 'the Lord of the heavens and earth'.

Likewise, no verse requires believers to witness that ‘there is no lord (rabb) but Allah’ but, as in the shah§da, that ‘there is no god (il§h) but God’. This is because Allah is their Lord, whether they witness it or not. No testimony is required because its truth transcends all human testimony. Allah is the Lord of both the believers and the unbelievers, He nourishes them all, He gives all humankind rain, light, and food, and all His laws of nature apply equally to everyone:

Of the bounties of your Lord [rabbuka] We bestow freely on all. These as well as those: the bounties of your Lord are not closed (to anyone). (Al-Isr§” 17:20)

Allah’s rules and commandments are stated in the umm al-kit§b, MuÈammad’s (ß) messengerhood. We infer from this that the umm a l-kit§b belongs to the book of divinity (kit§b a l-ulåhiyya). The universal laws of nature, cosmos, and history are contained in the qur”§n, the realm that exists outside the human mind. Hence, the qur”§n belongs to the book of sovereignty (kit§b al-rubåbiyya).[220]

Determinism in _{QUR}”§_N and _{UMM}
_{AL}-_{KIT}§_B

In this final section an important distinction will be made between the two Arabic terms a l-qadar and a l-qa·§”. In traditional theology the two terms were normally regarded as synonyms, both indiscriminately expressing the notion of ‘predestination’, which humans have to accept submissively since God’s predestination of all things on earth is unfathomable. We propose to revise the alleged synonymity between the two terms and redefine them as follows: the term that expresses the notion of Allah’s ‘predestination’ is only a l-qadar, whereas al-qa·§” refers to decisions that are taken, or ‘determined’, by human beings. While the former characterizes God’s laws in the objective reality of the universe, the latter symbolises the existence of free will in human activities in this world. Al-qadar belongs to al-qur”§n, whereas al-qa·§” belongs to the umm al-kit§b.

Let us first explore the notion of determinism in the qur”§n. We established that the qur”§n contains the objective, absolute laws of nature, the cosmos and history; explains the manifestations of the natural world; and narrates the events of human history as they had occurred in the past. The Book defines the qur”§n as the ‘truth’, in the sense that death is true, the sun is true, day and night are true, and so on. These things are objective because neither human knowledge nor human activities can affect or change them. Their course is ‘predestined’ by the eternal laws of the universe. The same is true for events in history: once they have happened they cannot be undone—they are real; they are true; or, better, they are determined. This is the realm of al-qadar.

In contradistinction, we defined umm al-kit§b as the part of the Book that contains the legal rules of human behaviour. In response to these rules, human beings can decide between acceptance and rejection, between submission and rebellion, between approval and disapproval. Allah has granted human beings a choice which they can exercise in fulfilling His demand to ‘do good and avoid evil’. We also pointed out that the fulfilment of Allah’s rules requires ‘understanding’ of the rules as an absolute precondition. Rules have to be comprehensible, so that both the man on the street and the country’s intellectual elite are able to follow them. Rules should not possess ‘ambiguity’ (tash§buh) but be clear, unambiguous, and precise. Once these rules have been made clear the people are able to either accept or reject them. Hence, knowledge and acceptance are the prerequisites for following the rules of the umm al-kit§b. In other words, these rules are not unconditioned or objective, but conditioned insofar as they require acceptance in order to be implemented and subjective because their execution is subject to men’s consciousness and decision-making. This is the realm of al-qa·§”.

Two verses from Sårat al-Nis§” illustrate the distinction we have made:

Wherever you are, death will find you out, even if you are in towers built up strong and high! If some good befalls them, they say, “This is from Allah”, but if evil, they say, “This is from you” (O Prophet). Say: “All things are from Allah.” But what has come to these people that they fail to understand a single fact. (Al-Nis§” 4:78)

Whatever good, (O man!) happens to you, is from Allah, but whatever evil happens to you, is from yourself. And we have sent you as a messenger to (instruct) mankind. And enough is Allah for a witness. (Al-Nis§” 4:79)

The first verse, by stating that ‘wherever you are, death will find you out’, makes it clear that truth is absolute and independent from human acts, be they for or against it. Death will ‘find people out, wherever they are’. ‘What has come to these people that they fail to understand a single fact (hadÊth[an])’, asks the verse. Note the term hadÊth here, a term that we defined as relating to al-qur”§n. And indeed, the first verse does not talk about good and evil in human behaviour but about good and evil in objective reality, the existence of life and death, of angels and the devil, which all have their origin in Allah. ‘Say: “All things are from Allah.”’ This verse talks about al-qadar.

The second verse, however, talks about good and evil in human behaviour. Whereas in objective reality angels (symbolising good) and the devil (evil) are both essential parts of the truth, and no preference exists for either of the two, angels are supposed to compete with the devil in what humans do. In saying, ‘Whatever good, (O man!) happens to you, is from Allah, but whatever evil happens to you, is from yourself’, the verse acknowledges: a) a distinction between ‘what is from Allah’ and ‘what is from human beings’, and b) an autonomy in human acts. These acts of human behaviour are thought to be regulated by the rules of the umm al-kit§b that are MuÈammad's (ß) messengerhood. MuÈammad (ß) was ordered by God to give people instructions about His rules. 'And we have sent you as a messenger to (instruct) humankind.' This verse talks about al-qa·§".

The following verse will give us an indication as to why it is so significant to distinguish between the al-qadar and al-qa·§":

Thy Lord has decreed [qa·§] that you worship none but Him, and that you be kind to parents. Whether one or both of them attain old age in your life, say not to them a word of contempt, nor repel them, but address them in terms of honour. (Al-Isr§" 17:23)

This is clearly an instruction that falls into the category of umm al-kit§b, as people have a choice whether to follow it and treat their parents respectfully or reject it and do the opposite. It is the realm of 'worship none but Him' by 'those who understand' to which the ethical rule ('be kind to parents') is attached. It would be a mistake to regard this verse as part of the qur"§n because then the ethical demand would turn into an objective fact whether one subjectively intended to do it or not. 'To be kind to parents' would turn into an objective law of human behaviour which exists absolutely and independently of what human beings actually do. Even if people began to abuse their parents, disobey them, or starve them to death, it would still count as 'being kind to parents' because, objectively, people cannot but 'be kind to parents' regardless of their subjective intentions. In analogy, if 'to worship none but Him' became objective law, it would not matter whether someone subjectively worships idols, pagan gods, or political despots such as Pharaoh, because all of these would count, objectively, as worship of Him. This is the big error that we find in Ibn 'ArabÊ's Fußåß al-\ikam where the author announced a 'unity of worship', implying that since God had decreed (qa·§) to 'worship none but Him', humans are predestined to do exactly that (in whatever manner and regardless of their individual intentions). In Ibn 'ArabÊ's notion of the unity of worship, free will to accept or reject a 'worship of Him' does not exist. The rules of Islam became an inescapable fate—heedless of what someone actually intended to believe or practise—a determined destiny that releases people from being responsible and in charge of their religious and ethical deeds. Because of Ibn ‘ArabÊ’s huge influence the verb qa·§ was seen as synonymous with qadara, and this has had a disastrous effect on the Arab-Muslim mind.

Finally, let us look again at the verses that we cited at the beginning of this chapter:

That is indeed a Qur’an most honourable, in a book well-guarded, which none shall touch but those who are clean. (A l-W§qi#a 56: 77–79)

These verses have been the subject of another fatal confusion between matters of a l-qur§n and the rules of umm a l-kit§b. The verb la yamassuhu was not understood in its indicative form (they do not touch) but rather as an imperative (they shall not touch). What was a descriptive narrative about the angels who did not touch the qur”§n, became a proscriptive rule and a ban for the ritually impure not to touch the Book. A statement of the qur”§n turned into a statement of the umm al-kit§b, and something from the realm of al-qadar was transformed into something of al-qa·§”. As a consequence, menstruating women, women in childbirth, and people of impurity are today not allowed to touch a copy of the qur”§n, only ink on white paper (!), which is, to say the least, simply outrageous.

 Summary

al-qur”§n umm al-kit§b

Hermeneutical quality of verses | ambiguous | definite |

| Content | The truth of absolute reality that allows humans’ relative knowledge of it; it separates truth from falsehood | Rules of human behaviour; it separates things that are allowed from things that are absolute taboos |

| Context of revelation | No causes of revelation | Responds to historical circumstances |

| Possibility of abrogation | No | Yes |

| Origin | ‘Clear Record’ and

‘Tablet preserved” | Allah’s throne: a direct command from Him |

| Inz§l and TanzÊl | Separate processes; al-inz§l and al-ja#l precede al-tanzÊl | Simultaneous processes without preceding transformation (al-ja#l) |

| Prophethood or Messengerhood | Prophethood (includes the ‘explanation of the book’ and the ‘seven oft-recited’) | Messengerhood |

| Sovereignty or Divinity | God’s sovereignty: it does not allow humans’ approval or disapproval | God’s divinity: the area of His rules, instructions, and commandments |

| al-qadar or al-qa·§” | al-qadar: Allah’s predestination of universal, objective, absolute laws of nature, the cosmos and society; historical events are determined after their occurrence | al-qa·§”: the legal, ethical, and religious codes of human behaviour; human beings have free will and choose between acceptance and refusal |

| Inimitability | The qur”§n is inimitable due to its quality of ‘ambiguity’ and being subject to historical/philosophical interpretations (al-ta”wÊl) | The umm al-kit§b is not inimitable, but it is subject to legal, ethical, and religious interpretations

(al-tafsÊr) |

 4. The Theory of Limits

This chapter explains the existence of limits in MuÈammad’s (ß) message. It also shows that Islamic legislation must be based on the principles of ijtih§d that govern a controlled renewal and flexible adaptation of legal rules to changing historical circumstances. It offers an alternative view to the current attempts to regard sharÊ#a law as an eternally fixed body of rigid rulings which allows neither additions nor modifications, and whose strict rules must be followed by every Muslim to the letter. Our alternative reading of MuÈammad’s (ß) message allows us to reinterpret the rules of sharÊ#a law as constantly evolving and, at the same time, to accept the sunna of the Prophet (ß) as a model in applying Allah’s laws flexibly to the everchanging circumstances in a variety of different cultures and economic systems. We will start by explaining what we mean by ‘change of Islamic legislation’ and why we still adhere to the belief in the ‘eternal validity’ of MuÈammad’s (ß) message. We will then introduce the concepts of ‘straightness’ and ‘curvature’ as they apply to sharÊ#a law and specify the upper and lower limits of Islamic legislation. A detailed application of our theory of limits to the area of Islamic inheritance and family law will follow in the next chapter.

 The Need of Change in Islamic Legislation

Let us start by revisiting the distinction between al-isl§m and al-Êm§n: to believe in Allah’s existence and the Last Day are the quintessential elements of al-isl§m, culminating in the creed that ‘there is no god but God’. Being the root and stem of its three main sub-branches— ethics, law, and rituals— al-isl§m also contains the area of sharÊ#a law which is, as we defined in chapter 1, the area of al-Êm§n, of MuÈammad’s (ß) messengerhood (since a l-isl§m is the generic type of the particular al-Êm§n). Followers of al-Êm§n believe that ‘MuÈammad is isl§m and as a l-isl§m is eternally valid, MuÈammad’s message is also eternally valid. The question is, of course, how does this square with our notion of an ever-changing legislation and its flexible adaptation to human develop ment?

God’s Messenger’ and are, thus, Muslim-Believers (al-mu”minån). As law and legislation are subrooted in a l-

We need to recall the historical truth that the more knowledge and expertise human societies accumulate and advance technologically, the more intense will they feel the impact of social, cultural, and economic change. And the more human societies change the more flexible and adaptable must be the law to accommodate its rules to the changing parameters of people’s daily life. Think of the time when car manufacturers improved their assembly lines so that cars could be mass produced—this not only changed the way people travelled, commuted, and went about their daily routines, it also required new legislation that regulated entirely new areas concerned with traffic control, the issuing of driving licences, and prosecution of driving offences. Or think of the legal consequences when it became possible for several nations in the world to produce nuclear weapons in the 1960s and 1970s; international law had to be adapted to this new technological advance, and the United Nations had to adjust their legislation accordingly. Or, when mobile phones became affordable consumer goods for all in the 1990s, new legislation had to regulate whether it was legal to use mobile phones at work, during public events, or at the steering wheel while driving a car. These few examples are enough to show the link between technological progress and the need to follow suit with new legislation. They also provide an illustration of the dynamics between prophethood and messengerhood during the time of the prophetical epoch, that is, before the death of Prophet MuÈammad (ß).

We know that there were more prophets than messengers in the history of humankind. The many, different prophethoods represented the constant accumulation of knowledge over long periods of time. What was then required was a messenger, ending the historical chain of prophets, who would bring new developments in line with official legislation by introducing new codes of behaviour. However, today we have been told not to wait until a new messenger arrives and issues a new message, because—and this is final—MuÈammad (ß) was the last messenger. How can we, citizens of the twenty-first century, an era of fast developments and epistemologic al-technological progress, deal with a message that was revealed to people in the seventh century?

The answer lies in the fact that the Book did not stipulate the sharÊ#a in the form of a codified law that is eternally unchangeable. Instead, Allah set the limits for the law whose upper and lower boundaries encompass the scope of legislation that human societies are allowed to explore freely. For the first time in the history of humankind, the messenger, MuÈammad (ß), did not introduce fixed regulations that accurately reflected the achieved accumulation of knowledge and technological progress of his time. Instead, he conveyed, in terms of its civilisational qualities, a highly advanced form of legislation that stood in sharp contrast to the existing abysmal economic situation and primitive tribalism of Arabian society. It was clear from the beginning that some verses of the new legislation were impossible to implement there and then because of the primitive backwardness of Arabian tribes. We hear that:

The desert Arabs are the most stubborn of all peoples in their disbelief and hypocrisy. They are the least likely to recognize the limits [Èudåd] that God has sent down to His Messenger. God is all knowing and all wise. (Al-Tawba 9:97, AH)

This acknowledgement of the Arab’s incapability to fully recognise the impact of the new law implies that the needed recognition could be achievable in more advanced societies. This is why the possibility of advanced recognition has been built into the text of the Book, because accumulation of knowledge never ends, technological development never stops, and legislation will never remain the same. We are today in a much better position to understand the legislative verses of the divine message because of the advances that human and natural sciences have achieved.

And we can confidently say that we have surpassed the Prophet’s companions in doing so, with the exception, of course, of the area of rituals. This is the only part of MuÈammad (ß) message that the companions knew best because they saw how MuÈammad (ß) performed them. It is the only area of law where innovations are illegitimate. The Messenger (ß) said, ‘whoever brings up new things in this matter of ours, is to be rejected’;[221] and ‘every innovation is deviation and every deviation is in the Hell fire’; [222] and the Book says: ‘The Messenger has said: “Lord, my people treat this qur”§n as something to be shunned”’ (Al-Furq§n 25:30; AH).

In order to understand the legal message of the Book and the dynamics between its eternal validity and historical temporality, it is necessary to introduce two contradictory yet complementary concepts that form the basis of our theory of limits. These are ‘straightness’ (al-istiq§ma) and ‘curvature’ (al-ÈanÊfiyya): they represent the internal dialectics of human life between the constant acquisition of new knowledge, leading to social and economic changes, on the one hand, and on the other, the introduction of new legislation as a proactive response to these changes and developments. We believe that the two concepts of ‘straightness’ and ‘curvature’ allow the full recognition of such dialectical dynamics without which no true contemporary understanding of Islamic law can ever be achieved.

Let us first look at the verses in which the terms occur.

‘Straightness’

Show us the straight way [al-ßir§ã al-mustaqÊm]. (Al-F§tiÈa, 1:6) Say: “Verily, my Lord has guided me to a way that is straight [ßir§ã mustaqÊm]—a religion of right—the path (trod) by Abraham the true in faith, and he (certainly) joined not gods with God.” (Al-An#§m 6:161) Verily, this is my way, leading straight [ßir§ãÊ mustaqÊm[an]]: follow it; follow not (other) paths, they will scatter you about from His (great) path: thus does He command you, that you may be righteous. (A l-An#§m

6:153)

And We guided them to the straight way [a l-ßir§ã a l-mustaqÊm]. (A l-‘§ff§t 37:118)

We find in these verses the concept of ‘straightness’ in the form of the adjective mustaqÊm. Both noun and adjective are derived from the Arabic root q-w-m which can mean two things: 1) a collective body of men, that is, ‘crowd’, which basically functions like the plural imra” (men), or 2) a reference to either intaßaba (to erect/set up/right) or #aíama (to determine/resolve/firmly intend). The concept of ‘straightness’ is derived from the root meaning of intaßaba and means ‘to put something right that has strayed’, and the Qur’anic notion of al-isl§m as the ‘correct or true religion’ (al-dÊn al-qayyim) is also defined by the second meaning of #aíama (strength); [223] hence the notion of ‘straight’ also connotes the meaning of ‘strong and mighty’ (qawÊy). This double meaning of ‘putting straight’ and ‘being strong’, which already indicates the dialectical nature of ‘straightness’ and ‘curvature”—the true strength of the Islamic religion—can be found in the following verses:

[Al-rij§l] are the protectors and maintainers [qaww§mån] of [al-nis§”]…[224] (Al-Nis§” 4:34)

God! There is no god but He, the living, the self-subsisting [al-qayyåm], eternal… (Al-Baqara 2:255)

‘Curvature’

As for the term ‘curvature’, this occurs in the Book primarily in the form of the noun ÈanÊf (sing.) or Èunaf§” (pl.), referring a) to those who are ‘true in their faith’ and b) to the religion the faithful adhere to. We hear from the Book:

So [Prophet] as a man of pure faith, stand firm and true in your devotion to the religion [li’l-dÊn ÈanÊf [an]]. This is the natural disposition [fiãra] God instilled in mankind—there is no altering God’s creation—and this is the right religion [al-dÊn al-qayyim], though most people do not realize it. (Al-Råm 30:30, AH)

And they have been commanded no more than this: To worship God, offering Him sincere devotion, being true (in faith) [al-dÊn Èunaf§”]; to establish regular prayer; and to practise regular charity; and that is the religion right and straight [dÊn al-qayyima]. (Al-Bayyina 98:5)

Being true in faith to God [Èunaf§” li-ll§h], and never assigning partners to Him… (Al-\ajj 22:31)

Who can be better in religion than one who submits his whole self to God, does good, and follows the way of Abraham the true in faith [ÈanÊf [an]]? For God did take Abraham for a friend. (Al-Nis§” 4:125)[225]

However, etymologically the noun ÈanÊf is derived from the Arabic root È-n-f which means ‘to drift’ or ‘to bend’ and almost always implies an aspect of incorrectness or distortion. If, for example, someone walks with a twisted ankle or a crippled foot one would use adjectives derived from È-n-f (e.g., aÈnaf) in order to indicate a foot distortion. Furthermore, related root words such as kh-n-f or j-n-f, which only differ from È-n-f by a different first radical, connote similar kinds of distortion or deviation, for example, khanafa, is to speak with a nasal twang, while janafa indicates a distorted sense of justice or unbalanced judgement, as indicated in the Book:

But if anyone fears partiality or wrong-doing [janaf [an]] on the part of the testator… (Al-Baqara 2:182)

In our reading of Sårat A l-An#§m, verse 79, the quality of being ‘curved’ or ‘bent’ (ÈanÊf) is a natural quality as it is intrinsic to human nature in the material, objective world. The verse reads as follows:

Lo! I have turned my face toward Him who created [faãara] the heavens and the earth, as one by nature [ÈanÊf [an]],[226] and I am not of the idolaters. (Al-An#§m 6:79; MP)

The term ÈanÊf occurs here in the form of a È§l-accusative, ÈanÊf [an], and designates the state or quality of the act to which the previous subclause refers, that is, to God’s creation of the heavens and the earth.[227] This implies that nature has been created in a nonlinear fashion, and that all things in the universe, from the smallest electrons to the biggest galaxies, move in curves. And since there is no natural ‘straightness’ in God’s creation, human beings, in their innate natural disposition (al-fiãra, notice the same root as the verb faãara in verse 79) are also characterised by curvature and a lack of straightness. But in their ‘curvedness’ they are in total harmony with the material, objective reality around them as this is marked by the same law of natural nonlinearity.

If the entire universe is characterised by curvature, nonlinear movement, and change, straightness will be necessary in order to implement some sort of equilibrium and constancy. Human beings need Allah as their guide to show them the ‘straight path’ (al-ßir§ã al-mustaqÊm) because of this necessity for controlling and restraining their natural inclination to constant permutations. Essentially, humans do not need God’s guidance to follow their ÈanÊfiyya disposition—they instinctively ‘bend towards’ non-linearity and change— hence, no verse in the Book tells man how to seek curvature. Instead, we hear ‘this is the natural disposition (fiãrat All§h) God instilled in humankind—there is no altering God’s creation—and this is the right religion…’ (Al-Råm 30:30; AH) and, thus, we hear instead ‘show us the straight way (a l-ßir§ã a l-mustaqÊm)’ (A l-F§tiÈa 1:6), not ‘show us curvature’.

Even if straightness is provided by God and curvature is a feature of human nature, this does not mean that God’s aim is to entirely replace curvature by straightness. This would destroy the disposition He created for humankind. It does mean that curvature and straightness stand together in a dialectical relationship whereby stability and change are intrinsically intertwined. This dialectical opposition between curvature and straightness allows for a limitless number of movements which human legislation can take so that Islamic law remains adaptable to all times and places until the coming of the Last Hour. It means that God’s provision of straightness allows humankind to know the utmost limits of human behaviour which humankind is not allowed to transgress. But within these extreme limits, as stated in the umm a l-kit§b, human beings are allowed to move freely and adjust their legislation according to the needs and circumstances of their times.

The following examples will help us to understand how intrinsic and natural the concept of upper and lower limits is for all of us in our daily life:[]

1. People live in locations in this earth which are defined by an average altitude between two extremes. We do not live on top of the highest mountains (the upper limit would be Mount Everest in the Himalayas) nor on land that is situated much below sea level (the Jordan Valley near the Dead Sea is the lowest limit). Only a tiny minority dare to occupy the extreme regions of this earth (e.g., mountaineers and adventurers), while the majority prefer to live in the middle between the outermost limits.

2. Daylight varies throughout the year according to season and time of the year. In Damascus, for example, the longest day of the year is fourteen hours and twenty-six minutes, while the shortest day is only nine hours and fifty minutes long. The other days of the year are in between these two extremes.

3. The human eye can only see colours that are visible within the spectrum of light. It cannot recognise the colours that are above violet or below red.

4. The human ear can only hear vibrations of sounds that are between the range of twenty to twenty-thousand Hertz. Body temperature, heart rate, frequency of breathing through inhaling and exhaling, the movement of our limbs, and such—all these function naturally between two extremes, and if these limits were transgressed, the body would cease to function properly.

5. The amount of blood sugar in our veins varies between 70 and 120 mg. Any amount in between the limits is normal, even if it is exactly either 70 or 120 mg, but this would trigger some tests and closer supervision. Most of us will have a healthy blood sugar level between the two extremes, as we do in relation to cholesterol, blood corpuscles, fat, and other elements of the blood.

6. Daytime temperatures also vary between two extremes. We may, for example, have a case where the highest temperature ever measured in a city is 46˚C, while the lowest temperature is –5˚C. Most days of the year, however, do not reach these extreme temperatures and the average is somewhere between the two. The same applies to the measurement of wind speed, air humidity, rainfall, or the height of waves on the sea.

7. In order to prevent dehydration the human body needs a minimum amount of liquid per day, but there is no strict upper limi for this. The amount needed differs according to air temperature, humidity, human activity, and other external factors.

8. The minimum speed required to overcome gravitation forces is 11km/s, while there is no limit for the maximum speed. However, if a spaceship reached the speed of light, the spaceship would turn itself into light.

9. The fastest possible way to travel is at the speed of light. No higher speed has ever been recorded. The minimum speed, however, is not zero m/h, because this would be an absolute standstill. Only when a body moves will it qualify as having speed.

10. The minimum requirement for organic life is the existence of water (i.e., humidity) and oxygen.

11. The minimum amount of subshells circling an atomic nucleus is one, and the maximum amount is seven. Hydrogen, for example, has only one subshell, while others have seven, such as radium. Therefore, the number of circling subshells always varies between one and seven.

These examples are sufficient to demonstrate how nature and society function between upper and lower limits, adherence to which is vital for the preservation of life.

The first person in the history of Islam who recognised the significance of the ÈanÊfiyya disposition of change and nonlinearity was Abraham. He, followed by other prophets and messengers after him, came to believe that nothing in nature and society should be forced to become fixed and stable, since this would mean turning something into ‘straightness’, a quality that only God alone can possess. To pretend ‘straightness’ for something that is naturally ‘curved’ is to violate Allah’s unity and commit shirk All§h. That is why in verse 161 of Sårat Al-An#§m the tauÈÊd of Abraham’s faith is contrasted to the shirk of the unbelievers:

Say: “Verily, my Lord has guided me to a way that is straight [ßir§ã mustaqÊm]—a religion of right—the path (trod) by Abraham, the true in faith [ÈanÊf [an]], [↔] and he (certainly) joined not gods with God.” (Al-An#§m 6:161)

In light of this verse, we say that Abraham’s faith consisted of his belief in the ÈanÊfiyya disposition of nature (curvature and change) and in the existence of Allah’s straightness in the form of limits between which the ‘curved progression of nature’ occurs. It was because of this belief and Abraham’s insistence on the unity of Allah’s sovereignty (a l-rubåbiyya) that the Book told us to see him as a role model to follow:

Abraham was truly an example: devoutly obedient to God and true in faith… (Al-NaÈl 16:120; AH)

In line with this perception of nature, the following examples show that curvature between the limits of straightness is also realised within the realm of human behaviour and social, that is, legally regulated, interaction:

1. The clearest sign of the existence of limits within a society are the actual borders of a country. These borders define the extent to which national laws apply and within which social, cultural, and economic relations are regulated. Between these borders a multitude of possible variations are permissible; in terms of how and where people settle down, the regional areas they live in, go to work, change their place of residence, spend their spare time, educate their children, and such. If someone wants to escape these societal patterns of life and work, in order to avoid breaking the law, he or she will have to cross the border and live under a different jurisdiction, by other norms, and within new borders.

2. The lawgiver in a society stipulates the maximum number of hours a human being is required to work without being able to claim overtime payment from his or her employer. Similarly, in every workplace there exists a notion of the minimum number of hours that an employee must work before the manager steps in and issues an official warning or even initiates a cut in wages because of negligence or absenteeism.

3. We are faced with hundreds of traffic signs on the roads that prescribe the maximum or minimum speed limit allowed or requested in order to secure a smooth flow of traffic. If someone exceeds the maximum speed limit or ignores the minimum speed limit, the traffic police will act and, together with city officials, prosecute the person for having broken the law.

4. If a toddler burns his fingers on a hot stove he has, despite the fact that he was told by his parents not to go near the stove, crossed a limit and is punished for it (burnt fingers). He has also had a moving, new experience (pain). This is because of our innate curiosity that sometimes causes a deviation from the rules and ignites some (curved) movements by sheer impulse.

These examples illustrate that human behaviour needs to be restrained by legal order. This is the reason why Allah sent messengers to humankind who brought legislation in order to put lawless societies back on (the straight) track. Before it was MuÈammad's (ß) turn to bring a new message, Allah decided to send messengers who, each in his own society, enforced concrete punishments that were expressly stipulated for each individual crime. It was a type of direct, explicit legislation that ended with MuÈammad's (ß) messengerhood which marked the beginning of a new legal concept: lex liminalis,[228] law by which humans legislate between the legal limits that the Book provides.[229]

MuÈammad's (ß) message not only launched a new type of human legislation but, by allowing change and nonlinearity, it also best reflected the nature of humans' ÈanÊfic predisposition. As such it essentially reflects the religion of al-isl§m that fully corresponds to the innate propensity of all people on this earth, even if they are not (yet) aware of it.[230] We sincerely believe that, sooner or later, most people will realise their natural inclination to this type of legislation, following the model of Abraham who was leaning towards his ÈanÊfic 'rectitude of conduct' even before he received divine revelations:

Long ago We bestowed right judgement on Abraham and We knew him well. (Al-Anbiy§" 21:51, AH)

Abraham's insights into the cosmological truth of ÈanÊfic law were passed on directly to MuÈammad (ß), since the Book tells us that lex liminalis was not part of the Christian and Jewish legal systems:

Abraham was not a Jew nor yet a Christian; but he was true in faith, and bowed his will to God’s (which is Islam), and he joined not gods with God. ($l #Imr§n 3:67)

We hear, for example, that when the Jews were told to sacrifice a heifer, they asked what specific kind of heifer they were supposed to slaughter. And we hear how God provided every detailed answer to every question (i.e., not a single detail of the law was left open to be filled by human legislation).[231] In questions of penal law, we are told that the punitive logic of their lex talionis required them to immediately punish a crime by maximum force and a like-for-like mentality that induced indiscriminate punishment:

We ordained therein for them: “Life for life, eye for eye, nose or nose, ear for ear, tooth for tooth, and wounds equal for equal.” (Al-M§“ida 5:45)

In contrast, Islamic legislation tries to avoid punishments being indiscriminately enforced and instead considers mitigation as absolutely vital. In the case of theft, for example, the amputation of the thief’s hand must be only regarded as the last resort if other forms of punishment have proved ineffective or if the type of theft was very serious. If, for instance, only a slice of bread has been stolen and if this was not done out of sheer menace but because of desperate hunger, to cut off a person’s hand—as if he had stolen somebody’s possessions out of greed and pure self-indulgence—is a violation of the flexible and moderate character of Islamic law. Yes, we accept that MuÈammad (ß) had indeed ordered the amputation of the hands of thieves in Medina, but we should not forget that the second caliph #Umar b. al-Khaãã§b (r) ruled against the Prophet’s example and pardoned a number of thieves.[232] In doing this, the caliph certainly did not abolish the Èadd penalty for theft once and for all. What he did was to exercise his right to judge each case individually. If a theft did not occur to him sufficiently grave or sufficiently proved, he did not apply the maximum penalty.[233] Because of this inbuilt flexibility of Islamic law, #Umar, opting for a different form of penalty, did not violate the divine ruling on theft. What he did was to simply move with his (human) legislation between the upper limit of punishment for theft (amputation of the right hand) and its lower limit (full pardon). And we should add that what #Umar did as caliph in seventhcentury Arabia has today become common practice in legal systems around the whole world. This makes our argument even stronger that the aspect of limits is a natural element in all human legislation. And while #Umar acted on impulse in judging cases of theft differently, we today can benefit from the findings of mathematical statistics and the scientific theories of limits that provide much more sophisticated means for pursuing a further diversification of Islamic legislation. We no longer need the help of our honourable scholars who would only continue their search for the umpteenth justification for amputation. Instead, we will use modern theories that can lead us to new horizons in the formulation of Islamic law.

 The Theory of Limits in Islamic Legislation

The theory of limits is based on the notion of a flexible system of (contingent) law that replaces legislation containing rigid regulations and certain penalties that allow no mitigation and are thought to be once-and-for-all fixed. Taking up again an analogy with the measurement of blood sugar in the blood, we propose a system that allows much tolerance in what is perceived to be normal, that is, we tolerate blood sugar levels within the range of 70 to 120 mg because we believe that if we insisted on a strict limit of just 70 mg as the only acceptable level of blood sugar we would seriously risk the health of millions of people. Doctors all over the world know that 70 mg is just the lower limit and that blood sugar levels of up to 120 mg (the upper limit) can be tolerated.

The legal verses of the Book provide us with the legislative framework within which we may adopt the new laws required by social change. A framework of legislation does not contain, as many believe, certain penalties which turn into ‘sources of law’, but just their outposts or, to use a football term, their sidelines. In some legal cases one may not even come near such sidelines, in others it is permitted to touch the line without fully stepping over it. Analogous to a football match, Islamic law allows movement over the entire football field. Sidelines only indicate the limits within which the game can be played while still allowing millions of different ways to play the game and of applying different tactics and strategies. Islamic law after MuÈammad’s (ß) messengerhood requires legislation within the limits of Allah, allowing an unlimited number of different legislations according to the needs of society. That is why MuÈammad’s (ß) messengerhood is called ‘mother of the book’ (umm al-kit§b) and not just ‘book’—as Moses’ and Jesus’ messengerhoods were called—because it allows millions of ‘books’ of legislations to be derived from it. And as the ‘mother of the book’ abrogated the previous books of Moses and Jesus, so will future legislations (‘books’) subsequently abrogate each other (not, of course, within weeks or months as some of our critics have insinuated).

Limits of Legislation

5. Lower limit

Lower limits are provided in:

A. The verses of marriage:

And marry not women whom your fathers married, except what is past: It was shameful and odious—an abominable custom indeed.

(Al-Nis§” 4:22)

Prohibited to you (for marriage) are: your mothers, daughters, sisters, father’s sisters, mother’s sisters, brother’s daughters, sister’s daughters, foster-mothers (who gave you suck), foster-sisters, your wives’ mothers, your step-daughters under your guardianship, born of your wives to whom you have gone in—no prohibition if you have not gone in— (those who have been) wives of your sons proceeding from your loins, and two sisters in wedlock at one and the same time, except for what is past; for God is oft-forgiving, most merciful. (Al-Nis§” 4:23)

In these two verses of Sårat a l-Nis§” Allah has issued a rule that provides a lower limit prohibiting certain marriage types. Nobody is permitted to transgress this lower limit. Under no circumstances is an ijtih§d acceptable that, for whatever cultural or political demands, aims at allowing a Muslim-Believer to marry his mother, daughter, maternal or paternal aunt, and the like. However, since the lower limit stands alone in the text, one may add further restrictions. For example, if medical tests indicate that children from couples who are cousins show higher risks of developing genetic disorders, the legislator is required to respond and to extend the list of prohibited marriage partners to the children of maternal or paternal aunts (note that this prohibition can never be an absolute taboo, because this is God’s prerogative).

Such an extension would not violate Allah’s limits, because, in stipulating possible marital arrangements, He did not provide an upper limit. The only condition is that clear scientific proof must be provided before any new legislation can be introduced. This means that a call for ijtih§d must be based on scientific evidence, and not on analogy. Analogies compare newly arising legal problems with previous legal cases or with a consensus of jurists who lived in the past, such as the salaf forefathers. Such analogical reasoning is, by definition, retrospective and regressive. It prevents Islamic legislation from being truly ÈanÊfic, that is, changeable, progressive, and adaptive to new scientific discoveries. God has assured us that mujtahids who, in their endeavour to be as scientific and analytical as possible, make mistakes, still deserve Allah’s reward for their efforts, and that mujtahids whose decisions are right will be given a double reward.

B. The food taboos:

Forbidden unto you (for food) are carrion and blood and swineflesh, and that which has been dedicated unto any other than Allah, and the strangled, and the dead through beating, and the dead through falling from a height, and that which has been killed by (the goring of) horns, and the devoured of wild beasts, saving that which you make lawful (by the death-stroke), and that which has been immolated unto idols. And (forbidden is it) that you swear by the divining arrows. This is an abomination. This day are those who disbelieve in despair of (ever harming) your religion. So fear them not, fear Me! This day have I perfected your religion for you and completed My favour unto you, and have chosen for you as religion a l-Islam. Whoso is forced by hunger, not by will, to sin: (for him) lo! Allah is forgiving, merciful. (Al-M§“ida 5:3)

Verse 3 of Sårat al-M§“ida lists ‘carrion and blood and swineflesh’ as prohibited food as well as food that has been ‘dedicated unto any other than Allah’. This constitutes the lower limit for those who want to legislate what is illegal to eat. A different category is meat of ‘the strangled, and the dead through beating, and the dead through falling from a height, and that which has been killed by (the goring of) horns, and the devoured of wild beasts’. Food from this kind of meat cannot be regarded as an absolute taboo, because, if one manages to slaughter it correctly by an ‘invocation of God’s name’, it becomes

Èal§l food and, hence, edible:[234]

Say: “I find not in the message received by me by inspiration any (meat) forbidden to be eaten by one who wishes to eat it, unless it be dead meat, or blood poured forth, or the flesh of swine, for it is an abomination, or what is impious (meat), on which a name has been invoked, other than God’s”. But (even so), if a person is forced by necessity, without wilful disobedience, nor transgressing due limits, your Lord is oft-forgiving, most merciful. (Al-An#§m 6:145) Why should you not eat of (meats) on which God’s name has been pronounced, when He has explained to you in detail what is forbidden to you, except under compulsion of necessity? But many do mislead (men) by their appetites unchecked by knowledge. Thy Lord knows best those who transgress. (Al-An#§m 6:119)

These two verses of Sårat al-An#§m state that under duress one is allowed to eat food that is normally forbidden. A transgression of Allah’s lower limit is hence permitted provided that we did not invent the reason that forced us to eat forbidden food. Such an exemption from the normal rule, however, does not exist with regard to marital arrangements. Under no circumstances is one permitted to cross the lower limit, not even in exceptional circumstances. Even if marriage outside one’s own family has become virtually impossible because of a dramatic shortage of unmarried women/men, it would still be illegal to marry close relatives.

Note that 5:3, which states Allah’s lower limit in terms of food taboos, is immediately followed by the announcement that:

This day have I perfected your religion for you and completed My favour unto you, and have chosen for you as religion al-isl§m. (Al-M§“ida 5:3)

This implies that 5:3 is Allah’s last revelation as far as His legislation of limits is concerned. It is chronologically, therefore, the last verse of MuÈammad’s (ß) messengerhood and thus of the umm al-kit§b. And yet, it is not the last verse of the entire Book as far as the whole al-mußÈaf is concerned because it also includes the verses of al-qur”§n.

C. The regulations concerning debt:

O you who believe! When you deal with each other, in transactions involving future obligations in a fixed period of time, reduce them to writing. Let a scribe write down faithfully as between the parties: let not the scribe refuse to write as God has taught him, so let him write. Let him who incurs the liability dictate, but let him fear His Lord, and not diminish aught of what he owes. If the party liable is mentally deficient, or weak, or unable himself to dictate, let his guardian dictate faithfully, and get two witnesses, out of your own men, and if there are not two men, then a man and two women, such as you choose, for witnesses, so that if one of them errs, the other can remind her. The witnesses should not refuse when they are called on (for evidence). Disdain not to reduce to writing (your contract) for a future period, whether it be small or big: it is juster in the sight of God, more suitable as evidence, and more convenient to prevent doubts among yourselves but if it be a transaction which you carry out on the spot among yourselves, there is no blame on you if you reduce it not to writing. But take witness whenever you make a commercial contract, and let neither scribe nor witness suffer harm. If you do (such harm) it would be wickedness in you. So fear God; for it is God that teaches you. And God is well acquainted with all things. (Al-Baqara 2:282)

If you are on a journey, and cannot find a scribe, a pledge with possession (may serve the purpose). And if one of you deposits a thing on trust with another let the trustee (faithfully) discharge his trust, and let him fear his Lord. Conceal not evidence; for whoever conceals it, his heart is tainted with sin. And God knows all that you do. (A l-Baqara 2:283)

In verses 282–83 of al-Baqara, Allah stipulated the lowest limit for what can be accepted as a valid contract. Since no upper limit has been set further regulations might be added that reflect the changing nature of financial contracts and the ever evolving rules of society's commercial markets.[235] Note that the minimal requirement of 'one man or two women' only refers to an oral contract ('so that if one of them errs, the other can remind her…'). If two women must appear in person to witness the 'signing' (or sealing) of a contract, it is because the contract is only expressed orally, and not in writing. However, if such contract is produced in written form, the testimony of two females is no longer necessary. In this case, the minimum of 'one man or one woman' is all that is required. We reject all sexist interpretations that explain double female testimony as proof of women's inferiority and an indication of their incompetence in commercial affairs.

D. Women's dress:

And say to the believing women that they should lower their gaze and guard their [lower] private parts [furåjahunna]; that they should not display their [hidden] beauty [zÊnatahunna] except what [visibly of her beauty] appear thereof; that they should draw their veils over their [upper] private parts [juyåbihinna] and not display their [hidden] beauty [zÊnatahunna] except to their husbands, their fathers, their husband's fathers, their sons, their husbands' sons, their brothers or their brothers' sons, or their sisters' sons, or [what follows] next in line [nis§“ihinna], or the [temporary partner] whom their right hands possess, or male [persons] free of physical needs, or small children who have no sense of the shame of sex; and that they should not strike their feet in order to draw attention to their hidden [beauty] [zÊnatihinna]. O you believers! Turn you all together towards God, that you may attain bliss. (Al-Når 24:31)[236]

In stipulating the rules of how women are required to cover their body, the Book merely provides us with a lower limit. The reason why only a lower limit is stated and what exactly this implies will be explained in detail in chapter 5. Suffice it to say here that 4:31 allows, under certain circumstances, to transgress the lower limit of 24:31, which is similar to the case of contingent food taboos in Surat al-An#§m. It is however different, as we mentioned above, from the absolute rule that one must not ignore the limits of marital partners as provided in Sårat al-Baqara.

2. Upper limit

A. The punishment of theft:

As to the thief, male or female, cut off [sic][237] [fa-aqta#å] his or her hands [aidiyahum§]: a punishment by way of example [nak§l[an]], from God, for their crime—God is exalted in power. But if the thief repents after his crime, and amends his conduct, God turns to him in forgiveness; for God is oft-forgiving, most merciful. (Al-M§“ida 5:38–39)

Common wisdom has it that Islam is a harsh religion that forbids leniency in cases of theft and demands extreme cruelty against any convicted thief. The truth is that the two verses of Sårat al-M§“ida reflect the flexible character of Islamic legislation that encourages us to mitigate every single case of theft and thus disproves the unmediated application of harsh penalties. Most civilizations in the world possess legal systems in which a process of mitigation is a normal procedure. Mitigation means that judges move—by way of deciding each case differently and on its own merits—between the limits that Allah has set. It shows that the proposed type of a lex liminalis is a universal, human, and civil form of legislation.

The central clue to the existence of a law of limits in verse 38 is given in the accusative noun nak§l[an], which translates as ‘exemplary punishment’ or ‘punishment as a deterrent’. Allah has set a condition by which the thief’s hand shall be cut off: its aim should be a warning so that the crime will not be repeated. This means that the punishment has a sociopedagogic function; it is not a merciless revenge of a crime. As such, it can only be exercised in the most extreme cases of theft; it is the upper limit of punishments that cannot be transgressed; cutting off the thief’s hand is the most extreme form of exemplary punishment (thus, thieves cannot be executed).

The existence of limits in the theft-verse (representing an upper limit and no lower limit) is reflected in the fact that theft was differently punished in early Islam. The ÈadÊths tell us that even though MuÈammad (ß) applied the Èadd-punishment, that is, he ‘moved’ to the upper limit, #Umar b. al-Khaãã§b, in his capacity as the second caliph, avoided the upper limit and used his ijtih§d to circumvent the most severe form of punishment. It is indeed the responsibility of each mujtahid, following the example of #Umar, to determine which type of theft is so severe that it requires the cutting off of hands, and what type does not. The fact that verse 38 does not want us to show mercy and compassion indicates that it discusses only the most extreme forms of theft, while for normal types of theft we are required to show mercy. In normal cases of theft the rationale for a punishment is to prevent its repetition, and this can be done in different ways, such that one does not have to come near the upper limit (amputation).

The verb used for ‘to cut off’ is the Arabic term q-t-# which, as the dictionary of Ibn a l-F§ris shows, has more meanings than the physical amputation of hands. In phrases like ‘to cut a corner’, ‘to cut a long story short’, ‘to cut off a relationship, or ‘to cut down expenses’, the verb ‘to cut’ is used both literally and metaphorically; and it does not always require a knife or a sword to cut something off. In addition to the root meaning of ‘to separate’ or ‘to set apart’, q-t-# can also acquire completely different connotations in the Arabic language, for example, ‘to sell’, ‘to save’, or ‘to suffocate’. The word is so polysemic that it beggars belief how often ‘to cut off’ is simply understood as ‘amputation’ (for which, incidentally, the Arabic language has an entirely different term, which is al-batr). The common understanding that q-t-# means ‘to cut off’ the left hand of a thief (bizarrely not his right hand!), contradicts the above quoted verse, which clearly uses the plural ‘hands’: (‘his or her hands [aidiyahum§]’), indicating that the best way to keep a thief’s hands(!) off society is to send him or her to prison. Surely, to cut off both hands of a thief would be a barbarity that not even the most scrupulous fuqah§” have ever contemplated.

A clear mistake by the jurists was to associate q-t-# with a complete amputation of the entire (one) hand. However, other verses of the Book, in which q-t-# of hands is discussed, prove that alternative readings are possible. In verse 31 of Sårat Yåsuf we hear, for example, of women who accidentally cut their hands after they became ecstatic over the beauty of Joseph’s face:

When she heard of their malicious talk, she sent for them [women of the city] and prepared a banquet for them: she gave each of them a knife. And she said (to Joseph), “Come out before them.” When they saw him, they did extol him, and (in their amazement) cut their hands [qaãa#na aidiyahunna]: they said, “God preserve us! No mortal is this! This is none other than a noble angel!” (Yåsuf 12:31)

Note that in this situation the women were already equipped with knives, provided by Potifar’s wife, the host of the banquet, which they used in order to peel the fruit served at the buffet. And yet, when, in their amazement, they ‘cut their hands’ they did not ‘cut their hands completely off ’, but only caused some minor cuts that certainly must have hurt but did not mean a loss of their hands.

Other verses support our thesis that the term q-t-# does not necessarily mean the amputation of a part of the body. Verse 49 of Sårat a l-Shu#ar§”, for example, in which Pharaoh is depicted as threatening his court magicians with severe corporal punishment, makes it logically and anatomically inconceivable to understand the term as ‘to cut off’:

Said (Pharaoh): “You believe in Him before I give you permission? Surely he [Moses] is your leader, who has taught you sorcery! But soon shall you know! “Be sure I will cut off [sic][238] [la-uqaãã i#ann[a]] your hands and your feet on opposite sides, and I will cause you all to die on the cross!” (Al-Shu#ar§” 26:49)

The conjunction ‘and’ used to connect the threat of a cut to their hands and death on the cross, indicates that the Pharaoh envisaged both punishments, in succession, for the wicked sorcerers. But a crucifixion after an amputation of both hands and feet is practically impossible to execute. Hence, the threat ‘to cut your hands’ (la-uqaãã i#ann[a] aidiyakum), preceding the threat of crucifixion, cannot possibly be interpreted as a threat of amputation. This is different from verse 33 of Sårat a l-M§“ida in which not ‘and’ but the conjunction ‘or’ is used which, because of possible alternative punishments, allows the verb q-t-# to be understood as ‘to cut off their hands’:

The punishment of those who wage war against God and His Apostle, and strive with might and main for mischief through the land is: execution, or crucifixion, or the cutting off [au nuqaãã a#[a]] of hands and feet from opposite sides, or exile from the land… (Al-M§“ida 5:33)

Other verses suggest even more different renderings of q-t-#, such as ‘to cut across’:

Nor could they spend anything (for the cause)—small or great—nor cut across [yaqãa#ån[a]] a valley, but the deed is inscribed to their credit… (Al-Tawba 9:121) Or ‘to sunder’:

Those who break God’s covenant after it is ratified, and who sunder [yaqãa#ån[a]] what God has ordered to be joined, and do mischief on earth… (Al-Baqara 2:27) Or ‘to wipe out’:

Of the wrong-doers the last remnant was cut off [quãi#[a]]. Praise be to God, the cherisher of the worlds. (Al-An#§m 6:45) Or ‘to break ties’:

Then, is it to be expected of you, if you were put in authority, that you will do mischief in the land, and break your ties [tuqaããi#å] of kith and kin? (MuÈammad 47:22) Or ‘to divide’:

We divided them [qaããa#an§hum] into twelve tribes or nations… (A l-A#r§f 7:160)

In light of these semantic variants of q-t-#, we conclude that the expression ‘to cut the thief’s hand’ cannot be interpreted as ‘amputation by knife or sword’. Instead, we must consider alternative forms of punishments, such as imprisonment, which equally deters convicted thieves to ‘put their hands’ on items that they might steal. Imprisonment also allows society to release fully rehabilitated criminals back into society unharmed, thus fulfilling God’s command to forgive and show mercy in the face of a thief’s repentance and remorse:

But if the thief repents after his crime, and amends his conduct, God turns to him in forgiveness; for God is oft-forgiving, most merciful. (Al-M§“ida 5:39)

Unlike a merciless, indiscriminate revenge for theft by corporal punishment, the possibility of imprisonment permits judges to impose different penalties that take the seriousness of each act of theft into consideration. In serious cases, such as stealing intelligence through espionage or embezzling money on the corporate or state level, the judge might interpret this as a serious threat to national security and our economy and impose the maximum sentence (analogous to the penalty for ‘corruption in the land’, see further below). But if the theft is of a much smaller scale, a lesser sentence will be more appropriate, and convicted criminals could be released from prison on parole if they no longer pose a threat to their community and society as a whole. None of this flexibility is, however, possible if sentences stipulate an indiscriminate amputation of the thief’s hand, regardless of how serious the crime is and regardless of the circumstances in which it takes place. It has become the norm in most legal systems today that one should not go to the extreme and cut off the thief’s hand. Given that, in referring to a thief, the Book always uses the active participle s§riq (‘the one who steals’), referring to someone who is still actively engaged in criminal activities in contrast to someone who has profoundly repented of his crime, we should seriously reconsider our current understanding of theft and adopt a more flexible stance towards it (which, we believe, a well-organised prison system can clearly provide).

B. The punishment for ‘corruption in the land’ and ‘war against God’:

Those who wage war [yuÈ§ribån] against God and His Messenger and strive to spread corruption in the land [yas#aun[a] fi’l-“ar· fas§d[an]] should be punished by death, crucifixion, the amputation of an alternate hand and foot, or banishment from the land… (Al-M§“ida 5:33)

Except for those who repent before they fall into your power: in that case, know that God is oft-forgiving, most merciful. (Al-M§“ida 5:34)

Clearly, Allah provides us with the most extreme forms of punishment that determine the upper limit of what judges can impose on the enemies of God and His Messenger. But in light of what we said in chapter 1, that we must not criminalise those ‘who cut off their ties with God’, as they enjoy their human right to do so, we cannot interpret the phrase ‘those who wage war against God and His Messenger’ as a reference to atheists and freethinkers, and ‘corruption in the land’ is not a reference to peaceful opposition to despotic regimes or, for that matter, to any political authority. Instead, those who wage war against God are those who disrespect freedom of opinion, freedom of expression, and freedom of religion, while ‘corruption in the land’ is a reference to the corruptive practices in the political administrations of this world, to vandalism and antisocial behaviour by thugs and street gangs, and to the pollution of the environment by irresponsible big business tycoons.

Note, however, that He also provides several options, and it is up to the mujtahids to decide, in the concrete historical context, which penalty is the most appropriate for each crime. Note also that in 5:34, following the list of possible punishments in 5:33, God wants to open the ‘gate of forgiveness’ by stressing the possibility of repentance for the sinners ‘before they fall into your power’. Such a condition implies that the sinner’s repentance should occur before any arrest or other forms of intimidation (e.g., torture) take place, allowing time and opportunity for forgiveness on the part of those who prosecute the offender. Since there are three types of punishment mentioned in the verse it indicates that God leaves the decision to human legislators, and since imprisonment is currently the most applied form of punishment, we should accept this as the most sensible way to punish criminals. It is not a sin to stay below the application of the upper limit. Only in the most severe cases of ‘war against God’ and ‘corruption in the lands’ should judges consider the application of the upper limit.

C. Homicide and physical harm:

Nor take life—which God has made sacred—except for just cause. And if anyone is slain wrongfully, we have given his heir authority (to demand qiß§ß or to forgive): but let him not exceed bounds in the matter of taking life; for he is helped (by the law). (Al-Isr§” 17:33)

O you who believe! The law of equality is prescribed to you in cases of murder: the free for the free, the slave for the slave, the woman for the woman. But if any remission is made by the brother of the slain then grant any reasonable demand and compensate him with handsome gratitude; this is a concession and a mercy from your Lord. After this whoever exceeds the limits shall be in grave penalty. (Al-Baqara 2:178)

Once again, the Book only mentions the upper limit: the most extreme punishment for taking a human life. Verse 33 of Sårat al-Isr§” refers to the punishment of ‘wrongful killing’, defined as an unjust act of unprovoked aggression and disproportionate brutality, but warns ‘not to exceed bounds in this matter’. It is thus forbidden to punish, in addition to the killer, his or her family, clan, and tribe, since excessive, revengeful punishment violates the principle of lex talionis and means that those who impose a penalty have overstepped the upper limit. Mujtahids will be required to clarify the degree of aggression, brutality, and premeditation that would justify the maximum penalty (death), and to distinguish this type of murder from unintentional killing or killing in self-defence for which life-long imprisonment might be the most appropriate punishment.[239]

We notice again the possibility of repentance that is built into verse 178 of Sårat al-Baqara: ‘but if any remission is made by the brother of the slain, then grant any reasonable demand, and compensate him with handsome gratitude’. As for the crime of killing a person by mistake, several different punitive actions are possible, depending on the social, ethnic, and geographical identity of the victim. Verse 92 of Sårat al-Nis§” mentions a lower limit, consisting of ‘a fast for two consecutive months’ or the ‘freeing of a slave’, but one may free more than just one slave (or the equivalent of money through personal accident insurance policies):

Never should a believer kill a believer; but (if it so happens) by mistake, (compensation is due): If one (so) kills a believer, it is ordained that he should free a believing slave, and pay compensation to the deceased’s family, unless they remit it freely. If the deceased belonged to a people at war with you, and he was a believer, the freeing of a believing slave (is enough). If he belonged to a people with whom you have treaty of mutual alliance, compensation should be paid to his family, and a believing slave be freed. For those who find this beyond their means, (is prescribed) a fast for two months running: by way of repentance to God: for God has all knowledge and all wisdom. (Al-Nis§” 4:92)

Two types of penalties should be distinguished: the first is with regard to the family of the victim, to which the convicted killer must pay a certain amount of ‘blood money’. The second is with regard to the killer himself, whose atonement must consist of freeing a slave or, if he or she cannot afford this, of fasting for two consecutive months. Note that ‘freeing a slave’ has a wider meaning and does not just mean slavery in the conventional sense. It encompasses all forms of (modern) slavery. If a convicted killer liberates someone from the bondage of his or her financial debts, this would be accepted as a modern equivalent to ‘freeing a slave’. This idea is supported by verse 60 of Sårat al-Tawba, which identifies ‘those in slavery’ as those who receive charity (a l-ßadaqa),[240] and verse 177 of Sårat a l-Baqara which mentions financial help for the ‘enslaved’ even before it mentions the duties of prayer and zak§h.[241] In sum, the lower limit of atonement is freeing at least one ‘financially enslaved person’. If one can afford it, one should release more than one. If one cannot afford to free even one, a two-month fast is the absolute minimum for the reparation of the crime.

D. Public homosexual activities (al-faÈsha)

I. Female homosexuality in public:

If any of your women are guilty of lewdness (al-f§Èisha),[242] take the evidence of four (reliable) witnesses from amongst you against them. And if they testify confine them to houses until death do claim them, or God ordain for them some (other) way. (Al-Nis§” 4:15)

The upper limit for punishing homosexual activities between two women in public is their confinement to the house. Their crime is not the homosexual activity as such but the illicit performance of a sexual intercourse in public. The Book is silent about homosexual relationships in people’s private sphere. However, homosexual intercourse in public will be prosecuted, for which the verse demands four (reliable) witnesses ‘from amongst you’ (masculine plural), that is from the general passer-by. No penalty can be inflicted if a witness is from their own kind: the text clearly says minkum, not minhunna (from among the homosexual women). This implies that, for example, a public ‘coming out’ of a woman who confesses to be lesbian would not count as proper testimony. In any case, since homosexual feelings and desires are not sinful but the public act of intercourse is, lesbian women can enter into a romantic relationship as long as they avoid sexual acts in public. Even if they are caught in public, the verse mentions an alternative punishment to confinement to the house: ‘or God ordain for them some (other) way’. It should be considered that Allah calls here for a much lighter form of punishment. Who are we to think that we can afford to ignore a hint from God for more lenience in such serious matters!

II. Male homosexuality in public:

If two men among you are guilty [of it], punish them both. If they repent and amend leave them alone; for God is oft-returning, most merciful. (Al-Nis§” 4:16)

In the case of homosexual intercourse between two males in public, punishment can be immediately inflicted without the need to call for witnesses. And yet, we should not forget that we can forgive the sinner because God has suggested this possibility in the very same verse. If, however, the path of forgiveness is blocked (because homosexual activities continue publicly) we should not hesitate to inflict punishments that cause pain. Strictly speaking, all kinds of pain, short of death, are allowed because this constitutes the upper limit of punishment for male homosexual intercourse in public.[243] Homosexual relationships in private are of no concern for Muslim legislators as long as they are based on consensual activities that avoid bestiality, debauchery, and orgylike excesses.

3. Conjoined upper and lower limits

This third type, conjoined upper and lower limits, is exemplified in the law of inheritance, which will be explored in detail in the next chapter. The main aim will be to demonstrate that Islamic inheritance law does not just prescribe one formula for distributing the inheritance but consists of several different options that depend on the number, sex, and the nature of the relationship between those who survive the deceased, for example, whether one has to consider the existence of parents, grandparents, and grandchildren or not. It will also be shown that the inheritance law which has been traditionally applied has had enormous repercussions on the manner in which the political system has functioned, basically since the seventh century. A reform of these inheritance procedures will therefore have a direct impact on the way state and government operate in the ArabMuslim world.

4. Meeting of upper und lower limits at one point – Unchasteness (zin§):

The woman and the man guilty of adultery or fornication: flog each of them with a hundred stripes; let not compassion move you in their case, in a matter prescribed by God, if you believe in God and the Last Day: and let a party of the believers witness their punishment. (Al-Når 24:2)

Let no man guilty of adultery or fornication marry but a woman similarly guilty, or an unbeliever: nor let any but such a man or an unbeliever marry such a woman: to the believers such a thing is forbidden. (Al-Når 24:3)

This fourth type refers to injunctions whose punitive measures are unambiguous. They exhibit absolute norms of how to punish for a crime. In the case of zin§ (illicit sexual relations in either fornication or adultery), for example, to ‘flog each of them with a hundred stripes’ is a fixed penalty that combines both upper and lower limits. It should neither be less nor more than one hundred stripes, and no compassion shall ‘move you in their case’. The other instance in which it is not permitted to even come near the prescribed limit (‘do not come near’, 2:187) is Allah’s command to stop eating and drinking during Ramadan as soon as ‘the white thread of dawn becomes distinct from the black’. This has been regarded as so important that a special call from the minaret warns people not to overstep this time limit; if they do their fast will become invalid and this will incur God’s punishment.

Allah does not, however, impose such extreme penalties unconditionally. We hear in verses 4 to 10 of Sårat al-Når that no less than four witnesses are required to support the allegation of adultery. We also hear that ‘the curse of God’ will be evoked if these allegations turn out to be unfounded:

And those who launch a charge against chaste women, and produce not four witnesses (to support their allegations), flog them with eighty stripes and reject their evidence ever after; for such men are wicked transgressors. Unless they repent thereafter and mend (their conduct); for God is oft-forgiving, most merciful. And for those who launch a charge against their spouses, and have (in support) no evidence but their own, their solitary evidence (can be received) if they bear witness four times (with an oath) by God that they are solemnly telling the truth. And the fifth (oath) (should be) that they solemnly invoke the curse of God on themselves if they tell a lie. But it would avert the punishment from the wife, if she bears witness four times (with an oath) by God that (her husband) is telling a lie. And the fifth (oath) should be that she solemnly invokes the wrath of God on herself if (her accuser) is telling the truth. If it were not for God’s grace and mercy on you, and that God is oft-returning, full of wisdom—(you would be ruined indeed). (Al-Når 24:4–10)

It is remarkable to read how strictly Allah regulates the witnessing of unchaste activities. In requiring four truthful witnesses or a sacred oath from either husband or wife, Allah’s sense of justice is supreme: If God had not made it very hard to accuse someone of adultery we would see hundreds of baseless accusations on a daily basis, wild insinuations made purely out of menace, jealousy, envy, or feelings of frustration and disappointment by being rejected by the accused. Without Allah’s binding conditions for any accusation of adultery, men and women would simply be too frightened to be seen together, girls and boys would be too scared to talk and sit with the opposite sex, and the possibility of platonic friendship between men and women would be too risky to even contemplate. In His justice, Allah not only imposed a very harsh penalty, leaving no room for either mitigation or mercy, He also provided a system of ‘double-checks’ that aims at counterbalancing the harshness of the imposed penalties and at preventing abuse by overzealous bigots.[244]

5. Lower and upper limits remain untouched by curvature

The fifth type contains the movement of curvature between the lower and upper limits by which neither of the two are touched. This movement of curvature is, for example, present in sexual relations between men and women. Beginning with a point above the lower limit, where men and women do not yet have any physical contact, the curvature moves upward in the direction of the upper limit and stops close to committing zin§. The lower limit (no relationship) and the upper limit (zin§) remain untouched by this relationship. If, however, a couple is legally married, it is permitted to cross the upper limit since their (licit) sexual intercourse will not count as zin§ (here: adultery). Thus type four will not apply here. In this case, to step over the upper limit is justified, similar to the case of (pardonable) killing in self-defence or manslaughter through culpable negligence. Types 4 and 5 are therefore interrelated because if, for example, a nonmarried couple is sexually active, their curvature illegitimately touches the upper limit, that is, zin§ (here: fornication), while the sexual intercourse of a married couple does not count as zin§ but as a legitimate touching of the upper limit as in type five.

6. Curvature movement between a positive upper limit and a negative lower limit

The sixth type represents the curvature movement between a positive upper limit and a negative lower limit. We often see this with financial transactions: if interest is levied the lower limit is reached; if, however, alms tax (zak§h) is paid the curvature moves towards the upper limit. In between, there is a level of payment that can be defined as point zero. An example of this neutral stage (neither positive nor negative) is an interest-free loan. Hence, fiscal transactions in a given society move, by responding to the economic and social needs, between the two extremes of a) payments of taxes and charity money to b) giving loans with interest, while a middle position is reached if c) interest-free loans are provided.

If we take the root meaning of r-b-w, the Arabic term for ‘interest’, we notice that it means ‘growth or increase’, an expansion of wealth by ‘adding up’ or ‘piling up’. In words such as rabiyya or rubwa (‘hill’), derived from the same root, we discover similar semantic connotations. Let us look at verses that mention the term al-rib§:

Those who devour usury [al-rib§] will not stand except as stand one whom the evil one by his touch has driven to madness. That is because they say: “Trade is like usury [al-rib§],” but God has permitted trade and forbidden usury [a l-rib§]. Those who, after receiving direction from their Lord, desist shall be pardoned for the past. Their case is for God (to judge), but those who repeat (the offence) are companions of the Fire: they will abide therein (for ever). (Al-Baqara 2:275)

God will deprive usury [al-rib§] of all blessing, but will give increase for deeds of charity; for He loves not creatures ungrateful and wicked.

(Al-Baqara 2:276)

O you who believe! Fear God and give up what remains of your demand for usury [al-rib§], if you are indeed believers. (A l-Baqara 2:278)

If the debtor is in a difficulty, grant him time till it is easy for him to repay. But if you remit it by way of charity, that is best for you if you only knew. (Al-Baqara 2:280)

O you who believe! Devour not usury [a l-rib§], doubled and multiplied; but fear God that you may (really) prosper. ($l #lmr§n 3:130) That which you lay out for increase [al-rib§] through the property of (other) people, will have no increase with God. But that which you lay out for charity, seeking the countenance of God, (will increase): it is these who will get a recompense multiplied. (Al-Råm 30:39)

O you who believe! Eat not up your property among yourselves in vanities. But let there be amongst you traffic and trade by mutual good-will. Nor kill (or destroy) yourselves; for verily God has been to you most merciful! (Al-Nis§” 4:29)[245]

From this list of verses we are able to discern four different types of ‘interest’:

A. Interest on ßadaqa

God will deprive usury of all blessing, but will give increase for deeds of charity; for He loves not creatures ungrateful and wicked. (Al-Baqara 2:276)

B. Interest on zak§h

That which you lay out for increase through the property of (other) people, will have no increase with God. But that which you lay out for charity, seeking the countenance of God, (will increase): it is these who will get a recompense multiplied. (Al-Råm 30:39)

C. An upper limit for acceptable interest

O you who believe! Devour not usury, doubled and multiplied; but fear God that you may (really) prosper. ($l #Imr§n 3:130)

D. A point zero

If you do it not, take notice of war from God and His apostle. But if you turn back you shall have your capital sums. Deal not unjustly and you shall not be dealt with unjustly. (Al-Baqara 2:279)

Based on verses from the Book we propose a flexible banking system which can incorporate, if need be, interest on loans provided that the limits set by Allah are observed, but which can also prevent interest being charged at an exorbitant rate (usury). Our proposal is based on the belief that the Book does not categorically and unconditionally prohibit the charging of interest, and we do not follow either MuÈammad's (ß) or #Umar b. al-Khaãã§b's conclusive veto against it.[246] Instead, we maintain that the three possible ways of money transfer within a society correspond to the movement, suggested above, between an upper and a lower limit.

1. Zak§h:

This is a special type of charity since it is defined as an alms tax for the benefit of the poor and handicapped who are adherents of MuÈammad (ß): Muslim-Believers. It corresponds to the absolute minimum of money transfer, a lower limit of ßadaqa (fixed as 2.5 percent of supraincome) that cannot be reduced.

2. 'adaqa:

This is a general type of charity, called ßadaqat al-isl§m, whose recipients are the poor and handicapped, whether they believe in MuÈammad's (ß) message or not. There exists no upper limit and each contribution is voluntary. The lower limit of ßadaqa is the payment of zak§h. There are therefore two different kinds of ßadaqa:

I. General ßadaqa for everyone:

It is not righteousness that you turn your faces towards East or West. But it is righteousness to believe in God and the Last Day, and the angels, and the Book, and the messengers; to spend of your substance [‘at§ al-m§l], out of love for Him, for your [dhawÊ ’l-qurba], for the [yat§mÊ], for the [al-mas§kÊn], for the [ibn al-sabÊl], for those who are [a l-sa”ilÊn], and for those [fi’l-riq§b]; to be steadfast in prayer, and practice regular charity [zak§h]; to fulfil the contracts which you have made; and to be firm and patient, in pain (or suffering) and adversity, and throughout all periods of panic. Such are the people of truth, the God-fearing. (A l-Baqara 2:177)

II. Specific ßadaqa for the Muslim-Believers (paid as zak§h):

Alms [ßadaq§t] are for the [fuqar§”] and the [mas§kÊn], and those who are [al-#§milÊn #alaih§]; for those who are [al-mu”allafa qulåbuhum]; for those [fi’l-riq§b] and [al-gh§rimÊn]; [fÊ sabÊl All§h]; and for the [ibn al-sabÊl]. (Thus is it) ordained by God, and God is full of knowledge and wisdom. (Al-Tawba 9:60)

In verse 177 of Sårat a l-Baqara we hear about six types of people who are recipients of charity money: 1) dhawå ’l-qurba: friends and acquaintances who are not blood related (because blood relatives would be ålå ’l-qurba);[247] 2) a l-yat§mÊ: orphans; 3) a l-mas§kÊn: handicapped people, those whose body functions are paralysed or ‘still’ (sakana); 4) ibn al-sabÊl: people on a journey who are stranded because of mishaps such as robbery or a car accident; 5) al-s§“ilÊn: people in need as a result of natural disasters such as floods, earthquakes, famines, or hurricanes; 6) fi’l-riq§b: those, as defined earlier, who are indebted without a chance to pay off their debts.

If we read the verse farther down we see that ‘regular alms-tax’ (zak§h) is mentioned separately, and we know why, because this is a special tax of the Muslim-Believers and an exclusive pillar of al-Êm§n. Charity money, as mentioned first in the verse, is, however, part of al-isl§m and given to people in need, needless of their religious affiliation. Verse 60 of Sårat al-Tawba even mentions eight types of recipients: 1) a l-fuqar§”: the poor, 2) a l-mas§kÊn: the handicapped,[248] 3) al-#§milÊn #alaih§: those who administer the zak§h tax, 4) al-mu”allafa qulåbuhum: people whose work has a positive impact on public life, 5) fi’l-riq§b: the financially enslaved, 6) a l-gh§rimån: people in debt and imprisoned because of their insolvency, 7) fÊ sabÊl All§h: donations ‘in God’s way’ to sponsor the foundation of universities, schools, hospitals, and 8) ibn al-sabÊl: travellers in need of assistance.

These eight types of recipients are entitled to charity from within al-Êm§n, that is, they are the recipients of zak§h, the lowest type or minimal amount of ßadaqa. Three types of recipients are mentioned in both såras: a) travellers in need of help, b) the handicapped, and c) the financially enslaved, implying that these people are entitled to charity regardless of their religious affiliation.

In contrast, three types in the first såra are not mentioned in the second såra and will therefore not receive money through zak§t al-Êm§n: a) orphans, b) acquaintances, and c) people in need because of natural catastrophes. That leaves us with five types of recipients who receive alms by virtue of their religious affiliation to MuÈammad (ß) and a l-Êm§n: a) the poor, b) the zak§h administrators, c) people who improve public life, d) people imprisoned because of their debts, and e) those who sponsor institutions of public health and education.

3. Loans:

Zak§h and ßadaq§t are for those who cannot repay their debts. We cannot expect any return for what we donate to them. O thers, however, can repay their debts but without having accrued interest. They would receive an interest-free loan which defines a financial transaction being at point zero:

If you do it not, take notice of war from God and His apostle. But if you turn back you shall have your capital sums [ru”s amw§likum].

Deal not unjustly and you shall not be dealt with unjustly. (Al-Baqara 2:279)

If people are wealthy enough to repay the borrowed money with interest (e.g., people working in industry, agriculture, the financial and service sectors, and such, in short the great majority of s ociety), one should not, as verse 130 of Sårat $l #Imr§n demands, asks for more than 100 percent interest of the original loan, that is, at maximum twice the borrowed sum, regardless of how long it takes to repay the debts:

O you who believe! Devour not usury, doubled and multiplied; but fear God that you may (really) prosper. ($l #Imr§n 3:130) Finally, why does verse 275 contain the following clause?

…but God has permitted trade and forbidden usury (Al-Baqara 2:275)

The answer is given in verse 276 that immediately follows:

God will deprive usury of all blessing, but will give increase for deeds of charity; for He loves not creatures ungrateful and wicked. (Al-Baqara 2:276)

We understand that 2:276 prohibits the payment of interest on money given in charity but allows recipients of charity to earn income through trade. In 2:275, Allah thus ‘permitted trade’ for recipients of charity but forbade charging interest on the money they receive through charity. In other words, while profit through trade is allowed, profit through charity is forbidden. It must not be understood, as can frequently be heard, that, through 2:275, Allah has allowed all types of trade while forbidden all types of interest. Such an unqualified statement would imply that, before Allah’s revelation concerning trade and interests all trade was forbidden and all types of interest were allowed which would, of course, be historically untrue and economically absurd. Instead, Allah wanted to clarify the position of the recipients of charity.

If He had not allowed people to trade with profit we would be in a grotesque situation in which every businessman ought to check whether his trade partners are entitled to charity or not; if so, the partnership would have to cease immediately. In order to avoid such chaotic and counterproductive trade arrangements and to separate trade from charity, verse 2:275 was revealed. This had a huge impact on society since it allowed welfare organisations, hospitals, charity banks, mental institutions, old people’s homes, and such to receive charity money regardless of their commercial and financial activities. If we look at the existing fiscal arrangements in most countries of the world we see how it corresponds best to the human disposition

(al-fiãra).

We conclude this chapter by discussing the main differences between our proposed theory of limits and conventional fiqh jurisprudence:

1. We do not treat the legal verses of the Book as codified law but as signposts or ethic al-legal markers that Allah asked human beings not to overstep. Traditional fiqh jurisprudence has regarded the legal verses as absolute law which allowed neither mitigation nor adaptation to changing social and cultural circumstances. Our theory of limits aims to regain the flexibility and elasticity in human legislation that was originally built into the divine text but which was removed by an overly rigid system of fiqh jurisprudence.

2. We re-emphasise the high degree of universality in Islamic legislation that is implicit in Allah's revelation. Traditional jurisprudence has sacrificed this universality in favour of very narrow cultural and nationalist agendas that reflect particular political interests more than they do the universal ethical message of the Book. We propose to disentangle Islamic legislation from the narrow cultural perspective of seventh-century Arabia and to replace it with a universal perspective which allows cultural diversity beyond the specific legal parameters on the ancient Arabian Peninsula.

3. We treat the sunna of MuÈammad (ß) as a model of good legal practice in the theory of limits, not as the ultimate specification and binding exemplification of Islamic law. Traditional jurists imprisoned the universal message of a l-isl§m too rigidly by their legal injunctions derived from MuÈammad's (ß) sunna, thereby mixing al-isl§m with the more specific and much narrower concept of al-Êm§n. We suggest to regard the sunna as an exemplary method of how to cope with the challenges and legal conflicts that MuÈammad (ß) faced in his time and of how to emulate his methods and apply them with our methodology (minh§j) to a system of law by which we are able to face the challenges of our modern times.

4. We dispense with 'analogy' (qiy§s) as a source of law as a consequence of our quest for universality in Islamic legislation. Traditional jurisprudence is inhibited by this method which has locked generations of jurists firmly inside the legal and intellectual horizon of seventh-century Arabia. The theory of limits functions perfectly well without analogies, which allows mujtahids to be firmly rooted in their contemporary context and to substitute comparisons to early Islam with references to the latest results of scientific research. This also allows them to correlate Islamic legislation with the epistemological progress in the sciences.[249]

5. We base the theory of limits on the belief that MuÈammad’s (ß) message (a l-ris§la) is the last message sent by Allah to human beings. No other new revelation will ever replace MuÈammad’s (ß) message, unlike previous revelations that were meant to be replaced entirely. For this reason MuÈammad’s (ß) message was not formulated as a final expression of law but in a way that permits a further evolution of law for millions of years until the coming of the Last Day. Unforgivably, traditional jurisprudence has regarded MuÈammad’s (ß) message in exactly the same way as previous messengerhoods and treated its law as absolute, certain, and definitive. This is a fatal mistake because it has regretfully negated the real essence of MuÈammad’s (ß) message as the last and final revelation which is, by legal and historical logic, at odds with absoluteness and comprehensiveness.

6. We take seriously the changes in cultural and social patterns of human behaviour and adopt them with our theory of limits. We compare human legislation with a football field where players are allowed to move freely and to use the entire space available. Traditional jurists have been so frightened of unexpected moves and unpredictable developments that they interpreted the rules of the game in such a rigid way that players were only allowed to move on the sidelines of the field which, inevitably, led to a complete paralysis of the game. Put in legal terms, we would allow flexibility in moving across the entire field of legislation, encouraging creative moves that lead to great sociocultural diversity in regulating marriage, divorce, inheritance, theft, murder, adultery, polygamy, dress codes, and so on, provided that legislators and mujtahids always stay strictly within the limits that Allah has laid out in the Book.

7. We distinguish between three branches (furå#) of MuÈammad’s (ß) message, of which only one allows the practice of ijtih§d. Ijtih§d will never be allowed in the sphere of rituals, since alterations will be rejected as harmful and illegitimate innovations (bid#a). The same is true for ethics and moral ideals, since the divine condemnation of hatred, greed, dishonesty, gluttony, and such must never be modified or changed. In the third branch, that is, the legal sphere, the legislative verses of command (do!) and prohibition (do not!) permit the exercise of ijtih§d. However, traditional fiqh jurisprudence, obsessed with an almost pathological quest for ritual accuracy, has ignored the ethical sphere, blocked ijtih§d in new legislation, and instead dealt with the smallest and most insignificant details of ritual behaviour. Our theory of limits puts the priorities right and allows ijtih§d for all legal verses, whether explicit naßß texts or not, and retrieves the ethical underpinning of Islamic law that it once undoubtedly had.

8. Finally, we believe that the theory of limits functions without the need to resort to abrogations. In our view, the abrogation of legal verses within one and the same messengerhood never took place. If verses were abrogated then this was only between subsequent messengerhoods, for example, between Moses and MuÈammad, as explained earlier. This implies that a new messengerhood could either amend or completely annul an earlier messengerhood or, if no legal provision was given, introduce an entirely new rule. Traditional fiqh has, on the contrary, been based on the acceptance of abrogation within messengerhoods, assuming wrongly that the following two verses support their false views:

None of our revelations do We abrogate or cause to be forgotten, but We substitute something better or similar… (Al-Baqara 2:106) When We substitute one revelation for another…; and God knows best what He reveals (in stages)… (Al-NaÈl 16:101)

We believe that both verses refer only to the abrogation of divine messages (as a whole), not individual sentences of the divine text. This is based on our belief that Allah would not issue contradictive legislation within one and the same messengerhood, whatever the historical situation. We believe in a succession of messages that are naturally replaced by a new revelation. Thus we see ourselves today in a wholly new postprophetic age in which, although formed and shaped by previous messengerhoods, we have matured to such a degree that we can be left alone to sort out legal problems without further divine messages. As we have shown, Allah has urged us unambiguously not to wait for new revelations but to rely on reason in using what we have already been given.

 5. Women and Islamic Law

Since the age of Islamic reformism in the nineteenth century numerous attempts have been made to improve the position of women in Islam by reformulating sharÊ#a law in the light of social change and modern developments. And yet, to our knowledge, not a single study has tried to propose legal reforms by exploring the dialectical relationship between ‘straightness’ and ‘curvature’ in human legislation and by studying this relationship in consideration of the human natural disposition, a l-fiãra. We propose therefore to start our investigation into the possibilities of legal reform with the notion of Allah’s limits, which not only stipulates boundaries (straightness) but also allows human legislation the freedom to move and change (curvature).

We can see three major reasons why previous attempts to radically reevaluate the situation of women in the Arab-Muslim world have failed:

In their study of the ‘mother of the book’ (umm al-kit§b), jurists have failed to distinguish between verses that stipulate Allah’s limits and verses that are purely informative and legally nonbinding (suggesting only good practice). Also, in their study of MuÈammad’s sunna they confused compulsory with optional categories of law. In more general terms they simply overlooked the existence of limits in Islamic legislation. In defence of medieval scholarship we might say that their understanding of Èudåd All§h was bound to be rather primitive and that their scholarship could not significantly improve before the introduction of Isaac Newton’s revolutionary theories, which gave Allah’s limits a solid mathematical underpinning. It was only after the introduction of Newton’s theory of ‘limits’[250] that forthcoming generations of scientists were able to study phenomena in nature and link them to the limits that Allah has set for human societies. However, current Muslim scholarship cannot resort to this excuse. After centuries of progress in the natural and social sciences, we are now able to apply the legal impositions of what is ‘straight’ and what is ‘curved’ in line with what is inherent in nature and the disposition of human beings, thus allowing us to embark on a truly contemporary and enlightened assessment of the situation of women, based on our rereading of the Book.

1. Feminists have failed to envisage a struggle for the liberation and emancipation of women that goes beyond the time of MuÈammad’s life. In their attempt to prove that Islam is not misogynous, Islamic feminists have too often focused solely on how MuÈammad’s mission has liberated women in ancient Arabia, while more or less ignoring the plight of Muslim women ever since. By doing so they have unintentionally suggested that the liberation of women achieved under MuÈammad was the optimum of emancipation possible. And since during MuÈammad’s time women were not working as judges and preachers and since they did not occupy high political positions, this was seen as the maximum amount of women’s liberation that we, today, are not allowed to further extend. This ignores, of course, the fact that the position of women in Arabian society was, just like slavery which initially had to be endorsed, something that did not allow radical changes or, to put it in evolutionary terms, something that did not allow a sudden ‘combustion of entire time periods’. Just as a sudden abolition of slavery would have destroyed the social fabric and the prevalent means of production in ancient Arabian society, a radical repositioning of women’s roles would have undermined the social stability that MuÈammad (ß) so desperately wanted to achieve with his new state.[251] The society which MuÈammad (ß) created was Islam’s first but not only model—Islam’s first fruit, so to speak.

MuÈammad’s (ß) political and legal decisions were deliberately positioned between Allah’s limits and constantly adapted to the spirit of his time: at times he enforced Allah’s limits vigorously, and at other times he allowed old conventions to continue if their practices did not violate Allah’s law. Such conventions, however, prevented women from doing what they would do today because it severely limited the opportunities of women to fulfil public roles. In some areas, however, for example as advisors to political leaders, in community administration, or during military campaigns, the remarkable public positions of #$“isha or Khaula bint al-Azwar[252] demonstrate that the new religion inherited a structural imbalance but did not exclude women from public affairs per se (i.e., only because they were women). One should not forget that the first martyr for the sake of Islam was Sumayya, a woman.[253]

And yet, we must not think that women's emancipation ended with MuÈammad's (ß) reform of ancient Arabian society. What is needed today is to understand his messengerhood and the verses of the 'mother of the book' in their dual capacity to both absorb the prevalent historical conditions of MuÈammad's (ß) time and encompass subsequent developments that allow much greater emancipation. MuÈammad's (ß) reforms were only one small (albeit not insignificant) part of a much wider scheme of women's liberation.

2. Exegetes have failed to correctly identify the meaning of the Arabic term a l-nis§", which has often been too narrowly understood to mean 'women'. The importance of redefining this term is immediately apparent when we look at the following two verses:

Fair in the eyes of men [sic] [li'l-n§s] is the love of things they covet: women [sic][al-nis§"][254] and sons; heaped-up hoards of gold and silver; horses branded (for blood and excellence); and (wealth of) cattle and well-tilled land. Such are the possessions of this world's life, but in nearness to God is the best of the goals (to return to). ($l #Imr§n 3:14)

Your wives [sic][nis§"ukum][255] are as a tilth unto you. So approach your tilth when or how you will, but do some good act for your souls beforehand; and fear God. And know that you are to meet Him (in the Hereafter), and give (these) good tidings to those who believe. (Al-Baqara 2:223)

If we still insist, as generations of exegetes did,[256] that a l-nis§" can only mean 'women' or 'wives' we have entered, hermeneutically and intellectually, a cul-de-sac that cuts us off from a progressive flow of history. In both verses (3:14 and 2:223), if nis§” is rendered as ‘women’, they can only be seen as no more than a commodity for men (‘the possessions of this world’s life’) or a piece of land to be tilled (‘when or how you will’). A first step to avoiding such misogynist renderings is to accept the fact that, in speaking of ‘women’ and ‘men’, Allah uses different terms when He refers to them as: a) biological beings, either male or female, or b) when He refers to them as cultural beings who possess morality, consciousness, and the ability to rationally reflect on their social and cultural environment. Examples are as follows:

That He did create in pairs—male [al-dhakar] and female [al-unth§]. (Al-Najm 53:45)

And of every thing We have created pairs [zawjain]: that you may receive instruction. (Al-Dh§riyy§t 51:49)

O mankind [sic][257]! [Y§ aiyuh§ al-n§s] We created you from a single (pair) of a male [al-dhakar] and a female [al-unth§], and made you into nations and tribes, that you may know each other—not that you may despise (each other). Verily the most honoured of you in the sight of God is (he who is) the most righteous of you… (Al-\ujur§t 49:13)

We have honoured the sons [sic][baniya] of Adam… (Al-Isr§” 17:70)

In the first and second verse Allah speaks about His creation in pairs which include not only men and women but everything that is either male or female, and that includes animals and plants that unlike humans do not possess the capacity to think and reflect. Biologically, women share their sex with other female creatures, by receiving the semen of the male species, by becoming fertilised by the male sperm, by giving birth after a period of pregnancy, and by nursing their progeny. Men are of the opposite sex which they share with any other male creature on the earth. They are the biological partners (zawj) of females with whom they form a relationship of natural correspondence for the purpose of procreation.

In the third and fourth verse, Allah does not speak about males and females but about humans (men and women) who, by having Allah’s spirit breathed into them, are able to think rationally and act consciously. In all those instances in which Allah addresses humans as rational beings the qur”§n starts with the exclamatory ‘O humankind!’, implying that no distinction is made between males and females. In other words, Allah ‘honoured both sons and daughters of Adam’,[258] regardless of their biological status, on the basis of the ‘good deeds’ they perform for the benefit of all humankind. Provided that the right historical circumstances are given, we believe that women are as capable as men to occupy leading positions in state and society. It is our endeavour to completely revise the notion that men are inherently superior to women because women lack rationality or because they are spiritually inferior to men.

Toward a Contemporary Understanding of _{FIQH} for Women

Our aim is to correct these three failures of traditional jurisprudence and to present a truly contemporary understanding of fiqh jurisprudence for women, based on the notion of a lex liminalis in Islamic legislation and on the belief that the legislative verses of the Book are valid for all time and in all places, allowing both flexibility and elasticity vis-à-vis the development of history and the demands of human society. In contrast to the legal codex that Moses brought to his people, which contained more than 600 concrete laws or legal injunctions, the legal verses of the Book contains less than a tenth of this number. The reason for this sudden reduction in the number of legislative verses is, as explained in chapters 2 and 4, the change in the nature of MuÈammad’s (ß) messengerhood: from a legal system where all laws are specific and punishments certain, to a legal system which only provides a universally applicable legal framework in the form of upper and lower limits (straightness), between which legislators formulate (diverse) particular laws (curvature). This new legal system works like a field whose borders provide the outer boundaries between which human legislation takes place. In some instances, laws may not even touch these boundaries (cf. 2:187),[259] in other instances boundaries may be touched but not transgressed (cf. 24:31). And when the Book states that ‘these are the limits (imposed by) Allah…’ (Al-Nis§” 4:13) and warns people not to ‘disobey Allah and His messenger and transgress His limits…’ (A l-Nis§” 4:14) it is clear that His intention is to declare the limit-based character also of Allah’s law of succession—stated in the preceding verses: ‘God (thus) directs you as regards your children’s (inheritance): to the male, a portion equal to that of two females…’, and such. (Al-Nis§” 4:11–12).

We will observe three fundamental principles in determining a law that moves between the boundaries of God:

1. The legal instrument of analogy (qiy§s) must only be employed if comparisons are based on what is empirically manifest (sh§hid) and not, as traditional jurists claim, on what is hidden (gh§“ib): that which has its root in the past and cannot be proven empirically. Acceptable empirical data are, for example, statistics about current birth rates, the percentages of women currently employed, or the distribution of wealth and the per capita income of a society’s current population. These data constitute the external criteria (of credibility) from which textual analogies are drawn.

2. Internal credibility is achieved through analogies and comparisons between textual passages of the Book based on the dialectical notion that underneath the thematic unity of verses and såras an ideational polarity of mutual opposition and duality exists.

3. The verses of the Book are never repetitive or, worse, redundant. The divine text does not allow synonymity between words. In cases of textual ambiguity or grammatical inconsistency, it is always a word’s semantic meaning that explains and determines a word’s occurrence in the text (and not style, rhyme, or other rhetorical considerations).

4. We believe that ijtih§d must be performed in all legal areas and that every ijtih§d should tackle the explicit legal text passages (naßß) that the Book provides, following our maxima that ‘there is no ijtih§d outside a naßß text’.

With the help of these principles we will now reenter the legislative arena and explore issues such as inheritance, polygamy, guardianship, dress codes for women, and other issues of family law.

 Bequest and Inheritance Laws

The traditional law of succession has its roots in the cultural and political milieu of the first two to three centuries of Islamic history. It has been characterised by a dominance of male centred perspectives which created a patriarchal inheritance law and which fuelled the spirit of tribalism and clan-ideology that controlled the way wealth was distributed among the different sections of Arab-Muslim society. Laws of inheritance were formulated by deliberately conflating the strict demarcation between family and state, leading to a situation where political succession (of dynastic rule) was secured by formulating inheritance laws that maintained the political interests of the ruling families (as was the case with the Umayyads, Abbasids, Shi#ites, Zubayrites, and others respectively).

Intellectually, inheritance laws were issued purely on the basis of the four arithmetic operations which, given the complexity of the matter, were highly insufficient and produced very crude and oversimplified solutions. All this happened before Descartes (1596–1650) laid down the foundations of analytical geometry and introduced a pioneering synthesis between ‘erupted digital quantities’ and ‘nondigital quantities’. This means that Islamic inheritance law became unfortunately finalised before the introduction of analytical geometry and the concept of mathematical ‘derivatives’, which was brought to perfection by the genius of Isaac Newton (1642–1726). Today, we can use the insights gained from further developments in the geometrical sciences, benefit from Newton’s and Descartes’ theories, and reorganize the distribution of wealth by inheritance laws. We should not repeat the unbelievable mistakes of earlier fiqh and formulate a law of succession purely on the basis of a single ÈadÊth or, as has been often the case, overrule the injunctions of the Book by an unconvincing reference to several weak and unauthentic ÈadÊths.

In doing this, we have to tackle the tendency in current jurisprudence to ignore the priority of bequest stipulations over inheritance rules, as explicitly stated by the Book.[260] We need to combat the jurisdictional practice of abrogating clear Qur'anic rules by the citation of ÈadÊths that were brought into circulation by parties who profited from military expeditions and the resulting booty. We need to question the widespread belief that 'no testament shall invalidate an heir's right' which, basically, disrespects a proper bequest and unfairly prioritises strict inheritance rules.

In addition, we have to correct the profound misunderstanding of the verse 'if only (mature) women (nis§"[an]), more than two (fawq ithnatain)...' (Al-Nis§" 4:11), which is still interpreted as '…if only daughters, two or more…"[261] which is, clearly, not the same. We need to tackle the erroneous understanding of 'child' (walad) as 'son' (ibn) and also the belief that only the existence of a male heir changes the patterns of inheritance, while the existence of a female heir changes nothing— and this in spite of the verse: 'God (thus) directs you as regards your children's (inheritance): to the male, a portion equal to that of two female' (al-Nis§" 4:11).

Finally, we need to deal with the widespread exclusion of orphaned grandchildren from inheriting from their grandparents—in spite of the fact that this is explicitly mentioned in the verses of inheritance, while other people, for example, uncles and aunts, are included as inheritors who are not mentioned in the text. We will have to introduce different sets of allocations for everyone who is qualified for inheritance and we will do this by departing from basic arithmetical operations because they only result in either surpluses, a convoluted system of returns and redistributions, or shortages which provoke long legal battles by those who feel cheated.

Considering the massive exegetical problems which the fuqah§” tend to either ignore or belittle, and the current attempts to implement a uniform Islamic law of succession, the subject of inheritance must be seen as a very sensitive topic: the distribution of wealth from the one generation to the next. We have carried out a thorough rereading of all relevant verses of the Book through the prism of our theory of limits. We have started our study by distinguishing between the general nature of inheritance rules and the specific nature of bequests, by which we aim to reverse current practice and restore Allah’s preference for bequests over inheritance rules.

 The Difference between Specified and Unspecified Shares (al -Èaíí wa’l-naßÊb)

Let us first explore the difference between the two Arabic terms for ‘share’, al-Èaíí and al-naßÊb. The first term, al-Èaíí, refers to shares whose exact amount is not specified but only defined in a very general manner, whereas the second term, al-naßÊb, usually connotes shares of an exactly identifiable quantity. If parliament, for example, passes a law whose aim is to improve life in general we would expect the benefits of this new law to be distributed to all social classes in society, even though one class, group, or region may profit from it more than others. A new law to improve pedestrians’ access to local shops on High Streets, for example, may give some shopkeepers, whose shops are close to the new crossings and traffic lights, greater benefits than others whose shops lay at a greater distance from the new crossings and are therefore less accessible. But since the new law was introduced to improve access to local shops in general, not for the benefit of any particular, individual shops, it is bound to create bigger and smaller shares of benefit. These shares, whose exact amount can not be pre-calculated, are known as ‘unspecified shares’

(al-Èaíí).

If, in contrast, a house owner plans to extend his house or to improve its access by building a ramp for his daughter’s wheelchair or by having a new back door installed to be used by his son’s family who lives next door, the benefits gained will be distributed in shares that the owner of the house has precisely calculated; that is why they are predetermined. These shares are called ‘specified shares’ (a l-naßÊb) which should never be confused with the first category of ‘unspecified shares’ (al-Èaíí). The term al-naßÊb is used to designate profit shares in business, shares held by shareholders of big companies or the tax contributions paid into the treasury (niß§b a l-zak§h). These are all shares known and specified in each individual case by those who are involved in the financial transactions. In the case of unspecified shares, however, the individual has neither the power nor the authority to change the amount payable; it is ‘beyond his or her reach’.

If we apply this to the question of bequests and inheritance, it would be correct to say that the latter is unspecified whereas the former is specified. On the one hand, Allah ordered a system of distribution of wealth that is universally applicable to everyone worldwide and where the individual share is given in the Book in very general terms (e.g., one-half or one-third of the legacy). On the other hand, Allah also prescribed bequests by which people can determine the distribution of their wealth individually, and by which they can specify the exact amount of individual shares. Whereas bequests are based on individual circumstances, the laws of inheritance are defined by much more abstract criteria for which, we propose, the application of analytical geometry, mathematical analysis, and set theory— in addition to basic arithmetics—is absolutely vital.

We will see that the Book contains rather rigorous legal injunctions by which Allah defined the distribution of inheritance according to blood relationship and degrees of kinship. For bequests, however, no such connection to kinship is prescribed. It is up to the testator to determine the beneficiaries of his or her legacy, be they close relatives or unrelated acquaintances, welfare institutions, charity organisations, cultural projects, or others. After reading the relevant verses in the Book, it is apparent that a greater number of people may benefit from bequests than from inheritance laws. Inheritance laws only consider those eligible who are next of kin within an extended family while bequests are not and therefore reach more people in society.

* Bequest

A bequest regulates the distribution of money or property according to the will of a testator who will define the amount of each share to be bequeathed (quantity) as well as the method of distribution (quality). A great variety of different people and institutions which do not belong to the family of the testator may receive bequests, and for this reason bequests have more weight in the Book than inheritance laws. Since bequests are not confined by fixed rules, testators enjoy great flexibility, thus may distribute their wealth evenly or unevenly and consider heirs to whom they feel personally obliged. Bequests therefore reflect the personal circumstances of the testator accurately. The outcome is often an uneven, or asymmetrical distribution of wealth, and each bequest will differ considerably from one to the next since objective reality is as complex as the human relationships we establish during our lifetimes.

Inheritance laws, in contrast, are meant to achieve a more balanced, symmetric distribution of money and property. Each share is calculated according to the relationship of the heir to the deceased (father, mother, child, husband, wife, brother, sister, and such). While imbalance characterises inheritance through bequests, balanced distribution is a characteristic of general inheritance laws. Balance or imbalance, symmetry or asymmetry—this polarity or duality expresses the dialectical relationship between bequests and inheritance laws. Imbalance reflects the diversity, curvature, and plurality of human relationships in human society, while balance reflects Allah’s will (and His order of straightness). But since unbalanced distribution of wealth mirrors the unbalanced relationships of our daily lives much better, the Book gives bequest rules a more prominent place than inheritance laws. We hear:

It is prescribed, when death approaches any of you, if he leave any goods that he make a bequest [al-waßiyya] to parents and next of kin

[li’l-w§lidain wa’l-aqrabÊn], according to reasonable usage—this is due from the God-fearing. (Al-Baqara 2:180)

This verse starts with the same formula (‘it is prescribed’) that Allah, only three verses further down of Sårat A l-Baqara, uses in a similarly authoritative way to command the duty of prayer and fasting:

O you who believe! Fasting is prescribed to you as it was prescribed to those before you, that you may (learn) self-restraint. (Al-Baqara

2:183)

When you pass (congregational) prayers, celebrate God’s praises, standing, sitting down, or lying down on your sides; but when you are free from danger, set up regular prayers: for such prayers are enjoined on believers at stated times. (Al-Nis§” 4:103)

There is the same prescriptive tone in His injunction to fast and pray as in His injunction to make a bequest. The only difference is that the command to fast and pray is only addressed to the MuslimBelievers (mu”minån), that is, to the followers of MuÈammad (ß), whereas bequests are the duty of ‘God-fearing’ Muslim-Assenters all over the world.

The above verse of bequest also lists the potential beneficiaries of a testator’s will. It uses the Arabic term li’l-w§lidain wa’l-aqrabÊn which, unfortunately, for far too long has been broadly understood as ‘to parents and next of kin’. But what kind of parents is meant here, the biological parents, that is, the ‘birth-givers’, or the foster parents, who have raised a child without being the child’s biological parents? And who exactly is ‘next of kin”? The Arabic language distinguishes between w§lid (father and ‘birth-giver’, that is, ‘who begets a child’) and ab (father and caregiver/nurturer, but not ‘birth-giver’), also between w§lida (mother and ‘birth-giver’, ‘who brings forth a child’) and umm (mother and caregiver, but not ‘birth-giver’). The dual term w§lid§n refers to the biological parents and the term abaw§n refers to the caregiver-parents. If the biological parents have also raised their children, they are considered as both w§lid§n and abaw§n. Seen from a child’s perspective, every child will have biological parents, and every child that is fed, raised and schooled will have caregiver-parents, but biological and caregiver parents are not always identical.

She [Mary] said: “O my Lord! How shall I have a son [walad] when no man has touched me?”… ($l #Imr§n 3:47)

The wife of Pharaoh said: “(Here is) joy of the eye, for me and for you: slay him not. It may be that he will be use to us, or we may adopt him as a son [walad[an]].” And they perceived not (what they were doing)! (Al-Qaßaß 28:9)

The distinction between natural parents and caregiver-parents is recognised in both verses. As Mary was ‘not touched by a man’ she could not become a w§lida, that is, the biological mother of Jesus.[262] And since Pharaoh and his wife were not Joseph’s biological parents (w§lid§n) they hoped to adopt him and become his caregiver-parents (abaw§n).

In the verse of bequest the given terms are, as we have said, li’l-w§lidain wa’l-aqrabÊn. Since li’l-w§lidain means ‘to the biological parents’, how does the verse refer to the caregiver-parents and others who feed, raise, and school the child, for example, the wet nurse or the dry nurse or relatives who have fostered the child for a certain period? The verse refers to them by the term wa’l-aqrabÊn, which connotes six different groups:

1. caregiver-father (al-ab) and caregiver-mother (al-umm)[263];

2. ascendants—to whatever degree above;

3. husband (if the deceased was a married woman) or wife (if the deceased was a married man);

4. children and grandchildren of the deceased, and any descendant—to whatever degree below;

5. brothers and sisters;

6. agnate uncles and aunts, and cognate uncles and aunts.

Together with the natural parents, these are the groups of primary beneficiaries to whom a testator may bequeath his wealth according to verse 180 of Sårat a l-Baqara. However, the following verse extends this circle considerably:

But if at the time of division other relatives, or orphans or [al-mas§kÊn], are present, feed them out of the (property), and speak to them words of kindness and justice. (Al-Nis§” 4:8)

Verse 4:8 adds another group of potential addressees: ‘orphans or [the handicapped]’,[264] which are not considered by any verse of inheritance law. The verse does not specify whether one should bequeath money to orphans or people in need individually or collectively by giving money to charitable bodies, such as orphanages, refugee camps, shelter homes for asylum seekers, or red cross/red crescent organisations.

Another, fourth group is added in verse 4:9:

Let those (disposing of an estate) have the same fear in their minds as they would have for their own if they had left a helpless family [dhuriyyat[an] ·i#§f [an]] behind: let them fear God, and speak words of appropriate (comfort). (Al-Nis§” 4:9)

The phrase dhuriyyat[an] ·i#§f [an] is a broad term to denote a wide range of ‘helpless’ people, for example disabled children, chronically ill wives, unmarried daughters who live, in comparison to their much happier married sisters, a miserable life. The point is that the Book’s designation of people who receive bequests is as open and varied as the testator wants it to be. It is entirely up to the person who writes a will to allot a bigger share for a handicapped daughter and a smaller share for the other children. In other instances a (divorced) parent might be given the sole rights over the deceased’s immoveable property, while the other parent receives the moveable property or no share at all. Bequests are simply more flexible and less restrictive because the laws of inheritance do not apply here. Inheritance laws would not allow such personal preferences since they regulate the distribution of the deceased’s money and property according to fixed formulas that ignore the personal circumstances of both the deceased and the inheritors. Also, inheritance laws are gendered laws, they operate on the basis of a distinction between male and female inheritors, a distinction that is entirely irrelevant in verses dealing with bequests.[265]

It is a religious duty (far·) to draw up a last will ‘whether the property be small or large’ (4:7). It is an individual duty (far·#ayn) to fulfil ‘when death approaches you’ (2:180). It is a sacred obligation that no one is allowed to change or abrogate: ‘If anyone changes the bequest after hearing it, the guilt shall be on those who make the change. For God hears and knows (all things)’ (A l-Baqara 2:181). If mistakes are made, for example, if someone bequeaths all the money to the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals despite the fact that one should have considered existing children, brothers, and sisters, it means that this person has indeed overlooked Allah’s command to consider a l-w§lidain wa’l-aqrabÊn. But in this case the following verse will apply, advising people, if faced with such errors, to apply mercy and forgiveness:

But if anyone fears partiality or wrong-doing on the part of the testator, and makes peace between (the parties concerned), there is no wrong in him: for God is oft-forgiving, most merciful. (A l-Baqara 2:182)

After the death of the testator, the bequest must not be changed otherwise it will incur God’s wrath. If the testator is still alive, one might protest and demand a higher share, but if the testator insists on it, nothing can be done about it. The courts cannot interfere in this.

Inheritance Laws

The technical term ‘inheritance’ (a l-irth) refers to the process of dividing the money and property of the deceased among the successors. This occurs either by drawing up a testament in which every share is individually determined (see above) or, if no such testament exists, by following the regulations of the inheritance verses as stipulated by the Book. Preference should always be given to the will of a testament. If a testament exists, it will be incumbent on everyone to adhere to it literally: ‘the distribution in all cases (’s) after the payment of legacies and debts…’ (Al-Nis§” 4:11). If, however, someone has neglected this duty and has not written a will, Allah will act on the deceased’s behalf through His stipulations of a general testimony that regulates the shares of each heir. It is incumbent on everyone to painstakingly adhere to them, both with respect to the given number of heirs and the amount of individual shares.

Three verses of Sårat al-Nis§” specify how the inheritance is to be distributed:

Allah commands you, with respect to your children, that the male shall inherit the equivalent of the share of two females. If there be more than two females, then they should receive two-thirds of what he leaves; but if there is only one female, she is entitled to one-half. To each of his parents, one-sixth of what he leaves, if he has any children; but if he has no children, then his parents will inherit him, the mother receiving one-third. But if he has any brothers, then his mother receives one-sixth, after any will he had made or any debt he had incurred [is taken care of]. Your fathers and sons—you know not who of them is of greater advantage to you. This is a law from Allah; Allah surely is All-Knowing, Forbearing. (Al-Nis§” 4:11, MF)

In what your wives leave, your share is a half, if they leave no child; but if they leave a child, you get a fourth; after payment of legacies and debts. In what you leave, their share is a fourth, if you leave no child; but if you leave a child, they get an eighth; after payment of legacies and debts. If the man or woman whose inheritance is in question, has left neither ascendants nor descendants, but has left a brother or a sister, each one of the two gets a sixth; but if more than two, they share in a third; after payment of legacies and debts; so that no loss is caused (to any one). Thus is it ordained by God; and God is all-knowing, most forbearing. (Al-Nis§” 4:12)

Those are the limits set by God [Èudåd All§h]: those who obey God and His apostle will be admitted to gardens with rivers flowing beneath, to abide therein (for ever) and that will be the supreme achievement. (Al-Nis§” 4:13)

Let us first establish who is addressed here (subject) and to whom inheritance shall be given (object). This is similar to the identification of subject and object in any other verse of the Book. For example, in the sentence ‘We have enjoined on man (a l-ins§n) kindness to parents (bi-w§lidaihi)…’ (Al-#Ankabåt 29:8 and Al-AÈq§f 46:15), the subject of Allah’s enjoinment is ‘man’ who is told to be kind, and the object of man’s kindness is his ‘parents’. The subject of the verses of inheritance is ‘humankind’ (a l-n§s), who are ordered to show ‘reverence [to their] Guardian-Lord…’ (Al-Nis§” 4:1), and verse 4:11 states their object: ‘God (thus) directs you as regards your children’s (inheritance) (aul§dikum)…’.

Note that the text does not say ‘your own children’s’ (abn§“ikum) but just ‘your children’s’ (aul§dikum), while further down in the same verse the text says

‘abn§“ukum’: ‘You know not whether your parents [ab§“ukum] or your (own) children [abn§“ukum] are nearest to you in benefit…’. The difference is significant, since ‘aulad’ is the plural of ‘child’ which, both in Arabic and English, is not engendered as it can be either male or female. As a neuter term (a feminine form of walad does not exist) it has universal application since it basically connotes ‘every child that is born’ on the earth.

Thus, the verse ‘God (thus) directs you as regards your children’s (inheritance) (aul§dikum)…’ expresses Allah’s concern for the ‘children of this earth’ and His honouring of all humankind. He even swears an oath on them in Sårat a l-Balad: ‘(I swear) by parent (w§lid[in]) and offspring (wa-m§ walada),’ (90:3, AH), and God also uses the term for a self-reference: ‘He begot no one (lam yalid) nor was He begotten (wa-lam yålad) (A l-Ikhl§ß 112:3). In other words, by specifying the object of Allah’s inheritance laws as ‘your children’ verse 4:11 makes it clear that the rest of the inheritance verses are meant to cover every possible case of inheritance applicable to all humankind, that is, for everyone who, unlike God, ‘has begotten and was begotten’ and has, therefore, father, mother, son, daughter, husband, or wife.

The first injunction after the introduction in 4:11 states: ‘to the male, a portion equal to that of two females’. This is the first law of inheritance. It indicates that the portion a male heir inherits is calculated on the basis of the portion that the female heirs inherit, as if Allah has urged us to define the portion of the female inheritors first and only then to deduce from it an equal amount for male inheritors. Mathematically, it is only logical that the equivalent number to sum A cannot be accurately established if sum A is not properly defined in the first place. Thus, only if sum A (female shares) is properly described can one work out an equivalent sum B (male shares).

The second injunction in 4:11 states: a) ‘if only daughters, more than two, their share is two-thirds of the inheritance’; and b) ‘if only one, her share is a half’. These are the second and third laws of inheritance. The two injunctions of verse 4:11 contain the essence of inheritance laws in the Book; other injunctions, given later in the verse, are just variations on these and are calculated on the basis of the three laws. They constitute Allah's limits as testified by the conclusion in 4:13, which says, 'those are limits set by God…'. Within these limits (the first two injunctions) we hear about the distribution of inheritance to several other inheritors, for example, children, grandchildren, husband, wife, brother, and sister, but we hear nothing about uncles and aunts as potential inheritors. This implies that within the limits of Allah uncles and aunts do not receive any share of the inheritance.

As it is our aim to give inheritance law a sound mathematical foundation we apply the following formula: the value of the ordinate (y) equals the value of the variable (x) by a multiplying factor t (parameter), thus, y=t(x). If (x) represents the value of variable t and (y) the value of the ordinate, then the value of (y) changes by an increase or decrease of variable (x). Applied to inheritance law we define (y) as the value of male shares and (x) as the value of female shares because the female shares (x) are the basis of the calculation, and if (x) changes so does the value of (y), the male shares. This reverses the traditional understanding of the first injunction entirely: 'to the male, a portion equal to that of two females', which used to be interpreted as 'to the male twice the portion of that of females'. Even if this looks like playing with words, the traditional interpretation had turned the originally intended basis of calculation on its head since it assumed that male shares are the variable (x) that determines the value of the ordinate (y), the female shares. In this equation, male inheritors always get twice the amount of female share, regardless of the actual number of female inheritors (1, 2, 3, 4, 5 … to infinity!) and regardless of the amount of shares calculated on the basis of the number of females in the family. This is, of course, unacceptable and violates Allah's proposition in this verse. We need to remind ourselves that Allah's legislation reflects the conditions of objective reality that universally exist for all humankind. And if it is said that 'to the male, a portion equal to that of two females', it is not just a purely hypothetical, abstract scenario but also an adequate reflection of a concrete social condition. In this case, if 'to the male, a portion equal to that of two females' should apply we need to have a situation where the number of female inheritors is twice the number of male inheritors, as illustrated by a few examples in this table:

| two females | one male |

| four females | two males |

| six females | three males |

How will this change if there is more than twice the number of females compared to the number of male inheritors, that is, if the ratio is for example, 3:1; 4:1; 6:2 or 12:4? In these instances the second injunction comes into play, which states: ‘if there be more than two females, then they should receive two-thirds of what he leaves’.[266] This confirms again, first, that Allah always calculates female shares first, which might increase or decrease, and, second, that the male share is not always twice the amount of the female share. If, for example, these are four inheritors (one male + three females), the male share is 33.333 percent, while the female share(s) are 66.666 percent, and divided by three this equals 22.222 percent each. And if there are six inheritors (one male + 5 females), the male share is again 33.333 percent, but the female share(s) change to 66.666 percent divided by five equals 13.333 percent. Hence, only in one specific situation, when the number of males is half the number of females, do male inheritors receive twice the amount of female shares. This clearly contradicts the traditional position of the fuqah§” who claim that males always receive twice the amount of female shares.

If there is only one female in the family who inherits, the second part of the second injunction applies: ‘if only one, her share is a half’. In this case, the female share is 50 percent and the male share is 50 percent. This last possibility means that the Book has covered all three possible inheritance constellations (there is not, either mathematically or empirically, a fourth one possible):

1. ‘if there is one female (heir)’ → the male (heir) receives half of her share;

2. ‘if there are two female (heirs)’ → the male (heir) receives double the amount of one female share;

3. ‘if there are more than two female (heirs)’ → the male (heir) receives one-third and the female heirs receive two-thirds regardless of their number (three to infinity).

The Book does not deal with situations where only male or only female inheritors exist. In this case, if there are either 1–∞ males or 1–∞ females, the shares will be equally distributed among all heirs. This can be done by simple arithmetical operations—and without the help of divine instructions. The Book is only concerned with the more complicated situation of male-female inheritance (mother–father); (sister–brother); (widowed wife–widowed husband), and such. Where the text mentions only one sex, for example, ‘females’ in verse 4:11, it always presupposes the existence of ‘males’ who live with the family. Likewise, although 4:11 only mentions the deceased’s ‘mother’, it does assume the existence of the deceased’s ‘father’.

The Book’s major concern is social justice in society. Equality is not absolute and does not imply that every individual will get exactly the same share of the inherited property. Justice is achieved on a more collective level insofar as inheritance is equally distributed among the two sexes, even if, in some instances, one individual female share is smaller than an individual male share. But on the whole, and only this really achieves peace in society, the two sexes receive the same amount of the disposable inheritance.

The Limits of God

As explained earlier, the Book draws Allah’s limits in verses 11–13 of Surat al-Nis§” and concludes the section on inheritance by explicitly referring to these verses as ‘limits set by God’ (4:13). This is a powerful reminder of the fact that those who keep these limits are rewarded with life in Paradise, whereas those who break them will go to Hell. Let us therefore recapitulate what these limits are:

1. The first limit:

‘to the male, a portion equal to that of two females’: This limit applies to those cases where the survivors of the deceased are two females and one male and, by analogy, to all other cases where the number of females is twice the number of males (if one male + two females → then one-half to him, the other half to them (=) if two males + four females → then one-half to the two males, the other half to the four females, and so on). This limit is expressed by the formula:

F

—

= 2 (F = number of female heirs; M = number of male heirs)

M

2. The second limit:

‘If there be more than two females, then they should receive two-thirds of what he (the deceased) leaves…’ [MF]: This limit applies to all cases where the number of females is more than twice the number of males. If there are one male and three females, then the one male receives a third and the three females receive two-thirds. The actual amount of the male share depends on the number of female shares (3–∞), (e.g., if two males + five females → then one-third is shared in equal portions by the two males, and two-thirds are shared equally among the five females; if three males + seven females → then one-third to the males and two-thirds to the females, etc.). This limit is described by almost the same formula as above:

F

—

> 2 (F = number of female heirs; M = number of male heirs)

M

In any case, male shares are not twice that of female shares (onethird is always smaller than two-thirds). Hence, it is different from the first case where individual male shares are always bigger than the individual female shares. But the first case is rather exceptional since it applies only to those rare situations where the female heirs outnumber [twice] the male heirs.

3. The third limit:

‘if only one, her share is a half’: This limit applies to all cases where the number of male inheritors exactly equals the number of female inheritors (if one male + one female → then half to each; if two males + two females → then a quarter to each, etc.).

This limit is expressed by the formula:

F

—

= 1 (F = number of female heirs; M = number of male heirs)

M

Once more, the male shares are not twice the amount of the female shares as in case 1/limit 1. The mistake of traditional jurisprudence was to apply case 1/limit 1 to all possible cases of inheritance, thereby conflating three different limits into one and spuriously overruling the two other limits by the first one. Our model proposes keeping the three limits apart and applying them separately to the case in which they can provide the best and fairest solution.

The text reminds us that ‘those are the limits set by God”! We will see that the remaining verses (11–13) provide the upper and lower boundaries of these limits. The following sections will demonstrate, with the help of analytical geometry and mathematical theories, that the exact amount of portions can be precisely calculated and allocated and that we do not have to put up with the quantitative or qualitative ambiguity of the traditional models of inheritance law.

The General Law of Inheritance

Moving from digital quantities to nondigital quantities in calculating inheritance shares, six situations can be formulated:

Case (A): there is more than one heir; they are male and female (three males and one female):

| female | male |

| | 1* | 1 |

| | 0 | 1 |

| | 0 | 1 |

| Total: | 1 | 3 | Applied limit: ‘if only one, her share is a half’ (3)*

Rule: 50 percent for females; 50 percent for males (a third each); absolute equality (in total) between male and female shares; yet, individually: one male share is a third of one female share, while the number of females is only one-third of the number of males—or if put the other way around: one female share is three times the amount of the individual male share, while the number of males is three times larger than the number of females. This means that the ratio of female to male shares (individually) is in exact inverse proportion to the ratio between female-male numbers (3:1 → 1:3)

Case (B): there is more than one heir; they are male and female (three males and two females)

female | male |

| 1* | 1 |

| 1* | 1 | 0

Total: 2

Applied limit: ‘if only one, her share is a half’ (3)*

Rule: 50 percent for females (one-third each); 50 percent for males (one-third each); absolute equality (in total) between male and female shares; the ratio of female to male individual shares (3:2) is in exact inverse proportion to the ratio between female-male numbers (2:3).

Case (C): there is more than one heir; they are male and female (three males and three females)

female | male |

| 1 | 1 |

| 1 | 1 | 1

Total: 3

Applied limit: the number of female heirs matches (in each row) the number of male heirs:

F

—

= 1 (F = number of female heirs; M = number of male heirs)

M

Rule: 50 percent for females (one-third each); 50 percent for males (one-third each); absolute equality (in total) between male and female shares; the ratio of female to male individual shares (3:3) is the exact ratio of female-male numbers (3:3), in total: 1:1 (each female and male share is exactly the same).

Case (D): there is more than one heir; they are male and female (three males and four females)

female | male |

| 1* | 1 |

| 1* | 1 | 2°

Total: 4

Applied limit: ‘if only one, her share is a half’ (3)* and ‘to the male, a portion equal to that of two females’ (1)°

Rule: 50 percent for females (a quarter each); 50 percent for males (a third each); absolute equality (in total) between male and female shares; the ratio of female to male individual shares (3:4) is in exact inverse proportion to the ratio of female to male numbers (4:3), since an individual female share is only 75 percent of the individual male share, while the number of males makes up 75 percent of the number of females.

Case (E): there is more than one heir; they are male and female (three males and five females)

female | male |

| 1* | 1 |

| 2° | 1 | 2°

Total: 5

Applied limits: ‘if only one, her share is a half’ (3)* and ‘to the male, a portion equal to that of two females’ (1)°

Rule: 50 percent for females (one-fifth each); 50 percent for males (one-third each); absolute equality (in total) between male and female shares; the ratio of female to male individual shares (3:5 = 1.666) is in exact inverse proportion to the ratio of female to male numbers (5:3 = 1.666), since an individual female share is only 60 percent of the individual male share, while the number of males makes up 60 percent of the number of females.

Case (F): there is more than one heir; they are male and female (three males and six females)

female | male |

| 2° | 1 |

| 2° | 1 | 2°

Total: 6

Applied limit: ‘to the male, a portion equal to that of two females’ (1)°

Rule: 50 percent for females (one-sixth each); 50 percent for males (one-third each); absolute equality (in total) between male and female shares; but since the number of female heirs is twice the number of male heirs, their individual share is only half the amount of the individual male share or, put differently, since the number of male heirs is only half the number of female heirs (3:6 = ½), males receive individually (and only then!) twice the amount of the individual female share (6:3 = 2).

The Distribution of Inheritance

So far we have calculated inheritance shares on the basis of the generic distinction between male and female heirs. Our next step will be to consider other subdivisions. For this purpose we need to go from digital quantities to nondigital quantities which can be found in analytical geometry. If we take our findings from the last section, where we concluded that the ratio of male to female shares is in exact inverse proportion to the ratio of the male to female number of heirs, and express this in geometrical terms we get the following formula:

If it is said that X = F/M (F = number of female heirs; M = number of male heirs), and Y = D2/D1 (D1 = share of the male heirs; D2 = share of the female heirs), and if the ratio of male-female shares is the inverse/reverse ratio of the male-female number of inheritors, then it follows that: Y = 1/X

This last equation describes the geometrical figure of a hyperbola. It is based on the application of only two limits of Allah (1 + 3). We can only achieve a hyperbola if the ratio between male and female numbers is greater than zero and smaller than 2 or if it equals 2:

$0 < F/M \leq 2$

If we apply the second of Allah's limits which says: 'If there be more than two females (nis§”[an]), then they should receive two-thirds of what he (the deceased) leaves…', we would first have to define the Arabic term nis§”. The usage of this term in the text is particularly odd since one would expect to see the proper term for 'female' which is in§th. So why does the verse use nis§”? Nis§” is the plural of imra”a and means 'women'. It connotes mature women, not girls. This is significant because even though every woman is obviously female, not every female is a woman who has reached her puberty. By using the term nis§”, and not in§th, the condition of the verse is that female heirs must have reached puberty (one should read: 'If there be adult women [nis§” [an]] more than two …'). This is different from the first injunction. Since every creature is either male or female ('that He did create in pairs—male and female' [Al-Najm 53:45]), we were able to conclude that Allah's first limit (1) 'to the male (dhakar), a portion equal to that of two females (unthayain)' implied a distribution of shares to male and female heirs regardless of their status of being either a minor or an adult.

Nis§” is, as we have said, the plural of imra”a, 'woman'. By definition it refers to more than two (ithnatain), that is, three or more. But why does the text say: 'adult women (nis§” [an]), more than two (fawq ithnatain)…',[267] if the term nis§” already indicates a number of more than two? Is this a redundant expression? Should it not be ‘if there are women’ or ‘if there are more than two (women)”? Since we believe that there is no redundancy in the Book, we are convinced that the expression ‘if there are women, more than two’ points to something extra that neither of the two units (‘women’ and ‘more than two’) possess alone. But what is this extra information? The following two contrasting examples will explain it:

Example 1: if we are faced with a constellation of two males and four female inheritors, the number of women would be ‘more than two (nis§”)’, but the ratio of 4:2, equalling two, is not ‘over two (fawq ithnatain)’. In other words, only the first part of the condition is fulfilled: ‘if there are females (i.e., over two)’, but not its second part: ‘more than two’ (i.e., over two more than male inheritors). Example 2: if, however, we have only one male and three female inheritors, the ratio of 3:1, equalling three, would be over two, which would qualify as ‘over two’ in actual numbers as well as ‘over two’ in comparison with the number of male inheritors. The same applies, for example to three males and 5 females, with a ratio of 5:3, equalling 2.5 which is > 2, and a number of women of more than two.

Example 2 illustrates that we might attain whole numbers (1, 2, 3…) as well as fractions (2.5) in calculating the number of inheritors. The text certainly allows the existence of fractions when it uses the preposition ‘over’ (fawq) but usually implies whole numbers when it uses the elative ‘more than’ (akthar). Verse 12 of Sårat al-Nis§” uses akthar: ‘but if more than two (brothers and sisters), they share in a third’, implying that to count here with 1 ½ brothers or 1 ¼ sisters would be impossible. But in using fawq: ‘women, more than two’, and not akthar, it is possible to calculate the ratio of male and female inheritors so that we might receive whole numbers or fractions.

We now return to the second limit of God in its entirety: ‘If there be more than two females (nis§” [an]), then they should receive twothirds of what he (the deceased) leaves…’, and explore the different variant options of male-female ratios.

If ⇒

women male

3 1

2 1

Rule: __ __

3 3

66.66% 33.33%

_____ _____

Result: = 22.22 = 33.33

3 1 and if ⇒

women male

5 2

2 1

— —

Rule:

3 3

0.666% 0.333%

_____ _____

Result: = 0.1333 = 0.1666

5 2

⇒ Y = [_____] D2 → 0.1333 _____ = 0.8 = _____ 2×2 =

then

D1 0.1666 5

number of males multiplied by two _____ number of females

If we apply nondigital quantities, we get the following equations:

a. For the individual female share:

2

D2 = [___]

3F

b. For the individual male:

1

D1 ___

3M

c. For the ratio between female and male shares:

2/3F 2 ___ 3___M ___ D2 2M ___

_____

= × or =

1/3M 3F 1 D1 F

If the ratio of the male to female number of heirs is:

F

X = __ [M]

and if we equate this with the two limits in inverse proportion, we receive:

___ 1 ___ F 2 ___ 2 ___ 2M ___

= or or =

X M X X F

It follows from this that the male-female ratio of shares is:

2M 2

Y = ___ = __

F X

This is entailed in the equation:

2

Y = [__]

X

This equation describes a hyperbolic function. However, it is only valid, a) if all females are mature women, and b) if the ratio of female to male numbers is more than two (fawq ithnatain):

F

___ > 2

M

This is where the hyperbolic ellipsis starts. It starts directly above zero and moves until infinity, but only if the hyperbolic equation is:

1

Y = [___]

X

According to analytical mathematics, the first derivative of this last equation must be described as follows:

Y = ___ 1 = X –1 of which is Y ′ = 1/2 ____

X x

Finally, if we assume Y[] ′ over X equals 1, we get:

[__] 1

Y′ = = 1 = α-tangent

1

If the derivative of X equals 1, the alpha-angle (α) of the tangent is 45°. The x-axis (abscissae) is then touched at 1, the point at which F equals M (i.e., if the number of female heirs equals the number of male heirs). This represents the hyperbola’s peak (or focus point), and if the tangent has an alpha-angle (α) of 45°, the derivative equals the tangent. Preceding the hyperbola’s peak are points on the x-axis that describe the situation where female heirs are outnumbered by male heirs but where their individual share is bigger than the male share. Following the hyperbola’s peak are points that describe the reverse situation, that is, where the female heirs outnumber male heirs and where their share is smaller than the male share. The result is a picture of absolute symmetry—to the effect that the extra that female heirs receive (pictured on one side of the hyperbola) is exactly balanced by the extra that male heirs receive collectively as a whole group (pictured on the reverse side of the hyperbola). This rather abstract picture, gained through analytical geometry, is matched by statistics taken from objective reality. According to these statistical data the number of female shares existing in the entire world equals the number of male heirs. The mathematical balance achieved through Allah’s limits thus reflects the actual circumstances that we encounter in our daily life.

1 _{___} 2

_{___}

And yet, what happens if the premise is not Y = but Y = ?

X X We attain: _{2 x X}[–1] and, as a result:

____₂/2 2 [__] 1[__]

Y = ; if X = 2, then Y′ _{= = =} β; β = 30° which is X = 2 of

X 4 2

the hyperbola

In conclusion, we maintain that all possible variants of how to distribute inheritance are covered by the three limits proposed by God and can be calculated accordingly. We also maintain that each case of inheritance can be described geometrically by a hyperbolic curve

___ 1 [] _{___} 2

(or function) of either Y = or Y = . There is no case of inheri-

X X

tance that is not covered by these two formulas. Our calculations are so precise that we will never have a surplus or a shortage of inherited property after the heirs have received their portions. Hence, we will never face the absurd situation where heirs receive less than their legitimate share or where, because of a sudden surplus, the families of aunts and uncles are considered who actually have no legitimate right to inherit anything at all.

Inheritance of Ascendant Members of the Family (al-ußål)

So far we have only covered the shares of the descendant heirs (al-furå# or ‘branches’) which were calculated by the parameters of mathematical set theory. This will now be complemented by a discussion of the shares for ascendant members of the family (al-ußål or ‘roots’). In contrast to the identity of a whole set (being either male or female), our calculations are now for elements of those generic sets which can acquire multiple identities. The element ‘father’, for example, may intersect with several sets, in their order of significance: 1) male 2) mature adult 3) married and 4) guardian of children. The element ‘mother’ is defined by: 1) female 2) mature adult 3) married 4) guardian of children. Because of the fact that elements such as ‘father’ or ‘mother’ are part of a larger set (male, female), the generic cases of inheritance law for male/female heirs can also be applied here. Three constellations are possible:

1. The deceased is survived by parents (whether also by brothers and sisters is here irrelevant): ‘For parents (li-abawaihi), a sixth share of the inheritance to each, if the deceased left children…’ (4:11)

Rule: the father receives the same share as the mother (limit law III). The share is given to ‘parents’, whether they are ‘birth-givers’ or ‘caregiver-parents’, as the text uses li-abawaihi and not li-w§lidaihi. One-sixth goes to the father (‘birth-giver’ or ‘caregiver-father’), and one-sixth goes to the mother (‘birth-giver’ or ‘caregiver-mother’). This rule covers the possibility that the deceased is the adopted son/ daughter of the surviving parents. This reflects national statistics showing that in a situation like this (the deceased is survived by his or her parents and children) the number of inheriting fathers equals the number of inheriting mothers.

| Share of subset ‘mother” | = | Share of subgroup ‘father” |

| Number of mothers | = | Number of fathers |

| Individual share | = | Individual share |

2. The deceased had neither children nor brothers and sisters: ‘if no children, and the parents are the (only) heirs, the mother has a third…’ (4:11)

Rule: the father receives two-thirds and the mother one-third (limit law I), after deducting the shares for the husband or wife of the deceased, if there are any. This reflects statistics showing that in a situation like this (the deceased is survived by only his or her parents) the number of inheriting fathers is half the number of inheriting mothers.

Share of subset ‘mother” | = | Share of subgroup ‘father” |

| Half the number of inheriting mothers | = | Number of i nheriting fathers |

| Twice the individual share | = | Individual share |

3. The deceased is survived by brothers and sisters but had no children: ‘if the deceased left brothers (or sisters), the mother has a sixth. (The distribution in all cases) after the payment of legacies and debts…’ (4:11)

Rule: the father receives five-sixths and the mother one-sixth (limit law II), similar to the case of one male (brother) and ten females (sisters), whereby the brother receives one-third and the ten sisters receive two-thirds. The share of the brother is five times the individual share of his sisters, exactly as in the case above where the father’s share is five times the share of the mother. And this is in spite of the fact that the father has not even been mentioned in the verse; it says: ‘the mother has a sixth”! This reflects statistics showing that the number of inheriting fathers is only a fifth of the number of inheriting mothers.

| Share of subset ‘mother” | = | Share of subgroup ‘father” |

| A fifth of the number of inheriting mothers | = | Number of i nheriting fathers |

| Five times the individual share | = | Individual share |

Taking the three situations together we can safely claim that the total share of inheritance all over the world is equally divided between surviving fathers and mothers. This is based on our belief that objective reality and its laws are the words of God (kalim§t All§h), that the Book is His speech (kal§m), and that the criterion of truth is within His words (i.e., objective reality). Even if we concede that the distribution of inheritance and the calculation of shares in each individual case is always a complicated procedure (if no bequest exists), it is still a remarkable fact that in all three cases permanent equality between male and female shares is achieved, which reflects God's justice.

The concluding statement in 4:11 is: 'You know not whether your parents (ab§"ukum) or your children (abn§"ukum) are nearest to you in benefit…'. The two groups mentioned here are ascending relatives of the deceased (ab§"ukum), to whatever degree upwards, and descending relatives (abn§"ukum), to whatever degree downwards. In other words, in both cases the verse does not refer to the nearest ascendants (parents) or descendants (children) of the deceased, but to the grandparents (and above) or to the grandchildren (and below). The use of ab§"u in this wider (figurative, nonbiological) sense can also be found in "And I follow the ways of my fathers (ab§"Ê): Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob…" (Yåsuf 12:38), implying that two of the three were Joseph's forefathers not his 'birth-givers'. The rule here is 'nearer [in degree excludes] the more distant [in degree]' (a l-aqrab fa'l-ab#ad), which means that if, for example, both the father/mother and grandfather/ grandmother of the deceased are still alive, the grandparents cannot inherit because of the parent's existence.

Likewise, if the deceased is survived by a son/daughter and grandson/granddaughter, the existence of the children automatically excludes the grandchildren. If, however, parents or children are already dead, grandparents and grandchildren will inherit because there is no parent or child to exclude them as heirs.[268] The lexical distinction between progeny (aul§d) and children (abn§”) is very significant in this respect. The term ‘progeny’ is much wider and more general than ‘children’. The latter describes direct descendants of the uß̊al-generation, whereas the former connotes a variety of relationships and is unspecific about the sex of the descendants. In prescribing the three basic laws of inheritance for the parties of parents, children, spouses, brothers, and sisters, Allah uses the term ‘progeny’ (aul§d): ‘Allah (thus) directs you as regards to your children’s (fÊ aul§dikum) (inheritance)…’ (4:11). This leads us to the meaning of the last sentence of the verse: ‘You know not whether your parents (ab§“ukum) or your children (abn§“ukum) are nearest to you in benefit…’, because it is never certain who will inherit from whom.

Is it the daughter who will inherit from her father or is it the father who will inherit from his daughter? Will the grandmother survive her grandson, or will it be the other way around? Each case is unpredictable and will vary from family to family, but statistically and on average it is more likely that sons/daughters inherit from their parents and not the reverse. The general rule (children inherit more often from their parents than vice versa) might, however, not apply in particular cases of inheritance (where parents do inherit from their children). In real life things are more complex and one can never be absolutely sure who exactly inherits from whom and how many heirs will survive the deceased. Particular case-law is unpredictable, inconclusive, and never predetermined. And yet, since the particular is part of the universal, there is no real contradiction between particular case-law and universal law, since the latter absorbs and assimilates the former in formulating its absolute and universally applicable laws.

The Inheritance of Spouses

The first part of the second verse of inheritance is dedicated to spouses:

In what your wives leave, your share is a half, if they leave no child; but if they leave a child, you get a fourth; after payment of legacies and debts. In what you leave, their share is a fourth, if you leave no child; but if you leave a child, they get an eighth; after payment of legacies and debts. (Al-Nis§” 4:12)

It starts by addressing men whose wives have died. Allah permits them half of her inheritance if the couple have no children (male or female, children or grandchildren). If the couple have children, he will receive only a quarter of her inheritance. It then addresses women whose husbands have died. They receive a quarter of his inheritance, but only one-eighth if the couple have children. Undoubtedly, the verse applies limit law I (‘to the male, a portion equal to that of two females’), since the childless widowed husband receives one-half, and one-quarter if the couple have children—no specification is given to the sex or number of children. Once again, we should remind ourselves of the need for such regulations only in situations where a bequest does not exist. If, however, a bequest exists, precisely specifying each share, it must be taken as the basis for allocating the deceased’s inheritance. A specific bequest always overrules the general regulations of inheritance law. [269]

The so-called kal§la inheritance

So far, the verses have covered inheritance cases where the deceased is survived by children or parents. But what happens if the parents have already died and no children exist? This situation is called a l-kal§la, i.e. a distribution of the inheritance to collateral heirs (those who are not of the direct line of the deceased but come from a side line, e.g. brothers, sisters, uncles, aunts, cousins, etc.). There are two types of al-kal§la:

1) If the deceased has one brother and one sister each will receive one-sixth, that is, each sex gets the same amount. If there are several brothers and sisters they all share equally one-third of the inheritance. One-third is the upper limit that brothers and sisters of the deceased can inherit, and their individual share is absolutely identical (limit law III). It also applies if the deceased has a husband (who gets at the lower limit ½ without children, ¼ with children) or a wife (who gets at the lower limit ¼ without children, ⅛ with children):

If the man or woman whose inheritance is in question, has left neither ascendants nor descendants [al-kal§la], but has left a brother or a sister, each one of the two gets a sixth; but if more than two, they share in a third; after payment of legacies and debts… (Al-Nis§” 4:12)

2) The second type applies if the deceased is not survived by a husband/wife and not by children or parents either. In this case, limit law III is used (‘if only one, her share is a half’), but only if the number of brothers and sisters is three or less and if male and female heirs exist (e.g. one brother and one sister, or one brother and two sisters, or two brothers and one sister). In all other cases where the number of brothers and sisters is four and above, and if male and female heirs exist, limit law I will be used (‘…to the male, a portion equal to that of two females’). If there are only sisters or only brothers, then each heir gets exactly the same share.

They ask you for a legal decision. Say: God directs (thus) about those who leave no descendants or ascendants as heirs [al-kal§la]. If it is a man that dies, leaving a sister but no child, she shall have half the inheritance: If (such a deceased was) a woman, who left no child, her brother takes her inheritance: If there are two sisters, they shall have two-thirds of the inheritance (between them): if there are brothers and sisters, (they share), the male having twice the share of the female. Thus does God make clear to you (His law), lest you err. And God has knowledge of all things. (Al-Nis§” 4:176)

 Conclusion and Summary

Bequest/Testimony Inheritance laws

General and Bequests are the primary specific laws source for distributing inheritance. Allah gave priority to bequests over inheritance laws since they reflect the personal and objective circumstances of the testator. Bequests represent a specific law within the realm of the more general laws of inheritance. They achieve specific justice on the personal level of an individual.

Inheritance laws were stipulated by Allah for all people on earth. They represent a universal law of distributing inheritance through a general formula of allocating shares in cases where no bequest/testimony exists, or where there is a surplus, i.e., ‘after payment of legacies and debts’ (4:12). Their aim is to achieve social justice on a general level (between whole sets), not on an individual level (between each heir).

| | Bequest/Testimony | Inheritance laws |

| Symmetry | Symmetry of distributional shares does not exist. | Symmetry does exist. Inheritors form symmetrical relationships to the deceased (father/mother/ son/daughter/brother/sister/ husband/wife). Symmetry is one of the universal attributes, while asymmetry is an attribute of the particular sphere. There is a dialectical

relationship between symmetry and asymmetry. |

| Shares of bequests and inheritance | Shares of bequests are called naßÊb. They are individually inheritance defined by the testator; hence they are subject to the human will. | Shares of inheritance laws are called Èaíí. They are primordially defined by divine will and cannot be changed by human will. Verse 4:11 says: ‘this is a law of God…’ [AH]. |

| Obligation or Law | Bequests are ordained by Allah as a religious obligation (taklÊf), just as He ordained prayer and fasting. | A law of God (farÊ·a min All§h) |

| Persons entitled to receive bequests and to be legal heirs | Testators can bequeath shares to anyone they want, but the Book mentions people to whom it is recommended to allocate shares (e.g., to parents, next of kin, orphans, people in need, the disabled and old). The potential number of people who can receive bequests is much higher than the number of potential heirs who are entitled to inherit by inheritance laws. | Inheritance laws stipulate precisely who is entitled to inherit and who is not. If persons are not mentioned they cannot inherit. |

| Laws of distribution | No law regulates the distribution of shares. It is entirely up to the testators when and how their inheritance is allotted to the people they mentioned in their bequest. It is a particular and specific form of distribution. | The verses of inheritance follow general, universal laws that are based on calculations that can be analysed by analytical geometry and mathematics (in addition to the basic arithmetic operations). These are fixed laws, defined by Allah, in which each share is meticulously determined. The amount of the total inheritance (100 percent) is neither to be under- or overused. The practice of surplus or shortage is illegitimate because it would imply that we have not calculated the shares correctly on the basis of the portions that Allah has fixed by His laws and limits. |

| Caregiverparents and birth-givers | Verses of bequests consider caregiver-parents. | Verses of inheritance consider ‘birth-givers’ and other ascendants (to whatever degree up) under the umbrella of al-ab§’, as well as children and other descendants (to whatever degree down) under the umbrella of al-abn§’. |

| Comments | Testators are entitled to combine shares of bequests with shares of inheritance by stipulating how much can be bequeathed and how much can be inherited. There is therefore nothing that would limit or restrain the freedom of the testators to write their last will as they wish.

However, parliament might issue a law that regulates the amount of the inheritance that can be bequeathed. Such laws have no eternal validity. We do not accept the traditional understanding of inheritance that states: ‘no bequest [is admitted] to the inheritor’. Bequests can take effect even before the death of the testator. | Inheritance laws were given on the assumption that both male and female heirs exist (mother/ father; brother/sister; husband/ wife). There are of course cases where only one sex exists, e.g., the deceased is survived by only male children, or only female children, or where there are only brothers but no sisters, or only sisters but no brothers. In all these cases the rule is that every heir of the same sex receives exactly the same share. For this rule no additional revelation was needed, and it is so self-evident that no further fiqh commentary or ÈadÊth by a companion of the Prophet (ß) or by anyone after them is required. |

Symbols Used to Calculate the Shares of Inheritance

| Category | Symbol |

| Number of female heirs | F |

| Number of male heirs | M |

| Ratio between female and male heirs | X = F/M

| Share of a male heir | D1 |

| Share of a female heir | D2 |

| Ratio between the share of a female heir and the share of a male heir | Y = D2/D1 |

The Three Limit Laws of Inheritance

| Limit | Hyperbolic function | Condition |

| Limit I
‘to the male, a portion equal to that of two females’ | The amount of male-female shares is in inverse proportion to the number of male-female heirs: | 0 < F/M < 2

The peak of x is 1

F[__] ≤ 2 F___ = 2

Limit II

‘If there be more than two females, then they should receive two-thirds of what he (the deceased) leaves…’ __ 2 M

The amount of male-female shares is in inverse proportion to the number of male-female heirs: F__ > 2

F__ > 2 Y = X

M The peak of x is 2.

Limit III

‘if only one, her share is a The equation is as follows:

half” __ 1 0 < F[__] ≤ 2 F__ = 1 Y = X M

The peak of x is 1

 Polygyny

The issue of polygyny[270] has perhaps been the most controversial topic since reformers of the nineteenth century began to question the plausibility of Islam’s traditional marriage law. It is certainly one of the key issues that women in the Arab-Muslim world today face in their struggle for liberation and emancipation. If this issue is ever to be resolved once and for all, Muslim-Believers worldwide must come to terms with the modern age and the problems that come with it. The reform we propose is to understand the verses of polygyny, contained in the umm al-kit§b, as Èudåd verses (pointing to upper and lower limits), which allows us to legislate in accordance with concrete historical conditions in society and to appeal to the most noble and universal aspects of all human beings.

The verse of polygyny, or should we say the verse about its abolition, can be found in Sårat al-Nis§”, the fourth såra and hence right at the beginning of the Book. It only consists of one verse, 4:3, and nowhere else in the entire text is polygyny mentioned again. The mistake of traditional exegetes has been to treat this verse consistently detached from its textual context ignoring the preceding verses which discuss how to avoid injustice to orphans. As a result polygyny was legislated for in isolation from the issue of marriages to widowed mothers of orphans and thus in isolation from its divine ratio legis.

In order to rectify this mistake, we will give the reader the exact sequence of the first verses of Sårat al-Nis§”. The såra begins with God’s call to humankind to show reverence to the ‘GuardianLord’:

O [humankind]! Reverence your Guardian-Lord, who created you from a single person, created, of like nature, His mate, and from them twain scattered (like seeds) countless men and women. Reverence God, through whom you demand your mutual (rights), and (reverence) the wombs (that bore you); for God ever watches over you. (Al-Nis§” 4:1)

It continues in verse 2 with a call to humankind not to squander the property of orphans but to take good care of it:

To orphans restore their property (when they reach their age), nor substitute (your) worthless things for (their) good ones; and devour not their substance (by mixing it up) with your won. For this is indeed a great sin. (Al-Nis§” 4:2)

Then comes the crucial third verse in which humankind is ordered to allow marriage to two or three or four wives on condition that people fear that they are unable to deal justly with orphans (the condition is underlined):

If you fear that you shall not be able to deal justly [all§ tuqsiåå] with the orphans, marry women of your choice [m§ ã§ba lakum], two or three or four; but if you fear that you shall not be able to deal justly [all§ ta#dilå] (with them), then only one, or (a captive) that your right hands possess [au m§ malakat aim§nukum], that will be more suitable, to prevent you from [having too great of a burden] [all§ ta#ålå]. (Al-Nis§” 4:3)

Verse 4 follows by ordering the obligation of a bridal gift and asks women to ‘take it and enjoy it with right good cheer’, while verse 5 forbids people from handing over their property to the feeble-minded, but requires them to ‘feed and clothe them, and speak to them words of kindness and justice’.[271] After this, verse 6 returns once more to the question of orphans:

Make trial of orphans until they reach the age of marriage… (Al-Nis§” 4:6)

These verses mention the matter of justice several times, using terms such as qisã and #adl. Both terms are autoantonyms or contranyms, words that have opposite and self-contradictory meanings. The word qisã, for example, can mean both ‘doing justice’ (as in 5:42, ‘For God loves those who judge in equity [al-muqsiåån]’) and ‘doing injustice’ (as in 72:15, ‘But those who swerve [al-q§siåån], they are (but) fuel for Hell-fire’). And #adl denotes ‘equality/balance’ on the one hand, and ‘inequality/imbalance’ on the other. Moreover, there exists a subtle semantic difference between qisã and #adl, even if they both mean ‘justice/equality’: whereas qisã implies that justice is done by only one side of the involved parties, #adl connotes a demonstration of justice by all, or at least two sides. The morphological root of the mathematical term ‘equation’ (mu#§dala), indicating an equality between two sides (as in x=y), can be found in #adl, but not in qisã.

Orphans, whether male or female, are legal minors (children that have not yet reached puberty), and they are fatherless. In the context of al-Nis§” they are orphans whose mother is still alive. Verse 6 says: ‘Make trial of orphans until they reach the age of marriage…’ (Al-Nis§” 4:6), indicating that orphans have not yet reached sexual maturity. And the absence of their father is pointed out in the following verse: ‘As for the wall, it belonged to two youths, orphans, in the town; there was, beneath it, a buried treasure, to which they were entitled—their father had been a righteous man…’ (A l-Kahf 18:82), as well as in the two passages that imply the absence of the guardian who normally takes care of children’s property: ‘And come not nigh to the orphan’s property, except to improve it…’ (A l-An#§m 6:152) and ‘To orphans restore their property (when they reach their age)…’ (4:2).

These verses urge people to take care of orphans’ property as they have become fatherless and are living with their (now widowed) mother. The case that orphans have lost both parents, including their mother, is not covered in the polygyny verse (4:3), because if both parents had died, the question of remarriage would not occur at all, and if they were motherless orphans who stay with their (widowed) father, the father’s steps for a possible remarriage were legally unproblematic and are, therefore, not in any way discussed in the verse.

Allah wants us to be kind to orphans who are minors and who have lost their father, and He wants us to take care of their property until they have reached majority. How are we supposed to do this? If we, for instance, fear that we cannot do justice to all of them equally (‘If you fear that you shall not be able to deal justly (all§ tuqsiãå) with the orphans…’) we may, as the polygyny verse suggests, consider marrying their mothers (‘marry women of your choice’). These men who are addressed here and who are asked to consider marriage to a widowed mother of orphans are men who are already married to one wife and who have children of their own. The verse explicitly says, ‘marry […] two or three or four’, starting to count with two (not one), thereby excluding men who are single and also those who have no children.

Hence, Allah does not give unconditional permission for polygyny. First, he requests that the second, third, or fourth wives are widowed mothers of fatherless minors. Second, such polygynous marriages are only allowed if there is justifiable fear that one cannot give orphans equal shares. If these two conditions are not met a polygynous marriage cannot be considered legally valid.

Allah’s qualification m§ ã§ba lakum, which contains His permission to take more than one wife, has been the subject of lengthy debate among exegetes. It has often been understood as a free license for polygyny in the sense of ‘marry women of your choice’. It is unthinkable for us that God could have meant that men can have as many wives as it pleases them, and that it was revealed to encourage men’s arbitrary selection of whatever woman was available. If Allah had really intended to please men’s sexual desires He would have said: ‘marry women you want’. Instead, He said m§ ã§ba lakum, which means: ‘marry such women as seem good to you’ [AA].[272]

Such expression demands kindness and generosity towards women who have lost their husbands, the provider of the family and the guardian of their children, and who are at the mercy of whatever suitor is willing to take them. ‘As seem good to you’ calls for men’s generosity, an open heart, and their compassion for the plight of the poor women who have to care for their orphaned children. Justice, kindness, and fairness are at the heart of the polygyny verse!

And yet, Allah must have anticipated that this powerful appeal to humanity, as expressed in this verse, might lead to a situation in which some men, in their relentless endeavour to please God, fulfil this obligation and marry widowed women with children without actually having the means to maintain them. This would result in many emotional and economic tensions whereby they are pulled between their own children of their first wife and the adopted orphaned children from their co-wives, resulting in a state of imbalance and injustice.

This is the reason Allah revealed the second part of the verse in which people are advised about the pitfalls of polygyny and are urged to stay monogamous. Some exegetes thought that this refers to the danger that in a polygynous marriage a husband might not give his several co-wives the same conjugal rights. However, the verse is not about equal sexual satisfaction of co-wives but about equality in terms of social and economic justice. The verse deals, after all, with the issue of orphaned children, not with marital problems, since it discusses the question of how to treat orphans justly (that is, equal to the husband's own children). The verse ends with an admonition to avoid injustice by not committing yourself to a polygynous marriage ('to prevent you from [having too great of a burden] [all§ ta#ålå]...', that is from having too many dependents to care for).

The verse of polygyny was intended to solve a crisis in the nascent Islamic community. The Arabian society of the seventh century was exhausted by the many wars that were fought in defence of the new religion, and the streets of Mecca and Medina were full of orphaned children who had lost their fathers on the battlefields. In those difficult years, Allah's revelation of the polygyny verse was a great relief for a society that did not know orphanages or state-sponsored charities for children. The polygyny verse should better be called the verse of adoption because it basically aims at regulating the process of adopting orphaned children into existing families. It does not deal with the marital issue of polygyny as such.

The danger is that this verse is read in isolation from the historical circumstances of its revelation and is interpreted as Allah's eternal order to unconditionally marry up to four wives regardless of the social or historical context (e.g., regardless of whether orphaned children exist or not). It would be extremely irresponsible to allow the practice of polygyny in a society in times of peace when there is no significant numerical imbalance between men and women, where the number of widowed women with small children is insignificantly low, and where there are properly functioning systems of adoption and care through orphanages. Some fuqah§” have fabricated long lists of reasons why men are allowed to marry more than one wife. They have said, for example, that polygyny could be justified if a woman cannot give birth, or if she is chronically ill, or if she has acquired some sort of physical or mental disability. These reasons are in our opinion totally unacceptable and completely against the essence of Allah’s revelation. We need to ask the fuqah§”, ‘why only women’?

Can men not become sterile, barren, and impotent? Are there not men who are disabled or chronically ill? Why do you not allow women to be polygamous and let them marry a second, third, or fourth co-husband?

Let us reiterate that Allah’s main concern was to create justice for orphaned children and to call for mercy for widowed mothers of young children. Polygyny was proposed as a solution to the social dilemma of not being able to care justly for orphans. It was not to solve the sexual problems a marital couple might have! And a restriction to monogamy was issued immediately afterwards covering the situation where a father faced the social problem of an unbalanced treatment between his blood children and the children he adopted. Verse 4:127 of the same såra basically reissues the moral appeal of verses 4:2–6:

They ask you for instruction concerning the women; say: ‘God does instruct you about them. And (remember) what has been rehearsed unto you in the book, concerning the orphans of women [yat§m§ al-nis§”] to whom you give not the portions prescribed, and yet whom you desire to marry, as also concerning the children who are weak and oppressed: that you stand firm for justice [al-qisã] to orphans. There is not a good deed which you do, but God is well-acquainted therewith’. (Al-Nis§” 4:127)

This verse has not escaped the superficial readings of traditional exegetes. Although the verse reiterates the previous call for ‘justice to orphans’ (li-yat§m§ bi’l-qisã) almost word for word, most commentators do not link this verse with 4:2–6, because of their misreading of ‘orphans of women’ (yat§m§ al-nis§”), which they understood to mean ‘orphan women’.[273] There are several considerations that speak against this interpretation by our honourable scholars. The Arabic yat§m§ al-nis§” contains a genitive construct (literally ‘the orphans of the women’) and not an attributive compound of noun and adjective (i.e., women who are orphans, or orphan women). Also, the Arabic term nis§” is the plural of imra”a, a woman who has reached marital age. Orphans, however, are by definition (4:6) not yet of marital age, thus, to call someone an orphan woman is a contradiction in terms, and as nonsensical as to call a male person an ‘orphan man’ (because male orphans are by definition minor boys). In sum, verse 4:127 must be understood in connection with the orphan verses 4:2–6 because both similarly call upon people to stand up for justice to orphans (children!). To interpret 4:127 in the context of orphan women is a mischievous attempt to draw the attention away from the true message of the verse.

* The Application of the Theory of Limits

The verse of polygyny contains an upper and lower limit whose exact definition has to be stated in quantitative and/or qualitative terms.

1. Quantitative limits:

The purely quantitative calculation is based on the passage ‘marry […] two or three or four’, starting with the number two, that is, double the number of the first wife. Since a man cannot marry himself or half a woman, we infer that the lower limit of marriage is one and that the upper limit is four. The separate presentation of each number, ‘marry […] two or three or four’, instead of saying ‘marry up to four’ stresses that we are dealing here with whole numbers, not with fractions, implying a ‘whole’ commitment, not just a ‘fractional’ 0.9, for example. If we prohibited polygyny completely we would still be within Allah’s limits as we would legally (and quantitatively) stand on the lower limit (of one). No verse of the Book explicitly prohibits us from doing so. If we allowed polygyny with up to four women, we would move between Allah’s limits towards the upper limit (of four). By focusing on a purely quantitative interpretation of the polygyny verse, traditional Islamic legislation has done exactly this and has allowed polygynous marriages without any qualitative considerations. The only qualification permitted, with regard to the conditional clause ‘but if you fear that you shall not be able to deal justly’, was to demand a balanced treatment of all co-wives. As this condition is difficult to meet, some schools of law came to the conclusion that one wife should be the norm and that only in exceptional circumstances (see above) should polygynous relationships be permitted. [274]

2. Qualitative limits:

The qualitative limits are defined by the virginal status of the woman. If she is still a virgin she will be treated differently from a woman who has lost her virginity. And if she has lost her virginity, one will have to qualify whether she is a divorced woman or a widow. This qualitative assessment is needed to link the conditional clause ‘If you fear that you shall not be able to deal justly with the orphans…’ to the response ‘[then] marry women of your choice, two or three or four…’. If we include these qualitative criteria in our analysis of polygyny, we come to the following conclusion: 1) with regards to the first wife, no specification is given: she might be a virgin, a divorcée or a widow; 2) the marriage to co-wives two, three and four is, however, qualified by a reference to ‘justice to orphans’, from which we infer that co-wives two to four must be widowed mothers of orphans, women who have lost their virginity. In this case, the quantitative limits are still between one and four, while the qualitative criteria restrict polygynous relationships to marriages of widows with small children. The marriage contract must include the adoption and financial support of the orphaned children by a man who is already married to a first wife.

The chart below shows that legislators are encouraged to issue polygyny laws in the light of the social and cultural conditions of the time. If in times of war we face, for example, a serious shortage of men and a sudden increase of fatherless children, legislators may consider changing laws that prescribe monogamous relationships and introduce laws that allow polygyny of up to four widows. This may include permission to marry more than two widow-wives who have no children at all. Absolutely forbidden are marriages to widows if the potential husband is not willing to adopt the orphans whom the widow wanted to bring into the new marriage.

Chart 1: Legislation of polygyny

<right>

Islamic fiqh, due to historical conditions and limitations, has up to now followed a purely quantitative model of legislating polygyny. Today, social change allows us to combine quantitative and qualitative models

</right>

The Wives of the Prophet (ß)

Some clarifying words are now in order with regards to MuÈammad's (ß) polygynous marriages (to more than four wives) which has caused enormous irritation amongst the critics of Islam in the past. What we need to consider is that MuÈammad's (ß) mission took place during a transition period between two historical epochs of humankind. History has been in two stages: the ages of human civilizations before MuÈammad's (ß) mission and after it. The current age ('after his mission') will last until the coming of the Last Hour. Even though MuÈammad's (ß) messengerhood introduced the beginning of the second historical epoch ('after his mission'), his own marriages were still arranged according to the traditions and customs of the old epoch ('before his mission'). This is confirmed by the following verse:

There can be no difficulty to the prophet in what God has indicated to him as a duty. It was the practice (approved) of God [sunnat All§h] amongst those of old who have passed away. And the command of God is a decree determined. (Al-AÈz§b 33:38)

We should avoid judging his polygynous marriages by the standards and norms of the second historical period he helped to initiate. We should not, for example, postulate that to marry more than four wives was a special dispensation for prophets since this presupposes that a restriction on polygyny was already in place as a norm at MuÈammad's time, but this clearly was not the case. It follows from this that we are not supposed to imitate MuÈammad's (ß) example with regard to his marriages. Note that the above verse explicitly uses the term 'prophet' (al-nabÊy) and not 'messenger' (al-rasål), and we know that only what MuÈammad (ß) did as a messenger is meant to be a role model to be followed by the Muslim-Believers:

You have indeed in the apostle [rasål] of God a beautiful pattern (of conduct)… (Al-AÈz§b 33:21)

Verse 38 of Sårat al-AÈz§b makes the point that Allah had asked His Prophet (ß) to do things that were 'practice amongst those of old who have passed away', which is a clear sign for us not to follow MuÈammad (ß) in that. Two things can be deduced from this:

1. The normative study of the Prophet's (ß) marriages is a pointless exercise because it would inevitably mean to assess his polygynous relationships from the perspective of contemporary norms and practices. It would confuse the standards of his pre-mission marital practices with the post-mission marital norms that his messengerhood (and this excludes his marriages!) aimed to introduce.

2. In as much as MuÈammad's (ß) polygynous marriages cannot be a model for us to follow, the same is true regarding the behaviour of MuÈammad's (ß) wives. Allah says: 'O consorts of the prophet! (y§ nis§" a l-nabÊy!) You are not like any of the (other) women…’ (A l-AÈz§b 33:32). This verse addresses only the ‘women of the prophet’,[275] indicating that no legislation is intended here, just information that is not binding legally (it is just suggested practice).[276]

* Concluding Remarks on Polygyny

We have seen that permission of polygyny is conditional (expressed in the clause ‘if you fear…’). Allah gave it, as we pointed out, in order to solve an acute social problem (surplus of women) in the war-torn society of seventh-century Arabia. It is now up to us to either use Allah’s permission if, and only if, the condition (fear) is fulfilled and the social circumstances are similar. If the condition and circumstances are not given, we must not permit polygyny. This may lead to a situation in which one country will introduce a polygyny law, while another country may abolish it because the country’s political and economic situation is entirely different. In both instances, however, legislators have to back up their decision by statistical data, representative surveys of existing marital relationships, and consultation with the population. If legal decisions are taken on the basis of sound empirical evidence, and a country like Syria allows polygamy while Saudi Arabia prohibits it, we will have to accept that the two legislative decisions, even if contradictory, are both sound. Should the social circumstances in these countries change again, polygyny legislation will have to be reconsidered; therefore neither the decision in Syria nor that in Saudi Arabia is forever fixed and eternally valid.

The dilemma of traditional jurisprudence is that the fuqah§” never bothered to consult people and ask what they think about polygyny. They have been so occupied with the task to implement Allah’s rule on earth, based on their narrow understanding of the concept of È§kimiyya, that they forgot to ask what this rule actually meant for people in their daily life. Far from being a practical solution to real problems, polygyny has become a matter of ‘right or wrong’ (Èar§m au Èal§l), while they ignore the fact that a Èar§m interdiction is allcomprehensive and implies an eternally valid taboo, and that Èal§l allows for changing legislation on the basis of empirical proof, statistical data, and proper parliamentary debate.

As a matter of fact, polygynous relationships are not a matter of ‘right or wrong’. If a country has ruled that polygyny is forbidden (on the grounds that the state provides enough care for orphaned children and sufficient financial support for widowed mothers of small children), a violation of that law must be sanctioned by social disapproval and prosecuted by the state authorities, but it must not be classified (religiously) as ‘adultery’ or ‘sin’. If a country decides to ban polygyny it does not mean, as some claim, to prohibit what Allah has allowed since God gave us the right to legislate in these matters.

If someone, for example, wants to ban smoking in public places (which Allah allowed), this person will have to provide hard evidence for the harmful effects of smoking on people’s health, and on this basis parliament might then decide to ban smoking in pubs, restaurants, and workplaces. Such a ban neither deliberately ignores Allah’s permission nor is it eternally fixed (because one might in future develop a kind of tobacco that is not harmful). One has to draw a fine line between absolutely forbidden things (Èar§m taboos) and those that are temporarily banned (mamnå#). Human legislation can never claim to have stipulated absolute taboos (the prerogative of Allah) because circumstances might change that require new legislation; and those practices (e.g., polygyny, smoking) that used to be permitted might be found to undermine public good, health, and welfare which would necessitate their public ban (although not forever).

We need to understand the status of the prophetical sunna in similar ways. During his lifetime, MuÈammad (ß) exercised ijtih§d in matters of Allah’s permission (by either ordering or banning what Allah had permitted), but none of MuÈammad’s (ß) decisions have eternal validity. Today, prophetical sunna is embodied in the many academic institutions and legislative assemblies that a modern nation-state possesses. Matters of rituals and religious worship are different; they are not part of MuÈammad’s (ß) prophetical sunna (only of his sunna as a messenger) and are therefore dealt with by muftis and their ift§” councils.

 Guardianship or Competence and Leadership (_{AL} - _{QIWA}¯_{MA})

What is frequently forgotten in debates about women in Islam is that the Book of Allah does not privilege one sex over the other. Nowhere does it claim superiority for either sex. Numerous verses address both male and female believers as well as male and female Muslims in an ungendered way, indicating equal status in the eyes of the Lord, and absolute and indiscriminate equality socially and religiously. The following study aims to prove this point against the claim of traditional exegetes, often made solely on the basis of a few isolated verses, that women are inferior to men and that women are 'deficient in reason and religion'. They argue that the verses of inheritance and (male) guardianship support their view that God does indeed differentiate between men and women and that He favours the former over the latter. However, reality has it that the views of medieval scholarship were clouded by an ideology of male dominance and patriarchal hegemony that characterised their entire exegesis and overshadowed their interpretations of the authoritative texts of Islam. Today, in the Islam of the twenty-first century, such forms of sexism and male chauvinism have no credibility any longer, and it is our aim to show that such male-centred interpretations can be fully contradicted by alternative readings which argue for equality and an end to sex discrimination.

Before we analyse the verses of guardianship in detail, we first outline our position on the relationship between men and women. We believe in a relationship of love, kindness, and mutual respect, to the effect that men are like a garment (lib§s) for women and women are like a garment (lib§s) for men. The Arabic term we use here, lib§s, means 'being intertwined' or 'blended together', referring to a symbiosis between your body and the garment you wear. It is taken from verse 187 of Sårat al-Baqara:

Permitted to you, on the night of the fasts, is the approach to your wives. They are your garments [lib§s[un]] and you are their garments [lib§s[un]]... (Al-Baqara 2:187)

A relationship of love, kindness, and mutual respect is a relationship of equality and equivalence (a l-mutak§fi”a) as to how both partners feel, think, and respond to each other. To talk about women as a kind of commodity for men or, less likely, about men as a commodity for women, is the opposite of what we intend by our concept of equivalence.

Let us now turn to the so-called verse of guardianship:

[Al-rij§l] are the [qaww§mån] of [al-nis§”], because God has given the one more (strength) than the other, and because they support them from their means… (Al-Nis§” 4:34)

Also, let us listen to the Book on the issue of the neglect of responsibility (al-nushåz) on the part of the woman, that is, at times when she upholds the duty of qiw§ma:

If you fear a breach between them twain, appoint (two) arbiters, one from his family, and the other from hers; if they wish for peace, God will cause their reconciliation—for God has full knowledge, and is acquainted with all things. (Al-Nis§” 4:35)

Concerning the neglect of responsibility (al-nushåz) on the part of the man, that is, when he is holding the qiw§ma, the Book says:

If a [woman] [imra”a] fears cruelty or desertion [nushåz][277] on her husband’s part [min ba#lih§], there is no blame on them if they arrange an amicable settlement between themselves; and such settlement is best, even though men’s souls are swayed by greed. But if you do good and practise self-restraint, God is well-acquainted with all that you do. (Al-Nis§” 4:128)

Verse 34 of Sårat al-Nis§” begins with a definition of al-qiw§ma, which means ‘to take care of’, ‘to be responsible’, or ‘to be in charge’.[278] It implies that if you take care of something you want to improve it. In verse 34, al-rij§l take care of al-nis§”, that is, the former are responsible for the latter. This has often been understood as ‘men take care of women’. For some naïve people it even expresses a biological superiority that is forever engrained in the constitution of the male sex, and since Allah created both sexes in this way they usually jump to the conclusion that Allah wanted women to be essentially deficient in reason and religion and that He preferred men to women (‘because God has given the one more (strength) than the other’, 4:34). But if Allah had really wanted to make such an essentialist and sexist claim on the basis of people’s gender, why did He not say: ‘All males [i.e., using a different word than rij§l, e.g. dhukår] are the guardian over all females [i.e., again, using a different word, not nis§” but in§th]’?

Defining the Term ‘Men’ (al-rij§l)

Conventional wisdom tells us that ‘men’ are defined by their masculine sexuality. But if masculinity was the only marker of manhood, the two terms ‘male’ and ‘men’ would be synonymous, interchangeable, and, hence, absolutely identical. This, of course, is out of the question since ‘men’ are not exclusively defined by their sex. The Arabic term ‘man’ (rajul) has the same root as the noun rijl, which refers to that part of the body which enables people to move, to walk, or to stand. People are called ‘pedestrians’ if they walk with their legs and feet (arjul), and a woman who walks per pedes is called ‘a woman going on foot’ (al-r§jila). Many verses in the Book use the term rij§l in exactly this way: to denote ‘movement’ regardless of the mover’s sex:

– ‘If you fear (an enemy), pray on foot (rij§l[an]), or riding…’ (Al-Baqara 2:239). If rij§l in this context only meant male sex, it would imply that women never go on foot!

– ‘“And proclaim the pilgrimage among men: they will come to you on foot (rij§l[an])…”’ (Al-Hajj 22:27). Again, if rij§l meant only male pilgrims, would this not exclude women from making the pilgrimage on foot? Of course, women also perform their pilgrimage on foot. Rij§l[an] in this context implies that those who perform the Èajj have to be strong enough to walk long distances; it addresses the stronger and healthier people among the believers (men and women).

– ‘By [the al-rij§l] whom neither traffic nor merchandise can divert from the remembrance of God, nor from regular prayer…’ (Al-Når 24:37). Can only men, in their prayers, not be distracted by traffic and trade? Does this mean, by logical inference, that women are constantly distracted by these things and thus cannot pray properly? Of course not! Al-rij§l in this context again includes both male and female believers!

– [al-rij§l] are the [qaww§mån] of women [al-nis§”]. Given the above examples of an ungendered usage of a l-rij§l, we maintain that the same term, used in 4:34, must refer to both sexes![279]

In contrast, other verses of the Book do have a gendered meaning; the term rij§l refers to male adults and the term nis§” to female adults, as we can see in the following three examples:

– …and if there are not two men, then a man [fa-rajul] and two women [imra”at§n]… (Al-Baqara 2:282) – …Had there not been believing men [rij§l] and believing women [nis§”] … (Al-FatÈ 48:25)

– Would you really approach men [a l-rij§l] in your lusts rather than women [al-nis§”]?… (Al-Naml 27:55)

The point we want to make is that the terms rajul-rij§l (sing.-pl.) are semantically not exclusively restricted to denote maleness. The generic sense of the term is ‘to walk’ or ‘to go on foot’ which is in neither case a prerogative of the male sex. As we have seen in the verses quoted above, the context will tell us whether rajul-rij§l is used in the generic, ungendered sense of ‘walking’ / ‘going on foot’ or whether its derivative, gendered sense ‘male adult’ is implied. The fact that in public life in the past men did all the walking to earn their living for family and wife (who stayed at home or did not walk when on travel), might explain why the generic sense (on foot) is almost always associated with the derivative sense (men). And yet to claim that this is the only sense of the term would mean, as we have seen, to amputate its meaning by half.

* Defining the Term ‘Women’ (al-nis§”)

The Arabic term al-nis§” is the plural of two different singular terms: first, of a l-mar”a (woman) and, second, of a l-nasÊ” (deferment). The latter term refers to things that are delayed or postponed, for example, we say, ‘the delivery has been postponed’ or ‘Zayd is late’. Verse 9:37 uses al-nasÊ” in this sense: ‘Verily the transposing (of a prohibited month) (al-nasÊ” [u]) is an addition to unbelief…’ (Al-Tawba 9:37). And a ÈadÊth, if authentic, states, ‘Whoever likes his provision to be increased and his life to be extended (yansa’, i.e., his death postponed), should uphold the ties of kinship.’[280] The former term, in contrast, refers either to the opposite partner of men (i.e., women, but in the sense of men’s social, nonsexual companion) or to the plural of woman (as a collective term), while, incidentally, the feminine singular imra”a (woman) has the same root as the male singular imru” (man).

The conventional—and rather primitive—rendering of the creation story wants us to believe that Adam was created before his wife. According to this story, she was formed out of his ribs and thus entered the world after him. Women were thought to be those who ‘come after’, ‘lag behind’ or are ‘delayed’, a misconception to which the following verse was believed to give full support:

O [humankind]! Reverence your Guardian-Lord, who created you from a single person, created, of like nature, his mate… (Al-Nis§” 4:1)

A more objective (scientific) understanding, however, can prove that at the beginning of creation there was no division into male and female creatures. The first organisms were all single celled. They increased in their number not by copulation and fertilisation but through cell division (mitosis). Only when evolution had reached the stage by which animals and humans reproduced life through procreative intercourse do we witness a (simultaneous) split into a male and female sex. In evolutionary terms, the traditional creation story simply does not make sense. Also, it is a biological fact that male sperms always produce embryos that initially are both male and female (some scientists even claim that they are initially all female). Thus, scientific research on the early stages of embryonic development also contradicts the hypothetical ‘male first, female second’ story.

As said before, the term nis§” expresses the notion of delay, deferral, or postponement, and can refer to basically everything that might ‘come later’. We propose to understand nis§” in this sense when we look at 3:14, which uses the term nis§” when talking about people’s ‘love of things’ and objects ‘eagerly desired’:

Fair in the eyes of men [zuyyina li’l-n§s] is the love of things they covet: [a l-nis§”] and sons; heaped-up hoards of gold and silver; horses branded (for blood and excellence); and (wealth of) cattle and [a bonus in crops of wheat]. Such are the possessions of this world’s life; but in nearness to God is the best of the goals (to return to). ($l #Imr§n 3:14)

In this context nis§” cannot possibly mean ‘women’.[281] First, because such a rendering would ignore the fact that the verse speaks about the desires of all people (al-n§s!), men and women, and not just men.[282] Second, it would turn women into commodities and goods of pleasure that are no more than ‘heaped-up hoards of gold and silver’, and on a par with ‘horses, cattle and well-tilled land’. However tempting it must be for some of the fuqah§” and many sexist exegetes to regard women as part of their livestock (ranked as equals with cows, sheep, donkeys, oxen, and mules), we should resist such a ridiculous interpretation of Allah’s speech. Instead, nis§” here literally means ‘things that arrive last’, that is, goods of the latest fashion.

The verse is absolutely accurate in saying that people in general, not just men (!), want to purchase the most recent models (cars, mobile phones, clothes, CD-players, designer spectacles, etc.). All over the world, people want to follow the latest fashion and look down on things that are ‘last year’. This implies an endless cycle of consumption because what is ‘hot’ in one year is old and ‘out’ in the next, when it will be replaced by the new arrivals, by what ‘follows next’

(al-nis§”).

Al-Nis§” can also refer to people who ‘come next’ or ‘follow behind’, as in the following verse:

And say to the believing women that they should lower their gaze and guard their modesty… [in front of] their women [sic] [au nis§“ihunna]… (Al-Når 24:31)

This verse addresses the ‘believing women’ who should lower their gaze and guard their private parts. It then mentions those relatives in front of whom women are allowed to reveal their zÊna (explained later), one group being described as nis§“ihunna, usually translated as ‘their [i.e. the believing women’s] women’.[283] But is it correct to say ‘women’s women”? If we look at the sequence of the people given: …except their husbands, their fathers, their husbands’ fathers, their sons, their husbands’ sons, their brothers, their brothers’ sons, their sisters’ sons, their nis§”…, we notice that the verse does not continue to list those ‘who come next’, that is, the sons of the sons, or the sons of the brothers’ sons, or the sons of the sisters' sons, and so on; and what could have potentially become an endless list is efficiently condensed into the phrase 'and those who follow next' (nis§”). The same applies to verse 55 of Sårat al-AÈz§b, 'There is no blame (on these ladies if they appear)… [in front of] nis§“ihunna… (33:55); the term nis§” here refers again to those male relatives who 'follow those mentioned before'.

The Verse of Guardianship (4:34)

Having defined the crucial terms of nis§” and rij§l, we are now in a position to understand the verse of guardianship:

[Al-rij§l] are the protectors and maintainers [qaww§mån] of [a l-nis§”], because God has given the one more (strength) than the other, and because they support them from their means. Therefore the righteous women are [q§nit§t], and guard […] what God would have them guard. As to those women on whose part you fear […] ill-conduct, admonish them (first). (Next), refuse to share their beds, (and last) beat them (lightly) [sic]; but if they return […], seek not against them means (of annoyance)—for God is most high, great (above you all). (A l-Nis§” 4:34)

We have ruled out the possibility that the first line of this verse can be interpreted as 'Men are the protectors and maintainers of women', because each of the two terms al-rij§l and al-nis§” refer to both men and women in this context. Let us say it again: to assume that al-rij§l means 'men' and al-nis§” 'women' is a serious mistake because in this verse both terms are not gendered: al-rij§l refers to both men and women, and al-nis§” means 'those who follow behind'. We need, of course, to identify the middle term that connects al-rij§l and al-nis§”. We know that the qaww§mån are 'those in charge' or 'those with power and competence'. Many well-meaning feminists have tried to reverse the supposed sexism of the verse and claim that qaww§mån means 'standing in service', implying that men are not the masters but in fact the servants of women. This may sound quite appealing to some but it is frankly very far-fetched. It still suggests that one should keep a division between men and women, even if husbands are now the alleged servants of their wives. It also fundamentally contradicts the next line of the verse, ‘God has given to some [the rij§l] more than others [the nis§”]’ [AH]. Such preference given by God is incompatible with the notion of servitude. Some have claimed that this verse makes it clear that Islam, in contrast with other religions and cultures, does not want gender equality and hence treats men and women differently. We object to this because the verse does not exclusively address ‘male believers’ (mu”minån) and ‘female believers’ (mu”min§t), the followers of MuÈammad (ß), but rather men and women in general. For us this implies that the verse must have a high degree of universality, to the extent that it is as applicable to men and women in Tokyo or São Paulo as it is to men and women in Cairo, Damascus, or Riyadh. Thus, we are not allowed to claim a higher or different status for the religion of MuÈammad’s (ß) followers. If we keep referring only to the context of Mecca and Medina of the seventh century while reading God’s revelation, we are bound to loose the Book’s universal message which is valid in all places and at all times.

The second line, ‘God has given to some more than [some] o thers’, is for some exegetes an indication of God’s preference of men to women. Since their interpretation of the first line is essentially gendered, they claim that God’s preference for men explains why men are in charge of women, since it is, in their view, clearly stated in the first line. This ignores the fact that the text says ‘some’ and not #all’. According to the scholars’ interpretation it would imply that God prefers ‘some’ men to ‘some’ women. The question would then be who these chosen men are, and who are the men whom God does not favour? Also, who are the (other) women God prefers to men? Since we cannot know the answer to these questions, such interpretation must be immediately discarded. What is indeed correct to say is that God has given to some men and women more (strength) than to other men and women. This view is supported by the following verse:

See how We have bestowed more on some than on others; but verily the Hereafter is more in rank and gradation and more in excellence. (Al-Isr§” 17:21)

Having dismissed the notion that Allah puts men in charge of women, we are now able to provide an ungendered explanation of Allah’s preference. Since al-rij§l refers to both men and women, we believe that high competence, moral strength, determination, education, and strong cultural awareness will always put some men and women in charge of others who do not excel in these things at the same level. People are very different in this respect; some men and women will always outperform others in their activities; some women are stronger than other women and other men; some men are stronger than other women and (other) men because ‘God has given to some more than others’.

The same applies to financial and economic power. Some people will always have more than others. This is what line 3 says: ‘because they [the qaww§mån] support them [the others] from their means’. Financial power is not, however, always coupled with cultural competence. Rich tycoons who own several companies, for example, are often incapable of running their business without the help of more competent and better-qualified people. And yet, because of their financial prowess they will remain in charge (qiw§ma) and dictate the overall strategies of their companies. Financial and economic power can be found in every level of society, in families, small businesses, political parties, sports clubs, international companies, and so on, and is exercised in most cases heedless of cultural competence.

The point we want to stress is that qaww§ma is not, as traditional exegesis suggests, only located within the realm of family and between husband and wife. Guardianship is found everywhere where cultural competence and financial power are necessary: in schools, universities, farms, factories, football clubs, ministries, hospitals, nurseries, banks, insurance companies, and estate agencies, that is, basically in all aspects of society. The universal aspect of our notion of guardianship lies in the fact that we find examples of cultural and financial strength everywhere in history, be it in ancient Rome, Palmyra, or Tsarist Russia, and also everywhere on the planet, be it in Egypt, Syria, England, Turkey, India, Pakistan, or Indonesia. This proves how absurd it is to identify guardianship solely with the male sex and conclude from this an essential (and everlasting) superiority of men over women.

Some exegetes have tried to justify their misogynist views by referring to verse 36 of Sårat $l #Imr§n which, in their opinion, reiterates Allah's preference of boys to girls:

…but when she gave birth, she said, 'My Lord! I have given birth to a girl"—God knew best what she had given birth to: the male is not like the female [wa-laisa 'l-dhakar ka'l-unth§]—I name her Mary… ($l #Imr§n 3:36, AH)

Halfway through the verse it is said, 'the male is not like the female'. Opinions differ about whether this is said by #Imr§n's wife (who, by a miracle, conceives a child from God) or, in parentheses, by Allah Himself. Either way, it is, we believe, powerful speech that contains a powerful message (regardless of who actually said it). More problematic is that the text is believed to discriminate against girls by stating a clear preference for boys ('males are different' is thought to express 'males are better'). In fact, if the text states a preference at all, it is the other way around! What has been overlooked is the fact that the text compares boys with girls, and not girls with boys. And if boys are compared to girls and found wanting ('males are different'), preference is, implied by such a negative reading, given to those to whom boys cannot be compared (the girls!). Note that we have mentioned a similar case of God's preference in our discussion of inheritance laws, by which the shares of the male heirs are always determined by the shares of the female heirs.

In the past, life was characterised by hard work and physical labour. This meant that, at least in terms of public presence, men had an advantage over women. Because of such physical superiority and public dominance, al-rij§l and qiw§ma were naturally associated with men. However, things have changed and technological progress has wiped out the advantage that physical labour once had over what used to be considered 'soft' work: education, administration, service, and intellectual and creative activities. Women are now not only active in almost all branches of industry, commerce, and agriculture, they have also taken up leading positions in politics and in the city’s boardrooms. Moreover, data from medical and educational research show that we can once and for all discard the myth that women are biologically and intellectually disadvantaged: women live longer than men, suffer less often from heart diseases, and girls do better in almost all school and university exams.

As for guardianship on the level of the family, research has shown that children are happier if both parents do the housework together, if they show kindness and respect to each other, and if at least one parent is willing to put in the hard work, to show a high degree of family commitment, and to provide strong leadership. And yet, not everyone is willing or able to take on the same amount of responsibility because some are naturally better than others in organising family life. In some families there are strong husbands who provide the necessary leadership, in others it will be the wife who takes up this role. And if both have strong personalities and high social and emotional competence, they will, following the principle of equivalence, make their decisions together. We therefore interpret ‘guardians’ as follows: Those who have strength, competence, and power (male or female) who will provide leadership to ‘those who follow them’ or ‘those who come after them’ (a l-nis§”) in terms of ability and competence (male or female). God gave more to those who possess qaww§ma (male or female) than others.[284] The gist of our argument is that rather than defining ‘guardianship’ as a characteristic of men, we believe that women can acquire it as well. This is supported by line 4 of our verse:

‘Righteous women [fa’l-ß§liÈ§t] are devout [q§nit§t] and guard what God would have them guard in their husband’s [sic] absence [È§fií§t li’l-ghayb]…’. [AH]

Righteous women are not those who are obedient[285] or who pray, fast, and give alms, as many exegetes have it, but those who possess qiw§ma (this is the theme of the verse after all), that is, those who do competent work and provide leadership. The crucial term is ß§liÈ§t, which many, too hastily, have understood as ‘devout and pious women who pray and fast’. But a comparison to Sårat Al-Anbiy§” reveals that this is incorrect:

<quote>

And (remember) Zakariya, when he cried to his Lord: “O my Lord! Leave me not without offspring, though you are the best of inheritors.”

* So We listened to him and We granted him YaÈy§. We cured [aßlaÈn§] his wife’s (barrenness) for him… (Al-Anbiy§” 21:89–90)

</quote>

The term ß§liÈ§t means here that Allah cured (aßlaÈa) Zakariya’s wife from her barrenness. This surely does not imply that Allah’s cure made her pray and fast! Instead, the passage tells us what righteous women do who possess qiw§ma, that is, those to whom God has given special skills and the power of leadership: they ‘guard what God would have them guard’, what God has given to them in terms of special gifts and talents. And if they keep and use their talents for the benefit of all, they are ‘righteous women’ (ß§liÈ§t).

What happens, however, if a woman does not possess these qualities and skills? What if she once had all that characterises good guardianship but lost it by wasting her skills and talents? In this case, a woman becomes what the Book calls a n§shiza, a woman who, because of her negative behaviour, is unfaithful to her talents and who rebels against her good nature. Having addressed righteous women, verse (4:34) continues by saying, ‘if you fear high-handedness (nushåz) from your wives [sic]’ [AH]. It basically says that nushåz women squander God’s special gifts and do not ‘guard what God would have them guard’. The rest of the verse explains the procedure of dealing with the problem of nushåz:

…admonish them (first). (Next), refuse to share their beds, (and last) [i·ribåhunna]; but if they return […], seek not against them means (of annoyance)—for God is most high, great (above you all). (A l-Nis§” 4:34)

By exclusively attaching this verse to the realm of marital relationship, some exegetes thought that nushåz meant a wife’s refusal to obey her husband’s orders.[286] However, marital disobedience is not at all the theme of the verse, which in fact focuses on a description of general leadership and guardianship. Also, nushåz connotes a much wider meaning of disapproval and discord than just marital disobedience, which is evident in the following verse:

O you who believe! When you are told to make room in the assemblies, (spread out and) make room: (ample) room will God provide for you. And when you are told to rise up [unshuzå], rise up [unshuzå]. God will rise up… (Al-Muj§dila 58:11)

This is evidence enough to suggest that nushåz cannot be rendered as the state of a wife’s recalcitrance or, as some traditionalists suggest, as her refusal to pray, fast, and pay zak§h. It is definitely not, as al-SuyåtÊ claimed, a form of female disobedience that needs to be disciplined by her husband’s firm hand and, if needed, by corporal punishment. It is closer to the truth, and to the spirit of the whole verse, to say that nushåz means the lack of qiw§ma in a woman. If she has lost her temper and has turned into an unkind, impatient, and pretentious person, she has lost her qiw§ma. If she has become selfopinionated and high-handed in everything she does, and takes all her decisions autocratically, she has also lost qiw§ma. This may be paralleled by the loss of qunåt, as explained in the previous line, that is, of ‘what God asked her to preserve’, for example, if a wife gossips and reveals marital secrets to other people. The important point to stress is that all women can become guilty of nushåz (whether they are married or not), be they sisters who are rude to their brothers, mothers who are mean to their children, or grandmothers who treat their children and grandchildren with disdain and disrespect.

The verse indicates what needs to be done in these circumstances: admonition and warning advice first, then, if the woman is married, a refusal to share her bed. Finally, if these things fail, she should be punished by the withdrawal of her right of guardianship. These three steps of solving the crisis only make sense if we accept that women actually possess qiw§ma, because if they did not, if qiw§ma, the provision of strong leadership and financial power, was the sole prerogative of men, the suggested solutions to the problem of nushåz would be entirely pointless.

The third step (withdrawal of guardianship) is stated in the Arabic text with the phrase wa-”·ribåhunna. This is conventionally understood to mean ‘to beat them’, either by a slap of the hand, a punch with the fist, or a blow with a stick. What has escaped most traditional exegetes is the fact that the verb ·araba is so polyvalent that it is ridiculous to reduce its meaning to the physical act of ‘beating’. A few examples will prove this point: ·araba Èaqn[an] means ‘to give an injection’; ·araba fi’l-“ar· means ‘to travel the world’; ·araba ·arÊba means ‘to impose a tax’; ·araba mathal[an] means ‘to apply a proverb’; and ·araba mith§l[an] means ‘to quote an example’. How on earth could scholars like a l-SuyåãÊ think that ‘to beat’ or ‘to strike’ is the only possible rendering of the verb ·araba?

Did they not consult the example of the Prophet (ß) who, after he heard that his companions had applied this verse too literally by beating their female slaves, rebuked them saying, ‘Do not beat Allah’s handmaidens’.[287] Provided that this ÈadÊth is sound, did our exegetes really think that MuÈammad (ß) would so unashamedly contradict Allah’s command of 4:34 (‘beat them’)? In reality, there is no contradiction between the Prophet’s (ß) interdiction not to beat women and Allah’s verse 4:34, which does not talk of physical punishment at all. To say that wa-”·ribåhunna literally means ‘beat your wives’ is a scandalous example of male biased exegesis.[288] Because of the fact that male chauvinism was culturally incubated, enacted and tolerated at the time of their writing, traditional exegetes like al-SuyåãÊ were bound to make the most misogynist reading of the verse and project their hostility to women onto the text. Little has been done to change this attitude. Some attempts have been made to explain beating as a ‘slight touch’ on the woman’s arm or face or, even more bizarre, as a gentle tap with ‘a toothpick”! However hard people have tried to present the beating as less harsh forms of corporal punishment, the tendency to denigrate women as a different kind of house pet which needs to be domesticated and if required, disciplined, did not change.

This goes entirely against the way in which nushåz of women is treated in other countries of the world. Men can always take a firm stand against women who haughtily refuse to cooperate with other men and women without using violence. And this is exactly what the verse suggests: if women abuse the gifts and talents of qiw§ma, of which ‘Allah has given to them more than others’, and if they squander their potential for leadership, their intellectual skills, or their financial resources, one should 1) warn them, 2) reduce contact with them, 3) establish a firm but nonaggressive and nonviolent resistance against their nushåz. If all of this fails the Book recommends the possibility of arbitration in the verse that follows:

If you fear a breach between them twain, appoint (two) arbiters, one from his family, and the other from hers; if they wish for peace, God will cause their reconciliation. For God has full knowledge, and is acquainted with all things. (Al-Nis§” 4:35)

So far we have only covered the nushåz of women. What about the nushåz of men? A reference to this can be found in verse 128 of Surat al-Nis§”:

If a wife [sic] [imra”at [un]] fears cruelty [nushåz[an]][289] or desertion [i#r§· [an]] on her husband’s part [min ba#lih§], there is no blame on them if they arrange an amicable settlement between themselves; and such settlement is best; even though men’s souls are swayed by greed. But if you do good and practise self-restraint, God is well-acquainted with all that you do. (Al-Nis§” 4:128)

The text does not use the sexually charged terms for wife/husband (zawja/zawj) but uses the terms imra”at [un][] (woman) and ba#l (nonconjugal partner). [290] Both terms describe a wider category of relationship than zawja/zawj. The term used to describe the object of a woman’s fear is ba#l (partner) which is not identical with zawj, her conjugal husband. In the context of a family relationship, a l-ba#l connotes someone who earns a living, who eats, drinks, plays with the children, and has close contacts with each member of the family. If such a ba#l marries the woman of the family, he becomes al-zawj, her conjugal husband. Every zawj husband is legally also a ba#l, but not every ba#l is a zawj (husband with whom she has sexual intercourse). One may describe the ba#l relationship between a woman and a man as nonsexual, as a friendship or acquaintance that has no sexual implications. Even between sexually active spouses there might be ba#l moments, that is, when they cannot exchange intimacies, for example, in front of their children or in public. Also, a husband who has become too old to have sex, resumes the status of a ba#l he had before he married his wife (even though, legally, he remains the husband of his wife). The following verse makes it clear that zawj refers to those who have licit sexual intercourse with their wives:

And those who guard their [lower] private parts [li-furåjihim È§fiíån], * except from their wives and what their right hands possess [azw§jihim]. [For these] they are not blameworthy… (Al-Mu”minån 23:5–6) [FM]

In contrast, the text uses ba#l when it refers to men in front of whom a women does not need to cover her private parts because no sexual complications are to be feared:

…[they should] not display their [bodily] beauty [zÊnatahunna] [291] except to their husbands [li-bu#ålatihinna], their fathers, their husband’s fathers

[ab§” bu#ålatihinna]… (Al-Når 24:31)

The verse lists a woman’s male relatives to whom she is not prohibited to show her zÊna: to her brother, her father, her son, the father of her husband, and so forth. In the context of this list a woman’s husband, by necessity, assumes the status of a ba#l because a zawj husband with all his conjugal rights would be allowed to see his wife entirely naked and would not need an explicit (thus, redundant) permission to see other parts of her body! Verse 72 of Surat Håd gives us an example of how precisely the Book distinguishes between zawj and ba#l; we notice how Abraham, when he had passed his sexually active years, was now called by his wife her ba#l husband, not any longer her zawj husband:

She said: “Alas for me! Shall I bear a child, seeing I am an old woman, and my husband here [ba#lÊ] is an old man?… (Håd 11:72)

Another example can be found in 2:228 in which divorced husbands are categorised as ba#l, not as zawj, since it is clear that they have ceased to have sexual intercourse with their former wives:

Divorced women shall wait concerning themselves for three monthly periods. Nor is it lawful for them to hide what God has created in their wombs, if they have faith in God and the Last Day. And their husbands [bu#ålatuhunna] have the better right to take them back in that period… (Al-Baqara 2:228)

Divorced husbands may still have close contacts to their divorced wives and their children, they may even continue to be the breadwinner of the family, and in some cases they may even still live in the same house as the rest of the family, but mostly their (sexual) intimacy with their former wives has stopped. The term that uniquely signifies this special relationship between a men and a woman is ba#l.

Since the verse in question (4:128) uses the term ba#l, not zawj, we can now safely say that contrary to popular belief, it does not discuss the sexual relationship between a wife and her husband. Instead it addresses a woman's social relationship with the ba#l provider of the family who possesses qiw§ma. Two things that can put a strain on such a relationship are mentioned:

3. Nushåz: a man becomes a despot and a tyrant to his family, which results in (complete) loss of freedom: the woman is not allowed, without his prior consent, to do anything in the household, not even the smallest things of everyday life. Good leadership (qiw§ma) is thus lost and has turned into bad leadership.

4. Neglect: a man does not fulfil his duties: he is absent from work, irresponsibly spends money that he has not earned himself and is—as the Arabs say—'swept around by the winds of the day'.

A woman can respond to this dreadful situation in two ways. She can accept it and regard it as God-given. This is, unfortunately, what most women in the Arab world do, despite the fact that the Book encourages them to actively try to seek a way out of the predicament (e.g., 'there is no blame on them if they arrange an amicable settlement between themselves; and such settlement is best…' [Al-Nis§" 4:128]). Or, alternatively, she can refuse to accept it and strongly object to his lack of respect, his despotic attitudes, and his neglect of his family duties. The Book instructs women what to do in this situation. It resolutely urges women to be firm in their protest and to seek 'a peaceful settlement, for peace is best' (4:128, AH).

Finally, it is absolutely vital to consider those situations in which an amicable agreement cannot be reached. The text mentions cases when ‘men’s souls are swayed by greed’ (4:128). In this context ‘greed’ must be interpreted as a man’s denial of any wrongdoing on his part. He blames the woman for the breakdown of their relationship while claiming all goodness for himself. In front of an arbiter, who wants to reconcile the two parties, the man admits no fault in his own behaviour, resists all attempts at change, and avoids reflection on the things that have gone wrong in his relationship. Such behaviour makes it extremely difficult, if not totally impossible, to mediate and reconcile the differences.

It is most intriguing to see that our verse ends with Allah’s encouragement to practice self-restraint, and that the next verse (4:129) continues the theme by advising against the practice of polygyny. It is as if polygyny is seen as one of the reasons why men forget their duties and neglect their families.

But if you do good and practise self-restraint, God is well-acquainted with all that you do. (Al-Nis§” 4:128)

You are never able to be fair and just as between women, even if it is your ardent desire: But turn not away (from a woman) altogether, so as to leave her (as it were) hanging (in the air). If you come to a friendly understanding, and practise self-restraint, God is oft-forgiving, most merciful. (Al-Nis§” 4:129)

It should be stressed again that the problem of ‘injustice between women’ is not primarily sexual negligence. Injustice is caused by negligence regarding all the other aspects of family life: care for children, support of elderly people in the family, provision of food and clothes, mortgage payments, and so on. This is exactly how the previous verse defined men’s nushåz and neglect as the two reasons why men have lost their qiw§ma.

The use of the conditional phrase ‘but if you do good…’ in 4:128 indicates that Allah accepts that reconciliation is only a possibility and not a foregone conclusion. Many things can go wrong at this stage, and even if it is preferable that a family stay together, it cannot always be achieved by all the will in the world. The next verse 4:130 confirms that at some junctures separation is inevitable:

But if they disagree (and must part), God will provide abundance for all from His all-reaching bounty: for God is He that cares for all and is wise. (Al-Nis§” 4:130)

Again, the position of women provides the rationale for this verse. If they have been treated badly, if men have been cruel to them or have neglected them, it is they who are entitled to ask for a divorce and request half of their husbands’ possessions—and not only the remainder of their bridal gift—as compensation paid to them as divorced women (because of their status as co-partners). We believe that current divorce practices are intolerable. Ironically, our Imams and preachers keep enthusiastically praising the role of women in Islam, presenting them as equal partners of men and as enjoying the same rights as men both in public life and at home. But as soon as divorce procedures are mentioned all such talk of equality suddenly stops, women are no longer equal partners, and it is soon forgotten that they own half the men’s property. What is granted to a divorced woman, if she gets anything at all, is just what remains of her dowry,[292] even if it is sometimes no more than a ring made of nickel. For a woman to demand a divorce is still seen as an affront, a deviation, a crime that must not be rewarded by any form of financial support. Hence, divorced women very often end up with nothing at all.[293] We believe, however, that women have every right to ask for a divorce if they have been treated badly (nushåz) or suffered because of their husbands’ negligence (i#r§·). And we believe that divorced women should get all the rights and provisions that modern family law allows, and that includes her right to stay in the house of her husband (unless she has become guilty of ‘open lewdness’), as is prescribed by the first verse of Sårat al-•al§q:

O Prophet! When you do divorce women, divorce them at their p rescribed periods, and count (accurately), their prescribed periods: And fear God your Lord: and turn them not out of their houses [buyåtihinna], nor shall they (themselves) leave, except in case they are guilty of some open lewdness, those are the limits set by God… (A l-•al§q 65:1)

Note that the verse speaks about ‘their (the women’s) houses’, not about ‘your (the men’s) houses’, even though the speech is only addressed to men!

 Dress Norms for Women (_{LIB}§_S)

The Issue of Women’s Headscarf (Èij§b)

Muslim women’s headscarf, called al-Èij§b, has become almost synonymous with the Islamic dress code for women. However, this contradicts the fact that in the Book, in all eight occurrences, al-Èij§b does not refer to a piece of cloth at all. When the text does address questions of dress code it uses other terms, such as al-thiy§b (outer garment), a l-jal§bÊb (galabia), or a l-khumår (veil). Why have exegetes been so obsessed with treating al-hij§b as a piece of cloth?[294]

Arabic dictionaries tell us that the root meaning of È-j-b is: ‘to guard’ or ‘to protect’; È§jib means ‘gatekeeper’, someone who guards an entrance and keeps out unwanted people; Èij§bat al-ka#ba was the name for the office of the gatekeeper of the Ka#ba in Mecca, whose task it was to protect the Ka#ba by ‘standing between the pilgrims and the sacred shrine’. In sum, everything that ‘comes between two things’ and keeps them apart is called a Èij§b, as the following examples from the Book underline:

The companions of the Garden will call out to the companions of the Fire: “We have indeed found the promises of our Lord to us true; have you also found your Lord’s promises true?” They shall say, “Yes”; but a crier shall proclaim between them: “The curse of God is on the wrong-doers.” (Al-A#r§f 7:44)

Between them shall be a veil [Èij§b [un]], and on the heights will be men who would know every one by his marks; they will call out to the companions of the Garden, “peace on you”: they will not have entered, but they will have an assurance (thereof).* When their eyes shall be turned towards the companions of the Fire, they will say: “Our Lord! Send us not to the company of the wrong-doers.” (Al-A#r§f 7:46–47)

In the context of these three verses, a l-Èij§b separates the companions of the Garden from the companions of the Fire. We understand that the ‘veil’ mentioned does not prevent the two groups from seeing and hearing each other or, as the following verse shows, from full, open interaction:

The companions of the Fire will call to the companions of the Garden: “Pour down to us water or anything that God does provide for your sustenance.” They will say: “Both these things has God forbidden to those who rejected Him.” (Al-A#r§f 7:50)

Another verse from Sårat al-Isr§” talks about ‘a veil invisible’ in the hearts of people who are not moved by the recitation of the qur”§n:

When you recite the qur”§n, We put, between you and those who believe not in the Hereafter, a veil invisible [Èij§b [an] mastår[an]]. (Al-Isr§” 17:45)

In this context, Èij§b is more like a natural disposition or a character trait that Allah has created so that the hearts of the unbelievers cannot recognise the beauty of the Book’s dhikr. And yet, they could still see and hear MuÈammad (ß)! These examples show that in the Book the term a l-Èij§b, in its meaning of ‘veil’, ‘curtain’, or ‘screen’, is primarily employed in its figurative, metaphoric sense, so much so that a literal interpretation as ‘a piece of cloth’ or ‘headscarf’ is completely untenable. We will therefore put al-Èij§b aside and concentrate instead on the term a l-lib§s and its association with women’s clothes.

Before we present our analysis let us reiterate the five cornerstones of our methodology:

1. We avoid a synonymous understanding of words in the Book. We maintain that there are semantic differences between terms that supposedly are synonyms, such as thiy§b (outer garment) and lib§s (raiment); saw”a (shame) and #awra (embarrassment); ba#l (nonconjugal husband) and zawj (conjugal husband), and so forth.

2. We maintain that the context in which words appear confines the meaning of polysemous words. For example, the term a l-lib§s in the following verse, meaning ‘raiment of righteousness’, needs to be understood in a figurative way. The context makes it clear that it does not literally mean ‘shirts’ or ‘trousers’:

O you children of Adam! We have [made you aware of] [anzaln§ #alaikum lib§s[an]] how to cover your shame, as well as to be an adornment to you. But the raiment of righteousness [lib§s al-taqw§]—that is the best. Such are among the signs of God, that they may receive admonition! (Al-A#r§f 7:26)

3. We stress the need to distinguish between absolute, divine law (Èar§m-Èal§l), which is the prerogative of Allah, and time-bound, contingent law (amr-nahy; Èasan-qubÈ), which is the realm of human legislation (see chapter 2).

4. We remove the mantle of sacrality from the body of medieval scholarship. What these scholars wrote is subject to criticism, correction, and revision because scholars can err and misunderstand. Human beings are fallible; they are forgetful, inattentive, and negligent. We must not give them the aura of infallibility.

5. We only attach sacrality to Allah and His Book. Divine sacrality is stored inside the text of the Book. It cannot be transferred to anything or anyone outside the text, for whatever reason and on whichever pretext.

The Problem of Original Sin

The imposition of a specific dress code on women has often been justified by references to the story of Adam and Eve and to the original sin of humankind. It is therefore important that we revisit the evidence given for this and then decide whether it withstands close scrutiny. Historians of religion will tell us that not all religious traditions accept the notion of humankind's original sin, and that those which do have various versions of the story that do not necessarily make women responsible for the original sin. The Old Persian religions, such as Zoroastrianism, Manichaeism, and Mazdaism, or the ancient Indian religions, such as Vedanta-Hinduism, Brahmanism, and Buddhism, do not posses any mythological account of the existence of an original sin, nor do they blame women for any sort of ur-sin. Nevertheless, many of them regard women as essentially inferior to men in their attempt to achieve sacredness, as a result of which women are asked to put a veil over their mouth and nose so that they cannot poison with their breath the sacred flame that burns for men. Socially, such inferiority has been translated into servitude, such that women have been forced to serve their (male) masters as if they were gods.[295]

Judaism was the first religion which attached the stigma of original sin to the cunning nature of women, and Christianity followed by basically accepting the account of the Old Testament. Centuries later, when Jews and Christians converted to the new religion of MuÈammad's (ß) mission, this story sneaked into the collective consciousness of Qur'anic exegetes and remained there for centuries, despite the fact that there is no textual evidence for any such misogynist rhetoric in the Book. The story can be found in Genesis 1–19, telling the reader how Eve's disobedience led to God’s curse on every living being on earth. The blame which Jewish exegetes threw at Eve because of her sin was extended to include all women on earth. Women were thought to naturally symbolise the disobedient behaviour of their female ancestor, and as a result it was thought best to restrain women by containment, repressive dress codes, and a position of servitude toward the man of the house. The view of men’s spiritual vulnerability by a woman’s appearance was deeply rooted in folk tradition and official doctrine, creating a culture in which a woman was seen as an ambassador of death. Her heart was portrayed as a hidden trap, her hands as shackles, and her whole body as an image of seduction from which the righteous soul can only seek refuge to God. It was only a question of time that Jewish women were then forced to hide their bodies behind long garments and their faces beneath a veil.[296]

In spite of the more progressive message of the Gospels which contained Jesus’ message to all humankind, men and women, regardless of sex and ethnicity, apostles and missionaries appeared to have replaced this progressive message in later years with the old hostility towards women. Paul, for example, in his epistle to the Corinthians, says ‘I want you to know that the head of a woman is her husband, that the head of a man is Jesus Christ, and that the head of Jesus Christ is God’, as a result of which women were sentenced to a life at home since they were denied the freedom to speak up in church (how striking is the similarity to what the fuqah§” say about #awra, ‘the feeling of shame”[297] of a woman’s voice). Women were subsequently forced to ask men for permission when they wanted to leave their house, and if they were given permission they had to cover their head and hide their face.[298]

If we look at the situation of women in pre-Islamic Arabia we will be surprised to learn that in spite of many rules and regulations, which disadvantaged women, the nomadic Bedouin society allowed women a considerable degree of freedom in choosing and divorcing her husband. It was, for example, sufficient for a woman during her husband’s absence to rearrange the entrance of her tent to let the returning man know that his wife had divorced him. During this period of ancient Arabia we can witness the existence of outstanding female personalities, such as the two queens Balqis and Zanubia, the poet al-Khansa”, the priest Zarqa” al-Yamama, and the wise woman Jahina. Numerous clans and tribes were named after women, such as the tribes of the Ummiyya, the Ghazziya, and al-Muzayyina. And yet, social practices reflected considerable misogyny, for example, the practice of female infanticide (cf. ‘When the female (infant), buried alive, is questioned * for what crime she was killed,’ A l-TakwÊr 81:8–9).

Let us see how the Book covers the question of original sin:

Then began Satan to whisper suggestions to them, bringing openly before their minds all their shame that was hidden from them (before); he said: “Your Lord only forbade you this tree, lest you should become angels or such beings as live for ever.” * And he swore to them both, that he was their sincere adviser. * So by deceit he brought about their fall: when they tasted of the tree, their shame became manifest to them, and they began to sew together the leaves of the garden over their bodies… (Al-A#r§f 7:20–22)

But Satan whispered evil to him: he said, “O Adam! Shall I lead you to the tree of eternity and to a kingdom that never decays?” * In the result, they both ate of the tree, and so their nakedness appeared to them: they began to sew together, for their covering, leaves from the Garden… (•§-H§” 20:120–21)

Five points can be immediately deduced from this account:

1. There is no indication that the original sin was committed by an act of sexual transgression. The body of Adam’s wife has absolutely no relevance to the sin.

2. The name of Adam’s wife is not given. Her role in the sin is so insignificant that her name is nowhere mentioned in the entire Book. It is certainly not \aw§”—as is so often claimed in the tafsÊr literature—which is the Arabic version of the name in Hebrew.

3. Adam either commits the original sin alone (såra 20) or together with his wife (såras 5 and 2), but in both accounts it was the Devil (shayã§n) who, by his whispers, instigated the act of disobedience.

4. A snake or a viper is not mentioned in the Book. This differs significantly from the Biblical account where the snake entices Eve to eat from the forbidden fruit.

5. The verses do not mention any item of clothing belonging to Adam and his wife—neither in Paradise nor on earth. It is only said that both become aware of their nakedness and that ‘they began to sew together the leaves of the Garden over their bodies…’ (7:22).

This last aspect is particularly important since it points out that the original sin of Adam and his wife was accompanied by the discovery of their nakedness. The effort of the two to cover their nakedness (first with the leaves of the Garden, then with clothes) finally results in God’s sending down of ‘raiment’ to the children of Adam (humankind):

O you children of Adam! We have [made you aware of] [anzaln§ #alaikum lib§s[an]] how to cover your shame, as well as to be an adornment to you. But the raiment of righteousness—that is the best. Such are among the signs of God, that they may receive admonition! * O you children of Adam! Let not Satan seduce you, in the same manner as He got your parents out of the Garden, stripping them of their raiment, to expose their shame; for he and his tribe watch you from a position where you cannot see them. We made the evil ones friends (only) to those without faith. (Al-A#r§f 7:26–27)

The significance of this sequence of events is that in order to establish women’s dress code in MuÈammad’s (ß) messengerhood, one has to study in general the clothes that early humankind wore in order to cover their nakedness before one can embark on a more specific study of particular items of clothing, such as the Èij§b, the jilb§b, or others.

Being Covered (lib§s)

The Arabic term lib§s connotes that something or someone is covered. The term can literally mean a garment that covers the whole body, as in 35:33, or can figuratively refer to a state of confusion because the truth is hidden or ‘covered’ beneath layers of falsehood, as in 2:42. Finally, it can be used as a metaphor for protection, help, and spousal support, as in 2:187:

Gardens of eternity will they enter: therein will they be adorned with bracelets of gold and pearls; and their garments [lib§suhum] there will be of silk. (F§ãir 35:33)

And cover not [la-talbiså] truth with falsehood, nor conceal the truth when you know (what it is). (Al-Baqara 2:42)

Permitted to you, on the night of the fasts, is the approach to your wives. They are your garments [lib§s[un]] and you are their garments [lib§s[un]]... (Al-Baqara 2:187)

Shame (saw”a)

The term saw”a can be understood literally and metaphorically, similar to its antonym lib§s. When Allah asked Moses to press his hand to his side, we are told that it came out white (as if being leprous) but ‘without harm’ (ghayr så”[in]), not physically ‘disfigured’ (20:22), but when Allah sent a raven to show Cain how to hide the nakedness of his brother Abel, saw”a is metaphorically used as a metonym (5:31). It certainly does not refer to nudity as such, but rather to shameful states of exposure, vulnerability, and intimacy. It pertains to the zone of #awra, i.e. the intimate parts of the body, which people are forbidden to show in public, that is, the pudenda, the sexual organs of men and women, because if they are exposed, it ‘causes harm’, or, as al-R§zÊ says, it signals ‘corporal decay’ and ‘mortification’.

“Now draw your hand close to your side: it shall come forth white (and shining), without harm (or stain) [ghayr så”[in]]—as another sign…” (•§-H§” 20:22)

Then God sent a raven, who scratched the ground, to show him how to hide the shame [saw”a] of his brother. (Al-M§“ida 5:31)

We tend to follow a more symbolic reading of al-saw”a and define it as a bad act which would, if publicly exposed and thus discovered, bring shame and dishonour and inflict pain on its perpetrators. Thus we do not understand 20:22, ‘…and so their nakedness (saw”atuhum§) appeared to them…’ literally as the uncovering of their private parts, but rather as a reference to their disgraceful act of having disobeyed God’s order. It describes more an act of moral denudation than just bodily nudity. One may object to this by asking, if their nakedness is not meant to be understood literally, why did Adam and his wife begin to cover their bodies immediately after they discovered their nakedness? The answer is that the text, even though it links the two events together, that is, a) the manifestation of the nakedness and b) ‘sewing together leaves of the garden’, uses the conjunction wa- (and), not in order to indicate cause and effect (because of their nakedness they collected leaves) but rather to narrate the sequence of events (first nakedness, then the collection of leaves). Why can it not be a causative wa-? Because we are told, in another verse, that Allah has assured Adam and his wife that they will not ‘go hungry or naked, suffer thirst or the sun’s heat’:

…their shame became manifest to them, and [wa-] they began to sew together the leaves of the garden over their bodies… (A l-A#r§f 7:20–22)

“There is therein (enough provision) for you not to go hungry or to go naked, * nor to suffer from thirst, nor from the sun’s heat.” (•§-H§” 20:118–19)

We understand that Allah placed Adam and his wife in His Garden where both cannot go hungry (fruits of the earth are plenty), or thirsty (water everywhere), or be harmed by the sun’s heat (no shadow required). Hence, Allah does not request saturation (which is permanent), nor does He want them to get dressed (nakedness is normal). Allah does not ask them to still their thirst (it is permanently stilled), nor does He want them to seek shelter in the shade (no heat can harm them). Allah only asks them not to come near the tree. But Allah’s creation consists of fallible human beings who are weak and forgetful, and indeed Adam ended up as a sinner because of his forgetfulness:

We also commanded Adam before you, but he forgot and We found him lacking in constancy. (•§-H§“20:115, AH)

After Adam disobeyed his Lord and went astray, he was expelled to an open land where hunger and thirst reigned. He discovered the need to dress against the cold and to seek the cooling shade against the sun. They suddenly faced the need to work which was particularly painful for women because in matriarchal societies women worked more and harder than men. And yet, the reason why Adam and his wife ‘began to sew together the leaves of the garden over their bodies’ was not because of the cold but because of a childish impulse to hide their wrongdoings as soon as they realised the gravity of their sin. When they realised this—and note that the emergence of a consciousness of sin marked, in evolutionary terms, the transition to humans as moral beings—Adam and his wife desperately tried to cover it up with the leaves of the Garden hoping that this would undo it. In doing so they expressed the primitive belief that if something is visibly concealed it will magically disappear. This gesture was certainly not meant to conceal their nakedness because nakedness is only considered to be improper if a particular social context requires people to assess it as socially unacceptable.

But neither in the Garden nor in the Open Land was there a context that made them feel ‘naked’, that is, improperly dressed! If the incident occurred outside Paradise, on earth, it certainly happened during a very early evolutionary stage in which people lived primitively. Humans, known as Homo erectus, who were alive at that time would have found nakedness the most natural way of existence. Even if the arrival of Adam and his wife meant the transition from Homo erectus to Homo sapiens, their nakedness would not have been judged as improper in the surrounding milieu. Therefore, we maintain that the collection of leaves was not meant to cover their nakedness but was rather an attempt to hide and undo their disobedience to God. We should therefore regard Adam as the ‘father of humankind’ (abå ’l-ins§n) only in this figurative (moral) and symbolic (nonbiological) sense, not literally as our genetic forefather (and note that the Book does not refer to him as father, the ‘birth-giver’, w§lid, but as abå, indicating nonbiological fatherhood).

Although the Book corrects the Old Testament’s account of original sin by not putting the blame on Adam’s wife, it is astonishing to see that Muslim exegetes such as a l-•abarÊ have found it appropriate to have recourse to the older version. Not only that; they have also elaborated on the old narrative and changed it to such a degree that its misogynous tone has become the dominant feature of the whole story. The old accusations against Adam’s wife, now called \aw§”, were revived: it was she who lured Adam into thinking that he could disobey God; it was she who tempted Adam to go near the tree; it was she who gave in to the temptations of IblÊs, and, even worse, it was she who acted as if she was the Devil. And since \aw§” was wrongly understood to be humankind’s biological foremother, all women on earth were indiscriminately seen as sharing genetically \aw§’s devilish nature of disobedience and seductiveness and were collectively punished for her sin. Suffering for her original sin, women had now to endure the ‘pain’ of menstruation and childbirth. The exegetes completely ignored the fact that the Book categorically rejects collective punishment: ‘no burdened soul will bear the burden of another…’ (35:18, AH). And yet, the same hostility to women can be found in the literature of \adÊth. One ÈadÊth makes MuÈammad (ß) say, ‘If I were to order someone to bow down before someone else, I would order the wife to bow down before her husband’[299]. Such misogyny is, however, in clear breach of the following verse of the Book:

And among His signs is this that He created for you mates from among yourselves, that you may dwell in tranquillity with them, and He has put love and mercy between your (hearts)… (Al-Råm 30:21)

In another ÈadÊth MuÈammad (ß) is quoted as saying, ‘Women are nakedness. So shut them up in the house’. And: ‘Three things invalidate your prayer: a woman, a donkey, and a black dog’.[300] Finally: ‘A woman asked the Prophet: “What is the husband’s right over his wife?” He said, “[That] she does not give any charity from his house except with his permission, and [that] she does not fast a day except with his permission. If she does that [without his permission], the angels of Allah and the angels of [His] blessing and the angels of [His] wrath would curse her.”’[301] These sayings are so outrageous and so completely against the spirit of Allah’s Book that one wonders which sick mind invented them and put them into the mouth of the Prophet (ß). One could quote hundreds of verses that contradict this fabricated misogyny but a few references will be enough to prove the entirely different tone of the Book:

O mankind [sic]! We created you from a single (pair) of a male and a female, and made you into nations and tribes, that you may know each other—not that you may despise (each other). Verily the most honoured of you in the sight of God is (he who is) the most righteous of you. And God has full knowledge and is well acquainted (with all things). (Al-\ujur§t 49:13)

This verse reminds us that God makes no distinction between males and females when He judges His creation. The only criterion for His praise is whether men and women do ‘good works’ in the world.

According to the Book, righteousness is an ethical category and not biologically inherent in the male sex.

God sets forth, for an example to the unbelievers, the wife of Noah and the wife of Lot… (Al-TaÈrÊm 66:10)

<right>

And God sets forth, as an example to those who believe, the wife of

</right>

Pharaoh…and Mary, daughter of Imran… (Al-TaÈrÊm 66:11–12)

Both these verses demonstrate that Allah does not define righteousness on the basis of the female sex either. The Book gives examples of righteous women (the wife of Pharaoh, Mary) immediately after it mentions the example of disbelieving women (the wives of Noah and Lot)—two good and two bad examples in equal measure! Also, there is not the slightest hint in Allah's verses that women's monthly cycle makes their prayer or fast invalid, or that 'women are deficient in religion'. Religion is bigger than prayer and fast, and Allah is above such petty notions that claim that female menstruation, so vital for the preservation and procreation of the human race, would make women religiously and spiritually inferior.

The truth is that the male chauvinist studies of medieval exegetes and \adÊth scholars reflect the influences of the social conditions of their times. One influence was the existence of slavery in ArabMuslim society. It is well-known that in ancient Arabia only free women wore the headscarf in order to distinguish them from bareheaded slave girls. Today, slavery has disappeared, and so has the necessity to differentiate free women from slave girls. Some people argue that what has survived until today is the proper, legal tradition of free women, which should be the norm: women should go veiled. But people forget that the way the dress of a free woman was distinguished from the dress of a slave girl was a historical convention that had no legal basis in Allah's law. Also, it was neither logical nor theologically sound to demand that the slave girl should not wear the Èij§b. Because, if it is true that a woman’s body and face cause fitna (social and sexual disturbance)[302] among men, all women in society, including slave girls, should have been asked to wear the Èij§b. How can anyone justify a law that puts free women under a veil to avoid sexual arousal, while most attractive slave girls were left unrestricted to wander bareheaded up and down the streets, free to cause fitna among men?

Such contradictions prove our point that anyone who fabricates ideas that ‘women cause fitna of men’ ultimately reiterates the misogynous renderings of the Paradise story (Eve tempts Adam). They ignore that the Book contradicts this account. Medieval Arab society created the milieu in which it was possible to present social conventions as if they were religious norms, creating a fatal confusion between patriarchal culture and religious ethics, a confusion that still exists today. Ideas of ‘honour’ (sharaf / nakhwa), ‘dignity’ (#ir·), ‘manhood’ (mur”a), and ‘respectability’ (shah§ma) have no textual basis in the Book and yet they are constantly fused into the religious discourse as if they represent the pinnacle of Islamic morals. The same is unfortunately true for the current debate about the Èij§b because, even though there is very little evidence for it in Allah’s revelation, the veil has been portrayed as the ultimate pillar of Islamic dress code, while in reality it is just a cultural convention that people introduced centuries ago.

* Women’s Dress Norms for Their ZÊna, or Their Hidden Beauty (Private Parts)

The upper and lower limits are contained in Sårat a l-Når, beginning with the following verse:

A sura which We have sent down and which We have ordained in it have We sent down clear signs, in order that you may receive admonition. (Al-Når 24:1)

For men the norms are stated in verse 30:

Say to the believing men that they should lower their gaze and guard their modesty: that will make for greater purity for them. And God is well acquainted with all that they do. (Al-Når 24:30) The norms for women are stated in verse 31:

And say to the believing women that they should lower their gaze and guard their [lower] private parts [furåjahunna]; that they should not display their [hidden] beauty [zÊnatahunna] except what [visibly of her beauty] appear thereof; that they should draw their veils over their [upper] private parts [juyåbihinna] and not display their [hidden] beauty [zÊnatahunna] except to their [ba#l] husbands, their fathers, their husband's fathers, their sons, their husband's sons, their brothers or their brothers' sons, or their sisters' sons, or [what follows] next in line [nis§"ihinna], or the [temporary partner] whom their right hands possess, or male [persons] free of physical needs, or small children who have no sense of the shame of sex; and that they should not strike their feet in order to draw attention to their hidden [beauty] [zÊnatihinna]. And O you believers! Turn you all together towards God, that you may attain bliss. (Al-Når 24:31)[303]

It is our aim to analyse each single part (as semantic-syntactic units) of these verses separately. We therefore start with the first line of both verses and continue line by line in parallel before we then concentrate exclusively on 3:31 until this verse reaches its conclusion.

First Line:

Say to the believing men that they should lower their gaze [yaghu··å min abß§rihim] (24:30). And say to the believing women that they should lower their gaze [yagh·u·na min abß§rihinna] (24:31)…

Both verses start with Allah’s command, addressed to both men and women, to lower the gaze. It has often been ignored that the text uses the preposition min as the partitive ‘of’. Because of this oversight, the usual transitive rendering of the verb as ‘to cast down their gaze’, which omits to acknowledge the existence of min, is incorrect. We also notice that the verse does not specify the object that the gazes of the eyes should avoid. It is obvious that the Book leaves it to us to decide what this should be—in accordance with existing social norms and moral etiquette. The Arabic term used for ‘to cast down’ is gha·· which, in its root meaning, connotes an act of politeness, that is, the opposite of being rude or impolite. A l-gha·§·a means softness, tenderness, or mildness, as used in: ‘a tender twig’, that is, a young, succulent branch of a tree compared to an old, dry, and arid limb.

What is the social meaning of being soft and tender? We believe that the verse addresses a social situation of embarrassment and how we can avoid such embarrassment with softness and tenderness. Just imagine the embarrassment when a man changes his clothes while several people, whom he does not know very well, surround him. Still, people cannot help but look at him. This naturally causes a lot of anguish for him. He feels utterly embarrassed and does not want to be seen by anyone, not even by his friends. The same distress can be observed in a woman who does not want to be looked at while changing her clothes, not even by her best friends. This is the social context, we believe, that Allah addresses in these two verses. He orders men and women to avoid staring at one another at those times when our looking could cause anguish and embarrassment. Today, it is seen as ‘good manners’ when people gently ‘cast down’ their eyes, pretending not to see the man or woman who does not wish to be seen. In all cultures this is regarded as good manners and praised as refined and civilised. This sums up our interpretation of this line. We do not think for a minute that ‘to lower your gaze’ means that men should not look at women, or that women, while working in offices, shops, and restaurants, should not look at men.

Second Line:

… and guard their [lower] private parts [wa-yaÈfaíå furåjahum]

… and guard their [lower] private parts [wa-yaÈfaín[a] furåjahunn[a]]

Men and women are asked to guard their furåj, which is often inadequately understood as ‘modesty’.[304] This time, for once, the term’s sexual connotation has been clearly overlooked. In the Book, Allah has ordered men and women to protect their private parts (furåj), in order to avoid two situations: first, that their nakedness leads to adultery or any other form of illegitimate sexual contact:

And those who guard their private parts [li-furåjihim È§fiíån], * except from their wives and what their right hands possess [azw§jihim]. [For these] they are not blameworthy… (Al-Mu”minån 23:5–6) [FM]

Second, and no less important, that any nonrelated male can cast a glance at their private parts. This is expressed by the second line in both verses. We notice the use of the noun abß§r, sing. baßr, which means ‘look’ or ‘glance’ by the movement of the eyes. This is different from ‘view’ or ‘sight’, which takes place inside the brain, where things can be ‘seen’ even if the eyes are closed. We infer that to keep the lower limit of proper men’s dress requires men to protect their private parts. This can be fulfilled by wearing underpants or a swim suit as this sufficiently covers a man’s genitals and buttocks, or what the fuqah§” called his ‘thick’ #awra (#awra mughallaía).

Verse 30 ends with the assertion that ‘God is well acquainted with all that they [men] do’. The term used to express ‘do’ is ßana#, usually employed to refer to a process of manufacturing things (e.g., ‘…Forthwith he (starts) constructing [yaßna#[u]] the Ark…’, Håd 11:38), or to a process of education (‘…and (this) in order that you may be reared [wa-li-tußna#[a]] under Mine eye’, •§-H§” 20:39). In 24:30 the term ‘doing’ is used in this second sense, that is, indicating a process of education, because, by asking men and women to protect their private parts, Allah sends down His instructions in order to teach us good and civilised behaviour. This is done in a nonrepressive and nonobtrusive way since people should learn gradually, and without harsh public sanctions, how to avoid casting glances that might embarrass other people. Members of every social community should learn how to protect their private parts by interaction with their surrounding culture and by responding, flexibly and open-mindedly, to each individual social occasion.

Third Line:

…that they should not display their [hidden] beauty [zÊnatahunna] except what [visibly of her beauty] appears thereof [ill§ m§ íahara minh§];

This line, like the rest of the verse, is different from 24:30 (the instructions to men) because lines 3–11 were revealed so that women could receive additional instructions about their dress code. It will be interesting to learn in detail what the implications of these additional norms for women’s lives are. We will analyse verse 31 in conjunction with Sårat a l-Nis§”, which provides additional information about women’s maÈ§rim (forbidden marriage partners), which is vital for a complete analysis of the verse.

A woman’s beauty/ornament, charms, or finery, can be divided into two parts: an outer (visible) part and an inner (invisible) part. Beauty is of three kinds: 1) beauty of things or material beauty; something that is added to the basic substance of a thing, for exam ple, special decoration to rooms, hairclips to hair, make-up to the face, and such; these external additions make something more attractive and enhances its basic beauty. Material beauty is described in:

And (He has created) horses, mules, and donkeys, for you to ride and use for show [wa-zÊna]… (Al-NaÈl 16:8)

O children of Adam! Wear your beautiful apparel [zÊnatakum] at every time and place of prayer… (Al-A#r§f 7:31)

2) beauty of places, or spatial beauty; this beauty can be seen in the public parks, zoological gardens, or herbaceous borders that one finds in big cities. These gardens and parks are that part of nature that has been cultivated for the benefit and recreation of everyone. People cultivate gardens by planting shrubs, bushes, and trees, or they establish a nature reserve, all for the purpose of a well-controlled interaction with nature, avoiding the excess and devastation that harm the environment. We propose to interpret zÊna[305], as described in verse 31, as spatial beauty (the space of the human body), not as material beauty (jewellery, rings, bracelets, etc.), as it was often thought to be.[306]

3) beauty that combines material and spatial beauty, as described in:

Say: ‘Who has forbidden the beautiful (gifts) of God [zÊnat All§h], which He has produced for His servants, and the things, clean and pure (which He has provided) for sustenance?…’ (Al-A#r§f 7:32)

(It grows) till the earth is clad with its golden ornaments and is decked out (in beauty) [wa-“zayyanat]: the people to whom it belongs think they have all powers of disposal over it… (Yånus 10:24)

The last verse states that historical progress and technological development will fill the earth with material and spatial beauty. This type of beauty as well as type 1 are not applicable to zÊna in this context, because zÊna refers, as we said, to spatial beauty (type 2) which a woman will display with her entire body; it is decidedly not just her make-up or her adornments. ZÊna refers to her body as a whole.

Fourth Line:

…that they should draw their veils over their [upper] private parts [wa’l-ya·ribn[a] bi-khumårihinna #al§ juyåbihinna] and not display their [hidden] beauty [wa-l§ yubdÊn[a] zÊnatahunna]

A woman’s body is divided into two parts: a) an exposed (visible) part: the verse says, ‘except what (must ordinarily) appear thereof (ill§ m§ íahara minh§)’; these outer parts are what can be seen of a female body: the head, back, shoulders, arms, legs, and such, constituting her physical appearance (in public); b) an unexposed (invisible) part: parts of her body that Allah has not exposed to the eyes; a woman’s unexposed part is called juyåb. The Arabic term jayb is derived from j-y-b and refers to an opening, a ‘cleft, crack or split’ that opens up between two sides (‘a cleft in the rocks’ or ‘an opening of a pocket’). A shirt sleeve, for example, has a round opening and extends between two sides. As for the body of a woman there are several parts that are located ‘between two sides’, for example, the area between, and under her breasts; under her armpits; the area of her vagina and her buttocks. All of these areas are her juyåb, and it is these that a believing woman is required to cover. It is incorrect to define jayb as merely the woman’s bosoms.[307] The verse uses the term khumår for the cover, but by no stretch of the imagination can it just mean ‘veil’. It is derived from kh-m-r, ‘to cover’. Wine is called al-khamr because it ‘eclipses/obscures’ or ‘covers’ the brain. Al-khim§r is not, as convention has it, a piece of cloth to wrap around the head; it is certainly more than that. Generically, it refers to any cover, whether of a woman’s head or other parts of her body. That is why Allah orders woman to cover her juyåb, those parts of her bodily, spatial beauty (zÊna) which are naturally hidden (breast, inner thighs, and armpits), but which He made possible to (naturally) be seen—since what can be revealed must originally be hidden (‘…whether you show what is in your minds or conceal it…’, Al-Baqara 2:284). Those who ‘see’ a woman’s beauty, and who would legally be allowed to do so, are only the sane and rational (‘…and so their nakedness appeared to them…’, •§-H§” 20:121). Some people will argue that a woman’s face (eyes, ears, mouth, and nose) can also be regarded as private. We do not deny this, but a woman’s face belongs to those parts that are m§ íahara, parts of the body that ‘protrude’ or, literally, ‘stick out’ (like the head, feet, and legs), meaning parts that are exposed and not naturally concealed. Moreover, a human face is the most visible part of the body and gives individuals their identity. Allah would never have wanted to put a woman’s face, with which she expresses her personality, under a veil. Therefore, the face (mouth, eyes, ears, etc.) does not belong to a woman’s ‘hidden’ juyåb but is part of her visible beauty (zÊna) and does not need to be covered.

Fifth Line:

…except to their [ba#l] husbands, their fathers, their husband’s fathers, their sons, their husbands’ sons, their brothers or their brothers’ sons, or their sisters’ sons

Allah has explicitly identified the [lower] juyåb parts (line 4) as her genitals (farj) (‘…and guard their private parts’—MF, line 2), which are to be protected from view. We must start from the premise that a woman is, by primitive law, not allowed to show her genitalia to anyone except her zawj husband. The fuqah§” also call the female genitalia a woman’s ‘thick’ #awra (shame), which a slave woman, according to Islamic fiqh, may not reveal to any male person and which a free woman, according to the Book, may not reveal to her maÈ§rim relatives. This explains why in the above list of people to whom a woman is explicitly allowed to show other parts of her [hidden] beauty (zÊna), only the ba#l husband is mentioned and not her zawj husband (because he is allowed to see it anyway).

We hear about, a) the ba#l husband (‘their husbands’), b) father and grandfather (‘their fathers’), c) father of the ba#l husband and his grandfather (‘their husband’s fathers’), d) sons (‘their sons’), e) sons of the ba#l husband (‘their husbands’ sons’), f) brother (‘their brothers’) or g) sons of the brother (‘their brothers’ sons’), or h) sons of the sister (‘their sisters’ sons’). If we ignore the difference between ba#l and zawj husbands, that is, if ba#l and zawj are treated as synonyms—which most exegetes say they are—we would be faced with a contradiction between verse 24:31 and 23:5. It is not logical to allow a woman to show her entire body to her husband (24:31), while at the same time being explicitly allowed not to guard her most intimate private parts in front of the very same person (23:5).[308] One assumes that a woman who is allowed to reveal her private parts to her husband is naturally also allowed to show him (the rest of) her entire body. One would not need an explicit divine command for it. This contradiction can only be solved if we accept that Allah treats the zawj husband differently from the ba#l husband. That is why He did include the ba#l husband among the others in the list to whom a woman can reveal other parts of her body (zÊna)[309] except her genitals (her ‘thick’ #awra, or, her farj).

As said above, the juyåb parts of a woman are her genitals, buttocks, breasts, and armpits. We also defined what is known as her ‘thick’ #awra (genitals and buttocks) as forbidden to anyone except to her zawj husband. As for the juyåb part of a woman’s breasts, no one disagrees that they are part of her (upper) private parts, or her ‘thin’ #awra (mukhaffafa). Most exegetes even go so far as to say that only her breasts are really covered by the term al-juyåb. This intolerable reduction of the term to a woman’s breasts was a result of the dress code in ancient Arabia. In seventh-century Arabia, Arab Bedouin women dressed themselves in public by basically covering their breasts with a long shawl; while inside their private homes they wore clothes that did not cover that area of their body. Naturally, only a woman’s breasts could be revealed when she walked in public. Hence, they were seen as the private parts she must cover. As for the other parts of her juyåb, they were essentially covered anyway.

Some may think that our interpretation of zÊna allows a woman to appear half-naked in front of anyone listed in verse 31 (with only her genitals covered). This may indeed happen but only by accident, through absent-mindedness or by force, while the zawj husband is the only person who is legally entitled to see her lower private parts (her ‘thick’ #awra). As for a woman’s upper private parts (breasts and armpits), a woman will not be prosecuted if she reveals them in front of the six types of men mentioned in the list. If it happens it is not regarded as Èal§l or Èar§m, but she should be criticised as being immodest (even though it is sanctioned by the Book).

The maÈ§rim Relatives and a Woman’s Body

As stated earlier, even though the ba#l husband is not formally counted as among a woman’s maÈ§rim, he is treated like a maÈram to whom a woman cannot reveal her (lower) private parts. Among those listed in verse 24:31 are seven maÈ§rim: a) the father, b) father of the zawj husband, c) son, d) the son of the zawj husband, e) brother, f) son of the brother, and g) son of the sister. These seven constitute exactly half of the fourteen maÈ§rim that are mentioned in 4:23. As for the maÈ§rim whom a woman is not allowed to marry but with whom she may stay alone (in a room or a house), but without being allowed —because they are not mentioned in 24:31—to reveal her upper private parts (breasts and armpits), they are: 1) the brother of the father, 2) brother of the mother, 3) foster son, 4) foster brother, 5) husband of the umm mother, 6) husband of the daughter (son-inlaw), and 7) husband of the sister (brother-in-law). This latter list of maÈ§rim whom she cannot marry and cannot show her body (zÊna) is surprising and forces us to rethink our understanding of zÊna as being merely a woman’s make-up, pieces of jewellery, or some sort of hair decoration (that, the fuqah§” claim, she is not allowed to display and thus must hide beneath a veil)! But zÊna cannot just mean make-up or jewellery, and such, because a woman appears, for example, in front of her son-in-law (No. 6) exactly as she would appear in front of a complete stranger (because he would be forever a kind of maÈram to her). And all the others who are not listed in the zÊna verse (24:31) would not be allowed to see the hidden zÊna of her body, this including her uncles, that is, the brothers of her father and of her mother (No. 1 and No. 2). Is it not more likely that zÊna is nothing else than her juyåb private parts, as we explained above? Clearly, it was a mistake by the fuqah§” to regard a woman’s zÊna as just material beauty (decoration and adornment) while, in reality, it is her bodily beauty (visible and hidden). The fault lies in their methodology since they drew an analogy between what is hidden (gh§“ib) and what is visible (sh§hid), and they did not apply the theory of limits.

Sixth Line:

…or [what follows] next in line [nis§“ihinna],

It is believed that this sequence permits women to reveal their hidden zÊna to other believing women. This is incorrect because the Arabic does not say ‘except to believing women’ (a l-mu”min§t min a l-nis§”). Rather it says nis§“ihinna with the third-person feminine plural suffix. This suffix is not that of possession, that is, ‘their’, in the sense of ‘their women’, because then it would mean ‘women of the women’, which is absurd. Also, the personal suffix cannot refer to the wives of the male relatives listed above (son, brother, nephew, etc.) meaning ‘except to their (m.) wives’, because this would require the thirdperson masculine plural hum, while we have hunna. It is nonsense to claim that the text might have substituted for stylistic purposes hunna for hum, given that the rules of saj# poetry sometimes make grammatical rearrangement necessary. Semantic considerations always override stylistic concerns, so we should not make baseless assumptions about stylistic necessities. We believe that nis§” in this context cannot refer to women but rather to male persons, so that the personal pronoun suffix is a true feminine plural ‘their’ (f.), as in their (the women’s) houses or their (the women’s) books. And nis§” means, as we explained earlier, ‘the most recent’ or ‘those who follow after’, in this context meaning those who ‘follow next’ but who are not explicitly mentioned in the verse, that is, the grandchildren: the sons of the son, the brother’s grandchildren, the sister’s grandchildren, the husband’s grandchildren, and so forth. They are the ones ‘who come next’ following the persons mentioned in the zÊna verse; and since they are all relatives of the women, who is the subject of the verse, they are called their (the women’s) nis§”.

If we look at verse 55 of Sårat al-AÈz§b, a similar picture emerges:

There is no blame (on these ladies [the prophet’s wives] if they appear) before their fathers or their sons, their brothers, or their brother’s sons, or their sisters’ sons, or their women [sic] [nis§“ihinna], or the (slaves) whom their right hands possess. And, (ladies), fear God; for God is witness to all things. (Al-AÈz§b 33:55)

This time only the wives of the Prophet (ß) are the subject of the verse. Again, as in 24:31, it does not list all maÈ§rim relatives when it allows the Prophet’s wives to reveal their bodies. Also, the verse does not mention the zawj husband because MuÈammad (ß) as their zawj has the right to see them naked anyway. It similarly does not mention the husband’s son, because MuÈammad (ß) did not have sons (only daughters). Likewise, it does not mention the husband’s father, because MuÈammad (ß) was an orphan. Again, nis§“ihinna is used to refer to those ‘who come next’, that is, MuÈammad’s (ß) grandchildren. It is striking that the verse addresses the question of the exposure of the zÊna of the Prophet’s wives in front of men. We know that Allah had decreed that all believing men are to be treated as maÈ§rim relatives who cannot be married:

...and his wives are their mothers... (Al-AÈz§b 33:6)

Nor is it right for you that you should annoy God’s apostle, or that you should marry his widows after him at any time... (Al-AÈz§b 33:53)

The special instruction for MuÈammad’s (ß) wives was that believing men should talk to them from behind a screen (al-Èij§b), in spite of the fact that they would never be allowed to marry them. As for the legal force of this verse, the explicit instruction of Allah that MuÈammad’s (ß) wives are not like any other believing women (33:32) makes it incumbent upon women not to follow the Prophet’s wives in speaking from behind a screen. If a woman ignores God’s command and follows the example of the Prophet’s wives she should then speak from behind a Èij§b to all male persons, except to her seven maÈ§rim relatives and ‘those who come next’. But in so doing she would, unnecessarily and unlawfully, impose upon herself what Allah only preserved for MuÈammad’s (ß) wives. What the believing women share with MuÈammad’s (ß) wives is Allah’s command that they protect their private parts. Women can use whatever clothes are sanctioned by the prevailing customs and dress norms of society.

The following table summarises the previous sections and presents our comparative survey of såras Al-Nis§” (4:23) and Al-Når (24:31):

List of maÈ§rim (taboo-)relatives | List of people to whom a woman may reveal her upper private parts (hidden zÊna) but must not reveal her lower private parts (farj) |

| 1. Son | 1. Son |

| 2. Father | 2. Father |

| 3. Brother | 3. Brother |

| 4. Brother of the Father

5. Brother of the Mother

6. Son of the Brother | 4. Son of the Brother |

| 7. Son of the Sister | 5. Son of the Sister |

| 8. Foster Son

9. Foster Brother

10. Father-in-Law | 6. Father of the ba#l husband |

| 11. Husband of the Mother

(from a previous marriage)

12. Husband of the Daughter

(Son-in-Law)

13. Husband of the Sister

(Brother-in-Law)

14. Son of the Husband

(from another marriage) | 7. Son of the ba#l husband

8. Added to the seven listed above are also the children and grandchildren who are all covered by the term nis§“ihinna: the descendants to whatever degree downwards. | We stress that we do not suggest that a woman is free to show those parts of her body that are not her lower private parts to all those persons (mentioned in the right-hand column), but if it unintentionally happens it should not be judged as Èar§m.[310]

Seventh Line:

… or the [temporary partner] whom their right hands possess [m§ malakat aim§nuhunna]

Historically, the phrase ‘what their right hands possess’ was used to indicate the slaves of the household. This immediately raises the question of how we today, given that slavery has ceased to exist, should interpret this verse. We know that slave girls dressed differently during the period of the Prophet’s companions. For one thing, they did not cover their heads and breasts with a Èij§b. M§lik b. Anas reported that #Umar's handmaidens 'used to serve us while revealing their hair that would touch their breast'.[311] Slave girls were seen as free sexual objects, and Muslim men took 70:30 for a long time as a licence to have unrestricted access to them ('Except with their wives and the (captives) whom their right hands possess; for (then) they are not to be blamed', A l-Ma#§rij 70:30). However, this was a one-sided practice since men did not allow their women to treat male slaves in a similar fashion. We hear about a woman called #Aziba whom the Caliph #Umar explicitly forbade to have sex with her male house slave. If we insist on saying that the phrase 'what their right hands possess' refers to slaves we risk having to admit that this part of the Book is today no longer relevant. This, however, would contradict the axiomatic truth that MuÈammad's (ß) message is eternally valid for all times. Therefore, we propose to regard the so-called misy§r marriages, which have become quite popular in recent years,[312] as the contemporary equivalent to the premodern master–slave girl relationship. We suggest that today's partners of a misy§r marriage can be described by the phrase 'what their right hands possess'.

Eighth Line:

... or male [persons] free of physical needs [al-t§bi#Ên[a] ghayr ålÊ 'l-irba min al-rij§l]

We understand that the verse refers here to those men who have no sexual desires. This does not necessarily include, as some claim, those who are mentally or physically disabled. The sexual drive of a disabled person might still exist. More likely, it refers, for example, to a gynaecologist who examines his female patients dispassionately and whose relationship to his patients is similar to the relationship between a mother and her son or a father and his daughter. If a gynaecologist needs to examine a girl's vulva, he will ask the father for permission.[313] Women in the Arab-Muslim world should know that they are, without any reservations, entitled to see a doctor; and they should be at ease with the physical examination of their body by a female or male doctor. Gynaecologists and other people working in the medical professions (male nurses, anaesthetists, x-ray specialists, dentists, and such), are the modern equivalent to the ‘servants free of physical needs’ mentioned in 24:31.

Ninth Line:

<right>

…or small children who have no sense of the shame of sex [lam yaíharå

</right>

#al§ #awrat al-nis§”]

It will be necessary first to define the term #awra, or as a l-Tha#§libÊ has put it, ‘what someone is embarrassed to reveal’.[314] As explained below, Prophet MuÈammad (ß) spoke about #awra in very similar terms. It needs to be stressed that the notion of shame does not fall into the categories of either Èal§l or Èar§m, because the feeling of shame is a cultural phenomenon. If a bald-headed man does not want to show his baldness to others, he will purchase a wig to cover his head. It is the baldness of his head that creates #awra (shame or embarrassment), but only in a cultural context in which baldness is seen as embarrassing, deficient, or ugly. The Prophet (ß) said: ‘Whoever covered a believer’s #awra [i.e., kept it secret], Allah c overed his [i.e., this person’s] #awra.’[315] This means that if somebody wants to hide some specific flaws of his body but notices that someone has already seen parts of it, he will be relieved to find out that this person has kept this to himself and that his flaws were not disclosed to anyone else. This is what is meant by ‘overlooking the #awra of a believer’. Also, to ‘conceal the #awra’ does not imply, as the following verse proves, to hide it beneath a piece of cloth. What it really means is to seriously question people’s perception of it. We hear in 33:13:

Behold! A party among them said: “You men of Yathrib! You cannot stand (the attack)! Therefore go back!” And a band of them ask for leave of the prophet, saying, “Truly our houses are bare and exposed [#awrat[un]],” though they were not exposed [bi-#awrat[in]] they intended nothing but to run away. (Al-AÈz§b 33:13)

We hear that people believed that their houses were exposed (#awrat[un]) and feared that their enemies would soon discover them. And yet, in reality this was simply not the case, and Allah made them realise their misconception. Back to verse 24:31, #awra, means shame, it describes that feeling of unease when a part of the human body or an act of human behaviour is exposed against one’s wishes. The feeling of unease is determined by norms that are set by the social milieu and cultural context in which we live. Even though our private parts (juyåb) are biologically determined, how we perceive them and how we respond if they are exposed, is culturally determined and always changes.

The verse says, ‘children who have no sense of #awra’, implying that children do not yet know why a person is ashamed of being exposed or seen in an awkward position or wearing insufficient clothes. Up to a certain age, children are ‘shameless’, they do not understand why a certain flaw of their body should be shameful. They have to be educated and socialised first in order to acquire a sense of shame. Only then will they adjust their behaviour so that shame is avoided. The verse refers to those children who have not yet acquired that knowledge.[316] Some cultures determine that the #awra of a man extends from head to knee and require men to cover this area. That is entirely acceptable as long as it is not perceived to be an eternally valid definition of #awra. What is felt as ‘shame’ varies from culture to culture and will eventually change over time.

Shame is, strictly, not part of either Èar§m or Èal§l, because the areas of shame are not explicitly mentioned by Allah’s Book, which contains God’s limits. And since the limits of a woman’s #awra are not given in the Book, they are left to human societies to define. It was certainly a purely historical decision to define #awra exclusively in sexual terms as the lower private parts of a woman: forbidden for men and slave girls in front of a stranger, and for the free woman in front of her maÈ§rim relatives. This latter distinction between slave women and free women is obsolete today, but it is still valid to apply #awra to only a few of the maÈ§rim relatives of a woman (those mentioned in 24:31). We have shown that it is possible to define #awra not only in sexual terms.

Tenth Line:

… and that they should not strike [ya·ribn[a]] their feet in order to draw attention to their hidden [beauty] [min zÊnatihinna].

The conventional understanding is that women ‘should not strike their feet’ to prevent anyone from hearing the noise of their anklets and other jewellery that they wear around the ankles, or to prevent anyone from hearing the click-clack of their heels if they wear highheeled shoes. We do not believe that this nonsense can ever be true. We have already learned that the Arabic verb ·-r-b is polysemous, and that one should not always take it literally to mean ‘to beat’ or ‘to strike’. It can mean, for example, ‘to travel’ the world for the sake of trade, commerce, or study, and to fight in God’s way, as we hear in the Book:

O you who believe! When you go abroad [·arabtum] in the cause of God, investigate carefully… (Al-Nis§” 4:94)

When you travel [·arabtum] through the earth, there is no blame on you if you shorten your prayers… (Al-Nis§” 4:101)

If you are journeying through the earth [·arabtum fi’l-“ar·], and the chance of death befalls you (thus)… (Al-M§“ida 5:106)

4-r-b also denotes the act of ‘forming’ or ‘shaping’. Humans are given a certain ‘shape’ by their Creator, a shape that is made in His image, that is, similar to Him; hence the meaning of ‘to strike an image’, ‘to set an illustration’ or ‘to give an example’ in several verses of the Book:

We gave you many examples [·arabn§ al-amth§l]. (Ibr§hÊm 14:45, AH)

…to each one We set forth parables and examples [·arabn§ lahu al-amth§l] … (Al-Furq§n 25:39)

In this Qur’an, We have set every kind of illustration [·arabn§ min kull al-math§l] before people… (Al-Råm 30:58, AH)

4arÊba means tax, a duty that is ‘imposed’ (·araba) upon people to compensate for their profits and salaries or to reclaim the expenses for public services. The literal meaning ‘to beat’ can sometimes mean ‘to stop’ or ‘to hinder’ in a wider sense; if, for example, I give you a rap on the knuckles I want you to stop doing something bad. An industrial strike (i·r§b) means to stop work and to prevent other people from continuing to work. A hunger strike (i·r§b #an al-ãa#§m) means to stop eating food. The verse says, ‘and that they should not strike (ya·ribanna) their feet’, because Allah requests from women that they prevent anyone from seeing the hidden part of a woman’s body (‘in order not to draw attention to their hidden zÊna”).

The verse thus talks about the hidden parts of her body, that is, a woman’s juyåb. It implies that Allah does not want a woman to work in a job where she needs to ‘strike her feet’ in such a way that her private parts can be seen. If a woman works as a striptease artist or a pole dancer her private parts will be inevitably revealed. It does not mean that dancing as such is forbidden, because a short exposure of the private parts while dancing is purely accidental. But in doing striptease or prostitution or nude sunbathing on beaches—the rationale here is to be naked.

We now know the limits of Allah. On the whole, His limits only rule out two female occupations: 1) jobs that contain elements of intentional nakedness (striptease, pole dancing, etc.) and 2) prostitution. Any other occupation is allowed for women. She does not need to fear that she is not complying with existing dress norms as long as she does not intentionally show her private parts in public. All other codes of behaviour (at work) are determined by the society in which women live; if a woman does not comply with these rules she will be criticised or even disciplined. Such norms and rules are historical and bound to change, hence they do not fall into the category of Èar§m/Èal§l.

Eleventh Line:

…And O you believers! Turn you all together towards God, that you may attain bliss.

The last line of the verse asks believing men and women to repent. During the course of one’s life mistakes are inevitable and only human. If deviations from the above rules have occurred, Allah in His mercy calls for repentance. He does not issue threats about future punishments.

<right>

Given what we said about women’s obligatory dress norms

</right>

(al-far§“i·), stated in 24:31, we are now in a position to conclude that it is obligatory for a woman to cover her lower private parts (juyåb, the ‘thick’ #awra) from the eyes of all men, including the ba#l husband, except from the

zawj husband who is entitled to see her, and that she must cover her lower private parts (farj) but not her upper private parts (breasts and armpits) in front of those men mentioned in 24:31. Her upper private parts (upper juyåb or hidden zÊna) must be covered in front of the other maÈ§rim relatives and any other stranger. This constitutes the lower limit of dress norms. Allah has imposed as a duty (far·) on the believing women that they comply with this lower limit; it is the minimum degree of dress regulations on the basis of which a woman knows what is permitted (masmåÈ) and what is prohibited (mamnå#). Women know that no concrete form of punishment is stipulated if they transgress this lower limit. It is, however, expected that they will repent.

But what if a woman wants to go a step above the lower limit by covering more of her body? In this case verse 59 of Sårat al-AÈz§b helps her to apply the norms that were addressed to MuÈammad's (ß) wives and that are not compulsory for all believing women. They were revealed to him (only) as a prophet, which means that they are not legally binding:

O Prophet! Tell your wives and daughters, and the believing women, that they should cast their outer garments [min jal§bÊbihinna] over their persons (when abroad): that is most convenient, that they should be known (as such [sic]) [yu#arafn[a]] and [thus] not molested [yu"dhain[a]]. And God is oft-forgiving, most merciful. (Al-AÈz§b 33:59)

The verse begins by addressing MuÈammad (ß) as a prophet. The invocation 'O Prophet!' is always used as a textual marker to indicate the realm of prophethood, which does not contain legislation. It is purely historical as it reflects the atmosphere of MuÈammad's (ß) time, alluding to the fact that women were not safe from harassment when they carried out their daily tasks in the streets of Medina. Inevitably, when societies change and public safety for women on the streets is improved, such precautionary measures no longer apply.

The verse talks about the possibility of wearing an outer garment (a jilb§b) when women leave the house.[317] The term jilb§b has its root in j-l-b, which either means to import things, literally, to carry things from A to B, or to wrap up, conceal, or veil what is visible. This second meaning can be found in the term julba (scar): it refers to the process of ‘closing down’: when a wound begins to heal it is scarred over by the skin which protects the wound from further external damage or an infection. Jilb§b thus literally means any cover that protects a person’s body from external threats (heat, water, coldness); such a cover is provided by trousers, shirts, cardigans, dressing gowns, anoraks, coats, parkers, and the like. All these things would qualify as proper jilb§bs.

In any case, this verse is only informative and not legally binding. There are two reasons for its injunction: a) women should be recognizable and b) it should prevent harm. In this verse, women are informed (not ordered) of how to avoid harm by safely covering their body. Harm can come in two ways: from nature and from society. Nature can harm a human body by exposure to cold, heat, humidity, and extreme weather conditions. Common sense dictates that a woman normally wears clothes that protect her body from extreme heat or cold. Society can hurt a woman through ridicule or blame, for example if she is not dressed according to prevailing dress norms. Again, by common sense and properly internalised social rules, a woman normally wears clothes that comply with these norms.

It is often overlooked that the verse links the injunction’s first reason ‘that they should be known”[318] to the second ‘that they are not being injured’ (MF). This is achieved by the causative preposition fa- (thus), and means that women who ‘know’ how to dress properly will therefore not be harmed.[319] However, if there is injury, then only because of the power of nature or of social sanctions. Further punishments by Allah are not mentioned.

The upper limit defining what a woman should cover of her body is provided by a ÈadÊth. If authentic, it says, ‘A woman’s #awra [what she might be ashamed of] is her whole body except her face and her hands’.[320] Leaving the fact aside that this ÈadÊth is not eternally valid, it still allows a woman to cover more of her body. It still does not, however, allow a woman to cover also her face and her hands, because these constitute a person’s identity.

This leads us to the conclusion that if a woman forgets to cover her upper private parts and only covers her lower private parts (‘thick’ #awra), she violates Allah’s lower limit (except in front of the maÈ§rim of 24:31). If she goes to the other extreme and chooses to cover her entire body, including her face and hands, she transgresses the upper limit set by Allah’s Messenger (ß). Most women in this world (naturally) dress in such a way that they move between Allah’s limit and MuÈammad’s (ß) limit. This corresponds to the inherent disposition of human beings and their natural way to dress in public. It is also normal that in some instances women happen to stand close to the outer limits, and occasionally they even transgress them.

Change of Dress Code?

We are now able to draw conclusions about the dress norms before and after the revelations of 24:31 and 33:59:

6. At the time of their revelation, Arab women did not go naked in public.

7. Arab women and men wore the clothes and costumes of the regional Bedouin culture that reflected the level of material production on the Arabian Peninsula. MuÈammad (ß) himself was dressed according to the regional culture of Arabia, to the extent that people who arrived in Medina could not distinguish him from other Arabs. ‘They would ask: “Who amongst you is Muhammad?”’[321]

One feature of this ancient culture was long garments that protected men and women from the heat. Women put a scarf over their heads similar to the way of Bedouin women today. We know that KhadÊja, MuÈammad’s (ß) first wife, dressed in this way—before the revelation of 24:31 and 33:59. This proves that a long garment was primarily a regional tradition. With the revelation of verse 24:31, Arab-Muslim women were asked to closely examine their way of dressing. It turned out that, basically, they did not have to change a lot. What was new was the possibility of displaying parts of their upper torso by way of a small neck cut in their blouses; their breasts were covered by their headscarves. No drastic changes were needed because it was clear that the other (lower) private parts were perfectly covered by the kind of regional clothes that women wore at the time.

This is how #$“isha, the ‘mother of the believing women’, was dressed (after the revelation of 24:31 and 33:59), showing no fundamental difference from KhadÊja’s way of dressing. There was, in particular, no difference in the way both wore a headscarf as protection, KhadÊja before and #$“isha after the revelation of the dress verse, against the heat. The mistake of traditional jurists was to define jayb as describing only a woman’s breasts. What led to this mistake was that they confused revelation with local tradition by issuing prescriptive dress codes for all Muslim women on the basis of customary dress norms to which all Arab women adhered in the seventh century (Muslims and Christians alike). The irony is that these supposedly ‘Islamic’ dress codes for believing women are still shared equally by Muslim and Christian Bedouin women, for example in the region of \aur§n in southwest Syria. These women are simply following the same regional tradition as they have done for centuries.

We should not forget that 24:31 was revealed in order to issue the minimum dress requirements for all believing women at all times (in the East and the West, in cold and warm climates). ArabMuslim women today have to rectify the fundamental mess they have inherited from fiqh jurisprudence. They have to remove that fateful analogy by which jurists drew from something nonempirical (the dress-codes of women, Muslims and Christians, in the seventhcentury Arabian Peninsula), and applied it to something empirical (the dress codes of Muslim women all over the world at all times of human history). We have seen that such an analogy is implausible because it is based on the wrong assumption that Arab women were, if we take the jurists’ interpretations of 24:31 and 33:59, completely covered from head to toe and had to be given permission to reveal those parts that the two verses supposedly describe. This is, of course, historically wrong. The truth is that the Book describes what women should cover (of their naked body) and not what to disclose (of their fully covered body).

8. Supposing that a woman wants to embrace Islam and that she is, at the moment, completely naked, what clothes would she wear? The simple answer is that every believing woman, of whatever origin and nationality, needs to follow the dress norms of the society in which she lives. The only restriction is that she needs to observe the lower limit of 24:31. Verse 33:59 is only for her information.

9. The assumption of some fuqah§” that a woman’s voice is part of her #awra is downright nonsense. We hear of women who stood together with MuÈammad (ß) on the streets and in the mosques of Medina, and when the Prophet (ß) asked them questions they were encouraged to answer without any inhibition or threat of punishment. It is thus incorrect to claim that there is a vocal #awra of a woman that is Èar§m[322] because common social practice worldwide proves this wrong. Most societies unreservedly accept female voices in public concerts, operas and the mass media—and we believe that it is not a sin to encourage women to take part in such activities.

 Concluding Remarks on Women’s Dress

One may ask why the traditional fuqah§” were not able to discover this by themselves. Was their command of the Arabic language really so bad? Not at all. The truth is that this has nothing to do with poor grasp of grammar, syntax, and rhetoric, but with a mistaken methodology. In their reading of 24:31 and 33:59 they assumed that the Prophet’s ÈadÊth (‘a woman’s #awra is her entire body except her face and her hands’) is a specification of the Book and misread it as an ÈadÊth abrogating 24:31 and 33:59. We believe, instead, that MuÈammad (ß) was simply formulating the upper limit of women’s dress requirements. But the jurists were so eager to formulate restrictive practices for women that their male-centred ideologies eventually got the better of their expertise in the Arabic language—with fatal results for all of us today who have to pick up the pieces of their reactionary zeal.

Let us finally summarise the findings of our study:

1. Dress requirements for men:

The lower limit means to cover the lower private parts, their genitalia, the so-called thick #awra according to traditional fiqh. Every other part of the body is covered (or remains uncovered) according to the existing cultural dress requirements of the country/region in which they live.

2. Dress requirements for women:

There are four stipulations to be considered:

a. Women are not allowed to appear completely naked except in front of their zawj husband—no other person is allowed to be present.

b. Women are required to cover their lower private parts (= absolute lower limit) in front of those persons mentioned in 24:31, but not their upper private parts. Their ba#l husband and half of their maÈ§rim (taboo-)relatives (note: not all of them!) belong to this group.

c. Women are required to cover their upper private parts (breasts and armpits) in addition to their lower private parts, her thick #awra (= this constitutes the lower limit for all women). This definition, however, does not cover dresses for special social occasions (parties, opera, concerts, etc.). As for the concept ‘from the navel to the knee’, we conclude that fiqh jurists unashamedly invented this. [323]

3. Headscarf:

Women and men are not required to cover their head. If they do so they are merely following the local conventions of their place of origin.

Finally, as the best counterargument against all those traditionalists who claim that women will never enter Paradise, we quote the following two verses:

Whoever works righteousness, man or woman, and has faith, verily, to him will We give a new life, a life that is good and pure and We will bestow on such their reward according to the best of their actions. (Al-NaÈl 16:97)

And they shall hear the cry: “Behold! The garden before you! You have been made its inheritors, for your deeds (of righteousness).” (Al-A#r§f 7:43)

Chart 2: Legislation of women’s dress code

Upper Limit (set by the Messenger of Allah)

To cover

Transgression of the limit set by MuÈammad (ß) Dress

The covering of the entire body except the face and hands; the natural disposition of human beings in setting up dress codes makes them move between the upper and lower limits according to their traditions and customs. Curvature (al-ÈanÊfiyya) results from this movement between the limits of Allah and His Messenger (this is, basically, the essence of verse 59 of Sårat al-AÈr§f).

Lower Limit (set by Allah): the covering of all juyåb private parts (breasts, area of the belly, vagina/vulva, and buttocks).

Transgression of the lower limit means complete nakedness in front of the [] maÈ§rim (taboo-)relatives (including the ba'l husband); also the exposure of the upper private parts to everyone except those mentioned in 24:31.

Historical time and place (contingency)

No upper limit.

Occupation All other possible occupations are allowed as long as society views them as proper workplaces for women. Societies will set up their own limits for female occupation, but these limits are neither absolute taboos nor absolute permissions (this is the prerogative of Allah).

The lower limit (set by God) is not to work as a prostitute or striptease dancer.

Transgression of the lower limit implies work in forbidden occupations (e.g., prostitution, striptease) because it would spread indecency, adultery, and fornication.

<right>

Historical time and place (contingency)

</right>

<right>

</right>

 6. Political Islam

In order to consider the phenomenon of Political Islam one has to address a number of burning questions: does freedom of religion exist in Islam; how is apostasy treated; what is the correct way ‘to prescribe what is right and to proscribe what is wrong’; what is the proper understanding of a l-jih§d and ‘fight’; how do we express loyalty and to what extent is it possible to harmonise differing personal, religious, and political identities? Since the emergence of Political Islam, which has proliferated in the many different streams of the Islamist movement, we have become accustomed to turning to our #ulam§” and asking them how we can make sense of this strange mixture of religion and politics. Initially, we thought that Islamism would be explained as a deviation from the #ulam§”’s sound scholarly tradition, and we expected the scholars to refute the Islamists and their aggressive ambitions to politicise Islam and to Islamise the whole world. How surprised were we when we heard not a word of condemnation from our honourable scholars but instead legal explanations that basically condoned the concoctions of the Islamists. We then realised that the #ulam§“s interpretations of apostasy, a l-jih§d, and al-qit§l were in fact not too different from the Islamists' positions and that the deviation from the spirit of Allah's Book did not just come with the Islamist movement but that it had occurred much earlier in history, namely during the formative period of Islamic scholarship!

To prove this point we have applied a different approach throughout this chapter. Instead of turning only to the Book in our analysis, we include ÈadÊth reports, tafsÊr commentaries and ta"rikh narratives and compare their ideas with those of Allah's Book. The benefit of this method is that we are now able to demonstrate that politicised Islam is basically an invention of our honourable scholars who aimed at replacing the spiritual message of the Book by a political ideology that pleased the authoritarian rulers of their times and mobilised the masses for unjustified wars and crimes against humanity.

This chapter intends to show how differently the Book talks about those topics that became politicised and militarised by traditional scholarship. We will show that struggle and fight in God's way have nothing to do with martyrdom, missionary activities, and warfare; that Allah does not stipulate any legal punishment for apostasy; that in Islam there does exist a concept of freedom of religion; that loyalty to the religion of Islam does not mean an exclusivist identity eliminating all other attachments and loyalties; and that finally Allah wants us to live a peaceful existence of multiple identities. It will become evident how close the #ulam§"'s and the Islamists' arguments are. Both demand the death penalty for apostasy; both deny freedom of religion; both treat humans as 'slaves of God'; both use the concepts of a l-jih§d and a l-qit§l as aggressive tools to justify militancy and violence; and both abuse the Qur'anic a l-amr bi'l-ma#råf wa-nahy #an a l-munkar as a strategy to intimidate people, to intrude into their private lives, and to function as a kind of combined thought police and vice squad. It is the aim of this chapter, which has been adapted from our fifth book,[324] that the readers will understand why both groups, the Islamists and #ulam§", since their views on these matters fundamentally contradict everything that Allah says in the Book, have lost the right to speak in the name of God.

 Freedom

We begin with the issue of freedom whose proper conceptualisation is absolutely vital for a critique of Political Islam and for a reconfiguration of the collective consciousness of Arab Muslims. The current intellectual crisis has been caused by a century-long absence of any viable notion of freedom in the public mind. As a result, in our debates about Islam and religion the issue of freedom counts for very little or is entirely absent. This section intends to contribute to a wider awareness of how important the notion of individual and collective freedom is for a reformulation of Islamic ethics and for the draining of the sources of religious fundamentalism.

Philosophically, the notion of freedom allows human beings the right to act and make decisions without external constraints. It refers to a state of being free or at liberty to exercise a conscious choice between affirmation and negation with regards to all aspects of objective reality. Expressed in the terminology of the Book, freedom gives individuals the power to determine their action by moving from al-qadar (objective determinism) to al-qa·§” (indeterminism/free will), facilitated by knowledge of the real world. Whereas al-qadar pertains to God’s laws of the objective reality, al-qa·§” refers to the free will of human beings to choose between confirmation or rejection of God’s laws. The achievement of this form of freedom depends upon the individual’s ability to acquire knowledge about the laws of nature and society, because without knowledge there is no choice, and where there is no choice, there is no freedom.

Freedom expresses a fundamental dialectic between (absolute) necessity/determination that is embodied in universal social and natural laws on the one side, and on the other, the ability of individuals to act independently of both the dictates of natural laws and social constraints. Freedom is born out of human beings’ desire to use objective laws to their own advantage. And this applies even if humans are incapable of doing so, either because of a lack of technology and hence an incapacity to use natural resources or because of sociopolitical factors that suppress individual sovereignty and selfdetermination. Not everyone who has accumulated knowledge of objective existence will gain freedom from it, but it is undeniable that such knowledge develops at least a feeling for the dialectical tension between objective determination and individual choice.

Choice in this context means the realisation of the dialectics between opposition and unity. It means to realise that in the world of nature, contrast (or opposition) can be resolved by a process of synthesis (or unity). The natural opposition, for example, between a mountain (thesis) and a valley (antithesis), is resolved by the unifying element of ‘landscape’ that combines the two opposites (synthesis). The opposition between cold and hot is resolved by the uniting element of ‘temperature’ (and this applies to many other oppositions: deaf ↔ hearing = ear; blind ↔ seeing = eyes; darkness ↔ brightness = light; slow ↔ fast = speed; above ↔ below = height; in front ↔ behind = position; right ↔ left = direction; north ↔ south = directions/points on the compass, etc.) Freedom consists of the ability of individuals to choose their own direction by moving between objectively existing opposites.

Freedom is thus not just an illusion in people’s minds. It is a fundamental law that awareness of choice increases when more knowledge is acquired about nature, cosmos, and society. The more people learn about the laws of objective reality the better they are equipped to make informed decisions. In order to decide, for example, whether to carry out a complicated surgical operation on the heart or not, one has to have thorough knowledge of the way a heart functions, the physiology of organs, the circulation of the blood, and so forth; the more we expand our knowledge in this area and the more we learn about the organ’s functions and its structure, the more freedom we possess in deciding whether to proceed with the heart operation or not (= a choice between affirmation and rejection). Herein lies the importance of research institutes in the natural sciences and their pivotal role in studying the constitution and function of the human body, coupled with their duty to teach people their research results, thus enabling individuals to make the right decisions.

What does a culture or civilisation look like that does not acknowledge the concept of freedom (as we have defined it) and how can we explain the absence of freedom in Arab-Muslim societies? We begin to answer this question by stating that freedom has two dimensions: it is personal/individual and collective/social. Personal freedom is manifested in the conscious decision of an individual, for example, to either eat (affirmation) or not to eat (rejection). The limits of such individual freedom are, however, restricted by nature and society. Human beings are by nature also social beings, and society is the collective assembly of individuals, defined by rationality. The individuals of a society are connected with one another by a collective sense of moral responsibility and sociopolitical duty that distinguishes human societies from the world of animals (because although animals assemble in herds and flocks they could never build complex organisations such as nations or states). Whereas the behaviour of animals is predominantly ruled by instinct, in human societies these instincts are curbed by ethical rules and civil contracts, for example, by the so-called maÈram code that prohibits a man to marry his mother, sister, daughter, and paternal and maternal aunts, curbing the biological, indistinctive drive of his sexuality. Other moral and social duties, such as respect for parents, justice to orphans, a balanced distribution of inheritance, and such, which do not exist in the world of animals, are established norms in human societies in order to foster civility and morality. These civilisational achievements have been acquired over a long period of time during human evolution. In this process, human societies have gradually moved away from the world of animals because now civility and morality regulate the social behaviour of society’s citizens and not animalistic urges of instinct and desire.

An awareness of personal freedom is necessary in order to develop an acceptance of the notion of democracy which is the political expression for the existence of individual freedom. Democracy signals the existence of freedom of thought and expression that individuals enjoy in any given society. It also indicates a higher amount of social and moral responsibility among its members, and a healthier atmosphere of care, compassion, and sympathy. If a country wants to achieve such a healthy state of mutual solidarity it has to give democracy an important place in its political life and facilitate it with an authority that is intellectually and morally supported by all members of society.

Such an authority does not exist in the Arab-Muslim world. Democracy is not truly embedded in the political consciousness of Arab Muslims. But we should not forget that we live in a region full of traditional customs and traditions that existed long before MuÈammad's (ß) mission had arrived, that is, long enough to have had a stronger impact on the people's mind (until today) than the message of the Book. Before MuÈammad (ß) called for a new social consciousness, ancient Arab society promoted an excessive form of individualism, much more so than any other culture that existed at that time. Arab Bedouin culture nourished a very individualistic concept of freedom. This individualism has ruled in our political consciousness ever since, in spite of MuÈammad's (ß) mission to abolish it. It has caused the absence of democracy in our culture because individualist ideologies suppressed the collective-social consciousness which any form of democratic culture would require. This is manifest in the victory of egotism, a consciousness of 'I', among the Arabs, in terms of political decision-making, and in the absence of a consciousness of 'us'. This, in turn, has generated a culture of political despotism which has become deep-rooted in the Arab-Muslim world. Arab culture consists of societies that are 'built on sand', in the sense that they are built upon millions of individual grains of sand totally isolated and unsupportive of one another. This is in stark contrast to European societies which are based on a widely shared sense of social and moral responsibility, solidarity, and national unity. Democracy has become strongly rooted in their societies which, as a result, show a remarkable degree of wealth, education, and economic strength.

MuÈammad's (ß) mission confronted the existing Bedouin society with the challenge of a new type of centralized state unique in the history of Arabia. This state was based on tauÈÊd, representing the first pillar of al-isl§m, complemented by the belief in MuÈammad (ß) as Allah's Messenger, representing the first pillar of al-Êm§n. During MuÈammad's (ß) lifetime, the distinction was fiercely protected, on the one hand, between a l-isl§m, which began with Noah ('a) and which was perfected by MuÈammad (ß), and on the other hand, a l-Êm§n, embodied in MuÈammad's (ß) messengerhood and its instructions for prayer, zak§t, fasting, pilgrimage, shår§ consultation, and Jih§d in God's way (see chapter 1).

Soon after the Prophet's (ß) death this distinction gradually disappeared, which had disastrous effects on the political culture in the Arab-Muslim world.

Through the ill-fated fusion of al-isl§m and a l-Êm§n, the central (universal) concepts of a l-isl§m remained semantically imprisoned within the culture of seventh-century Arabia as they were kept inside the compound of al-Êm§n. The interpretation of the term ‘mosque’ (al-masjid), for example, is today entirely dominated by the semantic constraints of al-Êm§n, as it is defined as the place where people perform ritual prayers five times a day, celebrate festivals, and listen to sermons from state-employed preachers who recite an oath of allegiance to the ruler of the country. In short, everything that is associated with the Êm§nic term al-j§mi#, the communal place of worship for the followers of MuÈammad (ß), the Muslim-Believers, and which is under the control of the state authorities. And yet, according to the Book, a mosque is an isl§mic term and refers in general to a place where God is remembered and where one calls upon all Muslim-Assenters to follow Him, that is, a place of universal a l-isl§m (referring to no building in particular but to ‘places where people assent to God’). Today, we see signs of a very welcome return to the mosque’s original function as the Book defines it. It had never fully disappeared but it was buried under centuries of exclusive usage for a l-Êm§n when mosques were turned into big prayer halls.

Let us reiterate that the Book gave Muhammad’s followers al-Êm§n, a set of rituals and very specific ceremonies of worship (in a j§mi#, not in a mosque). But it also gave humankind al-isl§m that is embodied in the intention to achieve, in a truly universal manner, the highest possible human ideals, a message that began with the tauÈÊd of Noah (“That you should worship God, fear Him and obey me…”, NåÈ 71:3), that was continued by the many calls of ancient prophets and messengers, and that was perfected by the noblest of Allah’s messengers (ß): ‘Say: “I am but a man like yourselves, (but) the inspiration has come to me, that your god is one God…”,’ (A l-Kahf 18:110). A l-isl§m contains the highest forms of morality as exemplified in Noah’s call to respect our parents (“O my Lord! Forgive me, my parents…”, NåÈ 71:28) and in the noble Messenger’s (ß) admonition to pay attention to the smallest details of everyday life (‘O you who believe! When you are told to make room in the assemblies, (spread out and) make room: (ample) room will God provide for you…,’ Al-Muj§dila 58:11).

As its core value, al-isl§m promotes freedom of worship. It negates slavish submission to a wrathful God. Human beings are free in their worship; obedience or disobedience occurs from their own will. They are God’s affirmers, not His slaves. This is what #Umar b. a l-Khaãã§b (r) meant when, in the famous narration of #Amr b. al-#$ß, he said, ‘Why did you enslave people when their mothers had born them free?”[325] #Umar said this in order to promote a strong sense of social justice among his companions, and this at a time when the son of a slave was still considered a slave! His words contain one of the most important human rights, namely the right of individual freedom, because it is a gift from God, like His gift of life and His gift of intellect. No human society can live without it. Individual freedom is the foundation of collective democracy; and democracy is the practice of freedom that is backed up by the most influential civic authorities of a society.

In spite of MuÈammad’s (ß) monumental efforts to establish a new political culture in Medina, building upon the few traces of democratic rules that existed in ancient Arabia, most of his achievements were destroyed by the political events that followed his death. Disregarding the Book’s injunction, people started to confuse his prophethood with kingship, in spite of the fact that MuÈammad (ß) did not create his state as a king or statesman, but only as a prophet. After his death, politic al-theological measures of the companions filled the (political, not religious!) vacuum that caused a serious internal crisis, as a result of which economic and tribal interests completely took over the political agenda—and history took its ill-starred course in the seventh century. Fatally, the political measures taken by the companions were eventually regarded as the continuation of MuÈammad’s prophetic office and entered Arab consciousness as a combined form of al-isl§m and al-Êm§n. But they had nothing to do with either of them. Our most important task today is to separate these political (and purely historical) measures again from MuÈammad’s (ß) messengerhood, which in effect demands a separation of religion from politics.

Since political rule of the companions entered our political consciousness as al-isl§m, religion was confused with politics, and after this the political and religious establishment has always found it necessary to promote educational and intellectual methods which suppress critical thinking and freedom of speech. We should remind our political and religious elite that the governance of Muhammad’s (ß) companions was purely based on a realpolitik which any state, ancient or modern, would be able to pursue (i.e., regardless of any prophetical message). The Arabs were by no means original in anything they did (politically) in the seventh century. Even their concept of a caliphate was completely improvised and based on the companions’ need to fill the political vacuum left by the Prophet’s (ß) death. The period of the rightly guided caliphs was in fact a transition period between the era of the Prophet (ß) and the era of Arab imperialism (of the Umayyads and Abbasids). Everything that happened in that transition period was based on the politica l-theological requirements of the day—the companions’ decisions were human, fallible, and contingent—with no real connection to the Messenger (ß). With the emergence of the epoch of imperial expansion, which started with the reign of Mu#§wiya b. AbÊ Sufy§n, rulers began to suppress the democratic right of people to participate in politics. As will be shown in this chapter, Jih§d was transformed into conquest and military raids, while during the period of the Prophet (ß) it had meant a struggle in God’s way to secure freedom of choice for all people.

During the formative period of the first three to four centuries, the pillars of religion were reduced to only four (prayer, zak§t, fasting, and pilgrimage). Shår§ consultation and fighting (al-qit§l) in Allah’s way (i.e., freedom of choice) were removed from of al-Êm§n, while ‘good work’ and ethics (moral laws) were removed from al-isl§m. Of course, eliminating these democratic and ethical dimensions from the pillars of religion was entirely in the interest of the individualistic and despotic political culture that dominated the formative period of (historical) Islam. In fact, this removal even bolstered the power and authority of political tyrants and despots. It created a lack of critical thinking because people thought that as long as they pray, fast, and go on pilgrimage, everything will be all right and Islam will prosper!

The lack of critical awareness created a mind-set that easily accepted the #ulam§”s newly devised theologies of predestination according to which God predetermines every single human act. The concept of free will and freedom of choice was entirely marginalised. In this way the formerly revolutionary (Islamic) concept of social, collective responsibility was replaced by a politic al-dynastical practice by which one tyrant removes another tyrant, leading to an endless series of political assassinations and a political culture of force and violence. Until today it has not been fully registered that a l-jih§d al-qit§lÊ does not mean militant holy war but rather ‘legislation’ for the purpose of establishing God’s word (kalimat All§h) as the highest ideal. The most significant ‘word of God’ is freedom of choice for all people, regardless of whether they are assenters, heretics, believers, or unbelievers. Any other form of a l-qit§l (in particular if it means ‘killing’) does not qualify as a ‘fight in God’s way’, even if it is regarded as legal (e.g., the execution of prisoners in the USA).

In order to change the current situation and mind-set of Arab Muslim-Believers we need to achieve a higher degree of acceptance of democracy in the Arab-Muslim world. We believe that these following four things will achieve this:

1. A spiritual covenant, consisting of worship of God by all people and based on freedom of choice between obedience and disobedience—a worship that will be assessed by Allah on the Day of Judgement. The Book’s eschatological vision of God’s judgement acknowledges the existence of free will and the freedom of choice (between faith and heresy) because freedom is a ‘word of God’ that is given primordially to humankind since God has eternally granted freedom to all of His creation.

2. An ethical covenant (the covenant of al-isl§m) which includes all humankind. The protection of Human Rights is a fundamental part of this ethical covenant.

3. A civil covenant (in the sense of Rousseau’s Civil Contract), implying a pledge of citizenship.[326]

4. A political covenant (or a code of practice for political participation). This consists of a pledge to successfully implement democratic values and procedures in all spheres of political life, from the formation of political parties (so that they cover a wide spectrum of political opinions) to the practice of state censorship (so that it does not stifle political opposition and dissent).

It is a regrettable fact that most people in the Arab-Muslim world have still not learned that freedom of thought, freedom of speech, and freedom of religion can only be achieved if that society is organised by a political system that wholeheartedly embraces democratic principles such as political pluralism, equality before the law, freedom of the press, the right to petition elected officials, civil liberties, judicial independence, separation of powers, and so on. We all have to learn that without these democratic principles a society cannot promote independent, critical thinking, and without intellectual autonomy and critical thinking a society will slide back into the darkness of either tyranny and despotism or complete anarchy. Our plea for more democracy is a plea to prevent the current attitude among Arabs from becoming so entrenched in archaic notions of politics that we can no longer hope for any reform of the political regimes currently in power.

 Apostasy

The notion that apostasy is forbidden and that apostates will be punished by death has often been used by political authorities and the religious establishment to suppress freedom of religion. For centuries the threat of the death penalty has been hanging over the heads of those who dare to question the fundamental doctrines of Islamic scholarship or who want to explore religions other than the one he or she was born into. This section shows that the death penalty is a fiction of Islamic fiqh concocted in order to discipline MuslimBelievers and to punish political dissent. Our aim is to reinvigorate the very lenient attitude of Allah’s Book towards apostasy and to leave behind the political, military, and ideological baggage of the past that the fiqh concept of apostasy has carried over into modern times.

We start by looking at the Arabic term for apostasy in the Book. Al-ridda is derived from the three-radical verb radda (r-d-d) that occurs, in its different cognates, fifty-nine times in the text. Al-ZamakhsharÊ, in his As§s al-bal§gha, lists over twenty different semantic meanings for its literal/descriptive usage, and over ten more meanings for its nonliteral, figurative usage.[327] In general, the verb radda (r-d-d) touches on a variety of thematic clusters, two of which are of particular interest for our study of apostasy:

1. radda meaning: to ‘return to’, ‘restore’, or ‘turn back to’ regarding something lost:

Thus did We restore him [radadn§hu] to his mother, that her eye might be comforted, that she might not grieve… (Al-Qaßaß 28:13) Quite a number of the people of the book wish they could turn you (people) back [yaruddånakum] to infidelity after you have believed… (Al-Baqara 2:109)

Then when they opened their baggage, they found their stock-in-trade had been returned [raddat] to them… (Yåsuf 12:65)

2. radda meaning: to ‘avert’, ‘prevent’, or ‘hold back’ things:

Nay, it may come to them all of a sudden and confound them: no power will they have then to avert it [raddah§], nor will they (then) get respite. (Al-Anbiy§” 21:40)

…if God inflicts harm on you, no one can remove [r§dd[a]] it but Him … (Yånus 10:107, AH)

…but if He wills harm on a people, no one can ward it off [maradd[a]]… (Al-Ra#d 13:11, AH)

‘O my people! Enter the holy land which God has assigned unto you, and turn not back [wa-la tartaddå] ignominiously, for then will you be overthrown, to your own ruin.’ (Al-M§“ida 5:21)

Two verses in the Book specifically address the issue of apostasy:

They ask you concerning fighting in the prohibited month. Say: “Fighting therein is a grave (offence); but graver is it in the sight of God to prevent access to the path of God, to deny Him, to prevent access to the sacred mosque, and drive out its members.” Tumult and oppression are worse than slaughter. Nor will they cease fighting you until they turn you back from your faith if they can. And if any of you turn back from their faith and die in unbelief, their works will bear no fruit in this life and in the Hereafter… (Al-Baqara 2:117)

O you who believe! If any from among you turn back from his faith, soon will God produce a people whom He will love as they will love Him—lowly with the believers, mighty against the rejecters, fighting in the way of God, and never afraid of the reproaches of such as find fault… (Al-M§“ida 5:54)

Based on these two verses, we shall define apostasy as any form of human behaviour that expresses a ‘turn back’ from faith. In contrast, belief is a form of human behaviour that expresses a ‘turn towards’ faith. On the Day of Judgement, Allah issues either reward or punishment for human behaviour in this world, which He will assess by weighing people’s acts ‘towards faith’ against their acts ‘back from faith’. (‘On that day will men proceed in companies sorted out, to be shown the deeds that they (had done). * Then shall anyone who has done an atom’s weight of good, see it! * And anyone who has done an atom’s weight of evil, shall see it’, Al-Zalzala 99:6–8). These verses assure us that every human being, by consciously choosing either to turn towards faith or back from it, determines his future destiny and whether he will be rewarded or punished ‘on that day’.

The word apostasy literally means ‘to stand clear’ or ‘to stay away’. The question is away from what? The Book says it means to stay away from ‘religion’ (dÊn), which is defined as a form of universal human behaviour that is characterised by faith in God, His angels, His books, His messengers, the Last Day and doing Good Work. The lower limit of religion is marked by belief in God, the Last Day, and doing Good Work (= the minimum requirement for embracing al-isl§m), and the upper limit of religion consists of the pillars of al-Êm§n, that is, prayer, alms tax, fasting, and pilgrimage. In between the upper and lower limits people decide to follow God’s orders and abstain from what He has forbidden. While the witness that ‘there is no other god but God’ defines the realm of al-isl§m, the witness that ‘MuÈammad is the Messenger of God’ defines the realm of al-Êm§n. In both realms, people are obliged to implement the highest moral ideals and act correctly in their daily conduct. Given these definitions, apostasy means to stay (altogether) away from religion, that is, a transgression of its lower limit, the first shah§da (‘there is no other god but God’), implying the complete abandonment of a l-isl§m. It does not, however, mean to leave a religious community. If someone parts from a monotheistic Abrahamic community, such as that of MuÈammad’s (ß) followers, of Jews or Christians, or from a nonmonotheistic religious community, it is not defined as apostasy. It would only mean to withdraw from membership to a specific religious community, not from a ‘religion’ as such, because there is only one religion and that is al-isl§m.

If apostasy occurs how are we supposed to respond to it? Should we punish apostasy and punish the apostate? Looking up the Book, we learn that there are two forms of punishment for apostasy: a) impotence of actions in this world and the Next, and b) a withdrawal of God’s love. The first punishment is stated in 2:217: ‘And if any of you turn back from their faith and die in unbelief, their works will bear no fruit in this life and in the Hereafter,’ and the second in 5:54: ‘God will produce a people whom He will love as they will love Him’. These punishments must be treated as the upper limit of penal law, similar to the other so-called Èadd/Èudåd punishments mentioned in the Book (for murder, adultery, theft, false accusation of fornication, etc.). The existence of a punitive boundary implies that there is no absolute and once-and-for all fixed punishment for apostasy, only a description of an upper limit for possible legislation concerning it.

Neither verse suggests punishing the apostate in any specific (corporeal) or personal way. Given the fact that the adoption of faith is a conscious, rational decision taken by intelligent people freely and voluntarily, the absence of any order to act against apostasy should not surprise anyone. After all, apostasy is a personal decision that only needs to be given account for on the Day of Judgement. The Book says that those who believe do so for the good of their own soul, and those who disbelieve do so to their own loss:

Say: ‘O you men! Now truth has reached you from your Lord! Those who receive guidance, do so for the good of their own souls; those who stray, do so to their own loss: and I am not (set) over you to arrange your affairs.’ (Yånus 10:108)

We showed him the way: whether he be grateful or ungrateful (rests on his will). (Al-Ins§n 76:3)

Given that these are clear rules by the Book, it is surprising to read that the commentaries of the exegetes prescribe unbelievably cruel punishment for apostates. In al-R§zÊ’s Maf§tÊÈ al-ghayb we read, for example, that an apostate ‘should be killed and should be fought until he is defeated. He does not deserve any support, help or good words from the believers. His wife should separate from him, and he does not deserve inheritance from the believers.”[328] By which verse of the Book can they justify such cruelty? We also hear unbelievable stories about the punishment of entire tribes for apostasy during the early period of Islam. In a l-ZamakhsharÊ’s TafsÊr al-kashsh§f we read that ‘during the period of the Messenger (ß) there were three groups of people who apostacized: 1—the clan of the Banå Mudlaj (the people of al-Aswad al-#AnasÊ), 2—the clan of the Banå \anÊfah (the people of Musaylima a l-Kadhdh§b), and 3—the clan of the Banå Asad (the people of •ulaiÈah b. Khuwaylid). During the reign of Abå Bakr (r) there were a further seven groups of apostates: 4—the tribe of the Faz§rah (the people of #Uyaynah b. \ ißn), 5—the Ghiãf§n (the people of Qurrat b. Salima al-QushayrÊ), 6—the clan of the Banå SalÊm (the people of al-Fuj§“at b. #Abd Y§lÊl), 7—the clan of the Banå Yarbå# (the people of M§lik b. Nuwayrah), 8—some from the clan of the Banå TamÊm (the people of Sij§È bint a l-Mundhir), 9—the tribe of the Kindah (the people of al-Ash#ath b. Qays), 10—the tribe of the Bikr b. W§“il of al-BaÈrayn (the people of a l-Khaãm b. Zayd); and during the reign of #Umar b. a l-Khaãã§b there was one more group: 11—the Ghass§n (the people of Jibillat b. al-Ayham)’.[329]

ZamakhsharÊ’s list is very peculiar for three main reasons. First, it omits, for no given reason, the Banå Amiyya (and hence of #Abdall§h b. Sa#d b. AbÊ SaraÈ and Marw§n b. al-\akam who allegedly apostacized), while it includes the people of Ghass§n as apostates who, ironically, had never accepted MuÈammad’s new message and could therefore not apostatise. Second, it suggests collective takfÊr, that is, the accusation of unbelief against a whole group because of the apostasy of individual members of this group—which contradicts the rule of the Book that ‘no laden soul shall bear the burden of another’ (35:18, MF). Third, it lists the names of MuÈammad’s (ß) companions (e.g., al-Ash#ath b. Qays) who should be, by the exegetes’ own logic, beyond the accusation of kufr, given that our noble scholars keep circulating a ÈadÊth that calls the believers to follow (all!) of Mu Èammad’s (ß) companions: ‘My companions are like the stars. Whichever [of them] you follow, you obtain guidance.”[330]

It is obvious to everyone that such accounts of apostasy are in clear breach of the rules of the Book. Later exegetes such as a l-R§zÊ and al-ZamakhsharÊ were victims of a scholarly ethos that, a) regarded the Companions as infallible and b) took their accounts as sacrosanct, resulting in doctrines that mutated ‘historical Islam’ into ‘Islamic history’, a form of revisionism through which purely historical narratives turn into sanctified heritage, and heritage into legislation. By the time a l-R§zÊ and a l-ZamakhsharÊ wrote their commentaries, they could not but accept at face value the texts of the tradition which had acquired an authority that they did not dare to challenge. At the root of this problem lay the earlier fuqah§”s’ search for a passage in the Book with the help of which their masters and employers, that is, the despotic rulers of the Umayyad and Abbasid dynasties, could legitimise the liquidation of their political opponents as a preventive measure for the protection of religion. When the fuqah§” realised that they could find nothing in the Book that served this purpose, they moved on to the prophetical Sunna searching for a suitable ÈadÊth. Yet again, they could not find a rule that demands the killing of an apostate. Finally, they searched the sÊra biographies of the Prophet (ß) and made a strike. They referred to reports that claim that MuÈammad (ß) had ordered the killing of the clan of the Banå Mudlaj (because of the apostasy of a l-Aswad a l-#AnasÊ), the killing of the clan of the Banå \anÊfah (because of the apostasy of Musaylima al-Kadhdh§b), and the killing of the clan of the Banå Asad (because of the apostasy of •ulaiÈah b. Khuwaylid). Furthermore, they claimed to have found a ÈadÊth that quotes the Prophet (ß) saying that 'he who changes his religion, kill him', and finally they managed to portray Abå Bakr and #Umar as acting only in the tradition of the Prophet's (ß) harsh words on apostasy when they persecuted and punished clans and tribes which had apostacized.

However, their claims can easily be contradicted in several ways, for example:

1. By a ÈadÊth, narrated by a l-Bukh§rÊ, Abå D§wåd, al-Nis§"Ê, al-TirmidhÊ, Ibn \ay§n, al-\§kim, AÈmad b. \anbal, Abå Ya#l§, al-BayhaqÊ, al-D§quãnÊ, al-•abar§nÊ, Ibn AbÊ Shaybah, reported from 'Ikrima: '#AlÊ had burnt a group of apostates. This [news] reached Ibn #Abb§s who said, "Had it been me, I [also] would have killed them because of the statement of the Messenger (ß): 'he who changes his religion, kill him'. But I would not have burnt them because of the statement of the Messenger (ß): 'Do not punish with Allah's punishment.' This [news] reached #AlÊ who said: "Ibn #Abb§s has spoken the truth". Abå '^s§ al-TirmidhÊ said: 'This ÈadÊth is ßaÈÊÈ Èasan, and based on this is the practice of the people of knowledge regarding apostates. They [only] differ with regard to [the treatment of a] woman if she apostacizes. One group said: she is to be killed; and this is stated by al-Awz§#Ê and AÈmad; and one group said: she is to be imprisoned and not killed; and this is stated by Sufy§n and others from Kåfah."[331]

Also, by a ÈadÊth narrated by Im§m M§lik in his Muwaãã§, reported by Zayd b. Aslam: 'The Prophet (ß) said:

“He who changes his religion, cut off his head.” This is mursal according to all narrators. The meaning of the Prophet’s (ß) statement is, according to our understanding—and Allah is most knowledgeable—that whoever leaves Islam for another [religious community], including the zan§diqah [those who have secretly apostacized] and similar others, if they make it [i.e., their apostasy] [publicly] manifest, they will be killed and will not be asked to repent. As for someone who has left Islam for another [religious community] but did not make it [publicly] manifest, he will be asked to repent. If he repents [he should be left alone], otherwise he will be killed. The Prophet (ß) [however] did not intend [to include], according to our understanding—and Allah is most knowledgeable—someone who leaves Judaism for Christianity or someone [who leaves] Christianity for Judaism or for any other [religious community]…’.[332]

Three things can be deduced from M§lik b. Anas’s account:

<right>

First, the prophetical statement, reported by Zayd b. Aslam, is graded as (only) mursal (‘hurried’)[333] but is then transmitted as authentic as it is included in the Muwaãã§ (note that Im§m Muslim objected to the authenticity of this ÈadÊth). Second, the ÈadÊth transmits a rule about someone who leaves one religious community for another (i.e., from MuÈammad’s community of believers to Christianity, Judaism or others). It does not talk about someone who leaves ‘religion’ per se and turns to unbelief—this in spite of the text’s use of the term dÊn, ‘religion’. It is impossible to interpret dÊn in this ÈadÊth as ‘religion’ in the conventional meaning of ‘religious community’, because then it should also be applied to Jews and Christians who have converted to Islam. Since these converts have also ‘changed their religion’, they should also be killed according to the fuqah§“s’ logic, which is, of course, utter nonsense. Third, and most important of all, the commentary on the ÈadÊth states that before anyone is killed for apostasy, his infidelity must be publicly manifested, implying that a renegade must openly declare that he has (completely) abandoned his religion.

</right>

From the first ÈadÊth, narrated by a l-TirmidhÊ, three things seem immediately obvious: First, the ÈadÊth, as reported by ‘Ikrima from Ibn #Abb§s and #AlÊ, has been classified as ßaÈÊÈ (sound) and Èasan (good), indicating that it has been accurately transmitted (word for word). Second, the rule about someone who apostacizes (‘kill him’) is therefore, at least according to the rules of ÈadÊth sciences, correct. Third, female apostates are exempted from the death penalty—according to the Kufan School—which, however, seems to be at odds with the prophetical statement in which the Prophet (ß) used the pronoun ‘whoever’ (Arab. man) which includes both men and women (‘kill him or her’). It seems very peculiar that whereas the first ÈadÊth (‘he who changes his religion, kill him’) was unanimously classified as sound (ßaÈÊÈ) by all \adÊth scholars, the second ÈadÊth (‘he who changes his religion, cut off his head’) was, even though it is almost identical to the first ÈadÊth, criticised for its weak chain of transmission, and that Im§m Muslim rejected it as entirely spurious.

We believe that both ÈadÊths are unreliable/false for the following five reasons:

a) They contradict the punishment for apostasy as it is given in the Book (2:217; 5:54).

b) They deviate from the spirit of the Book and its treatment of disbelief or—as it puts it—any ‘rejection of God’:

Not for you, (but for God), is the decision: whether He turn in mercy to them, or punish them; for they are indeed wrong-doers. ($l #Imr§n 3:128)

Invite (all) to the way of your Lord with wisdom and beautiful preaching; and argue with them in ways that are best and most gracious: for your Lord knows best, who have strayed from His path, and who receive guidance. (Al-NaÈl 16:125)

If it had been your Lord’s will, they would all have believed—all who are on earth! Will you then compel mankind, against their will, to believe! (Yånus 10:99)

Therefore, do give admonition, for you are one to admonish. * You are not one to manage (men’s) affairs. * But if any turn away and reject God, * God will punish him with a mighty punishment. (Al-Gh§shiyya 88:21–24)

c) They contradict other ÈadÊths of the Prophet (ß), for example:

Ibn #Abb§s reports that the Prophet (s) said: ‘I have been ordered to fight people till they say ‘there is no god but Allah’. So, whoever said it has saved his life and wealth from me—and yet, the [final] reckoning is with God.”[334]

Abå Huraira reports that the Prophet (ß) said: ‘None of the Muslims is allowed to [take] another Muslim’s blood, property and honour.”[335]

a) They were not cited by the companions when they themselves had to deal with apostasy. Ibn #Abb§s quoted the ÈadÊth (‘he who changes his religion, kill him’) in the context of his disapproval of #AlÊ’s punishment of the Zaãã, a sect that refused to give up their pagan practices. This happened during #AlÊ’s reign as caliph, more than thirty-five years after the Hijra of the Prophet (ß). Significantly, this ÈadÊth was not cited by Abå Bakr when he was challenged by #Umar for his harsh treatment of apostate tribes twenty years earlier. He only said to #Umar:

‘By God, I will [definitely] fight those who separate between prayer and zak§t. By God, if they refuse [to pay even] a bridle, which they used to pay to the Messenger of God (ß), I will fight them for their refusal."[336] If the ÈadÊth reported by Ibn #Abb§s had been such an approved and well-known statement of the Prophet (ß), as it is now claimed, Abå Bakr would have surely used it in his reply to #Umar in order to justify his persecution of apostate tribes because it would have had much more authority than his own ijtih§d on this.

b) The ÈadÊth has never been applied and turned into common practice ('kill him'), neither during the time of the Prophet (ß) nor during the reign of the rightly guided caliphs. Those clans, tribes, and individuals, which al-ZamakhsharÊ lists, were not killed because of the fact that they abandoned religion but because of the political consequences their apostasy had for the safety and welfare of MuÈammad's community at the time. This will be explained in detail below.

2. All accounts of the first cases of apostasy start in the year ten of the Hijra, after MuÈammad's farewell pilgrimage. This includes the exegetical works on 2:217 and 5:54, and the treatment of apostasy by scholars of ÈadÊth, sÊra, akhb§r, and tar§jim—all of them seem to date the first cases of apostasy to the last year of MuÈammad's life. Does this mean that before 632 there were no cases of apostasy? Of course there were many! We are told that it was then labelled as 'hypocrisy' (nif§q), not apostasy. #$"isha said: 'the Messenger of Allah (ß) died, and the Arabs apostacized, but it was [still] known as hypocrisy'.[337] Also, al-ZamakhsharÊ's list of apostates ends with a group that apostacized during the reign of #Umar. Does this mean that after his death in 644 there were no more cases of apostasy? Of course there were, but in the fiqh manuals they became categorised under different headings, for example, ßiy§l (assault), naq· al-bay#a (breach of the oath of allegiance), al-khuråj #an al-jum#a (secession from the community), a l-zandaqa (heresy, 'free thought'), raf· a l-ã§#a ålÊ 'l-amr (disobedience and rebellion against those in authority, political dissent), and others.

It is evident from this that apostasy has not been treated systematically by the fuqah§" and that the lists of apostates circulated by the exegetes are both historically and legally worthless. From the discussion so far we can discern four things: first, apostasy needs to be publicly manifest (openly declared) in order to be punished (Im§m M§lik); second, it has to become ‘known’, that is, officially acknowledged—even though it might be under the name of hypocrisy (ÈadÊth by #$“isha); third, apostasy was treated as a collective misdeed (a l-ZamakhsharÊ); and fourth, apostasy is reported to have occurred in the shape of (armed) separatist movements which forcefully opposed the authority of the central government. We are told by al-•abarÊ:

He then turned to Najr§n and conquered it in ten days. The people of MadhÈaj supported him. Then he killed Shahr b. B§dh§m (one of the Prophet’s [appointed] collectors in Yemen after the death of his father). He defeated the (tribes of) a l-Anb§” and conquered ‘an#§’. Al-Aswad conquered [everything] between ‘ahÊd— a desert of the \a·ramawt—and al-BaÈrayn before ‘Aden. The Yemen supported him, and his authority started to spread like fire. [By the time] a month had passed, he had seven hundred horsemen in addition to the camel corps. His governor in MadhÈaj was #Amr b. Ma#d Yukarrib a l-ZabÊdÊ… (He [a l-#AnasÊ] had written a letter to those who came to fight him. He wrote: “O you who have come to us! Keep away from us and do not take our land because we deserve it more.”)[338]

Then al-•abarÊ tells us about the apostate •ulaiÈah b. Khuwaylid:

At the time when #Abas and Dhuby§n and its surroundings until al-Buz§khah were enclosed (i.e., the springs of the Asad clan, where •ulaiÈah and his helpers stayed after returning from Sumayr§”), •ulaiÈah sent to Judaylah and a l-Ghawth [asking them] to join him. So people from \uyayn hurried towards him. The horsemen of the Tay’ used to run into the horsemen of the Asad and the Faz§rah, but they would not fight. [The horsemen of] the Asad and the Faz§rah would say: “No, by God, we will never give alliance to Abå Faßil [a derogatory name for Abå Bakr meaning father of the calf of a shecamel]”, and [the horsemen of] the Tay’ would say: “We testify that he will fight you until you call him Abå al-FaÈl al-Akbar [father of the biggest bull, i.e., a person of strong, masculine personality]”….[339]

We see that the real issue at stake was the question of loyalty which was measured according to the standards of tribal alliances of ancient Arabia.

Apostasy from religion, as such, did not matter to anyone. This also becomes clear when we read the lines of the following poem:

We obeyed the Messenger of Allah when he was among us, But what is with Abå Bakr, O servants of God?

Will he bequeath that [money of zak§h] to a [young] camel if it survives him?

By God, that would be a disaster.

Why did you not return our support during his time?

And why did you not fear the noise of the young braying camel?[340]

These accounts give us a good picture of the tribal culture of ancient Arabia. At its heart lay the question of allegiance, loyalty, tribal solidarity, and the (male-centred) norms of honour and dignity. Tribal warfare was an expression of power politics that aimed at the regulation of the balance of power in the Arabian Peninsula and at the political and military control over the area. The so-called apostasy wars were not fought because someone ‘left religion’ or apostacized from the faith, otherwise everyone who abandoned Islam in those years would have been killed, which was clearly not the case. Reading a l-•abarÊ’s history, one comes across names of people[341] who, because of their alliance to tribes that fought the troops of Abå Bakr’s central government, should also have been killed—at least according to the alleged words of the Prophet (ß), i.e. ‘he who changes his religion, kill him’ and ‘he who changes his religion, cut off his head”—but the fact that they were left alone not only increases our doubts as to the authenticity of these ÈadÊths but also as to the fuqah§“s’ claims to have correctly read these events.

In his a l-Iß§ba fÊ tamyÊz a l-ßaÈ§ba, a l-#Asqal§nÊ writes for example about al-Ash#ath b. Qays:

Al-Ash#ath b. Qays b. Ma#d Yukarrib al-KindÊ[h], called by the agnomen Abå MuÈammad, had visited the Prophet (ß) with seventy camel corps from Kind[ah]. He was one of the kings of Kind[ah] and was chief of the \a·ramawt. Al-Bukh§rÊ and Muslim reported about him in their ‘aÈÊÈ [ÈadÊth collections]. He had apostacized together with others from Kind[ah] and was arrested. When he was brought to Abå Bakr, Abå Bakr freed him and married his sister to him. So, he [al-Ash#ath] drew his sword, entered the camel market and hamstrung every male and female camel [he came across]. The people shouted: “Al-Ash#ath has rejected [i.e., apostacized]!”. After he had finished, he threw his sword away and said: “I, by God, did not reject [i.e., apostatise], but this man [i.e., Abå Bakr] has married his sister to me. If we were in our land, the feast would be different than this. O people of Madina! Eat! … and you camel owners, take their bodies!” He visited a l-Yarmåk and a l-Q§disiyyah, and [also] ‘iffÊn, together with #AlÊ. He died in the year 42 [Hijra] after #AlÊ was assassinated.”[342]

And al-#Asqal§nÊ tells us about #Uyayna b. \ißn:

Uyaynah b. \ißn b. \uzayfah a l-Faz§rÊ, called Abå M§lik, was among the converts [to the new religion] [a l-mu”allafat a l-qulåb]. He was one of the Prophet’s companions but his narration [of ÈadÊth] was not valid. He became a Muslim before the seizure [of Mecca] and took part in the seizure of Mecca, [the battles of] \unayn and a l-•§“if. He was among those who apostacized during the reign of Abå Bakr. He inclined towards •ulayÈah and gave allegiance to him. In him was the harshness of the desert [Bedouins]. Ibr§hÊm al-Nakha#Ê said: “#Uyaynah b. \ißn came to the Prophet (ß), while #$“isha was with him, and said: ‘Who is this woman sitting next to you?’ He [the Prophet] replied: ‘#$“isha’. He said: ‘Do I not come to you with a better [woman] than her?’ he meant his [own] woman, Umm al-BanÊn.” I read in al-Sh§fi#Ê’s Kit§b al-umm that #Umar b. a l-Khaãã§b killed #Uyayna b. \ißn due to [his] apostasy, but I did not find anyone else who mentioned that. Instead, #Uyaynah lived until #Uthm§n’s caliphate…[343]

As for a l-Zaburq§n b. Badr, we hear nothing about his apostasy in al-#Asqal§nÊ, but we know that he lived until the reign of al-Mu#§wiya because of the following account by al-J§Èií: #Al-Zaburq§n went to Ziy§d b. AbÊhi—whose eyesight had weakened—and greeted [him] lightly. Ziy§d made him come closer and sit next to him. He said: “O Abå #Abb§s! The people are laughing about your harshness.” He said: “Even if they laugh, by God, there is no man among them whose wishes I have not fathered due to [my] charm or [my] wisdom.”[344]

Is it possible that Abå Bakr and the other caliphs would have been allowed to kill apostates in the way it is reported—assuming for a moment that the accounts are accurate—purely because these people abandoned a specific belief? Or put differently, how likely is it that their harsh (persecution and decapitation) and often inconsistent (marriage to relatives, release from prison) treatment of apostates could have been possible—and this includes the reported cruelty by Kh§lid b. a l-WalÊd against M§lik b. Nuwaira and his people[345]—if such shameful and disgraceful acts would today be enough to send its perpetrators to the International War Crimes Tribunal in The Hague? Just to make it clear, we are not attempting to set up a court and charge people for their crimes during this part of Islam’s history—similar to the inquisitional style of caliphs such as #Abd al-Malik b. Marw§n or Abå Ja#far a l-Manßår[346]—since the Book reminds us that they were ‘a nation which passed away. I shall reap what it has earned, and you shall reap what you have earned. You shall not be questioned about what they were doing’ (Al-Baqara 2:141, MF).

Indeed, we would not be so critical of our early history if that spurious concept of (punishment for) apostasy, which provided the perfect legal pretext for the elimination of political opponents during the Umayyad and Abbasid periods, did not today play such a dominant role in the tactics of Islamist groups and their terror against the political establishment. Ironically, by allowing the killing of political rulers on the basis of (alleged) apostasy, Aiman al-£aw§hirÊ and other ideologues are using precisely the same weapon of terror as the ancient political regimes did in order to intimidate their opponents. Because of the confusion between religion (disbelief) and politics (secession) from the time of the early ‘wars of apostasy’, apostasy has attained a political dimension and has thus been fixed in the Arab-Muslim mind ever since. And since the fuqah§” were so involved in power politics during that period, apostasy, with these political overtones, has come to be formulated in Islamic law with exactly that fusion of religion with politics, rendering what happened during the appointment of Abå Bakr as MuÈammad’s (ß) successor (eliminating the influence of the al-Anß§r) as perfectly legal.[347] Once these apostasy wars, and in particular Abå Bakr’s military expedition in the years 10–11 A.H., were defined as ‘fulfilling God’s words’, they became the legal norm of how to deal with (any) apostate (individual or group), so that the possibility of being persecuted as an apostate hung over the political opposition like a sword of Damocles and is today, because the Islamists have turned this threat against the rulers themselves, a common feature of our current political life.

Many factors contributed to this amalgamation of apostasy with politics; we name only six:

a) The tendency to idolise people who are mentioned in the authoritative texts of nascent Islam, to the extent that we are supposed to emulate their every action and act in our times as they did thousands of years ago. As a result of this we are faced with comical situations, such as people insisting on paying their alms during Ramadan in the form of wheat, exactly as their forefathers did, because they do not accept money or any other modern substitute for it. Such excessive veneration of people is close to personality cult, which causes people to invent exaggerated accounts of their idols’ lives (similar to what we have seen with the mystics and their almost fanatical veneration of dubious ‘åfÊ sheikhs).

b) The completely uncritical attitude towards the early history of Islam, which makes it impossible to assess this period objectively according to the (political, economic, and military) parameters of its time. Instead, the period of the forefathers is seen as sacrosanct and the writings of the founders of the legal schools are regarded as infallible and untouchable, with the terrible consequence that its historic values (e.g., tribalism, paternalism, male chauvinism, and martialism) have now been transported into the modern age and are with us all the time (e.g., in the horrendous repression of women and their rights in marriage, education, and work), and are, in spite of their contingent origins, praised as absolute standards that are universally valid for all times.

c) The enormous influence of cultural traditions whose power is seen as overriding the authority of Allah’s Book. As we have seen in chapter 5, this is particular harmful in the sphere of family law where the Book’s insistence on bequests is ignored in favour of rigid inheritance laws that are applied in such a way that they maximise the male shares and minimise the female shares to the detriment of all women in the family. This against the clear rule of Allah that ‘from what is left by parents and those nearest related there is a share for men and a share for women, whether the property be small or large—a determinate share’ (Al-Nis§” 4:7).

d) The power of schoolism in legal thought, that is, the tradition to force people to attach themselves to a specific school of law and get their legal guidance exclusively from this school, even if it clearly contradicts the guidelines from Allah’s Book. We once more quote the position of the \anafÊ school: ‘if the views of the Sheikhs [of our school] contradict the views of the Qur’an, we stick to what the Sheikhs said’. Such an attitude of schoolism is also prevalent in the current obsession to call one another disbelievers, simply because of the conviction that what is not congruent with our own position must, by definition, be kufr, since we see ourselves as holding a monopoly on the truth.

e) The absence of freedom of speech in our societies and the power of public censorship in cases of nonconformity, both in the present and the past. The fact that news about the arrest of political opponents, as well as their torture and imprisonment, is met by the majority of the population with silence and indifference, while the police would not dare to ask a woman to remove her veil because of the massive public outcry it would cause, is an expression of this culture of conformity in which people cannot say what they think and cannot wear what they want.

f) The dominance of an ethos of death that attaches little value to life and belittles the attempts by modern medical research to prolong life. Doctors in our societies carelessly treat their patients like guinea pigs in laboratory experiments and do not really fight against unnecessary or accidental loss of life. Instead, if patients die we are at once told that it was God’s will, that it was predetermined that the person would die at exactly that moment. Day by day and week by week we hear the preachers from their pulpits scolding us because we love life and fear death, in spite of the fact that love of life and fear of death is a natural disposition that Allah has instilled in all of His creation. But this continuing praise of death has turned many young men into monsters who care little about life and do not think twice about blowing themselves up, killing children, women, and old people—the higher the number of casualties, the greater is their bravery. This praise of death is indeed a sick ideology.

Let us return to the problem of how to correctly define apostasy, and let us explore the following questions: What is apostasy? Who can be called an apostate? Why does the Book mention the futility of an apostate’s work in this life and the next without stipulating an actual legal punishment for the act of apostasy? Does this imply that God left it to the ruler, the judges, and the prevailing legal system to determine the punishment for apostasy? Is the Prophet’s (ß) command to kill an apostate in harmony with the divine intention as stated by the Book? Does apostasy mean that someone leaves a community for good? Can apostasy mean a revolt against a political ruler, a government, or a state? Is political apostasy the same as religious apostasy? And, finally, can any punishment for apostasy be justified in the light of our demand for freedom of religion and freedom of speech?

It is vital to answer these questions in order to sort out the mess that the traditional fuqah§” have left. It is more than evident that they were unable to conceptually separate political dissent from religious apostasy, as they constantly muddied the water with their religious interpretations and legal classifications of purely political events in the history of Islam. They were never fully able to see the difference between an oath of allegiance to a political ruler or (political) system and the religious witnessing of Allah, the Last Day, and the unity of God. In their work we see how they failed to assess the killing of Sa#Êd b. Jubayr by a l-\ajj§j as a politically motivated murder (because al-\ajj§j regarded Ibn Jubayr's disloyalty as a political affront that must be punished by death),[348] because they interpreted it as the ruler's legitimate punishment for heresy (and, thus, apostasy). But political apostasy/separatism, which may occur independently from either al-isl§m or al-Êman, should not be confused with religious apostasy, even though it has become fixed as such in the minds of most Arab-Muslims.

Apostasy from al-isl§m

We defined the lower and nonnegotiable limit of al-isl§m as a commitment to believe in God, the Last Day, and the good deeds, implementing the moral ideals of ethical perfection that were first laid out by Noah and accomplished by MuÈammad (ß). Al-isl§m is the (only) religion of humans' natural disposition that Allah has authorised for humankind. It is the religion that does not allow the increase in the number of absolute taboos, but allows new permissions and prohibitions according to what human societies, parliaments, and civil law courts see fit to introduce. It is the religion that most people in this world adhere to at the moment. And yet, apostasy from al-isl§m occurs, namely on three levels:

A. The level of religious doctrine:

Apostasy here means to cut oneself off from Allah by disbelieving in His existence and the Day of Judgement. Apostasy here means heresy, and this includes withdrawing from a monotheistic belief ('there is no god but God') and adopting a polytheistic belief—here, the second shah§da ('MuÈammad is God's messenger') does not matter at all. As for religious doctrines, a person enjoys absolute freedom. He can freely decide between al-isl§m and heresy. No one should ever force a person to adopt a specific belief (or disbelief), because the religious belief of a person does not touch, as such, the social collective, and everyone should be free to voice his beliefs in public. B. The level of social and ethical practice:

Apostasy here means to renounce the Good Work and ignore the prescriptions of morality. To transgress the basics of moral law would mean to live a life of flagrant immorality: disrespect of parents, open vandalism, truancy, indecencies, and public calls for more corruption, bribery, exploitation, slander, and defamation. If such a person apostatises from morality, it is the duty of everyone—regardless of their religious affiliation—to restrain him. The fight against immorality all over the world is the realm where Muslim-Believers should work hand in hand with the rest of humankind. Unlike the first level of religious doctrine, it is clear that apostasy from morality—and this includes from human rights—cannot be tolerated since al-isl§m organises the social relations between the different sections of a society and beyond. Put differently, an apostasy from al-isl§m, which would have disastrous social and moral consequences, must be categorically prohibited by the legislator. C. Hence, the level of legislation:

Apostasy occurs when legislation transgresses the upper and lower limits set by God in the Book. Islamic legislation means a civil, human legal system that operates within the limits of Allah. The more civilised a society becomes the closer its laws approach a true legislation of limits, which represent the ÈanÊfiyya character of al-isl§m. At the moment this is best realised in those states that possess a constitution and a parliamentary system because the more democratic a society is the more ÈanÊfic it is with respect to its forms of legislation.

Apostasy from al-Êm§n

We have learned that al-Êm§n combines the first shah§da (‘there is no god but God’) with the second shah§da (‘MuÈammad is God’s messenger’). We identified the people who followed Noah, Abraham, Moses, Jacob, and Jesus as Muslim-Assenters, and the followers of MuÈammad (ß) as Muslim-Believers. Some chapters of the Book are entirely dedicated to a discussion of issues relating to the MuslimBelievers, such as Sårat MuÈammad (47) and Sårat al-Anf§l (8). It follows from here that Judaism and Christianity are, like the umma of Muslim-Believers, not religions but spiritual communities, as we are told by the Book (‘Never will the Jews or the Christians be satisfied with you unless you follow their [socioreligious community] [millatahum][349]...,’ A l-Baqara 2:120). A Muslim-Believer who leaves al-Êm§n, that is, apostacizes from following MuÈammad (ß) in order to become a Christian or Jew, only moves—according to our understanding—from one monotheistic community to another. He simply ceases to be a Muslim-Believer, but since he still believes in tauÈÊd— God’s unity—he is still a Muslim-Assenter. The Book states:

Say: ‘O people of the Book! Come to common terms as between us and you: That we worship none but God; that we associate no partners with him; that we erect not, from among ourselves, lords and patrons other than God.’ If then they turn back, say: ‘Bear witness that we (at least) are Muslims (bowing to God’s will)’. ($l #Imr§n 3:64)

The verse says ‘O people of the Book!’ because Jews and Christians were addressed like this during the time of the Prophet (ß)! It also contains the ‘common terms’ shared by them and MuÈammad’s followers: worship none but God, no shirk and no idolatry, that is, they all rejected rubåbiyya among themselves. It ends with the admission that if they are not happy about this they ‘at least’ should bear witness that he (i.e., MuÈammad) is a prophet and that they (i.e., his followers) are (still) Muslim-Assenters. But why did MuÈammad (ß) want Jews and Christians to testify that he and his followers are Muslim-Assenters? Because he believed that Jews and Christians were themselves Muslims and he saw himself as one of them, even though later on he wanted them to join a l-Êm§n, while he allowed them to keep their faith in Allah’s tauÈÊd.

If we look at MuÈammad’s mission from a political angle, it is evident that in addition to his role as a messenger who spread the revelation of his Lord, he was also a prophet who—with the support of his followers—was able to erect a centralized state on the Arabian Peninsula with Yathrib (later Medina) as its capital. His new state included people and tribes from all religious affiliations, including Christians and Jews. Compared to anything that existed before, this was a qualitative jump in the way states were previously formed and administrated. It was only natural that the names of the state’s new political positions reflected the historic situation, for example, the title ‘Leader of the Muslim-Believers’ (amÊr al-mu”minÊn), or ‘Treasury of the Muslim-Assenters’ (bayt m§l al-muslimÊn). While the Emir (Arabic: amÊr) was the head of state because he led the group of believers who founded the state (hence amÊr al-mu”minÊn), the public treasury administrated the money and property of all citizens regardless of their religious affiliation (hence: bayt m§l al-muslimÊn). The historical sources tell us that in his capacity as a caliph, #AlÊ (r) did not hesitate to give money to Jews and Christians from his treasury (bayt m§l) and that after #AlÊ’s death, Abå Dharr a l-Ghif§rÊ opposed the proposal of the new caliph Mu#§wiya to change the name from ‘treasury of all Muslims’ to ‘treasury of God’ (bayt m§l All§h).[350] This reflected the widespread opinion that even though the amÊr al-mu”minÊn, as head of state, is in possession of all legislative and executive powers administered mostly by his fellow Muslim-Believers (hence his title as their leader), the public treasury must not be restricted solely to the concerns of Muslim-Believers but should also consider the financial needs of Jews and Christians. Many modern states show a similar structure of public administration. The prime minister of Great Britain, for example, has been appointed to lead a government because he represents all the political goals and aspirations of the political party that won the last election (mostly either Labour or Conservatives), whereas the chancellor of the exchequer is expected to administer a budget whose money is spent on all sections of the population regardless of their political affiliations.

Before the introduction of a unified national tax system, Jews and Christians were required to pay the so-called jizya, a head tax on free nonbelievers who lived under the rule of a Muslim-Believer. This was seen as an equivalent to the tax (zak§h, ßadaq§t) which the Muslim-Believers had to pay. The money the public treasury received in this way was spent in roughly equal terms in return on both Muslim-Believers and Muslim-Assenters. Today, modern tax law requires the state to collect taxes from all citizens equally, and yet it allows both Muslim-Believers and Muslim-Assenters alike to pay voluntary ßadaq§t to religious and charity organisations. This is money they can spend on the specific needs of their respective religious communities (e.g., for prayer rooms, schools, nurseries, interfaith centres, etc.). The modern tax system is hence more dynamic and flexible and has made the old jizya head tax entirely redundant. The call for a reintroduction of the jizya tax ignores the fact the current economic and financial context of our tax system has changed to such a degree that any specific state tax collected from citizens according to their religion would make no sense whatsoever. It ignores the fact that in fiscal reality the religious ßadaq§t are no longer part of the monthly/annual state income and that non-MuslimBelievers already contribute to state revenues in the form of national income tax, VAT, and other taxes on consumer goods (such as petrol and tobacco, etc.). To call for a return of the old jizya tax in the modern world is certainly as anachronistic as it is ignorant of the possibility that ancient terms can acquire new meanings when they have lost their old ones. What jizya signifies today is adequately expressed in the general tax laws that modern nation-states apply. A return to the old system would create nothing but bloodshed and national disintegration.

Seen from a modern perspective, the followers of MuÈammad (ß) operated on the level of state and government like a political party that was led by the Prophet (ß). Institutionally and ideologically, this represented a dramatic change to the political scene on the Arabian Peninsula, which used to be organised around the principles and values of clan culture and tribal solidarity. Because of their early conversion to the new faith, the groups of the Muh§jirÊn and Anß§r formed a kind of political avant-garde that also enjoyed more privileges than others in terms of political posts and shares of war booty. It certainly marked a progression to a higher form of political organisation, which, regrettably, was abolished soon after the Prophet (ß) died.

The fact that MuÈammad (ß) succeeded in establishing a centralized state led, however, to the unfortunate impression that his prophetical mission essentially included his role as a statesman, and that he was both prophet and king in one person. And yet, this is both theologically and historically inaccurate, as shown by MuÈammad Sa#Êd al-#Ashm§wÊ's profound analysis in his book al-Isl§m al-siy§sÊ.[351] In the political Arab-Muslim mind we come across two concepts: first, whoever wants to found a state and become its head, thereby emulating the model of MuÈammad (ß), needs to be first a prophet, (i.e., needs to present his political aspirations in religious terms); second, whoever wants to seize leadership of the Muslim-Believers must wait until the founders of the state disappear. Both things have indeed occurred in our history. The prophetical claims of a l-Aswad al-#AnasÊ, Musaylimah, and •ulaiÈah b. Khuwaylid are examples of the first concept, because their religious rhetoric was in fact a tactical (political) tool to undermine the unity of the community and the authority of the state. Religion was propagated in order to pursue political 'apostasy' and to disobey the government. Neither the Prophet (ß) nor, after his death, Abå Bakr (r) could afford to tolerate a political schism, hence their orders to fight and kill the secessionist apostates. The occurrence of political opportunism after the seizure of Mecca in 630 is a good example of the second concept. After the Meccan opposition to MuÈammad (ß), led by Abå Sufy§n and #Amr b. al-#$ß, was defeated (in 630 when the Prophet seized Mecca), the Prophet's former enemies quickly closed ranks with the MuslimBelievers and, in order to pursue their old goals in the disguise of the new faith, joined the party of the new religion. However, they had to wait until the first generation (i.e., the first rightly guided caliphs) which had established the state had gone, before Mu#§wiya could restore the power and privileges of the old Meccan aristocracy (in 661), which had lost its influence in politics for some thirty years.

Let us repeat that a society cannot afford to tolerate apostasy (in the sense of 'turning away') from morality and civility and must introduce legislation that makes such apostasy punishable. If the apostasy is, however, from a religious creed, society must not interfere because it should tolerate freedom of choice on such personal matters. It should never be punished by death. Only in the case of political apostasy, whose aim is to undermine the unity of the nation and its territories as well as the authority of the state and its institutions, is the use of force and the shedding of blood justified. The secessionist wars in the history of the United States are a good example of what we mean by political apostasy. When the states of the South (the separatists), declared their independence in 1860 (under the leadership of Jefferson Davis and General Robert E. Lee) and thus threatened to undermine the territorial integrity of the USA, their secessionism was fought by the Union army under Abraham Lincoln in a long and bloody civil war that cost millions of lives; by the end of the conflict national unity was restored. If any religious community in the United States today, for example the Christian Right, threatened to withdraw from mainstream society in order to establish their own autonomous state which does not accept the authority of (secular) state law, the federal government in Washington would immediately respond to such a threat by forcefully suppressing any practical step in that direction.

The same would be true if some Islamist groups decided to create an autonomous region near Aleppo in an attempt to establish a separatist state inside Syria, independent of any political decision taken in Damascus. The Syrian authorities could respond to such a threat only by force. The separation of Syria from Egypt in 1961 after three years of a political union (1958–1961, in the form of the United Arab Republic), was in fact a form of political apostasy. We know that President Nasser was given all the powers (including military force) to stop Syria's secession but, in the end, shied away from using force and consequently the separation took place. Separatism can never be accepted, except when a nation reclaims territory that has been occupied by a foreign power (Tibet, Palestine) or has been denied territorial sovereignty (Kurdistan, Darfur) and on condition that its claim to an independent state are acknowledged by the United Nations and supported by the majority of countries worldwide.

Given this political history, it is peculiar to see a revival of #Umar's very narrowly defined view on apostates. He had labelled as apostates those renegade tribes who denied the Medinan central government the right to collect the official zak§h tax from them. Those who claim similar things today forget that in spite of their religious pretexts these tribes were motivated by their ultimate goal of becoming financially, and eventually politically, independent from central government. They refused to pay zak§h not because they had doctrinal quarrels with an alms tax but rather because they wanted to spend the money on their own region. And yet, it was clear that the tribes' refusal would have resulted in their secession from the central state, something which #Umar countered through his campaigns against 'apostasy' (the term only reflecting the tribes' religious rhetoric). But whatever the political motivations might have been, #Umar's definition of apostasy has lost its relevance today because zak§h is no longer collected by the state but rather voluntarily paid in order to support either charities and welfare organisations or the poorer relatives of one's own family.

As for religious apostasy, it is shocking to notice a new kind of fanaticism amongst Muslim-Believers when they accuse one another of apostasy; sometimes only on the ground that someone has missed a prayer or has said something provocative or contradicting mainstream views. People get called apostates only because they dare to challenge the opinion of our noble scholars who deem themselves to be a kind of thought police who control and censor everything people say and do. Such zealousness has nothing to do with either al-isl§m or al-Êm§n. In our eyes, it is an unfortunate return to the medieval inquisition where lists of heretics and apostates were circulated during the reigns of Abå Ja#far al-Manßår and a l-Ma”mån b. a l-RashÊd. Under the pretext that they must uphold religious orthodoxy for the will of God they had their (political) opponents’ heads cut off because these people dared to differ on sensitive issues. Under the same pretext today hundreds of innocent elderly people, women, and children are killed simply because they are in the wrong place at the wrong time when a suicide bomber strikes in the name of religious orthodoxy. And still, no one seems to dare a complete revision of the old fiqh concept of apostasy that has imported the ancient values of inquisitionist fanaticism into our current times.

Why can we not have, like in France or Canada, the freedom to openly express our religious beliefs (or disbeliefs) without someone being allowed to harm them? Provided that the ethical and social behaviour of apostates does not undermine public order and the general norms of moral decency, why can people not choose the religious creed they want (in particular if they are born into a community they did not choose themselves)? As long as their loyalty to their home nation cannot be questioned, what harm would there be in allowing a Muslim-Believer to leave MuÈammad’s (ß) community and join the followers of Jesus (r)? Given that the Book prohibits ‘compulsion in religion’ (2:256), can we force people to stay in a religious community they have not chosen? We are told that ‘if it had been your Lord’s will, they would all have believed—all who are on earth! Will you then compel mankind, against their will, to believe!’ (Yånus 10:99). People should be permitted to differ in their opinions and practices, and as long as they do not undermine the general consensus on human rights and the highest moral ideals that the Book describes, they should be allowed to apostacize. It is vital that they should enjoy the same rights as those who apostacized during the time of the Prophet (ß): they were left entirely unharmed because MuÈammad (ß) strictly adhered to the Book’s prescription of religious tolerance.

After the death of the Prophet (ß), his followers became divided into several different political blocs that later turned into different religious sects. This early split in MuÈammad’s (ß) community had initially nothing to do with either the pillars of a l-isl§m or a l-Êm§n, but it eventually led to a scholarly revisionism by which the pillars of al-Êm§n were given preference over the pillars of al-isl§m.

Having learned the lesson from the political schism of Islam’s early history, we propose to establish a new basis on which we can strengthen the human, universal character of a l-isl§m which overrides all narrow interests of party politics. The truth of al-isl§m does not lie in being capitalist or socialist or in promoting the manifestos of a Labour Party or a Conservative Party, before anything else, a l-isl§m promotes humanity. It does not favour one social class over another and it does not put the views of medieval fuqah§”, #ulam§”, and the Companions over anyone else. It does not accept the exclusivist notion of an Arab morality, nor does it believe in the existence of a non-Arab morality. There is only one morality, which is the morality of humanity. What appears as Arab or non-Arab are rather customs and traditions that can be overcome, albeit with difficulty and only over a long period of time.

Let us finally come to the frequently discussed clash between tradition and modernity that modernist discourse proposes. For us, it is a clash of two different epistemologies; one based on modern methods of historicism, historica l-critical research, and dialectical, philosophical thinking, and one that is based on medieval terminologies which have come to us as empty signifiers that have lost their meaning. The semantic content of these terms that once fitted nicely into the politica l-historical context in which they were created has become entirely anachronistic in our different, modern context. Unlike modern epistemologies that have their origin in the study of reality, these traditional epistemologies avoid reality by remaining in a past that disappeared a long time ago. This is the terminology of fiqh, kal§m, tafsÊr, and ÈadÊth.

 “Prescribe What Is Right and Proscribe What Is Wrong”

In this section we propose to correct the fuqah§“s’ interpretation of the Book’s injunction ‘to prescribe what is right and to proscribe what is wrong’ (al-amr bi’l-ma#råf wa’l-nahy #an al-munkar). In the hands of our honourable jurists, this divine injunction has been turned into a slogan for the justification of dictatorial rule and autocratic government. We totally disagree with this abuse of the divine word, and we begin our own investigation with the study of the four binary pairs of terms whose complex meanings have been so carelessly treated by the fuqah§”:

1. Èal§l ↔ Èar§m 2. amr ↔ nahy

3. sam§È ↔ man#

4. Èasan ↔ qabÊÈ

Deplorably, the fuqah§” have not paid much attention to how these pairs of terms differ from each other, with the disastrous result that Èal§l is treated as synonymous to Èasan (or mustaÈsan), and sam§È (or masmåÈ) as ‘what ought to be prescribed’ (al-ma”mår bihi). Similarly, Èar§m is seen as just another word for qabÊÈ (or mustaqbiÈ) and man# (or mamnå#), meaning ‘what ought to be proscribed’ (al-munhÊ #anhu). This careless conflation of terms made it only logical —by the power of synonymity—to link ‘what ought to be prescribed’ with things that are Èal§l, sam§È, and Èasan; and ‘what ought to be proscribed’ with things that are Èar§m, man#, and qabÊÈ.[352]

Such indiscriminate use of terms, as we will show, is detrimental to a correct understanding of Allah’s injunction ‘to prescribe what is right and to proscribe what is wrong’. We will discuss each term of this injunction separately and then finally propose a different understanding of it. Let us first quote the verses that contain the injunction:

Let there arise out of you a band of people inviting to all that is good, enjoining what is right, and forbidding what is wrong[353]: They are the ones to attain felicity. ($l #Imr§n 3:104)

You are the best of peoples, evolved for mankind, enjoining what is right, forbidding what is wrong, and believing in God… ($l #Imr§n 3:110) They believe in God and the Last Day; they enjoin what is right, and forbid what is wrong; and they hasten (in emulation) in (all) good works: they are in the ranks of the righteous. ($l #Imr§n 3:114)

The hypocrites, men and women, (have an understanding) with each other: they enjoin evil, and forbid what is just, and are close with their hands. (Al-Tawba 9:67)

The believers, men and women, are protectors one of another: they enjoin what is just, and forbid what is evil; they observe regular prayers, practise regular charity, and obey God and His apostle. (Al-Tawba

9:71)

(They are) those who, if We establish them in the land, establish regular prayer and give regular charity, enjoin the right and forbid wrong: with God rests the end (and decision) of (all) affairs. (Al-\ajj 22:41)

“O my son! Establish regular prayer, enjoin what is just, and forbid what is wrong; and bear with patient constancy whatever betide you; for this is firmness (of purpose) in (the conduct of) affairs. (Luqm§n 31:17) … for he commands them what is just and forbids them what is evil; he allows them as lawful what is good (and pure) and prohibits them from what is bad (and impure); He releases them from their heavy burdens and from the yokes that are upon them… (Al-A#r§f 7:157)

The above verses quote the two terms ‘what is right’ and ‘what is wrong’ always in conjunction with each other. Other verses mention them separately, as in the following two examples:

For divorced women maintenance (should be provided) on a reasonable (scale) [bi’l-ma#råf]. This is a duty on the righteous. (Al-Baqara 2:241) …for prayer restrains from shameful and unjust deeds [al-munkar]; and remembrance of God is the greatest (thing in life) without doubt. And God knows the (deeds) that you do. (Al-#Ankabåt 29:45)

Right and wrong is one of those pairs of binary opposition that the Book uses repeatedly in order to highlight clear and unambiguous contrast: e.g., day and night, heaven and earth, blind and seeing, even and odd, far and near, this world and the Next, Paradise and what is right and forbid indecency’; AhA: ‘enjoin what is esteemed and forbid what is odius’; AH: ‘urges what is right, and forbids what is wrong’. The translators’ use of the pair ‘to enjoin”—‘to prohibit’ does not reflect MS’s intention to separate the activities of al-amr and al-nahy from the sphere of (state) legislation. For him al-amr and al-nahy ought to be seen on the same level as the prescriptions of medicines or the proscriptions (i.e., health advice) of a medical doctor, who cannot enforce what he or she has prescribed and who is not permitted to punish someone who has failed to follow his proscriptions. AH’s rendering as ‘urges what is right’ is perhaps closest to MS’s interpretation.

Hell, knowledge and ignorance, first and last, mortal and immortal, reward and punishment, and so on.

‘To Prescribe’ (al-amr)

The Arabic noun a l-amr is derived from the regular verb amara which is polysemous. First, it expresses an order to act. The one who issues the order usually enjoys a higher status than the one to whom the order is directed, as in: ‘They said: “O Shu”aib! Does your prayer command you (ta”umuruk) that we leave off the worship which our fathers practised”…’ (Håd 11:87), or ‘God does command you (ya”umurukum) to render back your trusts to those to whom they are due; and when you judge between man and man, that you judge with justice…’ (Al-Nis§” 4:58). An amÊr, or military commander, is the one who issues his orders to the officers and soldiers who serve under him. A second meaning for a l-amr is matter, business, or affair, as in: ‘It is no business (al-amr) of yours whether Allah…’ ($l #Imr§n 3:128, MF), or ‘…so pass over (their faults), and ask for (God’s) forgiveness for them; and consult them in affairs (al-amr)…’ ($l #Imr§n 3:159). Al-immar is a pejorative term because it refers to a foolish or wicked act, for example: ‘Said Moses: “Have you scuttled it in order to drown those in it? Truly a strange thing (immar[an]) have you done!”’ (A l-Kahf 18:71). A l-am§ra means sign or token, and a l-im§ra is the place (that is, an Emirate) where the Emir (Ar. al-amÊr) rules over his subjects.

Al-amr, in its many derivatives, occurs 248 times in the Book. In its meaning as ‘order’ it can be both prescriptive (‘do it!’) and proscriptive (‘do not do it’), thus containing internally a binary opposition (prescription ↔ proscription) as well as an external opposition, if understood prescriptively (‘do it’): an opposition to the proscriptive term al-nahy (‘do not do it!’). Such binary oppositions structure human conscious behaviour. Both terms (prescription and proscription), as a pair of contrast, are dialectically linked to another pair of opposition, that is, obedience and disobedience, because obedience and disobedience need prescription and proscription in order to be meaningful, and need choice and deliberation in order to be legally and theologically relevant. It is obvious that if someone receives an order but does not want to fulfil it, his disobedience will vitiate the order. If, however, he fulfils the order, he validates the order and expresses his obedience to the one who gives it. Adam and his wife were given the choice to either obey or disobey God’s proscription not to ‘…approach this tree…’ (Al-Baqara 2:35). IblÊs too had the choice and he also decided to disobey when he refused God’s prescription to ‘“…bow down to Adam”: They all bowed down except IblÊs. He was one of the Jinns, and he broke the command of his Lord…’ (A l-Kahf 18:50). We have, however, to acknowledge that there are different categories of orders and that the importance of an order depends on the status, power, and authority of the one who gives it. Clearly, if Allah is the giver of an order, His orders will have a different authority than orders issued by human beings.

* ‘To Proscribe’ (al-nahy)

The Arabic noun al-nahy is derived from the regular verb nah§ which basically means ‘to reach’, that is, to get to a stage where something has been completed or ‘has come to an end’. We say ‘I informed him’, meaning literally (in Arabic): ‘I “ended” the news with him’ (anhaitu ilayhi al-khabr). Nih§ya means end and implies the limit or utmost degree of something; nuhan means intelligence because reason and intellect end foolish talk; al-nahy implies an interdiction to say or do something. Its many cognates occur fifty-six times in the Book, most of them carrying one of the meanings just explained. Just like al-amr it is dialectically linked to obedience and disobedience which require free will in order to be meaningful. ‘(God) said: “What prevented you from bowing down when I commanded you?”…’ (A l-A#r§f 7:12), which unambiguously refers to the existence of a rational mind that can freely think about its decision to obey or disobey. Proscriptions, just like prescriptions, consist of a dialectical process of communication between their sender and their receiver. The side that issues proscriptions can only do so because a receiver exists to whom proscriptions can be addressed. Proscriptions, just like prescriptions, are only meaningful if there is a possibility of obedience and disobedience on the part of the receivers, and the existence of choice between obedience and disobedience is only intelligible if no force is exercised by those who issue the order. We hear from the Book that the first thing addressed to humans is a command by God[354] and that their response to this, that is, their first ever response to the Creator was an act of disobedience(!). By Adam’s refusal to obey his Lord, he showed that he enjoyed freedom of choice. In his act of disobedience he appears as someone who has decided on his own accord and under no duress because he decided deliberately to act against God’s prohibition to go near the tree.

But freedom of choice is not absolute and does not apply equally to everyone. For a more well-rounded account of disobedience we need to explore other issues of Adam’s case, for example:

– Did Adam disobey God’s prescription (amr) to ‘dwell in the Garden’ or God’s proscription (nahy) not to ‘come near the tree”?

– Why did God order the angels to bow down in front of Adam by His word: ‘We said’, while the same order to IblÊs was issued by His command?[355] Is there, then, a difference between God’s word (qaul) and His command (amr)?

– Does the story of Adam imply that there are further differences between angels and jinns in terms of obedience to God’s orders?

As for the first question, it is clear from the textual evidence that Adam and his wife did not disobey God’s prescription (amr) to live in the Garden. If they had done so they would never have found the tree. Thus, they only disobeyed God’s proscription (nahy). It was the first ever proscription by God directed at human beings, because before that (before human beings could think rationally, as Adam and his wife could) everything was allowed in the Garden. As for the second question, the different treatment of angels and jinns (IblÊs) indeed reveals two different methods by which God issues His commands. A divine word (qaul) is a compulsory rule that is irrevocable and irreplaceable, (‘We said: “Embark therein, of each kind two, male and female, and your family—except those against whom the word (al-qaul) has already gone forth…”’, Håd 11:40). God’s word is unchangeable because ‘“the word changes not before Me, and I do not the least injustice to My servants”’ (Q§f 50:29). His words are irrevocable as they represent objective reality which everyone can touch and hear: (‘It is He who created the heavens and the earth in true (proportions): the day He says, “Be,” behold! it is. His word is the truth’, A l-An#§m 6:73). God’s irrevocable, compulsory words turn into objective reality, that is, the truth, in which there is no room for choice between obedience and disobedience. God’s words cannot be disobeyed. In contrast to His words (qaul), God’s prescriptions (amr) can be disobeyed. This is why all verses of messengerhood were issued in the form of prescription or proscription, not as God’s words. Verses that contain God’s prescriptions to pray or fast never start with ‘God said:’ (q§la All§h) because this would mean that prayer and fasting are parts of objective reality and that people are compelled to pray or fast whether they wanted to or not.

As for the third question, angels are indeed unlike jinns. Whereas angels are creatures that obey their Lord by nature and would not know how to revolt against His prescriptions (‘… over which are (appointed) angels stern (and) severe, who flinch not (from executing) the commands they receive from God, but do (precisely) what they are commanded’, Al-TaÈrÊm 66:6), jinns, by contrast, possess intellect and—just like humans—free will, which allows them to express their willingness to either accept or refuse God’s prescriptions, so that ‘amongst us [jinns] are some that submit their wills (to God), and some that swerve from justice. Now those who submit their wills— they have sought out (the path) of right conduct’ (Al-Jinn 72:14). IblÊs, one of the jinns, chose to disobey God’s order and refused to bow down in front of Adam. The phrase ‘he was one of the Jinns’, was added to explain the fact that ‘he broke the command of his Lord (amr [in] rabihi)…’ (A l-Kahf 18:50). This is why when IblÊs was told to bow down in front of Adam he did not receive God’s order as His word (qaul) but as His prescription (amr), which left him with the choice to either follow or disobey it.

As we said earlier, nahy (proscription) has often been mixed up with Èar§m (absolute taboo). A few explanations are now necessary to clarify our position on this matter:

First, conflation of the two terms must be avoided because the semantic (and legal!) differences are simply too important to ignore. It is evident that every Èaram rule contains a proscription (‘do not do it!’) but not every nahy rule expresses an absolute taboo (and is therefore different from a Èar§m rule). Second, unlike proscriptions, the Book’s Èar§m rules are eternally valid. A new Èar§m rule can only be introduced by a new revelation from God. For example, to introduce an absolute, eternally valid ban on smoking would require a new message from God. Third, a Èar§m rule is the sole prerogative of God and no human being can ever claim to do like Him. In contrast, a prescription can be issued by God, a prophet, and/or a human legislator (‘Have you seen the man who forbids [yanh§] * [Our] servant to pray?’ Al-#Alaq 96:9–10, AH). And fourthly, the historical sequence of God’s commands and orders requires us to make a sharp distinction between nahy and Èar§m:

1. First, it began with God’s order to Adam and his wife to stay in the Garden (‘Dwell”!) and to stay clear from the tree (‘Do not go near!’).

2. Next, during the era of Abraham we hear of God’s orders for a sacred space in Mecca (‘O our Lord! I have made some of my offspring to dwell in a valley without cultivation, by your sacred house [baytik al-muÈarram]…’ Ibr§hÊm 14:37). While continuing the theme of human dwellings from the time of Adam, this introduces more complex notions of spatial sacrality (with the concept of a sacred house).

3. This order was later complemented by orders that express temporal sacrality (‘The number of months in the sight of God is twelve (in a year)—so ordained by Him the day He created the heavens and the earth—of them four are sacred [Èurum[un]]…’ Al-Tawba 9:36).

4. In legislation to the Israelites (Jacob), we come across a new concept: the notion of absolutely forbidden food (‘All food was lawful to the children of Israel, except what Israel made unlawful for itself, before the law (of Moses) was revealed…’ $l #Imr§n 3:93).

5. During the time of Moses, God revealed the Ten Commandments in the form of prohibitions (Do not!) which at the time of MuÈammad (ß), were upgraded to ten absolute taboos (‘Say: “Come, I will rehearse what God has (really) prohibited (Èarrama) you from”…’ Al-An#§m 6:151). The same applies to the law of usury which used to be a simple proscription (nahy) to the Israelites[356] and which the Book later issued as an absolute taboo (Èar§m).[357]

6. MuÈammad’s (ß) message concluded the epoch of messengerhoods and in this way Allah closed the gate of eternally valid legislation (in the form of absolute taboos) and opened the gate of human/ historical legislation (in the form of prescription and proscription, permission and prohibition). This allows doctors to order their lung disease patients not to smoke, and it allows a government to pass a new law that prohibits smoking in public places and to order the police and the legal authorities to enforce it. Once the new law has been accepted (by parliament), the individual citizen is obliged to observe it, but he is free, on a personal level, to dislike the law and to air his discontent, provided that he does not try to impose his opinions on others.

How are we then expected to read the phrase ‘if you avoid the grave sins you are proscribed to do’ (in tajtaninå kab§“ir m§ tunhaun[a] #anhu)’ in verse 4:31?[358] To what extent does this verse reflect the choice of humans to obey or disobey God’s proscriptions? Firstly, we notice the conditional conjunction ‘if’ (in) which, as in the following two other verses, introduces a conditional subclause:

If [in] a wicked person comes to you with any news, ascertain the truth… (Al-\ujur§t 49:6)

Say: “If [in] I am astray, I only stray to the loss of my own soul: but if I receive guidance, it is because of the inspiration of my Lord to me…” (Saba’ 34:50)

In this capacity it shares its meaning ‘if’ or ‘when’ with the particle idh§ as in:

When [idh§] comes the help of God, and victory. (Al-Naßr 110:1) When [idh§] it is said to them: “Make not mischief on the earth,” they say: “Why, we only want to make peace!” (Al-Baqara 2:11)

The difference between in and idh§ is, however, that while in states a condition whose fulfilment is uncertain, idh§ states a condition that is absolute and fulfillable. The use of the particle in for 4:31 tells us that the text wants to stress uncertainty because it is not clear whether human beings will commit or avoid such grave sins since this is subject to their free choice. If they choose to obey they will avoid heinous crimes; if, however, they choose to disobey they will commit them.

Secondly, we notice the Arabic term kab§“ir for ‘grave sins’, literally meaning ‘great’ or ‘major’ in contrast to ‘small’ or ‘minor’ sins (ßagh§“ir). The Book refers to major sins three times, and only once to minor sins—by using the term lamam :

If you (but) eschew the most heinous of the things [kab§“ir] which you are forbidden to do, We shall expel out of you all the evil in you, and admit you to a gate of great honour. (Al-Nis§” 4:31)

Those who avoid great sins [kab§“ir] and shameful deeds [a l-ithm wa’l-faw§Èish], only (falling into) small faults [lamam]... (A l-Najm 53:32)

<right>

Those who avoid the greater crimes [kab§“ir] and shameful deeds

</right>

[a l-ithm wa’l-faw§Èish], and, when they are angry even then forgive. (Al-Shår§ 42:37)

These verses introduce a very relevant terminological clarification that is vital for our discussion on prescription versus proscription. The implicit distinction between major and minor sins in 4:31 is supported by 53:32 where ‘great sins’ are explicitly distinguished from ‘shameful deeds’ (al-ithm wa’l-faw§Èish), as we also find in 42:37. In order to establish their proper meaning against the meaning that these terms have acquired in Islamic fiqh, we need to distinguish between four different stages (of interpretation): a) the qur”§n, b) the Prophet (ß), c) the companions, and d) the second and third generation after the companions, of which only the first two encapsulate the terms’ true meaning.

A. Major sins in the qur”§n

All heavenly messages in general, and also MuÈammad’s (ß) message in particular, distinguish between two categories of divine commands: orders (Gebote) and prohibitions (Verbote). Orders are meant to guide human behaviour to concrete actions by issuing a (positive) command ‘Do it!’, while prohibitions restrict human behaviour by asking people to avoid certain actions with a (negative) order ‘Do not!’. As seen above, prohibited acts are classified as major or minor sins, the prohibition of idolatry being on top of the list of major sins. Commands also come in the categories major and minor: to have faith in the existence of God is a major command (kab§“ir), and the order to be polite to a passer-by on the street is, so to speak, a minor command (ßagh§“ir). Between these major and minor orders lies the command to believe in the Last Day combined with the command to do righteous acts that are beneficial to society. It is one of God’s blessings to the believers who receive His orders, that ‘He made them love belief and hate unbelief, wickedness, and rebellion’ (49:7).[359] Unbelief, as we explained earlier, is an openly hostile view of a specific command or a person, hence, unbelief (kufr), in this context, is a publicly declared enmity against MuÈammad’s (ß) message and, according to 4:37, a ‘niggardliness that expresses a disbelief in God’s bounty and grace’.[360] Transgression of God’s orders is called fisq (pl. fusåq); when IblÊs disobeyed God and did not bow down in front of Adam, ‘…he broke the command (fa-fasaqa) of his Lord…’ (Al-Kahf 18:50). Transgression of God’s prohibition is given the term #iß§n, which the text uses when it talks about Adam’s rebellion against God’s prohibition not to come near the tree, ‘…thus did Adam disobey (#aß§) his Lord, and allow himself to be seduced’ (•§-H§ 20:121). Another of God’s great blessings is to tell those who have disobeyed His prohibitions that if they avoid the major sins (kab§“ir) Allah will ‘expel out of you all the evil in you, and admit you to a gate of great honour’ (Al-Nis§” 4:31). However, such forgiveness is the sole prerogative of God, no human ijtih§d is allowed here.

Prohibitions in the Book are thus divided into two categories: a) major sins (kab§“ir) that are fixed and absolutely valid for all time (these are the Èar§m taboos), and b) minor sins (ßagh§“ir). But while it is possible to enumerate the prohibitions in the Book and qualify which of them is an absolute taboo, it is impossible to do so for the major sins (kab§“ir). The simple reason for this is that not all major sins were transgressions of absolute taboos as it depended on the prevailing social conditions whether a major sin was perceived as such. For example, the sins of idolatry, usury, and wine consumption were the gravest major sins during the first thirteen years of MuÈammad’s mission and his confrontation with the standards of Meccan society and the prevailing norms of the tribe of the Quraish. After the migration to Medina this changed to desertion from military duties (after the ban to kill was lifted), which had not been previously mentioned as a major sin. In another context, during the time of Lot homosexuality was so widely practised that it had become the most serious major sin. Thus, Allah had finally to send a new prophet-messenger with the mission to restore (heterosexual) morality, redirecting Lot’s people back to the right path (and when they did not listen, they were destroyed).

It is true that the Book reiterates and reevaluates a number of previous prohibitions, and yet nowhere does it categorize them as ‘major sins’ (kab§“ir). If the term kab§“ir is mentioned (see above) it is without the definite article, that is, its numbers are kept indefinite because the noun with a definite article would suggest a limit of some kind that the Book did not want to specify. Instead, the Book says, yes, absolute taboos (muÈarram§t) are major sins (kab§“ir) but not every major sin is an absolute taboo. The indefinite nature of kab§“ir allows us to consider as ‘major sins’ those things that a society regards as the gravest, most heinous crimes (which may change from epoch to epoch and from society to society), but we are not permitted to add such prohibitions to the list of absolute taboos since these are defined only by God.

B. The Prophet (ß) and major sins

The evidence that the prophetical understanding of ‘major sins’, as in most other areas, does not differ significantly from the Qur’anic concept is overwhelming. In a ÈadÊth quoted by al-R§zÊ we hear, for example, that MuÈammad (ß) considered public defamation of innocent women and false accusation of adultery as one of the most heinous crimes. [361] Within the context of his efforts to establish a new society upon the sound basis of good relations within and between families and clans, we see MuÈammad’s definition of kab§“ir as a logical and necessary consequence of life in seventh-century Arabia. It also corresponds to the Book’s appeal to root out injustice (íulm) as one of the most serious dangers for the sound functioning of a s ociety. Since there was no political injustice and no oppressive usurpation of power in Medina at MuÈammad’s (ß) time, it was perfectly l egitimate to target public defamations as a form of injustice that needed to be wiped out. One should also note that the Prophet (ß) did not use the definite article al- when he talked about the kab§“ir but left it as undefined, indeterminate and unspecified as he found it in the qur”§n. This indicates that when he proposed his understanding of what ‘major sins’ are, he knew that it was (only) relevant for his own period of time and for his own society and did not rule out the possibility that the perception of such sins might be subject to considerable change.

C. The companions and major sins

After MuÈammad’s death the efforts to accurately define what constitutes a ‘major sin’ and an ‘absolute taboo’ were seriously undermined by the sudden circulation of obscure ÈadÊth traditions that, for example, issued a bizarre number of kab§“ir, ranging from nine to seven hundred, and which were all treated as absolute taboos. We observe the tendency to blend together major and minor sins, and proscriptions and absolute taboos so that clear demarcation lines eventually disappeared and all the different types and classes of orders and prohibitions were perceived equally and indiscriminately as ‘what God has prohibited’. Even then it was obvious how weak the chains of transmission back to the Prophet (ß) were.

D. The generations after the time of the companions

This situation became aggravated within two generations after the Prophet’s (ß) death. We see an explosion of hadÊths circulated in the different centres of the Empire and which could not possibly all go back to the Prophet (ß). Bear in mind the fact that MuÈammad (ß) received his first revelation at the age of forty and that he died twenty-three years later at the age of sixty-three. He had therefore twenty-three years as a prophet, that is —based on a lunar calendar—195,408 hours, to discuss and debate the matters of the new faith (supposing, for the sake of the argument, that he did not sleep a single minute throughout a twenty-four hour day), in addition to his role as a prophet and messenger who transmitted God’s revelation to the people. If we assume that MuÈammad (ß) had roughly 85,000 hours left to fulfil his prophetical role (in his ten years in Medina), and since we have now in front of us a total of 750,000 hadÊths that were circulated after his death from his Medinan period called sunna, on the basis of such dubious evidence (fabricated ÈadÊths) and then oblige Muslim-Believers to use it as a binding source of law. We know that legal rulings can only be found in MuÈammad's (ß) message, not his sunna, and that if the sunna was to be binding it would mean a good deal of hardship (socially, psychologically, and financially) for most people today, which contradicts the Book's imperative that 'God intends every facility for you; He does not want to put you to difficulties…' (Al-Baqara 2:185). And yet, we also know that after MuÈammad's (ß) death, the community of believers increased more and more, with the Empire becoming diverse and heterogeneous in its composition. Diversity led to tensions and people began to disagree about the correct way of eating, drinking, dressing, and sleeping by quoting the example of the Prophet (ß) to substantiate their own positions and refute others. Every little dispute was transformed into a battle over the right methodology, creating separate schools for every single issue or particular opinion.[362] This situation not only resulted in several schisms within the community, best illustrated by the Battle of the Camel and the Battle at 'iffÊn in 36 A.H., it also led to further confusion over the term kab§"ir, which now came to be defined according to the positions of the schools, sectarian conflicts, and dynastic rivalries that more and more obscured the original concept of the Book.

(of which Im§m AÈmad reported 40,000 in his Musnad alone), which means that the Prophet (ß) must have issued on average nine ÈadÊths per hour which is, of course, absurd. Because of this very shaky basis for the authenticity of most ÈadÊths and the likelihood that a considerable number were fabricated during the Umayyad and #Abb§sid periods, we believe it is, a) dishonest to assert the authenticity of the ÈadÊths, and b) illegitimate to construct a body of texts,

Let us therefore return once more to the original source, the Book. We said earlier that prohibitions express the negative aspect of divine legislation, and that 'major sins' are formulated as prohibitions, some of them in the form of absolute taboos. The difference between (the generic form of) prohibition and absolute taboos (which is one specific type of prohibition) is that the former contains rules that are contingent and that give people the choice between obedience and disobedience, while the latter are absolute and eternal, even though the former includes the latter. It also means that 'major sins', in contrast to absolute taboos, may increase or decrease in number according to the historical (legal and moral) context. If, for example, in a certain society traffic incidents have reached an alarmingly high number because of the inconsiderate behaviour of drivers, the authorities, equipped with more legislative powers, will change their attitude, and while having viewed inconsiderate driving as a minor offence in the past will now regard it as a major crime and punish it with tougher sentences. This will continue until the new regulations have made an impact and have reduced the number of incidents. In contrast, absolute taboos do not increase or decrease in number and do not change their content. To kill a person or to marry one’s mother or sister remains Èar§m everywhere—in London, Damascus, or Mecca, and at all times in history, whether in the seventh, twentieth, or fortieth centuries. The Book gives fourteen absolute taboos, of which the first nine are as follows:

I. To commit idolatry

II. To be disrespectful to parents

III. To kill one’s children for fear of poverty

IV. To come close to shameful deeds (adultery)

V. To take life unjustified

VI. To consume the property of orphans

VII. To give false measure and weight

VIII. To commit perjury

IX. To break a vow (this is different from an oath which God has allowed us to expiate; but the vow of a doctor is a pledge to Allah binding the doctor to the cure of his patients: breaking a vow cannot be expiated by a fast of three days or the feeding of ten poor people; unfortunately, many people often confuse an irrevocable vow to Allah with an expiatory oath).

Together with the tenth (religious) command, which is to follow the straight path (6:153), these nine taboos comprise God’s ethical guidance (al-furq§n), elsewhere called the ‘Ten Commandments’ or the ‘First/Old Testament’.[363] In addition, the following prohibitions received by Moses were eventually turned into absolute taboos through MuÈammad’s (ß) message:

X. To marry maÈ§rim relatives (mother/sister/daughter, etc.)

XI. To eat dead meat (carrion) and pork, and drink blood;

XII. Usury (‘merely’ a prohibition in Moses’ message); XIII. To commit illegitimate sins and transgressions; XIV. To say about God what cannot be known.

The first twelve taboos are clear and self-explanatory. The remaining two, however, need further elaboration:

E. The attribute ‘illegitimate’ for a sin implies the existence of a ‘legitimate’ sin—in addition to the subdivision of ‘sin’ (in 42:37 and 53:32) into major and minor sins. But what are legitimate sins? The Arabic term for sin is ithm. This term occurs forty-eight times in the Book, mostly in the context of, a) to stay behind, to fall back, for example, when we say ‘the she-camel fell back’ (athamat a l-n§qa), that is, it stays behind the rest of the caravan; or b) to abstain or refrain, as in ‘if one is forced by necessity, without wilful disobedience, nor transgressing due limits, then is he guiltless[364] (fa-l§ ithm #alayhi)…’ (A l-Baqara 2:173). The sinner in this context is someone who does something that others do not do. The first context expresses a legitimate sin, while the second refers to an illegitimate sin. The horseman who falls back with his horse in a race, the student who falls behind the rest of the class, the pupil who stays behind the group on an excursion; these ‘sins’ are all legitimate. But whoever holds back his witness when he should give it, commits an illegitimate sin, because: ‘conceal not evidence; for whoever conceals it, his heart is tainted with sin (ithm[un]). And God knows all that you do’ (Al-Baqara 2:283). If alcohol is used for the benefit of society, for example, as an anaesthetic in surgical operations, as was done before the discovery of chloroform, it is classed as a legitimate sin. The same drug can yield both a great sin and great benefit depending on the intention of its use. It is a great sin if alcohol is used for pure pleasure and if it is consumed until the brain is intoxicated so that a person cannot control his tongue any longer. If gossip is used to defame your relatives at home and your colleagues in the workplace, it is classed as slander and a great sin. But if it used as a tool by the secret intelligence services in order to gain advantage over the nation’s enemy, it is a legitimate sin.

The Arabic term for ‘transgression’, baghy, is used ninety-six times in the Book. In a more literal sense it means to seek hard in order to obtain something desirable, as in: ‘To him who does this, seeking (ibtigh§” [an]) the good pleasure of God, We shall soon give a reward of the highest (value)’ (Al-Nis§” 4:114); we say ‘the woman is a prostitute’ (baghat al-mar”a bigh§“an), meaning literally ‘she is out to acquire a man’.[365] Mostly, the term is used to indicate a violation of moral standards, implying injustice, rudeness, and causing enmity: ‘If God were to enlarge the provision for His servants, they would indeed transgress (la-baghau) beyond all bounds through the earth; but he sends (it) down in due measure as He pleases…’ (Al-Shår§ 42:27). It means the opposite of ‘doing good’ and is—as the Book says—a rebellion against God’s command of justice: ‘God commands justice, the doing of good, and liberality to kith and kin, and He forbids all shameful deeds, and injustice and rebellion (al-baghy)…’ (Al-NaÈl 16:90). And yet, there are situations where we find legitimate forms of transgression, for example, if we look at the issue of (the actually prohibited act of) seeking oracles from lot-casting. If at the beginning of a football match lots are cast (in order to decide what team plays on which side and who kicks off), it is a legitimate transgression. If, however, lot-casting is practised in matters of trade, marriage, travel, or even in political and military affairs (e.g., to decide on war or peace), it is an illegitimate transgression. We know that deliberate, callous theft is an illegitimate form of taking things away, but paying the price and to take things away after one has paid for them is perfectly legitimate. We believe that in every legal system there are many grey areas where legislation is not

(and can never be) clear cut. Between the definite limits of Allah’s law we are faced with an area full of ambiguities. It is as the Prophet (ß) said: ‘The lawful is clear and the unlawful is clear, and in between are ambiguities.”[366]

F. The prohibition ‘to say things about God without knowledge’ is based on the Book’s injunction 7:33.[367] Widely known examples of things said without knowledge are the content of the fatw§s by our honourable scholars who have invented an increasing number of absolute taboos (close to a hundred by now), including the (absolute) ban on smoking, adopting children, surrogate motherhoods, listening to music, and singing in public. Even clearer examples are their fatw§s which, by applying all sorts of legal tricks—applying the strategy of fraudem legis agere—allowed dubious monetary institutes to run their business under the name of ‘Islamic Banking’, which, to our mind, is just a different way of legalising serious financial fraud. The Book tells us that the prohibition ‘to say things about God without knowledge’ was first revealed as a (normal) prohibition but was later, because of its seriousness, upgraded to an absolute taboo:

But say not—for any false thing that your tongues may put forth— ‘This is lawful, and this is forbidden’, so as to ascribe false things to God. For those who ascribe false things to God will never prosper. (Al-NaÈl 16:116)

‘What Is Right’ (al-ma#råf)

The Arabic term for the phrase ‘what is right’, al-ma#råf, is derived from the verb #-r-f, whose diverse forms are used seventy-two times in the Book. Its first occurrence is in 2:89, [368] and its last in 83:24.[369] The most important cognates are ma#råf, #urf, ta#§ruf, ma#rifa, and #ir§fa, each of which will be briefly defined:

– ma#råf has two meanings: a) known, widely accepted, recognised, as in: ‘And women shall have rights similar to the rights against them, according to what is equitable[370] (bi’l-ma#råf) …’ (A l-Baqara 2:228); and b) to do kindness, to render others a service, as in: ‘… except that you should do kindness[371] to your friends (auliy§“ikum ma#råf [an]). This is written in the Book (of nature)’ (A l-Ahzab 33:6), or: ‘…yet bear them company in this life with justice (and consideration)[372] (ma#råf [an])…’ (Luqm§n 31:15).

– ‘urf has several meanings: a) the opposite of nukr (denial, disavowal), that is, beneficence, kindness; b) the highest part, top of something, for example, the comb of a rooster; c) conventional practice, customs, traditions, that is, what has come to be ‘widely accepted’ (ma#råf); a l-arf (i.e. with a fatÈa) means fragrance, perfume, as in ‘And admit them to the Garden which He has announced for them’ (MuÈammad 47:6), that is, the Garden’s fragrance was nicely diffused for them;[373] and al-#irf (i.e., with a kasra) means—according to al-Za makh sharÊ —patience.

– ta#§ruf means mutual understanding, acquaintance, and peaceful co-existence, both between individuals and between groups, states, and nations. It constitutes the purpose of Allah’s c reation, as we are told in the following verse:

O [humankind]! We created you from a single (pair) of a male and a female, and made you into nations and tribes, that you may know each other (not that you may despise each other) [li-ta#§rifå]. Verily the most honoured of you in the sight of God is (he who is) the most righteous of you… (Al-\ujur§t 49:13)

– ma#rifa refers to the relationship that is perceived in the human intellect between the different manifestations and properties of this existence, or—in a more philosophical sense—to the relationship between objective reality and human consciousness. Knowledge (#ilm) is what feeds this relationship with data from the external social and objective reality. The Book never uses the phrase ma#rifat All§h, only #ilm All§h, because God’s knowledge does not need to be fed with data since He already knows everything. He does not need, as human do, a theory of knowledge (i.e., a methodology of how to acquire data and to perceive knowledge). Knowledge itself can be either known (í§hir) or hidden (makhfiyy), for example, when states do not reveal their intelligence to other states it is hidden knowledge, or when God does not lead anybody astray with His knowledge (i.e., by hiding it), only those He wants to.

– #ir§fa means false knowledge such as that of fortune-tellers and divinatory fraudsters, as among ‘åfÊ groups; some pretend to perform miracles while others claim to receive supernatural knowledge by meditation, contemplation and other ascetic practices. Only very few can be considered true ‘knowers’ (#§rifån); most of them are just fortune tellers (#ir§fån). True knowledge, on the one hand, is a deep longing whose subject matter exerts total control over the seeker who is never distracted by anything and who has no desire for wealth, rank, and power. On the other hand, producing false knowledge is perhaps the oldest trade in human history and is done by magicians, shamans, sages, sorcerers, and all the H§m§ns[374] of this world. It is a mistake to believe that #ir§fa knowledge died out with the end of the age of idolatry, pagan worship, and ancient tribalism. This form of heathendom only changed its outward appearance; it still exists and trades its old (false) knowledge under new names, wrapped up in a different cloak.

* ‘What Is Wrong’ (al-munkar)

The Arabic term for the phrase ‘what is wrong’, al-munkar, is derived from the verb n-k-r, whose diverse forms are used thirty-seven times in the Book. It first occurs in 3:104[375], and last in 67:18.[376] The most important cognates are munkar, nakÊr, nukr, nukra, and ink§r, each of which will be briefly defined:

– munkar refers to the opposite of ma#råf, that is, to everything that rational beings regard as shameful or repulsive, and everything that a society agrees to eradicate from its traditions or customs. When Lot asked his own people about their bad practices, he enquired about their munkar habits: ‘Do you indeed approach men, and cut off the highway, and practise wickedness (al-munkar) (even) in your councils?’ (A l-#Ankabåt 29:29). According to the Book, absolute taboos are exactly those shameful, repulsive acts of munkar§t.

– nakÊr has several interconnected meanings: a) difficulty, restrain, restriction, siege; we say ‘the army beseiged the city and exerted pressure on it’ (shaddada #alayh§ al-nakÊr)’; and b) a well-fortified stronghold, as is (metaphorically) used in ‘that day there will be for you no place of refuge nor will there be for you any room for denial (nakÊr) (of your sins)!’ (Al-Shår§ 42:47); and c) deterrent punishment or rebuke, as in: ‘But I granted respite to the unbelievers, and (only) after that did I punish them: but how (terrible) was my rejection (nakÊr) (of them)!’ (Al-\ajj 22:44).

– nukr refers to an extremely ‘foul thing’ that every soul despises and tries to prevent. We hear how ‘Moses said: “Have you slain an innocent person who had slain none? Truly a foul (unheard of) thing (nukr [an]) have you done!”’ (Al-Kahf 18:74). We use the term nukar§” to express hostility to anything feminine; we also say ‘a terrible calamity has befallen them’ (nazalat bihim maßÊba nukar§”), that is, something of considerable pain.

– nakira is a grammatical term used for an indefinite noun, an unknown person, or a nameless human being; people say about such a person that he is ‘neither this nor that’, that is, someone without any individuality in what he does and being incompetent to such a degree that if he offered his help, everybody would be immediately on their guard.

– ink§r means negation, rejection, and denial. The rejection of grace is a kind of denial, but the negation of one’s own ego is a form of altruism and as such is a laudable act, as we hear in 59:9.[377]

How ‘to Prescribe What Is Right and to Proscribe What Is Wrong’ Today

Before we are able to define the proper meaning of ‘to prescribe what is right and to proscribe what is wrong’ for today, we need to explain two other related aspects:

1. Harshness (faí§ía):

the Book warns that ‘were you severe (faí[an]) or harsh-hearted (ghalÊí a l-qalb), they would have broken away from about you…’ ($l #Imr§n 3:159), implying that if someone prescribes what is right and proscribes what is wrong in a harsh-hearted manner, that is, if he talks to people in a rude and patronising way, then people will not listen but rather run away from him. In this context, ‘harsh-hearted’ means dull-witted stupidity; it refers more to the brain than to the heart (the organ that pumps blood through the body). Even though the heart is indeed in people’s breasts, its functioning is controlled by the front part of the cranium that works from behind our foreheads: ‘Truly it is not their eyes that are blind, but their hearts which are in their breasts’ (Al-\ajj 22:46).

2. Compulsion/duress (ikr§h):

the Book makes it clear that under duress neither belief nor unbelief can be accepted as authentic or valid: ‘Any one who, after accepting faith in God, utters unbelief, except under compulsion, his heart remaining firm in faith…’ (A l-NaÈl 16:106). The Book mentions variations of the term ikr§h over forty times, expressing the notion of dislike and detestation, and also of pain and hardship. The notion of dislike is mentioned first in 2:216, a verse that will be further discussed in the section on al-qit§l,[378] and mentioned last in the context of the pagans' detestation of the true religion.[379] The sense of aversion to accept anything under pressure is expressed in Håd's speech to his people: 'He said: "My people, think: if I did have a clear sign from my Lord, and He had given me grace of His own, though it was hidden from you, could we force you to accept it against your will (lah§ k§rihån)?" (Håd 11:28, AH). The meaning of pain is stated in: 'We have enjoined on man kindness to his parents: in pain did his mother bear him, and in pain (kurh[an]) did she give him birth…' (Al-AÈq§f 46:15). The term ikr§h means compulsion, duress, and also, as we saw in 11:28, a force against a person's will. The prohibition of ikr§h is not only mandatory within the realm of prophethood (and hence the realm of personal responsibility on the Day of Judgement), but also within the realm of messengerhood, as is expressed in many verses of the Book[380] and in numerous ÈadÊths.[381] If it is true that a contract of sale or any other business contract is invalid if it is signed under duress, that an oath of allegiance to the ruler is worthless if it is given under compulsion, that a marriage contract is null and void if it is done by force, and if it is true that a statement of belief in God, His angels, His books, and His messengers is false if it is not given wholeheartedly and voluntarily, how can it then be right that people use force and swing a whip when they prescribe what is right and proscribe what is wrong?

Let us now return to the question of how to define 'to prescribe what is right and to proscribe what is wrong'. The following three verses will help in this:

Let there arise out of you a band of people inviting to all that is good, [prescribing] what is right, and [proscribing] what is wrong: they are the ones to attain felicity. ($l #Imr§n 3:104)

You are the best of peoples, evolved for mankind, [prescribing] what is right, [proscribing] what is wrong, and believing in God… ($l #Imr§n 3:110)

They believe in God and the Last Day; they [prescribe] what is right, and [proscribe] what is wrong; and they hasten (in emulation) in (all) good works: they are in the ranks of the righteous. ($l #lmr§n 3:114)

We notice that, firstly, the task of ‘prescribing what is right and of proscribing what is wrong’ is coupled with the invitation to #all that is good”—it is either mentioned first (3:104) or second (3:114); secondly, the task of ‘prescribing what is right and of proscribing what is wrong’ is also coupled with the condition to believe in God—it is either mentioned first (3:114) or second (3:110); thirdly, the three verses of $l #lmr§n mention four interconnected things: a) to call to do good works; b) to prescribe what is right; c) to proscribe what is wrong, and d) to call to believe in God; and finally, these elements are connected by the conjunction wa- (and), implying that it is a connection between four inseparable items that cannot be considered in isolation to one another. What connects the four elements is the notion that none of them must be forced upon people; their common denominator is the absence of compulsion. We should also not forget that this is a description of ‘a band of people’ who are praised as ‘the best of people’ enjoying ‘the ranks of the righteous’, the counterimage of those who are idolaters, pagans, and heathens.

We now include three more verses:

The believers, men and women, are protectors one of another: they [prescribe] what is just, and [proscribe] what is evil; they observe regular prayers, practise regular charity, and obey God and His Apostle. (Al-Tawba 9:71)

Those that turn (to God) in repentance; that serve Him, and praise Him; that wander in devotion to the cause of God; that bow down and prostrate themselves in prayer; that [prescribe] good and [proscribe] evil; and observe the limit set by God… (Al-Tawba 9:112)

(They are) those who, if We establish them in the land, establish regular prayer and give regular charity, [prescribe] the right and [proscribe] wrong—with God rests the end (and decision) of (all) affairs. (Al-\ajj 22:41)

These verses attach even more things to the task ‘to prescribe what is right and to proscribe what is wrong’:

a) to believe in God (as above);

b) to observe prayers;

c) to practise charity;

d) to obey God and His Messenger in what they have ordered and prohibited;

e) to observe the limits set by God.

We notice that the tasks to observe prayers and to practise charity either precede the task ‘to prescribe what is right and to proscribe what is wrong’ (22:41) or follow it (9:71). Again, we understand that the conjunction wa- (and) is meant to connect different things and that it does not imply a hierarchy (of importance). And yet, some of the tasks mentioned are practised purely on a personal level (belief in God, prayer, obedience to God and His Messenger), while others are practised both on a personal and a collective level (to prescribe what is right, to proscribe what is wrong, to practise charity, to observe the limits of God). If they are practised on a collective level, they need to be organised, properly administered, and controlled. But neither on a personal nor on a collective level is it allowed to apply pressure, force, or compulsion.

How the fuqah§” and #ulam§” Have Misconstrued the Qur”anic Phrase

In order to strengthen their grip on people’s private and public lives, it became necessary for our h§m§n§t scholars to arrive at a legal pretext that concealed their true intention, which was to gain full control of what the common people felt and thought. Some scholars used the pretext of calling themselves the guardians of religion; others claimed that they were the legitimate heirs of the prophets, a third group claimed to be the friends of God (auliy§t All§h), while a fourth maliciously used their misreading of the Book to secure them a special position within the umma of the Muslim-Believers. As for the third group, just listen to the preposterous claims of a scholar such as al-NawawÊ and his quite inventive way to use the Prophet (ß) for his purposes. In his book al-Tiby§n fÊ §d§b Èamalat al-qur”§n, he says, #al-Bukh§rÊ narrated from Abå Hurayra in his ‘aÈÊÈ that the Messenger of Allah (ß) said:

“The Exalted said: ‘Whoever hurts a friend of mine, I will wage a war against him.”” It is reported from the two revered Im§ms, Abå \anÊfa and al-Sh§fi#Ê (r), who said: “If the scholars (i.e., men of religion) were not friends of Allah, then there would be no friends of Allah.” Im§m al-\§fií Ibn #As§kir (r) said: “Let it be known, O brother, and Allah accorded us His pleasure and made us fear Him and be conscious of Him—as is His due—that the flesh of the scholars is poisoned. Allah’s habit is well-known that He discloses the secrets of those who find them [i.e., the scholars] defective. Whoever sets his tongue free to abuse them, Allah will try him by the death of his heart before his [real] death. So, those who disobey His command should beware of a trial or severe affliction that will come upon them.[382]

This is exactly the way—like intellectual terrorism—to instil fear into the hearts of the common people that if they criticise our honourable scholars, God will punish them for it.

As for the fourth group, their favourite trick was to point to 3:104 and claim that Allah had indeed elevated them above everyone else. The verse says: ‘Let there arise out of you a band of people (la-takun minkum) inviting to all that is good, enjoining what is right, and forbidding what is wrong: They are the ones to attain felicity’ ($l #Imr§n 3:104). Claiming that the phrase ‘a band of people out of you’ is a reference to the class of #ulam§”, they then argued that the following ÈadÊth, transmitted and authenticated by all major ÈadÊth collectors, supports this claim. The version transmitted by Abå D§wåd says:

‘It is reported from Abå Sa#Êd al-KhudrÊ who said that Marw§n brought out the pulpit on the day of #Êd and started the sermon before the prayer. A man stood up and said: “O Marw§n! You have just contravened the sunna. You brought out the pulpit the day of #Êd, while he [the Prophet (ß)] did not do that, and you started the sermon before the prayer [while he started the prayer first].” Abå Sa#Êd asked; “Who is this man?” They replied, so and so, the son of so and so. He [Abå Sa#Êd] said: “As far as this [man] is concerned, he has fulfilled what is required of him. I heard the Messenger of Allah (ß) saying: ‘Whoever sees evil that he is able to change, he should do so first with his hands, and if he is not able [to do so], then with his tongue, and if he is not able [to do so], then with his heart. This is the minimum [degree of] Êm§n.””[383]

In the eyes of our honourable scholars there is no question that God appointed them not only as the guardians of His religion but also as the intermediaries between Him and the people, as the translators of His orders and prohibitions, and as the commentators of His verses and rules. They maintained that the preposition + suffix pronoun minkum (out of you) is partitive, dividing the umma into those whom Allah appointed ‘to prescribe what is right and to proscribe what is wrong’ and the rest (who were not appointed), while they, of course, embody ‘the band of people’ that Allah chose for this task. The truth is, however, that the preposition min is not partitive (out of you) but rather designative (of you), as in the sentence: ‘The emir so-and-so turned his country (ja#la min bil§dihi) into a highly civilised nation’, implying a change of his entire country—in spite of the use of min—and not just parts of it. Moreover, the identification of a privileged group contradicts several important principles: first, it would condemn the majority of the population to passivity, while only a tiny group ‘prescribes what is right and proscribes what is wrong’ which, according to 3:110, contradicts Allah’s more general designation that the entire umma are ‘the best of peoples’. Second, it would suggest a certain hierarchy that contradicts the spirit of the Book. We know that Allah appointed His noble Prophet (ß) to prescribe what is right, [384] after a long process (over forty years!) of selection during which MuÈammad (ß) lived with his peoples and his family, and during which he proved himself trustworthy to carry out this majestic task. The testing and probing was done in a rigorous manner so that His word could be true: ‘Verily the most honoured of you in the sight of God is (he who is) the most righteous of you…’ (A l-\ujur§t 49:13). Given this rigorous process of selection, is it plausible that God chose a group of people even before they were actually born? Can such a selection be sensible when it means that mere membership of this group is enough to gain a privileged position regardless of skill and competence? Is this not similar to the presumptuous (racist) claim that God chose one nation over all others, whereby everyone born into this nation is, by birthright, God-chosen simply because of his ethnicity and not because of his character or good work?

As for the ÈadÊth, it clearly contradicts the Book, a fact that our honourable scholars tried to circumvent by issuing their famous dictum that ‘the Sunna abrogates the Qur’an’ which is, frankly, a despicable hermeneutical trick. What is even more detestable is that they used this ÈadÊth to justify violence and force in prescribing what is right and proscribing what is wrong. To correct what is wrong by (only) your tongue and heart became labelled as ‘soft’ or ‘feeble’ and was interpreted as a reflection of having weak belief. And after having turned this upside down, the act of correcting ‘by your hand’, that is, by force and pressure, became the ultimate expression of strong belief. Needless to say that this turns the message of the Book completely on its head, which prefers ease over hardship and friendliness over harshness, as the sequence of actions demonstrates in the following verse: ‘As to those women on whose part you fear […] ill-conduct, admonish them (first), (next), refuse to share their beds, (and last) [criticize them (severely)][385]…’ (A l-Nis§” 4:34). The ÈadÊth has also often been used by our honourable scholars to give state authorities a free hand to use violence against what they (religiously) perceive as (politically) wrong. But the ÈadÊth is only concerned with human behaviour on a personal level. The Prophet (ß) was far too clever to allow state authorities to interfere with an individual’s faults and errors, as he—quite justifiably so—anticipated that this would turn any democratic rule into despotic rule where the ruling class will be allowed to take the law into their own hands and turn it— under the pretext of ‘forbidding what is wrong”—against their political opponents. He also anticipated that to give political rulers the licence to ‘forbid what is wrong’ would allow them to set up religious tribunals which sentence critics of the regime to death, masked under the pretence that this will eradicate heresy, atheism, and free thinking. And indeed, this is what has happened: the accusation of takfÊr has given the political and religious establishments freedom to confiscate the property and possessions of so-called convicted ‘apostates’, and by hiding behind a façade of laughable accusations of immorality and licentious lifestyles they have deemed it proper to destroy the honour and dignity of their fiercest opponents. Thus, what the Prophet (ß) wanted to prevent has in fact turned out to be a political reality. The use of force and violence by political rulers has become a feature of everyday life. And yet, the sword that our honourable scholars presented to the rulers as a gift turned out to be doubleedged, as we explained earlier. While in the past it allowed oppressive regimes to fight their opponents with brutality, it left the political opposition with no choice but to acquire the same brutal mentality in their fight against the political order. Once again, the pretext of ‘forbidding what is wrong’ is used today for purely political reasons, only this time accusations of kufr are being turned against the political class itself.

 Conclusion

To prescribe what is right and to proscribe what is wrong is a divine duty. Allah did not set up fixed rules that can be automatically applied in how to exercise this duty. Instead, He left this to be done according to what is ma#råf, that is, widely recognised and what is perceived as good taste and common sense within any given society. What needs to be prescribed or proscribed is what is shared by most people as accepted norms of good or bad social practice. The condition is that, for the implementation of such norms, violence and force must not be used. Whoever forces people to pray five times a day, and whoever forces women to wear a Saudi-style Èij§b, regardless of the cultural norms of their country, has not properly fulfilled God’s duty because something has been enforced that is not commonly shared or practiced. In an age of mass communication and globalised forms of interaction (global village), we propose six general principles that are indispensable for the fulfilment of God’s duty:

1. freedom of speech: nobody should fear prosecution or punishment for expressing his thoughts and ideas in public (radio, newspapers, television, books, internet, etc.);

2. civil society and nongovernmental organisations: these should be given as much support as possible (be they human rights organisations, societies for the protection of animals, consumer watchdog organisations, professional associations, or environmental campaign groups), but they should not use force and violence to impose their ideas of ‘what is right and what is wrong’.

3. confederation of states: their task is to investigate accusations of crimes against humanity, violations of human rights and breaches of international law in a member state; the other members apply international sanctions and diplomatic pressure in order to ‘prescribe what is right’ (i.e., widely accepted and recognised as international norms).

4. politics as social contract, not God’s rule on earth: individual freedom is constrained by a social contract that exists between a state and its citizens. The individual citizen gives up parts of his personal freedom by observing the existing laws. But the laws of a society (limits) should not be confused with the political rules of the state authorities. There are God’s limits in human legislation, but there is no God’s rule in politics. Political rule is exercised by humans who exercise it within the parameters of a social contract. The concept of God’s rule on earth has no evidence in the Book and, if applied to politics, is a recipe for despotism and religious authoritarianism.

5. separation between isl§m and politics: Isl§m means rituals, legislation between God’s limits, and moral guidance. No political party must therefore carry the adjective ‘Islamic’ in its title, because isl§m is (not politics but rather) a ÈanÊf religion. Political slogans that carry the name isl§m (e.g., ‘Islam is the solution’) are nonsense because religion cannot solve the economic, social, and political problems of a society, but only the people themselves. More prayers, more fasting, and more pilgrimages will never solve the ills of the community, but rather good, sensible, and moral legislation within the limits that God has set. These limits and the moral ideals of the Book are not addressed only to the followers of MuÈammad (ß) but to all humankind.

6. synthesis between isl§m and society: isl§m as a universal religion and is as valid for the Peoples Republic of China as it is for the Kingdom of Monaco, provided it is kept out of politics. But we say politics, not society. Isl§m must not and cannot be separated from society.

Sadly, after centuries of political misuse and abuse, isl§m has lost its universality. It has been carelessly sacrificed for the ills of power politics and the political opportunism of our honourable scholars. This book’s aim is to recover Islam’s lost universality and restore its powerful message as it is laid out clearly in All§h’s Book. But only God knows whether we will achieve this aim.

 JIH§D

In this section we tackle the complex problem of how to understand jih§d. We accept that it is a very sensitive issue and recent events in world politics, in particular after 9/11, have unduly emotionalised the entire debate and severely hampered our understanding. In recent publications on the topic we recognise how easily religious doctrines are mixed up with politics, how legitimate anger about the West’s neocolonialist expansionism is expressed in religious terms, and how readily learned scholars conflate the concept of jih§d with the killing of unbelievers and innocent civilians. We also observe, in response to the threat of terrorism, how authoritarian regimes in the Arab-Muslim world have managed to eradicate any democratic opposition to their autocratic rule, while attempting to appease the Islamist opposition by allowing outdated, medieval ideas of religion to dominate the public debate. In this sensitive debate about jih§d, we are faced with a dual invasion of our freedom: externally, by the ever more aggressive globalisation of Western capitalism, and internally by the elimination of our civil liberties by oppressive states firmly in the grip of the mukh§bar§t.

This is not just a recent development, however. The entire history of Islamic fiqh is basically characterised by efforts of the #ulam§" to define jih§d with bellicose connotations and to advance reasons for the so-called legitimate killing of the enemies of Islam. Some scholars claim to be innocent because of their ignorance of the subject or try to justify their misunderstandings by saying that they were blindly following the authority of a school of law, while, in fact, they were actively involved in power politics and wanted to please authoritarian rulers by providing them with an expansionist ideology for their imperial ambitions. That Islamist groups today resort to the concept of jih§d as a cloak of legitimacy to hide their lust for political power and authoritarian rule unashamedly, is also not new in Islamic history. This history of abuse begins with the first civil war and the killing of the third caliph #Uthm§n in seventh-century Arabia and finds its culmination in the twentieth century with the dethronement of Reza Shah Pahlavi in Iran and King Farouk in Egypt. It currently ends with the so-called Jihadist groups, the militant Taliban in Afghanistan and the al-Q§#ida networks all over the world. The political history of Islam reveals a frightening habit to use religion for the purpose of usurping political power. The list is indeed very long: Zubayrites, Harurites, Qarmatis, Umayyads, Abbasids, Mamluks, Ottomans, and so on, all used jih§d as a pretext for their hunger for power. Another feature of this fatal alliance between religion and politics is that the jih§d doctrine has been misused over centuries to justify an ever-growing expansion of the Islamic empire by declaring military conquests a 'mission for the spread of Islam' and by disguising conquests and invasions as 'openings' to the religion of Islam. Inevitably, Islam soon became known as the religion of the sword, of violence, terror, oppression, supremacy, hatred, and vengeance, and today's terror in the name of Islam certainly does not help to eradicate this image of Islam as a martial religion.

It is the aim of this section to contribute to a clarification of the concept of jih§d. We will first explore a general definition of the term and then outline specific categories that properly define the act of ‘fighting in God’s way’. We will need to clarify whether jih§d allows the use of force and in which context opposition to injustice can justifiably be called jih§d. A considerable part of our analysis will be dedicated to a study of issues related to the problem of jih§d, in particular the thorny question of whether al-isl§m allows martyrdom or not.

 The Term jih§d

The noun jih§d is derived from the third verb form j§hada and thus has the structure and semantic meaning of words of the f§#ala group, such as jid§l (dispute), qit§l (fight), and khiß§m (argument). Jih§d, like these three nouns, connotes a struggle between two sides in which one side wants to overcome and triumph over the other (which may be an individual or a whole group). It has often been assumed that jih§d is derived from the first verb form, jahada, and that the long § is accidental and not constitutive for its meaning. This has led to the understanding of jih§d as a derivative of juhd (exertion) and to the fatal parallel classification of qit§l (fight) as qatl (killing), culminating in the association of jih§d with qatl (killing) and not with qit§l (fight)!

The following two verses show how absurd it is to link jih§d to killing:

We have enjoined on man kindness to parents: but if they (either of them) strive (to force) you [j§had§k] to join with Me (in worship) anything of which you have no knowledge, obey them not. (A l-#Ankabåt 29:8)

“But if they strive to make you [j§had§k] join in worship with Me things of which you have no knowledge, obey them not; yet bear them company in this life with justice (and consideration)…” (Luqm§n 31:15)

In both verses the possibility is considered that parents may not want their children to worship God. The force they may apply is described by the term jih§d. This cannot possibly imply the parent's killing of their children, given that God asks the children 'not to obey them', also to 'bear them company in this life with justice"! We could not find a better definition of this aspect of jih§d than in the ÈadÊth in which 'the Prophet (ß) once said to his companions: "You have made a good transition from the lesser jih§d to the greater jih§d." They asked: "What is the greater jih§d?" He said: "A servant's struggle against his desires."[386]

In spite of this textual evidence, the fuqah§" not only successfully associated jih§d with killing (qatl), they also invented an arsenal of arguments that justified armed expeditions, conquests, raids, incursions, and other military activities as essential forms of jih§d. The main tool and principal method of achieving such a mischievous rendering of the term was naskh, abrogation. By using the concept of naskh, according to which Allah's earlier revelations were considered as superseded by later ones, they were able to argue, based on this diachronic logic, that later (human) traditions of the Prophet's companions overruled the authoritative verses of the Book and of the authentic sunna. This is so central to the debate about jih§d that we need to revisit the question of abrogation before we can proceed.

The main argument of the jurists for the existence of abrogation was that some verses of the Book seem to contradict one another. One of their prime examples was the theological discrepancy between the following two verses:

O you who believe! Fear God as He should be feared, and die not except in a state of Islam. ($l-#Imr§n 3:102)

So fear God as much as you can; listen and obey and spend in charity for the benefit of your own soul and those saved from the covetousness of their own souls… (Al-Tagh§bun 64:16)

It confused the exegetes that 3:102 demands fear of God ‘as He should be feared’, that is, with an intensity that is equal to Him, whereas 64:16 only asks to fear God ‘as much as you can’, that is, with an intensity that humans are capable of even if that falls short of how ‘He should be feared’. In order to solve the contradiction it was suggested that 64:16 was abrogated by 3:102 since it did not correspond to the normative expectations of the fuqah§”. The exegetes were also confused by the fact that the Book apparently contradicts itself by calling for tolerance, nonviolence, and peaceful persuasion in some verses, such as:

Let there be no compulsion in religion… (Al-Baqara 2:256) Say, “The truth is from your Lord”: Let him who will believe, and let him who will, reject (it)…” (Al-Kahf 18:29)

Invite (all) to the way of your Lord with wisdom and beautiful preaching; and argue with them in ways that are best and most gracious: for your Lord knows best, who have strayed from His path, and who receive guidance. (Al-NaÈl 16:125)

While in other verses, the Book seems to promote intolerance and legitimate violence against other religions by an aggressive expansionist theology, as for example in the so-called sword verses of Sårat al-Tawba:

O Prophet! Strive hard against the unbelievers and the hypocrites, and be firm against them. Their abode is Hell—an evil refuge indeed. (Al-Tawba 9:73)

Fight those who believe not in God, nor the Last Day, nor hold that forbidden which has been forbidden by God and His Apostle, nor acknowledge the religion of truth, (even if they are) of the people of the Book, until they pay the Jizya with willing submission, and feel themselves subdued. (Al-Tawba 9:29)

…then fight and slay the pagans wherever you find them, and seize them, beleaguer them, and lie in wait for them in every stratagem (of war)… (Al-Tawba 9:5)

We do not deny that abrogation exists within the Book. Abrogation occurs in two forms: as annulment (ibt§l) and as amendment (ta#dÊl) of previous legislative verses. The Book confirms this:

None of Our revelations do We abrogate or cause to be forgotten, but We substitute something better or similar: do you not know that God has power over all things? (Al-Baqara 2:106)

When We substitute one revelation for another—and God knows best what He reveals (in stages)—they say, “You are but a forger”: but most of them understand not. (Al-NaÈl 16:101)

Most fuqah§” base their theory of abrogation on these two verses. However, they have failed to interpret these verses within the context of either preceding or succeeding verses. We believe that 2:106 and 16:101 are specified by 2:105 and 16:102 respectively:

It is never the wish of those without faith among the people of the Book, nor of the pagans, that anything good should come down to you from your Lord. (Al-Baqara 2:105)

Say, the Holy Spirit has brought the revelation from your Lord in truth, in order to strengthen those who believe, and as a guide and glad tidings to Muslims [li’l-muslimÊn].[387] (Al-NaÈl 16:102)

We deduce from this that abrogation occurred between messengerhoods (e.g., between the message of Moses and the message of Jesus), but not within one and the same messengerhood. Verse 5:15 confirms this:

O people of the Book! There has come to you our apostle, revealing to you much that you used to hide in the Book, and passing over much (that is now unnecessary)… (Al-M§“ida 5:15)

Abrogation became necessary because several centuries had passed between the messengerhoods, life changed, and legal adjustments were needed. This certainly was not the case, however, within the time span of only one messengerhood. We hear in 40:78 that people had forgotten the ‘stories’ of previous messengers who came a long time ago, so Allah had to remind them:

We did a foretime send apostles before you: of them there are some whose story We have related to you, and some whose story We have not related to you… (Gh§fir 40:78)

Abrogation occurred because Allah wanted to implement legal rules that either improved existing legislation (‘We substitute something better’ 2:106) or replaced similar rules (‘We substitute something … similar’ 2:106). The underlying principle of abrogating similar rules is Allah’s wisdom to express the truth within the changing idioms of the time. For example, the truth of al-tauÈÊd is essential to all messengerhoods, starting with Noah (‘a) and ending with MuÈammad (ß), but it needed to be explained differently according to the progressing stages of human societies. In addition, old legislation occasionally required updating to bring it in line with new ritual practices even though the essence of the rule did not change. Let us, for example, compare 21:48 with 2:185:

In the past We granted to Moses and Aaron the criterion (for judgment) [al-furq§n], and a light and a message for those who would do right. (Al-Anbiy§” 21:48)

Ramadan is the (month) in which was sent down the Qur’an, as a guide to mankind, also clear (signs for) guidance and judgement (between right and wrong) [al-furq§n]… (Al-Baqara 2:185)

The similarities between the first message (to Moses and Aaron) and the second (to MuÈammad) are indeed striking: both were revealed in order to bring light and guidance to ‘those who would do right’, and both contain al-furq§n, formulated in the form of the Ten Commandments to Moses and as a catalogue of orders to MuÈammad

(ß).[388]

But God also abrogated legislation when a rule was to be abolished and replaced by a better one. A good example of this type of abrogation is God’s decision to lessen the severity of the punishment for adultery. Jewish law demanded the death penalty, while the law of the Gospel prescribed forgiveness and mercy with the adulterers, but MuÈammad’s (ß) message finally abrogated both the death penalty and the granting of complete absolution by introducing a ‘better rule’ which stipulates the penalty of flogging with a hundred stripes:

If a man is found sleeping with another man’s wife, both the man who slept with her and the woman must die. (Deuteronomy 22:22)[389]

If anyone of you is without sin, let him be the first to throw a stone at her. (John 8:7) [390]

The woman and the man guilty of adultery or fornication—flog each of them with a hundred stripes… (Al-Når 24:2)

The Book speaks about the notion of successive messengerhoods by precisely defining the role each messenger had to play. We hear, for example, about the mission of Jesus:

“(I [Jesus] have come to you), to attest the law which was before me. And to make lawful to you part of what was (before) forbidden to you…” ($l #Imr§n 3:50)

And about MuÈammad’s (ß) mission:

“Those who follow the Apostle, the unlettered prophet, whom they find mentioned in their own (scriptures)—in the law [Thora] and the Gospel—for He commands them what is just and forbids them what is evil; He allows them as lawful what is good (and pure) and prohibits them from what is bad (and impure); He releases them from their heavy burdens and from the yokes that are upon them… (Al-A#r§f 7:157)

This verse stresses the fact that MuÈammad’s (ß) role was to ‘release people from the heavy burdens’ of previous rules. This would occur, for example, by abrogating the death penalty for adultery. It beggars belief that the fuqah§” have ignored all the textual evidence and overruled Allah’s command by shamelessly reintroducing the death penalty for adultery.

A similar evolutionary development of legislation can be observed if we look at the rules on killing. First, we hear about the Law Code of Hammurabi (e.g., paragraphs 196, 197, 200, 229, 230) which basically introduced a lex talionis (law of retaliation).[391] Next, the Torah reiterates the lex talionis of the Code of Hammurabi (Exodus 21:22–25; Leviticus 24:17ff.; Deuteronomy 19:21) but no longer condones its class distinctions.[392] This is explicitly endorsed by the Book (see 5:44), which at that time was, in legal terms, a huge step forward because it established retributive justice as a strong deterrent against intentional killings:

We ordained therein for them: “Life for life, eye for eye, nose for nose, ear for ear, tooth for tooth, and wounds equal for equal.” (Al-M§“ida 5:45)

It was We who revealed the law (to Moses): therein was guidance and light… (Al-M§“ida 5:44)

This level of legislation was finally abrogated by MuÈammad’s (ß) messengerhood. The Book also prohibits homicide but extends this to the killing of all creatures that possess a soul, that is, animals and plants:

Nor take life [nafs = soul]—which God has made sacred—except for just cause… (Al-Isr§” 17:33)

The added concessive subclause ‘except for just cause’ indicates a higher form of legal reasoning because it considers the possibility of justified killings if this follows the principle of utility, for example, the cutting of trees in order to acquire wood, or the slaughtering of animals for food. Any other killing is unlawful and will be prosecuted. Both messengerhoods distinguish between unintentional and intentional homicide. For intentional homicide, both legal systems prescribe the same penalty (death). As for unintentional homicide, the Torah of Moses stipulates that the killer has to flee into one of three cities of Israel to save his life (Deuteronomy 4:41), whereas MuÈammad’s (ß) message is more lenient and only stipulates a fast of two successive months for the killer.

Never should a believer kill a believer; but (if it so happens) by mistake, (compensation is due): If one (so) kills a believer, it is ordained that he should free a believing slave, and pay compensation to the deceased’s family, unless they remit it freely. If the deceased belonged to a people at war with you, and he was a believer, the freeing of a believing slave (is enough). If he belonged to a people with whom you have treaty of mutual alliance, compensation should be paid to his family, and a believing slave be freed. For those who find this beyond their means, (is prescribed) a fast for two months running: by way of repentance to God: for God has all knowledge and all wisdom. (Al-Nis§” 4:92)

We are now able to return to the problem of an apparent contradiction between 2:256 (prohibiting coercion) and 9:5 (permitting coercion). It can now be ruled out that either verse is abrogated because abrogation did not occur within MuÈammad’s (ß) messengerhood. The key to the solution lies in the distinction between MuÈammad’s (ß) prophethood and his messengerhood. It has been overlooked that verse 9:5 (permitting coercion) is part of his prophethood (nubåwa), whereas verse 2:256 (prohibiting coercion) is part of his messengerhood (ris§la). This distinction has far-reaching consequences. Thus, whereas the verses of messengerhood have legal significance (insofar as we enjoy the power to exercise legislative ijtih§d about them), the verses of prophethood are not legislative at all but are purely informative. The verses of Sårat a l-Tawba which give an account of the military expeditions of the early Muslim community—when killing was a historic necessity—do not state universal laws but only ‘news’: khabar news for MuÈammad’s contemporaries and naba” news for us who live centuries after the events took place.[393]

 The Act of Witness

The terms shah§da and shahÊd are derived from the root word sh-h-d which appears 160 times in the Book. Its first occurrence is in Sårat al-Baqara (…and call your witnesses [shuhad§“akum] or helpers (if there are any) besides God, if your (doubts) are true, 2:23), and it is mentioned for the last time in Sårat al-Buråj (…and God is witness [shahÊd[un]] to all things, 85:9). None of the 160 occurrences of sh-h-d even remotely concern martyrs or martyrdom. It is indeed a mystery how this bizarre meaning could have ever been associated with the act of giving witness. A l-shahÊd is one of the ninety-nine names of God and describes Him as someone who is permanently present and who is near you so as to see, hear, and listen, as the two following verses confirm:

He is with you wherever you are; He sees all that you do. (A l-\adÊd 57:4, AH)

It was We who created man, and We know what dark suggestions his soul makes to him: for We are nearer to him than (his) jugular vein. (Q§f 50:16)

The message is clear: God can only see, hear and listen (be a witness) because He is present, He is with you, He is ‘nearer to you than your jugular vein’. The active participle of sh-h-d is a l-sh§hid, one ‘who is witnessing’, from which al-shahÊd is derived. The dual of al-sh§hid is al-sh§hid§n, and the dual of al-shahÊd is al-shahÊd§n. Al-sh§hidån is the plural of al-sh§hid, and al-shuhad§” of al-shahÊd. Both terms describe the act of ‘witnessing’, but they denote two different types of it. The first type of witnessing requires the witness to be physically present when something happens and to directly observe and perceive things with his own senses. The second type does not demand physical presence as it requires the witness to testify according to his (previously) acquired knowledge. The act of witnessing given in the latter is based on empirical evidence, that is, similar to a legal case which is assessed purely on the basis of evidence that the police or lawyers have provided. In telling the story of Joseph’s seduction by Potifar’s wife, the Book provides an example of a witness who, even though he was not a member of the household and not even present when the incident happened, was able to testify against Potifar’s wife purely by looking at the state of Joseph’s shirt:

He said: “It was she that sought to seduce me—from my (true) self.” And one of her household saw (this) and bore witness [shahida sh§hid[un]], (thus): “If it be that his shirt is rent from the front, then is her tale true, and he is a liar! * “But if it be that his shirt is torn from the back, then is she the liar, and he is telling the truth!” (Yåsuf 12:26–27) The Book employs sh-h-d as follows:

1. As a term for physical presence (at home during Ramadan) and eyewitness (of the new moon), characterising witness as both presence and observation:

Ramadan is the (month) in which was sent down the Qur’an, as a guide to mankind, also clear (signs for) guidance and judgement (between right and wrong). So every one of you who is present (at his home) [fa-man shahida] during that month should spend it in fasting. But if anyone is ill, or on a journey, the prescribed period (should be made up) by days later… (Al-Baqara 2:185)

2. As a term for physical presence in the form of companionship; when Jesus denied that he had ever asked his disciples to worship both God and Mary, [394] the term ‘witness’ is used to point to the time when he was alive (‘when I was a witness over them during my time with them’). After his death, that is, after his presence with, or witness over them, he refuses to take responsibility for his disciples’ action:

“I told them only what You commanded me to: ‘Worship God, my Lord and your Lord’; I was a witness [shahÊd[an]] over them during my time among them. Ever since You took my soul, you alone have been the watcher [al-raqÊb] over them: You are witness

[shahÊd[un]] to all things. (Al-M§“ida 5:117, AH)

3. As a term for someone who is present at the writing of a commercial contract or an official document and confirms its existence with their testimony, showing that they have seen with their own eyes that the partners of the contract or the author of the document have signed it:

…and get two witnesses [shahÊdain], out of your own men, and if there are not two men, then a man and two women, such as you choose, for witnesses… (Al-Baqara 2:282)

4. As a term for the four witnesses who are present during an act of lewdness; these four (male) witnesses must tell in a court of law what they saw with their own eyes:

If any of your women are guilty of lewdness, take the evidence of four (reliable) witnesses from amongst you against them… (Al-Nis§” 4:15)

We learn from these examples that in the Book a ‘witness’ has five characteristics:

I. A shahÊd witness (note the long Ê) is required to be physically present when something happens. If they give evidence of an event that they themselves did not attend, their status is that of sh§hid witnesses (long §).

II. A shahÊd witness is by definition alive. If someone is dead their status as a witness ceases (as in the case of Jesus). We have learned in 5:117 that after Jesus’ death only Allah alone remained to be the watcher (al-raqÊb) over his disciples: ‘He, eternally, is a witness (shahÊd[un]) to all things’. But when a human being dies, their witness-ship ends.

III. A shahÊd witness is more precise and accurate than a sh§hid witness who does not base his account on direct experience. Even if one were able to completely reconstruct a scene from the past, the account of an eyewitness who was actually present at the scene will always provide more detail and depth.

IV. According to 2:282, contracts are only valid if they are testified to by a shahÊd witness. If they are testified to by a sh§hid witness, the contracts are invalid.

V. A shahÊd is not someone who is killed or kills himself on the battlefield but, for example, the journalist who is embedded in a military unit and reports home what he has witnessed at the battlefront. Whether he is killed in action or whether he returns alive does not at all matter to his status as a shahÊd. Similarly, the peace activist who is thrown into prison, alongside murderers, thieves, and drug dealers, because he protested peacefully against the government's atrocities and numerous violations of human rights—he is also a true shahÊd (pl. shuhad§") because he dared to 'witness' the truth in the face of an inhuman regime.

It has become clear that it is unjustifiable to associate the Qur'anic terms shahÊd or shuhad§" with martyrs or martyrdom. The evidence from the Book is supported by the \ adÊth literature. One particular ÈadÊth stands out because it has been transmitted in not less than 139 variations of text (matn) and in as many chains of narrations (isn§d). This ÈadÊth narrates how MuÈammad (ß) responded to his companions' answer to his question: '"Who of you is a shahÊd?" They said: "Whoever was killed in the way of All§h is a shahÊd." He [MuÈammad (ß)] said: "Verily, the shuhad§" of my nation, in that case, are very few." They said: "[If we are not right in our definition of a shahÊd] Then who are they, O Messenger of Allah?" He said: "Whoever was killed in the way of God is a shahÊd. And whoever died in the way of God is a shahÊd. And whoever died [due to the illness of] the stomach is a shahÊd."'[395] In another ÈadÊth, MuÈammad's (ß) definition is much wider: 'He said: "Whoever was killed in defence of his wealth is a shahÊd. And whoever was killed in defence of his family is a shahÊd. And whoever was killed in defence of his religion is a shahÊd. And whoever was killed in defence of his blood [i.e., life] is a shahÊd."'[396] In a third ÈadÊth the Prophet's (ß) views are even more comprehensive: 'He said: "There are five [ways] and whoever died in one of them is a martyr; the one who is killed in the way of God; the one who is drowned in the way of God; the one who suffered [due to the illness of the] stomach in the way of God; the one who suffered [due to] plague in the way of God; and the woman in childbirth in the way of God."'[397] A fourth ÈadÊth adds: "Whoever departed [went away] in the way of God, and died or was killed is a shahÊd; whoever breaks his neck by [falling off a] horse or camel is a shahÊd; whoever is bitten by a poisonous creature, or whoever dies in his bed by any death All§h wished for him, is indeed a shahÊd. For him there is Paradise.”’[398] Finally, a fifth ÈadÊth concludes: ‘He said: “Whoever was killed [fighting] against oppression is a shahÊd.”’[399]

MuÈammad (ß) was obviously not happy with the very narrow definition of shahÊd that his companions gave (he rebuked them by saying, ‘Verily, the shuhad§” of my nation, in that case, are very few’).

He corrects them by providing a wider definition that is more compatible with the concept of the Book. He also includes, however, the components of death and killing for God in his definition, which is, as we have shown, an innovation that is against the message of the Book. We have broadly defined the semantic field in which the term sh-h-d is used in the Book (presence in the month of Ramadan, guardianship and social presence, eyewitness of the new moon, signing of a contract or official document, and witnessing an act of lewdness), and none of these have any association with death, killing, or martyrdom. We have also distinguished sh§hid from shahÊd in that the former witness is not required to attest to something he has seen with his own eyes. Those who, according to the shah§da, witness the existence of God are sh§hid witnesses, not shahÊd witnesses because God can neither be seen nor heard. When the Book says that Allah sent MuÈammad (ß) as a witness of God, it uses the term sh§hid and not shahÊd![400] To deny this and to claim to be a shahÊd of God would be to anthropomorphise God, because it would imply that we actually see Him with our own eyes—‘Allah, the Highly exalted, is above what they ascribe to him’.[401]

Critics of our definition of shahÊd may come along and reject it on the grounds that it is too comprehensive. They might object to our notion that basically every single one of us can become a shahÊd, men and women with no distinction. If we accept the Prophet’s (ß) definition but take the component of death away, one might say that most of us will seek knowledge in one way or another, or will provide for home and family, or will suffer one way or another from some kind of disease. Will this be enough to make us shuhad§”? Our answer to this is that in our definition of shuhad§” we first of all made sure that we did not depart from the semantic field of sh-h-d as it is defined in the Book. Given that the plural shuhad§” is ungendered and connotes witness by men and women, there is no linguistic restriction that would exclude women from being shuhad§”. This is supported by verse 78 of Sårat al-\ajj in which the verb ‘be’ is similarly gender neutral and includes men and women who can be ‘witnesses for mankind’:

…that the Apostle may be a witness for you, and you be witnesses [wa-takunå shuhad§”] for mankind! … (Al-\ajj 22:78)

Our definition also remains faithful to the ÈadÊths of the Prophet (ß). It does not include, however, his reference to death (‘whoever was killed’) since this contradicts the Book. As said above, a shahÊd cannot be dead. He must be alive, present, and see with his own eyes. He witnesses what is evident before his own eyes. A witness of something that is absent (al-gh§“ib) is impossible. For us today, MuÈammad’s (ß) community is absent insofar as it is not present in the current level of civilisational development and the current modes of production.

The other question is whether someone who is killed, for example, in a car accident or by drowning in a river, is to be considered a shahÊd. Since death itself cannot be taken as the decisive component, we need to define the circumstances of his death and explore the reasons why he was killed. We need to find other criteria that make someone a shahÊd. We believe that everyone who is killed in an accident is a shahÊd (a witness of his accident), and that Hell or Paradise (reward or punishment) have nothing to do with it; it will be —as 56:60 says—that death ‘has been decreed as our common lot’.[402] In this sense (of witnessing your own death), all the graves of Muslims and non-Muslims alike become graves of shuhad§”. Our understanding of the prophetical ÈadÊths is that the shuhad§” are those who are still alive. What MuÈammad (ß) meant to say is that those who witness a serious illness or those who witness a cruel war are the real shuhad§”; since it is impossible to witness either illness or war as a dead person. Death was mentioned in the ÈadÊths only in order to express the idea that if death comes it abruptly ends the act of giving witness. We understand that those listed as prophets, ßidÊqån, shuhad§”, ß§liÈån, and such, are those who, when still alive, publicly declared their faith and for which they eventually gave their lives. Giving their lives was the price they paid for their open declaration of the shah§da, but their death alone did not define them as shuhad§”; they did not hurt or kill anybody, they just behaved bravely when they, defenceless and unarmed, faced a mighty opposition. Abå Bakr, for example, did not earn his title of honour, al-ßiddÊq, through his death but through his sincerity, righteousness, and bravery, while he was still alive! In fact, if someone witnesses the signing of a sales contract and is killed because of his act of witnessing, he will indeed be listed next to the prophets, ßidÊqån, shuhad§”, ß§liÈån, and such, not because—we dare to say—but in spite of his death (because he never wanted to lose his life). Our point of contention is that it is not death as such which is the deciding factor in being a shahÊd. Peace activists who witness the cruelty of their own government and pledge their shah§da are certainly shuhad§” regardless of whether they are killed or continue to protest until they die naturally. Our views correspond with social and political reality because those who die for their convictions or are killed because of their ‘witness’ are few. If death is one aspect of being a true shahÊd, it would apply to the unarmed, peaceful journalist who is killed by a sniper bullet while reporting the news from a war zone.

What about the suicide bomber who blows himself up in the middle of a busy marketplace, killing hundreds of innocent civilians—is he a shahÊd? Or are those civilians who are killed during such incidents shuhad§”? What about the human rights activist who takes part in a peaceful protest demonstration—is he a shahÊd? Or are those politicians shuhad§” who order a massive crackdown on the protesters, arresting and torturing hundreds of them on the pretext of maintaining public order and national security, while in reality fearing that public protest might reveal their corrupt deals with the army, the police, and the security services? What about the religious zealots who besiege entire villages with their missionary campaigns, using threat and violence to force men and women to adopt their radical religion—are they shuhad§”? Is this really jih§d in the name of Islam and fighting in God’s way? Or is this simply aggression against the social order, a violent negation of life that has nothing to do with either jih§d or the shah§da? We know that the fuqah§”, corrupted by their alliance with despotic rulers (basically since the reign of the Umayyads until today), cannot bring themselves to categorically remove violence, coercion, and death from their definitions of jih§d and the shah§da. In this way they contradict Allah’s Book and Allah’s Messenger (ß).

Clearly, the defence of a nation’s security in the face of outside aggression is an objective necessity and must not be mixed up with the concepts of jih§d or shah§da. The peaceful spread of a religious message by persuasion and good argument is, whether it is done by men or women, a laudable activity if, and only if, it is done in God’s way. Whether someone dies during such a mission should not matter at all. To seek knowledge and to maintain a family are praiseworthy acts if, and only if, it is done in God’s way. Whether someone dies during his studies or in his job should not matter at all. Women will be rewarded for enduring menstruation and childbirth, whether they die or not. The activist who fights against tyranny and for democracy and social justice surely deserves Paradise, if, and only if, his protest is done in God’s way. Whether he dies during his struggle should not matter. All of these activities, however, are not related to the concept of shahÊd, that is, to witness with your own eyes, nor to shuhad§” as proposed by the Book:

And if you are in doubt as to what We have revealed from time to time to Our servant, then produce a sura like thereunto; and call your witnesses [shuhad§“kum] or helpers (if there are any) besides God, if your

(doubts) are true. (Al-Baqara 2:23)

I called them not to witness [m§ ashhadtuhum] the creation of the heavens and the earth, nor (even) their own creation: nor is it for helpers such as Me to take as lead (men) astray! (Al-Kahf 18:51)

O you who believe! Stand out firmly for God, as witnesses [shuhad§”] to fair dealing... (Al-M§“ida 5:8)

These three verses support our reading of the Book. Not even remotely do they link the act of ‘witnessing’ to being killed on the battlefield or to dying for Allah’s cause. Even if we consider verses that use al-istishh§d, the fuqah§“s term for martyrdom, we still cannot see any connection to violent death:

...and get two witnesses [istashhadå shahÊdain], out of your own men... (Al-Baqara 2:282)

If any of your women are guilty of lewdness, take the evidence of four (reliable) witnesses [istashhadå] from amongst you against them... (Al-Nis§” 4:15)

We still need to clarify the meaning of the phrase ‘in God’s way’ (fÊ sabÊl All§h), which is so often used and abused in the context of the debate about jih§d. Let us first start with the preposition ‘in’ (fÊ). It can be used in basically three different ways:

1. As a preposition of time and place, meaning ‘in’, ‘at’, ‘on’, ‘near’, ‘by’, ‘within’, ‘during’, ‘among’, ‘through’, and such, either literally or metaphorically, for example, ‘Say: “Travel through (fÊ) the earth...”’ (A l-#Ankabåt 29:20) uses fÊ literally within an adverbial clause of place. In ‘so Moses conceived in his mind (fÊ nafsihi) a (sort of) fear’ (•§-H§ 20:67); even though fÊ means literally ‘in’, the fear in Moses’ head is nevertheless not real. Finally,

‘within a few years…’ (Al-Råm 30:4) uses fÊ as a preposition of time.

2. As a preposition of cause, meaning ‘because of’ or ‘for’, for example, the hadÊth says ‘A woman entered Hell because of the cat she imprisoned’,[403] that is, the woman will be punished because of (fÊ) her cruelty to her cat.

3. As a preposition meaning ‘in the company of’ or ‘with’, as in: ‘He will say: “Enter you in the company of (fÊ) the peoples who passed away before you—men and jinns—into the Fire.”

(Al-A#r§f 7:38)

In all three instances, fÊ always points to something that is inside, hidden, or secretly concealed. If we, for example, say ‘I will look into it (fÊhi)’, it indicates that one is keen to discover or disclose what is still hidden or concealed.

The noun sabÊl, often translated as ‘cause’, literally means ‘way’, ‘course’, or ‘means’ and is used in a neutral sense, that is, it can be (theologically) a good or a bad path since the term as such is value free. Its actual nature is determined by either the textual context or explicit attributes, for example, ‘way of God’ or ‘way of evil’:

…it took its course [sabÊlahu] through the sea in a marvellous way! (Al-Kahf 18:63)

Invite (all) to the way of your Lord [sabÊl rabbika] with wisdom and beautiful preaching… (Al-NaÈl 16:125)

In the first verse sabÊl literally means ‘path’, while the second verse uses sabÊl figuratively as ‘way’, in the sense of manner or method. It says ‘way of the Lord’, that is, His manner, method, or doctrine, referring to the straight path of God. But sabÊl can also turn into a ‘way of evil’, that is, of deviation, aberration, and deceit, as we hear in the following verse:

Those who believe fight in the cause of God [fÊ sabÊl All§h], and those who reject faith fight in the cause of evil [fÊ sabÊl al-ã§ghåt]… (Al-Nisa” 4:76)

The phrase ‘in God’s way’[404] (fÊ sabÊl All§h) can be found seventy times in the Book. It first occurs in 2:190: ‘Fight in the cause of God those who fight you, but do not transgress limits; for God loves not transgressors’, and its last 73:20: ‘…yet others fighting in God’s cause…’. In several instances it connotes a fight, struggle, even military battle. In other instances it refers to a struggle for a family’s nafaqa in the form of sustenance, clothing, and shelter. It is often used in c onnection with the term jih§d, less often with the command to ‘travel the world’. In all instances, however, it demands doing something ‘in His way’, that is, according to Allah’s way/method/path. It is not used to demand a human sacrifice for Allah’s cause. The idea that people should sacrifice their and other people’s lives for a higher, divine aim is not found in the Book. ‘Fight in God’s way’ cannot mean ‘kill other people’ or ‘sacrifice yourself for God’. Allah is greater than that anyone should kill for Him.

What does ‘in God’s way’ mean? We believe it means that in the struggle for nafaqa, for example, one should seek money and property in a legal and ethical way. One should not squander things that are permitted, nor should one be parsimonious and forbid what is allowed; one should neither be excessive nor miserly, and one should abstain from what is forbidden. If one abides by these rules, one indeed lives ‘in God’s way’. However, if these rules are broken, one strays from the way of God (sabÊl All§h) and follows on the path of evil (sabÊl al-ã§ghåt):

And spend of your substance in the cause of God [fÊ sabÊl All§h], and make not your own hands contribute to (your) destruction; but do good; for God loves those who do good. (Al-Baqara 2:195)

Those who spend their substance in the cause of God [fÊ sabÊl All§h], and follow not up their gifts with reminders of their generosity or with injury; for them their reward is with their Lord… (Al-Baqara 2:262)
Behold, you are those invited to spend (of your substance) in the way of God [fÊ sabÊl All§h]. But among you are some that are niggardly. But any who are niggardly are so at the expense of their own souls… (MuÈammad 47:38)

These verses ask us to spend sustenance ‘in God’s way’ (fÊ sabÊl All§h). This can be done in many ways: one may nourish and feed the dependents of the family; one may give ßadaq§t and support charitable organisations; one may finance a school, or a nursery, or a clinic—all these things cover ‘sustenance in God’s way’. In contrast, however, it is against ‘God’s way’ to establish security services that terrorise the population; it is against ‘God’s way’ to supply paramilitary organisations with rocket-propelled grenades to shoot down civilian airplanes; it is against ‘God’s way’ to provide militant groups with explosives which they detonate as bombs in crowded market places or on trains containing hundreds of commuters during the rush hour, killing innocent people who have not killed anyone and who have never been involved in any military operation.

Let us also look at the term ·-r-b which has often been misused in the debate about jih§d. What does ·araba ‘in God’s way’ really mean? If we take verses of the Book as evidence, it simply connotes ‘to travel the world’ and ‘to travel fast’ for the purpose of trade, commerce, study, or research, as it is stated in the following verse:

O you who believe! When [idh§] you go abroad in the cause of God [·arabtum fÊ sabÊl All§h], investigate carefully, and say not to any one who offers you a salutation: “You are none of a believer!”, coveting the perishable goods of this life… (Al-Nis§” 4:94)

Three things can be deduced from how the above verse uses ·araba ‘in God’s way’:

1. The particle idh§ in 4:94 (if, when) expresses a fulfillable condition ‘when you go abroad in the cause of God’; there is no doubt about the possibility of going abroad and travelling the world. The ‘when’ particle is like the idh§ in the verse ‘when (idh§) the sun (with its spacious light) is folded up…’ (A l-TakwÊr 81:1), expressing a condition that is inevitably and naturally fulfilled. This is not the case if we assume the verse to mean ‘killing or going to war in God’s way’, simply because peace is the base condition of life while war is an exception to it. Wars do not happen because they are inevitable, natural, or essential to human life. They are rather accidental and anomalous, destroying the normal rhythm of social life. An interpretation of d-r-b as ‘to kill’ would, therefore, not comply with the need to have a fulfillable condition required by idh§.

2. The second part of 4:94 orders the believers not to reject greetings from a nonbeliever by saying, ‘you are not a believer’ [AH]. But exegetes, in forcing a militant interpretation upon the verse and by seeking textual support for the so-called sword verses of Sårat a l-Tawba, claimed to see not the expression of a greeting in al-sal§m, but rather the offering of peace (after a military struggle). We absolutely reject this interpretation because al-sal§m refers to a greeting (‘Peace be with you’) in normal encounters of everyday life, and therefore it is not an offer of peace negotiations or a plea to save one’s life when facing death by a Muslim warrior.[405] We also think it is more plausible to render the phrase لست مؤمناً not as ‘you are not a believer’

(mu”min[an]) but rather as ‘you are not safe or secure’ (mu”ammanan), because the Arabic term mu”min[an] (believer) can also be read as mu”amman[an] (safe, secure).[406] Be that as it may, what we want to stress is that the exegetes' hawkish reading of the verse can be thoroughly countered by a much more peaceful interpretation.

3. The verse concludes by linking the act of 'going abroad in God's way' with the possibility to do it 'out of desire for the chance gains in this life' [AH]. We believe that these 'chance gains in this life' entail the pursuit of studies, the participation in conferences, the development of business relations, meeting partners in trade and commerce, even tourism. Traditional exegetes have claimed that this verse speaks negatively about the 'ephemeral goods of this life' which are incompatible with the believers' quest for guidance and faith. But we believe that the Arabic text (#ara· a l-Èay§t a l-duny§) does not allow such a negative rendering.[407]

We have shown that the phrase ·arabtum fÊ sabÊl All§h in 4:94 should not be rendered to mean a belligerent 'fight in God's way'. We propose as an alternative rendering 'to travel the world in God's way', in which the association with war and violent conflict is entirely eliminated. The adverbial clause 'in God's way' defines how one should go about things, stipulating a condition that must be met if something is done 'in God's way'. The most important characteristic of human interaction 'in God's way' is to speak fairly and gently and to invite people with wisdom and eloquent preaching to live a Godcentred life:

...speak fair to the people... (Al-Baqara 2:83)

Invite (all) to the way of your Lord [sabÊl rabbika] with wisdom and beautiful preaching... (Al-NaÈl 16:125)

To 'travel the world' means to leave home, while the one who travels is a muh§jir. Verse 4:100 proves that hijra does not connote exile and life as an armed renegade, soldier, or guerrilla fighter because such a dangerous muh§jir would never find 'many a refuge, wide and spacious':

He who forsakes his home (man yuh§jir) in the cause of God (fÊ sabÊl All§h), finds in the earth many a refuge, wide and spacious… (A l-Nis§” 4:100)

To ‘travel the world in God’s way’ means to do business peacefully with the rest of the world. The condition is to do it ‘in God’s way’. Owners of global companies must forsake their monopoly over the market if they want to do business in God’s way. Salespeople must stop cheating and looking for a quick profit if they want to sell their products in God’s way. Producers of groceries and dairy products must stop adulterating their food with unhealthy substances if they want to provide the supermarkets with products in God’s way. Joiners, tailors, carpenters, plumbers, painters, and so on, all need to practice their trades diligently and competently without overcharging their customers if they want to do things in God’s way. Surely, one does not need to be a resistance fighter if one wants to ‘travel the world in God’s way”!

According to the Book istishh§d does not mean martyrdom but rather ‘to give evidence as an eyewitness’ (2:282; 4:15). How is it possible that this term lost its Qur’anic meaning? We believe that the semantic shift occurred after MuÈammad’s (ß) death. We know that the Prophet (ß) classified jih§d as either great or small. The greater jihad, he said, is the struggle of the soul against its animalistic passions and cravings. The smaller jih§d is armed defence in the event of external aggression. In the later works of fiqh, however, jih§d becomes a technical term for armed conflict with unbelievers. Unbelievers had to be fought until they accepted Islam, and if they refused, they should be killed. Jih§d, in this technical sense, was then qualified by the phrase ‘fight in God’s way’ by which it adopted the meaning of ‘to kill in God’s way in the fight against unbelievers’. Jih§d, originally expressing the notion of self-defence, was finally linked to the offensive concept of ‘conquest’ through raids (ghazwa). This was then retrospectively applied to MuÈammad’s military actions, which were all identified as ‘conquests’, thus contradicting the historical evidence that they were in fact defensive battles of survival (and this includes the battle of Tabåk).[408] This identification of jih§d with conquest is unacceptable. The meaning attached to the terms conquest or invasion is always pejorative. There are no positive or beneficial conquests. We say, ‘Hitler’s Germany conquered France during the Second World War’, and the word conquest gives Germany’s war a negative and aggressive connotation. We also say, ‘The French fought against the German invasion’, by which we attach a positive significance to the fight of the French (against the invasion). The term ghazwa was taken from the vocabulary of J§hiliyya Arabs. They regularly carried out raids into neighbouring tribes, seeking booty by extremely violent means. In flagrant contradiction with the Qur’anic term jih§d, the fuqah§“s revived this aggressive concept of conquest and projected its meaning on the concept of a defensive battle. In order to do so, the jurists had to produce a semantic transformation of a whole list of terms in the Book: shah§da, shahÊd, istishh§d, shuhad§”, ·araba, fÊ sabÊl All§h, and such; by which the true (irenic) meaning was stripped off and a false (belligerent) meaning put on, and hence constructing an Islamic concept of ‘conquest’ (which in reality was the old tribal notion of an offensive raid). As a result, the shuhad§” of the Book were turned into soldiers of Islam and a shahÊd was turned into a fanatical warrior who falls heroically on the battlefield (this in spite of the fact that a shahÊd needs to be alive and ceases to be a shahÊd when he dies).

The decline of political culture in the Arab-Muslim world started immediately after MuÈammad’s (ß) death. It was triggered by the political crisis caused by the caliphate of #Uthm§n b. a l-#Aff§n. His leadership had alienated a growing number of people who eventually demanded his removal from power. #Uthm§n’s reluctance to give up power and to hold on to it as long as he could caused the breakdown of political culture which eventually led to #Uthm§n being killed by his opponents. We see in this event the beginning of a fatal development of political corruption: the rulers’ fear of assassination by their opponents; the tendency to hold on to power for as long as possible; the frustration of political opposition leading to calls for violent resistance; lack of democracy, plurality, and a will to reform. We can identify five aspects that were decisive for the deterioration of political culture in the Arab-Muslim world and for the emergence of the concept of ‘martyrdom’ in Islamic thought:

1. The confusion over the term ‘consultation’ (al-shår§):

…who (conduct) their affairs by mutual consultation; who spend out of what We bestow on them for sustenance. (A l-Shår§ 42:38)

Despite the clear ruling of the Book that consultation has to be mutual and consensual, shår§ came to be understood as the ruler's prerogative to allow his subjects to voice discontent which he was, however, free to ignore. In contrast to a true open and democratic system of mutual consultation, as practised by the Prophet (ß) who accepted collective decisions even if they did not reflect his own views, shår§ was reduced to a means of identifying potential critics of the regime. If people dared to articulate views that threatened the ruler's position they were eventually silenced by imprisonment and torture.

2. The emergence of the concept of 'dispatching' / 'sending of' (al-tasyÊr): This was practiced in two ways, 1) by escorting a group of critics to the ruler's palace where, intimidated and frightened by the presence of fully armed guards, they had to listen to the views of the despot without been given the chance to respond; 2) by sending them ('unescorted') as soldiers to the front where they had to fight, and die, alongside the troops of professional ghazwa warriors. For their comfort and psychological assurance, they were made to believe that their fight was a form of jih§d. This convinced the warriors, who fought bloody wars, that they were in fact muj§hidÊn. It did not take long for this ideological dilemma to lead to a confusion between ghazwa and jih§d. Historical documents show that this terminological confusion occurred in the transition period between the era of the rightly guided caliphs and the beginning of Umayyad rule. By the time that Islamic fiqh emerged, a clear distinction between ghazwa and jih§d had already completely disappeared. The muj§hidÊn were subsequently defined as 'warriors for the cause of Allah' and shuhad§" became the 'martyrs of Islam' who were given a guaranteed entry-ticket to Paradise.

3. The practice of eviction:

To force people to leave their houses and send them into exile has become a favourite way to silence critics of the regime.

4. Manipulation by bribery:

If the above three methods did not yield the expected results, tactics had to change. After having being kept in abject poverty for a humiliatingly long period of time, critics were suddenly showered with money, goods, and all sorts of privileges. The aim was to corrupt their souls by asking them to join the ranks of the mercenaries who yearned after the booty gained in the most recent raids and who became rich by amassing the plundered goods of foreign peoples. And who would listen to the criticisms of a corrupted soul?

5. Physical elimination:

The last and final solution when all other strategies have failed.

Our point of contention is this fatal confusion of power politics and religious doctrine. As a result, a political (!) doctrine of jih§d emerged that justified the military conquest of foreign cultures. It justified, in religious (!) terms, the sacrifice of soldiers and the political elimination of opponents by declaring the enemy infidels and the fallen soldiers martyrs. The peaceful sermon that wanted to persuade people, in a good and convincing argument, to follow the path of God was abandoned in favour of parading the military might of brutal warriors. The Book's call to 'travel the world in God's way' turned into a pretext to 'spread Islam by the sword' which, in fact, was just another ideological pretext for looting and plundering foreign villages and cities. As usual, the prophetical ÈadÊths were used to replace the peaceful message of the Book with a more bellicose rendering that legitimised the political goals of the regimes. Just look at how exegetes interpreted the politically neutral (read: purely soteriological) term 'victory':

Verily We have granted you a manifest victory. (Al-FatÈ 48:1)

When comes the help of God, and victory. (Al-Naßr 110:1)

For no reason whatsoever fatÈ, in conjunction with naßr in 110:1, became in both verses Allah’s description of MuÈammad’s (ß) conquest of Mecca in 630. This interpretation ignores the fact that in 48:2–3, the text clearly specifies why the Prophet (ß) was granted success or victory;[409] namely, that he had secured four things from God: a) His forgiveness of sins; b) His grace; c) His guidance to the straight path; and d) His powerful help. Nothing supports the connection made by the exegetes between the conquest of Mecca and Allah’s granting of these four things. The error of the exegetes is even more obvious if we look at other verses that use the term fatÈ:

In the God is our trust. Our Lord! Decide you [iftaÈ] between us and our people in truth, for you are the best to decide. (Al-A#r§f 7:89)

If the people of the towns had but believed and feared God, We should indeed have opened out [la-fataÈn§] to them (all kinds of) blessings from heaven and earth… (Al-A#r§f 7:96)

Yet you [Prophet] will see the perverse at heart rushing to them for protection, saying, ‘We are afraid fortune may turn against us.’ But God may well bring about a triumph [bi’l-fatÈ] or some other event of His own making: then they will rue the secrets they harboured in their hearts. (Al-M§“ida 5:52, AH)

The first verse employs the imperative iftaÈ (‘you decide’) in the sense of God’s command; the second verse uses fataÈn§ (‘we opened out’) to refer to God’s blessing; while the third uses fatÈ (‘victory’)[410] to suggest the possibility of reconciliation or peacemaking with ‘those in whose hearts is a disease’. What on earth made exegetes think that these verses describe military activities and success on the battlefield? We fear that medieval commentators allowed their ideological agenda to hijack the nonbellicose connotations of the Book. How else can we explain why they understood al-fataÈ al-#aíÊm as a reference to a situation of war, that is, to the siege of a town by an army and to the imminent demolition of its walls by the attacking forces, in the following verse?

Say: “Our Lord will gather us together and will in the end decide the matter between us (and you) in truth [bi’l-Èaqq] and justice [wa-håwa al-fataÈ al-#aíÊm]...” (Saba’ 34:26)

Let us finally explore whether 3:169 really justifies martyrdom in the name of Islam. We will first quote the verse in full and then attach our commentary summarised in five points:

[Prophet], do not think [la taÈsabanna] of those who have been killed in God’s way [alladhÊn qutilå fÊ sabÊl All§h] as dead. They are alive with their Lord [#inda rabbihim], well provided for. ($l #Imr§n 3:169, AH]

1. The verse mentions ‘those who have been killed in God’s way’ (alladhÊn qutilå fÊ sabÊl All§h). Death in God’s way can be caused by a multitude of reasons. We believe that it is inexcusable to reduce this only to death on the battlefield. The ÈadÊth of MuÈammad (ß) cites over ten different types of people who are killed in God’s way. These types can be applied, if removed from the narrow context of seventh-century Arabia, to almost all inhabitants of this world. However, in order to be real shuhad§”, the condition is that they are alive. If they are killed and given their lives for the defence of their shah§da, they must not have killed anyone for this and should not have purposefully intended to be dead! We heard the condition stated in the Book that a shahÊd is an eyewitness who must be alive. If he dies, his witness ends and after which, as the example of Jesus tells us, God takes over as ‘watcher’ and ‘witness’ (5:117).[411]

2. If we accept a literal reading of 3:169 (‘those who have been killed are still alive with their Lord’), and thus follow the exegetes, we would commit the sin of anthropomorphism. Moreover, we would contradict logic. If we, for example, understand literally that those killed in God’s way are not really dead but live ‘with their Lord’, we would assume that they physically found a place ‘with Him’. Such a reading not only anthropomorphizes God, it also divinises mortal souls, and both of these things are theologically untenable. The notion that these people are only seemingly dead also contradicts the clear evidence of the decay of their bodies in the grave. It is absurd to claim that they possess ‘holy’ bodies which remain fresh and free from any decomposition until the Day of Judgement, when evidence proves the opposite.

3. For a correct interpretation of 3:169 we must avoid the confusion between ‘soul’ and ‘spirit’. It is the soul (nafs) that returns to dust, that is, to its original state (‘It is God that takes the souls (of men) at death…’, A l-Zumar 39:47). But the spirit (råÈ) returns—not necessarily ascends—to God, its Creator, who breathed it into His creatures when they developed into rational human beings who are able to think in abstract terms. Death has, therefore, two meanings: 1) a material, physical meaning that implies decay and decomposition (‘every soul shall have a taste of death…’, Al-Anbiy§” 21:35); and 2) the symbolic, figurative meaning of absence or lack of something, for example, of light when ‘death’ means darkness: ‘Is a dead person brought back to life by Us, and given light with which to walk among people, comparable to someone trapped in deep darkness who cannot escape?…’ (Al-An#§m 6:122, AH). While the first meaning is covered by the term mawt (real death), the second meaning is contained in the term waf§” (absence).

4. Verse 3:169 starts with an imperative: ‘Think not!’ The Arabic la taÈsabanna is derived from the verb Èasiba, used here negatively in the sense of ‘to be deluded’ or ‘to wrongly assume’. In this sense it is used forty-five times in the Book, indicating that something is really different from how it appears on the surface:

Think not [l§ taÈsabanna] that God does not heed the deeds of those who do wrong… (Ibr§hÊm 14:42)

Does man think [a-yaÈsab] that We cannot assemble his bones? (Al-Qiy§ma 75:3)

The imperative, ‘Think not!’, in 3:169 is intended to correct a misconception of death. The verbal format l§ taÈsabanna (3rd pers. sing.), even though formally directed at the Prophet (ß) only, actually addresses all human beings, men and women. With His rebuke, Allah wants to forbid His noble Prophet (ß) from assuming that those killed in God’s way are dead while they are in reality alive (for Him). He wants MuÈammad (ß) to understand that both life and death must not always be understood literally or physically; that someone whom our eyes cannot see and our hands cannot touch could still be (with God, i.e., in His eyes) alive. If life and death were to be physically or biologically understood in 3:169, its message (‘they are alive’) would be a lie because our human senses would contradict it—which is categorically impossible.

In sum, to understand this verse to mean that those who are killed on the battlefield spreading the religion of Islam by the sword are not really dead, since their bodies will not decay and since they and their unharmed bodies will find a space near God, is as ridiculous as it is dangerous. It is a fundamental misreading of every single word of this verse, and exegetes who do so must be accused of anthropomorphism, literalism, and an over-reliance on the military history of nascent Islam. In this section it was our aim to identify the verses that have been illegitimately loaded with the semantics of war and we hope that we have given sufficient evidence for this. In the next section we will study the verses that must be read within the context of killing in Allah’s way.

 Fight (al-qit§l)

The Arabic term qit§l consists of four radicals (q-t-a-l). It is derived from the four-radical verb

q§tala which belongs to the same verb form (f§#la) as verbs such as j§dala (to contest), kh§ßama (to quarrel), sh§raka (to share) and b§ya#a (to make a contract). The long § in qit§l is—as with the long § in jih§d—not accidental, as some have claimed, but rather essential to the word's meaning. To ignore the long § in qit§l has serious implications and would create even more harm than if it was neglected in the word a l-jih§d. This is because if we took q§tala as a synonym for qatala (the first verb form without a long §), the meaning of 'to fight' (q§tala) would turn into 'to kill' (qatala), which, as we will explain in this section, would be a serious misunderstanding of the term.

Together with its many verbal cognates, the noun qit§l occurs seventy-one times in the Book. It is first mentioned in 2:190[412] and last mentioned in 73:20.[413] It connotes a violent clash between two opposing sides, either two individuals or two groups of people. If only one side seeks to fight while the other refuses to fight, the resulting collision cannot be called qit§l, as we read in the following verse:

"Should you stretch your hand out to kill me [li-taqtulanÊ], I will not stretch my hand out to kill you [li-aqtulak[a]] [414]; for I fear Allah, Lord of the worlds." (Al-M§"ida 5:28, MF)

This implies that if one side does not commit itself to a fight and withdraws, while the other side keeps fighting, it becomes a one-sided battle (i.e., qatala). A fight is also one-sided if it is initiated by one side (the aggressor) while its opponent is not given a chance to respond. This is the case with suicide missions in Iraq and elsewhere in which innocent, defenceless people are attacked by an unknown, armed aggressor. Such missions are premeditated collective killings in a one-sided fight, because they are planned deliberately to give the ambushed victims no chance to either defend themselves or to fight back.

<right>

The best description of qit§l can be found in the following verse:

</right>

Fighting is prescribed for you [kutiba #alaikum al-qit§l], and you dislike it [wa-huwa kurh[un] lakum]. (Al-Baqara 2:216)

This verse states that the obligation to fight is one of the hardest duties to fulfil. The phrase ‘and you dislike it’ means that a human soul will find it naturally very distressing to fight and kill anyone. To fight, therefore, must be seen as a last resort when all other means to solve a conflict have been exhausted. And yet, ‘to fight’ has been prescribed as a duty by Allah, similar to His order to fast[415] and to exact retribution.[416] It is a religious obligation that, like any other obligation, only the rational and sane person may fulfil. Some exegetes have claimed that it is an individual duty to which everyone must comply. Others have claimed that it was only a duty for the Prophet (ß) and his companions and is, therefore, not applicable any longer. The latter view is driven by the fear of admitting that Islam prescribes fighting as a religious duty. The truth is that ‘to fight’ has been glossed as jih§d, and ‘to fight in God’s way’ has become mixed up with the notion of military conquest. The first error occurred when ‘to fight’ (al-qit§l) was defined as the essence of the ill-named ‘smaller jih§d’ (as it was incorrectly called by the Prophet). The second, more dangerous mistake was made, when ‘smaller jih§d’ was given an exclusively military connotation: ‘to fight’ (qit§l) turned into ‘to kill’ (qatl), which was then associated with the military battles for the expansion of the Islamic empire. Once again, this terminological confusion was caused by the exegetes’ failure to distinguish between the verses of messengerhood and prophethood in the Book. The exegetes ignored the fact that the stories of MuÈammad’s (ß) military expeditions belong to the verses of prophethood and do not possess legislative authority.

It will be necessary therefore to first point out the difference between jih§d and ‘to fight’ (qit§l). In the previous section we learned that jih§d comprises many activities that are not in any way militant, such as the duty to seek knowledge wherever you are, to provide maintenance and sustenance for your family, to suffer the pain of menstruation, to provide guardianship for a woman, to resist the temptations of your carnal soul, to be steadfast in the face of great challenges, and so forth. None of these things involve throwing stones or firing rocket grenades; they can be achieved without resorting to physical violence and are indeed the opposite of armed conflicts. This is in sharp contrast to ‘fight’ in the sense of qit§l which, by definition, implies the use of violence to resolve a conflict when all other means have failed. Examples of such fights are given by the Book: both fights between individuals[417] and battles between large armies (e.g., the battles of Badr, UÈud, Khaybar, and a l-•§“if). All these fights are reported as historic events, like the stories about Moses and Noah, and are thus just ‘Qur’anic stories’ which do not belong to the verses of messengerhood. This makes it possible to regard Allah’s order ‘to fight’ as an individual duty that is valid at all times and places (‘fighting is prescribed for you, and you dislike it’, 2:216). This is different from the so-called sword verse (‘then fight and slay the pagans wherever you find them’, 9:5) because the command to fight here is historically qualified. Whereas the former verse contains an order to fight that has universal validity, the latter verse gives an order that is applicable only in a very specific historical context and should not be universally applied.

It is astonishing to see how consistently the fuqah§” have inflicted a military intention on the Book’s vocabulary. Dogmatically using the notion of synonymity, they equated al-fatÈ (opening) with al-Èarb (war), jih§d with fight, and fight with raiding (ghazwa). Their ill-conceived theory of abrogation meant that later Medinan verses, such as 9:5, are thought to repeal earlier Meccan verses, as a consequence of which the sword replaced peaceful persuasion in the believers’ ‘fight in God’s way’. This was in addition to the fuqah§“s flagrant attempts to totally eradicate the original meanings, for example, when they invented completely new fiqh terminology (such as the notion of an ‘offensive jih§d’) that has increasingly conditioned our understanding of the original terms.[418] Such innovations, enforced to eliminate the Book’s authentic meanings, have often been legitimised by reference to the existence of a consensus (al-ijm§#) among our honourable scholars—as if that would mean anything! Not that it is wrong to achieve a consensus on matters of the Book and to come to an agreement on how to apply it during a specific period of time and in a specific type of society. But it is fundamentally wrong to take an ijm§” that was achieved by a circle of scholars in one of the early centuries of Islam and propound it as a source of legislation binding for all future generations of Muslims, eternally valid until the Last Hour! Such eternal validity of a ijm§# gives human beings (e.g., scholars of the ninth to tenth centuries) an immortality that, strictly, can only be attributed to God. It ignores the simple fact that human societies constantly progress and that conditions of life always change. It ignores the fact that new developments will inevitably overturn old consensuses, and that new parties, groups, and movements will emerge that question old certainties and undermine the agreements of the past. This is not to mention the romanticist, utopian bias in the scholars’ conception of ijm§#, because such a comprehensive consensus is notoriously difficult to achieve. Societies possess complex structures of human organisations whose complexities cannot possibly be reduced or eliminated except by despotic, authoritarian force. Open societies have pluralistic, heterogeneous, and multifarious structures, producing myriads of different views and opinions that make it impossible to achieve a communal consensus. What the notion of ijm§# disguises is the historical truth that the ‘consensus of the umma’ has never amounted to more than the agreement of a few privileged scholars who declare their own views as sacrosanct while dismissing divergent views as ‘heretical’. It also ignores the possibility that even an absolute consensus can still be wrong. The fact that in Israel there used to be a national consensus to occupy the territory of Palestine did not make the occupation right or sacrosanct, and the beginning of an internal opposition in Israel to the occupation proves that one-time overwhelming majorities are only temporary and can never be eternally maintained. We must relinquish this romanticist and utopian notion of ijm§# by acknowledging the historical truth that legislative decisions have always been made by an intellectual elite—whether they represent a majority or minority—and that it can never attain immortality or infallibility. What might be right and good for one specific historical situation could be disastrous in another, and what has been harmful and regressive in an earlier period might be fruitful and beneficial in a later one, which is best illustrated by the example of the Mu#tazila.[419]

The act of fighting is, as 2:216 says, an obligation that is part of the human disposition, even though it is naturally disliked by everyone. This instinctive aversion to fight is imprinted (maktåb) into human nature, perhaps, similar to the monthly cycle of women as we hear about it in the prophetical ÈadÊth,[420] or the survival instinct of human beings (who come to the fore regardless of how we feel about it). The phrase '…and you dislike it' means that fighting is unnatural; it means that humans must be fore against their will to fight (and use violence to kill their opponents).[421] Nonetheless, the phrase 'it is prescribed to you' implies a religious obligation that every human being has to fulfil, like the obligation to fast ('fasting is prescribed to you…', 2:183) or the obligation of answering 'like with like' in response to murder ('the law of equality is prescribed to you in case of murder…', 2:178), and this in spite of the fact that human beings naturally show great aversion to such acts and would instinctively avoid them as much as they could.

The universal nature of 'fighting is prescribed to you' contradicts the view that fighting was only an obligation for the Prophet (ß) and his companions. Since fighting is a natural disposition (inasmuch as the dislike of it) it is generally applicable to everyone; and indeed, a dislike of fighting has been observed with people who lived long before MuÈammad (ß) ('He [MuÈammad] said: "Is it not possible, if you were commanded to fight, that you will not fight?", Al-Baqara 2:246). A dislike for fighting will be part of our constitution until the Last Hour. Such universality does not square with the common view that fighting is only a so-called collective or representative duty (al-kif§ya) which is fulfilled by only a few people for the benefit of all. The verse says 'it is prescribed to you (lakum)', implying all of us, because 'to you' does not pertain to a specific group of people but rather includes everyone who lived before or after the Prophet (ß). If the duty to fight was only a collective duty, as some fuqah§" have claimed, we should then apply the same thinking to the preceding verse 2:215, that is, a few people should pay charity for the benefit of all—which would be rather absurd.[422]

God made 'aversion to fight' a natural disposition, and that includes 'dislike for killing' and carrying out any other destructive act. And yet His revelation made it incumbent upon every human being to fight if they need to (‘Fighting is ordained for you, though you dislike it…’, AH). After having explained the conditions for such necessary fights, the Book issues several verses with the imperative ‘Fight!’, calling people to action (even though they dislike it). There is no reason to assume that the command ‘Fight!’ (Ar. q§tilå) is only directed at a select few, since the plural form of the verb q§tilå suggests that it is addressed at all humankind. In their deliberate effort to impose a military connotation upon the text, the fuqah§” believed that ‘Fight!’ addresses only a few, that is, the army of the Islamic empire that fought wars on behalf of the entire community. Such interpretations, of course, say more about the historical (medieval and premodern) context of our scholars, in which military castes such as the Mamluks, Turks, and Janissaries held the upper hand and saw their military aggression justified by the fuqah§“s’ readings of the Qur’an, more than about the actual meaning of verses in the Book.

The Aims and Objectives of Fighting

We know that when the Book talks about victory in 48:1 (‘Verily We have granted you a manifest victory (fatÈ[an]).’), the two verses that follow give four objectives of this victory: to provide for God’s, a) forgiveness, b) grace, c) guidance to the straight path, and d) powerful help.[423] We also know that when the Book in 49:13 refers to God’s creation of humankind into ‘male and female, nations and tribes’, it also attaches the divine rationale to it ‘that you may know each other (not that you may despise (each other))’.[424] The same applies to the Book’s other instructions to fast, pray, do the pilgrimage, believe in God and His Messenger (ß), and so forth, which are all introduced along with their purpose (e.g., to show God’s mercy, to purify the believers’ souls, etc.). It is therefore surprising that God’s order to fight (2:216) is given without any explanation of its aims. Surely, it cannot imply that there is no divine rationale for the command. It only means that we have to look elsewhere, and we believe that the Book provides these three objectives: 1) so that God’s word reigns supreme; 2) so that the earth is protected from destruction; and 3) so that the house of the Lord is preserved against destruction. These objectives can be found in the following three verses:

If you help not (your leader), (it is no matter): for God did indeed help him, when the unbelievers drove him out: he had no more than one companion; they two were in the cave, and he said to his companion, “Have no fear, for God is with us”: then God sent down His peace upon him, and strengthened him with forces which you saw not, and humbled to the depths the word of the unbelievers. But the word of God is exalted to the heights [kalimat All§h hiya a l-#uly§]: for God is exalted in might, wise. (Al-Tawba 9:40)

…And did not God check one set of people by means of another [wa-lau-l§ daf #[u] All§h al-n§s ba#·ahum bi-ba#·[in]], the earth would indeed be full of mischief. But God is full of bounty to all the worlds. (A l-Baqara 2:251)

…Did not God check one set of people by means of another [wa-laul§ daf #[u] All§h al-n§s ba#·ahum bi-ba#·[in]], they would surely have been pulled down monasteries, churches, synagogues, and mosques, in which the name of God is commemorated in abundant measure ... (Al-\ajj 22:40)

First aim: the exaltation of God’s word

Since verse 40 of Sårat al-Tawba has often been used to justify sectarian strife, partisan spirit, and religious chauvinism, we need to have a closer look at it in our discussion of the aims of fighting. The verse discusses three things: first, MuÈammad’s (ß) and Abå Bakr’s (r) flight from Mecca; second, the battle of Badr; and third, the divine rationale that lies behind the violent conflicts of that period. The problem with 9:40 lies in the phrase ‘the word of God is exalted to the heights’ because exegetes have found it difficult to explain what ‘the word of God’ (kalimat All§h) means. Kalima (word) is a singular noun whose plural can either mean ‘speech’ (if it is the collective plural kal§m)[425] or ‘existence’, that is, the laws of objective reality (if the plural is kalim§t). [426] It certainly cannot refer to the first part of the shah§da

(‘there is no god but God’) as many exegetes have believed, because such a rendering would make no sense in the context of many other verses of the Book, such as 3:45[427] and 10:33.[428] Instead, the shah§da (‘there is no god but God’) is part of God’s speech (kal§m), as laid out in the Book—of which its readers either approve or disapprove—but God’s words (kalim§t) are the laws of the universe that are there unconditionally—whether people approve or disapprove of them. (“And God by His words (bi-kalim§tihi) does prove and establish His truth, however much the sinners may hate it!” Yånus 10:82). If the shah§da (‘there is no god but God’) were one of God’s words (kalim§t) it would mean that it has become objective reality, implying that we are all monotheists and that we would not find a single idolater or disbeliever in the whole world.

In the context of 9:40 and 2:216 we notice that the ultimate aim of any fight is to establish God’s word in the world. The words of God (kalim§t) yield all the distinctive marks that God has provided for us, rational human beings, since they represent all the laws of objective reality that nobody can remove or undo. Allah has explained these laws in their totality, and because of this His words have become reality. God has given His words to men and jinn who perceive them as the ultimate expression of freedom. Free will, a selfdetermined quest for a better life, and the choice of religion and ideological conviction are the most important features of the freedom that lies in God’s words. By their predisposition to act like free men, people will (naturally) implement justice and equality; and yet in a society where personal freedom and the notion of free will are absent, the intuitive inclination towards justice and equality will be inhumanely blocked. We understand justice as legal fairness in the spirit of verse 4:58,[429] and equality as equality before the law. This equality does not mean absolute equality where everyone possesses the same amount of money or property. Such was the futile dream of communism that is as utopian and unrealistic as it is counterproductive to all the natural urges to work that human beings possess.

Our notion of justice is different from the notion of a just despot— so much cherished in the Arab-Muslim world—a notion which, to say the least, is illusionary and in the realm of politics reflects an inexcusable naivety.

The Book’s position is clear on this since it defines ‘fight in God’s way’ (a l-qit§l fÊ sabÊl All§h) as a struggle against tyranny and despotism:

Those who believe fight in the cause of God [yuq§tilån fÊ sabÊl All§h], and those who reject faith fight in the cause of evil [yuq§tilån fÊ sabÊl a l-ã§ghåt].[430] So fight you against the friends of Satan; feeble indeed is the cunning of Satan. (Al-Nis§” 4:76)

For a believer, any fight in God’s way is a fight against what those who reject faith represent: al-ã§ghåt, the cause of evil, that is, tyranny and despotism. This implies that any other category of fight, if it is not directed against tyranny and despotism, is—by definition—not a fight in God’s way.

One decisive feature of any fight in God’s way is that it does not tolerate any form of compulsion in questions of religion. We hear in the Book:

Let there be no compulsion in religion [l§ ikr§h fi’l-dÊn]. Truth stands out clear from error; whoever rejects evil [fa-man yakfur bi”-l-ã§ghåt] and believes in God has grasped the most trustworthy hand-hold that never breaks. And God hears and knows all things. (Al-Baqara 2:256)

The verse identifies ‘no compulsion in religion’ as an essential part of people’s faith in God, while at the same time it associates compulsion and force with those who allow tyranny and despotic rule. The Arabic term for tyranny (al-ã§ghåt) expresses, like other nouns of the f§#ål group such as ‘cleaver’ (s§ãår) or ‘counter’ (È§såb), the notion of a prolonged and oft-repeated activity; a counter, for example, repeatedly carries out arithmetical operations, a cleaver repeatedly cuts through wood or meat—both things are done more than just once. The same applies to tyranny, which is not just an isolated event in history but a frequent phenomenon of political absolutism throughout the entire human history. And yet, we learn that the ultimate aim of humankind is #ib§diyya (the worship of God), not #ubådiyya (the life of slaves): ‘I have only created Jinns and men, that they may serve Me’ (Al-Dh§riyy§t 51:56). The phrase ‘that they may serve Me’ means ‘that they worship Me’, not ‘that they may be slaves’! To worship God means to obey Him freely or to disobey Him freely. In contrast to the much-too-narrow understanding of worship by the fuqah§” only as performance of rituals (prayer, fasting, pilgrimage, zak§h, etc.), #ib§diyya (the worship of God) is a much wider concept and includes many activities of people’s daily life. Worship of God in no way means just servitude symbolised in one’s outward (ritualistic) expression of slavish submission (e.g., through prostration in prayers) since that would turn worshippers (al-#ubb§d) into slaves (al-#abÊd). This would, linguistically and theologically, be a grave error.

The Arabic term #ubb§d is the plural of #§bid (worshipper) which has a second plural: #§bidån, for example, ‘Nor will you worship (#§bidån) that which I worship’ (Al-K§firån 109:3).[431] The Arabic term #abÊd, in contrast, is the plural of #abd (slave) which implies captivity, servitude, and the absence of freedom. The difference between the two terms is that whereas the worshipper (#§bid) is free to choose and exercise free will, the slave (#abd) is deprived not only of property but also of free will and any freedom of choice. We have to understand that worship of God (#ib§diyya) is expressed both as obedience and disobedience. (‘Say: “If (God) most gracious had a son, I would be the first to worship”’ A l-Zukhruf 43:81). The noun #ib§da (acts of worship), derived from #ib§diyya, is thus auto-antonymic as it hosts two meanings that directly contradict each other (obedience ↔ disobedience). Because of this auto-antonymity, the common interpretation of #ib§da as rituals of worship (performed in mosques, churches, and synagogues) is too simplistic. To worship God means, instead, to position yourself vis-à-vis God—obediently or disobediently—in all spheres of life: at work, at home, in the supermarket, in schools, hospitals, factories, football stadiums, and so on. Consequently, the word ‘mosque’ (al-masjid) should not be reduced to mean ‘place where people perform rituals’. According to the Book it has a much wider meaning:

In houses, which God has permitted to be raised to honour, for the celebration, in them, of His name: In them is He glorified in the mornings and in the evenings, (again and again). * By men whom neither traffic nor merchandise can divert from the remembrance of God, nor from regular prayer, nor from the practice of regular charity. Their (only) fear is for the Day when hearts and eyes will be transformed (in a world wholly new). (Al-Når 24:36–37)

We thus learn that mosques are ‘houses, which God permitted to be raised to honour, for the celebration, in them, of His name’. This definition may include prayers and the collection of alms, but the term #ib§da covers more than just these rituals. The Book says:

Verily, I am God: There is no god but I: So serve you Me (only), and establish regular prayer for celebrating My praise. (•§-H§” 20:14)

Verse 20:14 links the phrase ‘so serve Me’ (fa-a#budnÊ) with the command to ‘establish regular prayer’ (fa-aqim al-ßal§t) by the conjunction ‘and’, that is, #ib§da and prayer, meaning that the two cannot be the same thing (hence, #ib§da cannot be explained only by prayer).

Allah’s commands and prohibitions in the Book were revealed to free men and women. ‘There is no compulsion in religion’ means that men and women are worshippers (a l-#ubb§d), not slaves (a l-#abÊd). By their own will, they either accept Allah’s commands or reject them. Reward and punishment are measured according to people’s acceptance and rejection and will be issued on the Day of Judgement. Nevertheless, people must obey the law of the state and respect its constitution.

The companions of the Prophet (ß) understood the difference between worship and slavery. It is reported that when #Umar b. al-Khaãã§b heard that a man prayed all night in the mosque and did also not leave it during the day, he asked, ‘When does he eat?’ He was told, ‘A brother of his feeds him and even feeds his family.’ #Umar then said, ‘He worships God more than his brother!’ and ‘He should not be his brother’s slave!’ This supports our thesis that slavish servitude (#ubådiyya) is neither necessary nor desirable, but if such slavish relationships exist (e.g., in a partnership or as forced labour) this should not be seen as a reflection of the relationship between God and His creation. Instead, God’s relationship to human beings is characterised by the fact that humans enjoy the freedom to choose between obedience and disobedience. Jih§d and fighting in God’s way are, then, the struggle of human beings to achieve this basic freedom of choice that is reflected in their freedom to choose whatever religious creed or humanistic belief they want.

Second aim: the protection of the earth

The second aim of qit§l is stated in 2:251: the protection of the earth against corruption:

…And did not God check one set of people by means of another [walau-l§ daf #[u] All§h a l-n§s ba#·ahum bi-ba#· [in]], the earth would indeed be full of mischief. But God is full of bounty to all the worlds. (Al-Baqara 2:251)

Our honourable scholars have misunderstood the phrase ‘and did not God check one set of people by means of another’ believing it pertains to military battles between opposing armies or political factions. Blinded by this military interpretation, the fuqah§” have filled whole libraries with books that assessed in legal terms the many different battle situations (who is attacking whom, for what reason, under what circumstances, and with what outcome, etc.). But the truth is that this verse does not talk about military battles. It touches on two things: a) the fact that God checked one set of people by means of another, and b) that this prevented the earth from becoming full of corruption. The two topics are linked together by a conditional main and subclause: ‘if God had not checked…, then the earth…’, implying that the act ‘to check’ (dafa#)[432] prevented the earth from becoming corrupt. The first topic refers to a form of competition that exists within human societies, a kind of mutual rivalry which makes people push one another to reach higher goals. This mutual competition is a socio-communal disposition that God has instilled in His creation. The phrase ‘one set of people’ cannot be reduced to a specific group of people (e.g., the believers, or the army of the caliph), but remains generic, meaning exactly what it says: ‘one set of people’ that remains undefined. The Arabic term for ‘to check”— in the sense of ‘to drive back’—is dafa#, a three-radical, transitive verb that requires a direct object, while the term for a ‘mutual push’ is tad§fa#a, a four-radical verb that requires two sides that are both subject and object, because it implies a process of simultaneously pushing and being pushed. Al-qit§l describes a similar competition between two sides, but, in contrast to al-tad§fu#, it might culminate in a violent battle between two armed opponents resulting in potentially high numbers of casualties, either wounded or dead. But mutual competition does not always have to be violent or deadly. Al-tad§fu# refers, for example, to the fight between sickness and health that we observe every day in hospitals, clinics, and the consultation rooms of medical centres; it refers to the fight between consumers and the retail industry over the best price and the best service possible; it refers to the fight between two opposing teams on the football field or the cricket ground; it stands for the fight between two rival parties in a lawsuit in the Magistrates Court where the only weapon allowed is a better argument and a more convincing piece of evidence, not guns or rocket-propelled grenades. A l-tad§fu# refers to the competition between universities for attracting better funding for their research institutes and for achieving a higher ranking than their competitors; it refers to the fight for a more successful advertising campaign than that of a rival company that operates in the same sector of the market; it refers to the peaceful opposition between rival political parties fighting for more seats in parliament; finally, it refers to the rivalry of states or multiple state organisations for a better share in the global economy. Admittedly, such rivalry may in some cases, which we will define further below, escalate into armed conflict, and most wars are indeed a development of previously peaceful conflicts. A war, as we know, is defined as a conflict of interests that cannot be solved by any peaceful means. The United Nations is the prime example of an international organisation set up to prevent the escalation of interstate rivalry into armed conflicts, and if wars cannot be prevented it will devise plans to solve the military conflicts by political means.

It follows from this that the phrase ‘check one set of people by means of another’ cannot possibly refer to a violent clash or an armed conflict. Mutual competition in this context should not be understood as al-qit§l, as the exegetes believed, because al-qit§l—in the sense of military conflict (which is not ‘in God’s way’)—will eventually cause the destruction of the earth, whereas the theme of 2:251 is the prevention of such destruction. This is how we understand the meaning of 2:216.[433] We also deduce that verse 22:38, ‘Verily God will defend those who believe…’ (A l-\ajj 22:38), does not carry a military connotation. According to our honourable scholars, God stands firmly behind the trenches of the believers and, with a sword in His hand, leads their army to victory against the infidel enemy. We despise such anthropomorphic fantasies and propose to replace the exegetes’ militant explanations with a more symbolic interpretation of the phrase ‘God will defend those who believe’. It is more plausible that God empowers the believers with the force of creativity, and this in all spheres of life and in the battles of everyday life, not in situations of war!

The second part of 2:251 says ‘the earth would indeed be full of mischief’. This implies that without fair competition and without a peaceful clash between the mundane and material interests of people, the earth would become corrupt. The phrase ‘be full of mischief’ or ‘become corrupt’ should not be understood literally as ‘moral corruption’. The earth may break into pieces or may become completely deserted, its wells may dry up, and its volcanoes may erupt all at once, but the earth as such cannot be morally corrupt. In this context, ‘earth’ refers to the entire cosmos in all its material existence, or as ‘worlds’ referring to the universe that is much bigger than the globe (‘…But God is full of bounty to all the worlds’, Al-Baqara 2:251). Seen from this angle, the interpretation of verse 2:216 is as follows: if there were no peaceful competition in human society, people would live contrary to the natural disposition that Allah has given them. This would lead to a corruption of their material interests—corruption meaning collapse or suppression—and result in the decline of the society’s material prosperity; living conditions would deteriorate and all avenues for additional income and financial revenues would be blocked. Eventually, material frustration would cause the ‘corruption’ of the social order: cooperation, solidarity, and fair and respectful competition give way to distrust, friction, and resentment. The material decline of the Communist states in Eastern Europe showed us how disastrous it was to stifle economic competition with centralised economies, to suffocate initiative by overbureaucracy, and to eradicate private property by nationalisation.

Armed conflicts (qit§l), defined as the last resort of (militarily) solving a (previously) peaceful clash of material interests, can, in contrast to competition, only take place between states, not between individuals, communities, or ethnic minorities. If, however, a whole nation suffers from suppression of freedom, brutal dictatorship, and the absence of human rights, we concede that a l-qit§l may take place (inside a state) in order to restore freedom and liberty. Even if such a fight outwardly does not pursue (material) interests, it is obvious that all armed conflicts do pursue other interests albeit not always transparently. In the case of a fight against oppression and dictatorship, values such as justice, freedom, and equality are the underlying interests of such an armed struggle.

Third aim: the protection of the house of the Lord

The third aim is found in verse 22:40.[434] While the second aim pertains to mutual competition among people in their pursuit of material interests, this verse talks about the peaceful coexistence of religious communities. It allows them to live according to their diverse spiritual interests and encourages them to achieve God’s rewards in the Next World in whatever way they want. To expand one specific religion by force and to destroy or reuse houses of worship that belong to other religious communities is to blatantly ignore the meaning of this verse. Not even Communist China, which is officially secular, dared to demolish the Buddhist temples in Tibet—surely not out of respect for Buddhism but because of international pressure and the fears of the Chinese rulers lest they provoke a political scandal—nonetheless, their restraint is more in line with the Book than what happened several times in history during the Islamic call (al-da#wa) that spread menace, intimidation, and sheer violence:

If it had been your Lord’s will, they would all have believed—all who are on earth! Will you then compel mankind, against their will, to believe! (Yånus 10:99)

It is in the spirit of the Book to allow as many religious creeds as exist in this world. The call to MuÈammad’s message (al-Êm§n) must be based on the acknowledgment that other religions—and this includes the so-called non-Abrahamic religions such as Hinduism, Buddhism, Mazdaism, Jainism, and Shintoism—have a legitimate right to exist, bearing in mind that the religion of al-isl§m is based only on belief in God and the Last Day combined with faith in the unity of God

(tauÈÊd).

The three aims of qit§l form a single unity whereby each aim is interconnected with the others. Verse 9:40 states the condition that any fight between two opponents must aim, if it can be regarded as a fight in God’s way, at restoring God’s word concerning freedom, justice, and equality in human societies. The envisaged ideal of complete submission to God is the human characteristic of voluntary obedience or disobedience, not a relationship of servitude that suppresses humans’ free will and their choice of religion. Verse 2:251 states that mutual competition among men for material prosperity does not necessarily lead to armed conflict and normally stays within the realm of peaceful rivalry. It warns against the stifling of healthy competition between groups and sections of human society and stresses the natural inclination of humans to contend with one another, which, if suppressed, leads to a serious decline of material standards in human civilisation. Finally, verse 22:40 brings this idea of a peaceful contest onto the level of spirituality, since it forbids the destruction of religious buildings or, even in times of conflict, closing them, which would prevent people from ‘commemorating the word of God’. If peaceful competition leads to violence and armed conflict, however, the resulting fight is not in God’s way (even if, according to international law, it is a legal war and a pursuit of legitimate interests). The First and Second World Wars are prime examples of rivalry between states and entire armies that continued by military means what was once a peaceful (economic) contest to rewrite the political world map during the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Even if—on both sides of the front—the Christian Church thought of God as ‘defending its believers’, neither war can be justified as a fight in God’s way. We believe that religious doctrines should never be used to justify such purely military and expansionist campaigns. Communism, as another example of a fight for an unjust cause by unjust means, proposed a world revolution but ended in a dictatorship of the working class which failed miserably both as theory and social practice. Because it suppressed the individual’s personal struggle for a better and more prosperous life in both material and spiritual terms, its fight cannot be justified as a fight in God’s way.

The verses using the term qit§l have often been read in isolation from the immediate context in which they occur in the Book. But these verses are so firmly embedded in the argument that precedes and succeeds them that they cannot be properly understood if read out of context. The following example illustrates this:

1. Verily God will defend [yud§fi#[u]] those who believe; verily, God loves not any that is a traitor to faith, or show ingratitude (Al-\ajj 22:38).

2. To those against whom war is made [sic],[435] permission is given (to fight), because they are wronged; and verily, God is most powerful for their aid (Al-\ajj 22:39).

3. (They are) those who have been expelled from their homes in defiance of right—(for no cause) except that they say, “our Lord is God”. Did not God check [lau l§ daf #u] one set of people by means of another, there would surely have been pulled down monasteries, churches, synagogues, and mosques, in which the name of God is commemorated in abundant measure. God will certainly aid those who aid his (cause); for verily God is full of strength, exalted in might, (able to enforce His will) (Al-\ajj 22:40).

4. (They are) those who, if We establish them in the land, establish regular prayer and give regular charity, enjoin the right and forbid wrong—with God rests the end (and decision) of (all) affairs (Al-\ajj 22:41).

First, it is important to understand the phrase ‘God will defend those who believe’ (22:38) in the light of the phrase ‘Did not God check one set of people by means of another’ two verses further below (22:40), because it clearly distinguishes between d§fa#a (third verbal class), as used in 22:38, and dafa# (first verb form), as used in 22:40. This helps us to understand the differences between ‘to defend’ and ‘to check’ and shows both can be understood in nonmilitary terms. Second, the phrase ‘God is most powerful for their aid’ (22:39) cannot be isolated from the phrase ‘God will certainly aid those who aid his (cause)’ in the succeeding verse (22:40). Third, the phrase ‘those who establish prayer’ and the houses of worship in the diverse religious communities (22:41) must be read in conjunction with the phrase ‘monasteries, churches, synagogues, and mosques’ as stated in the preceding verse (22:40). This helps us to understand that since Allah has firmly established humankind on this earth, the best way to consolidate people’s place on earth is to give them religious freedom and the right to perform the traditions and rituals of their choice. Fourth, it is impossible to correctly understand the phrase ‘Did not God check’ (22:40) in isolation from ‘one set of people by means of another’, as stated in the same verse. Finally, the term ‘mosque’ in 22:40 is to be understood in its specific meaning of ‘the place of prayer for the believers and followers of MuÈammad (ß)’ because it is mentioned separately from the ‘monasteries, churches, synagogues’ in the previous line. In a different context, however, for example, in 72:18 or 22:18, the same term has a more general meaning, referring to a ‘place of commemorating God’s name’ which includes mosques, churches, synagogues, and monasteries.[436]

Causes and Conditions of al-qit§l

We have said that there are three aims of fighting in God’s way. This means that such fights are caused by specific conditions and are led under specific circumstances. We propose to unconditionally disallow the possibility of calling any fight that has not been marked by these causes and conditions a fight in God’s way.

There are three legitimate causes of a fight in God’s way:

1. The occurrence of injustice (a l-íulm)—in accordance with verse 22:39, ‘to those against whom war is made, permission is given (to fight)…’ (Al-\ajj 22:39).

2. A humanitarian crisis in which hundreds of people have been expelled from their houses—in accordance with verse 22:40, ‘(they are) those who have been expelled from their homes in defiance of right…’ (Al-\ajj 22:40).

3. An external or internal attack against people’s life, property, and dignity; and a flagrant violation of human rights (the right to work, the right to move and to travel freely, freedom of expression, freedom of religious conviction, and freedom of ritual practices)—in accordance with verse 2:194, ‘…[there is the law of equality]. If then anyone transgresses the prohibition against you, transgress you likewise against him. But fear God, and know that God is with those who restrain themselves’ (Al-Baqara 2:194).

Let us begin by dealing with the first aim. Most importantly, we have to define what injustice (al-íulm) means. First, it literally means ‘out of place’, that is, ‘improperly (ad-)justed’ or, in a more technical sense, it refers to a device (e.g., a computer) that has not yet been ‘justified’. In the Book it means a digression from fairness and justice. We are told: ‘…God means no injustice (íulm[an]) to any of His creatures’ ($l #Imr§n 3:108). Injustice implies failure, total loss, and inade quacy: ‘each of those gardens brought forth its produce, and failed not (lam taílim) in the least therein…’ (Al-Kahf 18:33). Second, íulm means an aggression against the limits of Allah: ‘…these are the limits ordained by God; so do not transgress them. If any do transgress the limits ordained by God, such persons wrong themselves as well as others (a l-í§limån)’ (A l-Baqara 2:229). It is an aggression that leads to rebellion against God and to a refusal to obey His orders: '…We visited the wrong-doers (alladhÊn[a] íalamå) with a grievous punishment because they were given to transgression' (A l-A#r§f 7:165). Third, íulm connotes injustice in a more political sense that is shared by other terms such as 'oppression' (ãughy§n), 'tyranny' (baghy), and 'haughtiness' (istikb§r). In this sense, injustice is a constant theme in the Book, and as mentioned above 22:39 uses íulm in exactly this way as it defines the fight for the oppressed as the ultimate rationale for any jih§d,[437] and if this jih§d is met by the resistance of the oppressor, it turns into a fight in God's way (qit§l fÊ sabÊl All§h). The ultimate aim is to restore the word of God, as verse 9:40 states: '[that] the word of God is exalted to the heights…'. This means that the word of God is restored when injustice is eradicated, when freedom, justice, and equality reign, when compulsion and force are removed from people when they choose their religion, their doctrines, and their membership of whatever confessional group they want. 'To restore the word of God' does not mean to conquer other countries or to force people to believe or practise a specific religious belief. And it should not matter whether injustice is done by a ruler who adheres to MuÈammad's (ß) message or by a ruler who is an atheist: jih§d against injustice and subsequently qit§l (if jih§d fails to end injustice in a peaceful manner) is not concerned with the ruler's religious affiliation. What matters is the injustice and the crimes against humanity that the ruler has committed. It is wise to say that 'it is better to serve under a just ruler who is an infidel than to suffer under an unjust ruler who is a believer', because infidelity affects only the person himself, whereas injustice affects us all. Unfortunately, the political culture we have become used to has turned this on its head. We now believe 'that if a ruler is unjust, it is because he shoulders so much responsibility' and all we can do is to show sympathy for him. Yet, if a ruler is just, all we do is to hope that he will be rewarded for it. This often translates into political apathy and moral indifference. The culture of lethargy is perhaps best reflected in the political axiom that 'a ruler who is feared by his subjects is better than a ruler who fears his subjects'. Here, it is vital to learn from the political culture that exists in non-Islamic countries where the opposite is true. If politicians in those countries evade the rule of law and violate the principles of fairness and justice, they must fear the wrath of the media and the enquiries of investigative journalists whose revelations will certainly cause the public to demand a politician's resignation if the allegations are found to be true.

It has not escaped our attention that many of our honourable scholars have disapproved of our irenic stand against other religious communities. Their view is that the use of violence against nonMuslim-Believers is always legitimate because of the fact that they are infidels and idolaters. They maintain that shirk idolatry, in the sense of ‘false worship’, is a form of íulm as we are told in the Book (‘…“O my son! Join not in worship (others) with God: for false worship (la-íulm) is indeed the highest wrong-doing”’ Luqm§n 31:13). Infidelity is by any account a form of íulm, as the case of the people of Thamud makes unmistakingly clear (‘…We sent the she-camel to the Thamud to open their eyes, but they treated her wrongfully (fa-íalamå)…’, A l-Isr§” 17:59). Given such clear textual evidence they argue that it is legitimate to oppose the infidels and idolaters by force.

Our response to this is as follows: First, idolatry is—as 31:13 tells us—an act of worship of other than God (i.e., it is not a refusal to belong to a specific religious community), and infidelity—as we hear in 17:59—is an act of denial, rejection, or disbelief. Both forms of íulm are wrongdoings against a person’s own soul, not against anyone else, as we hear in the Book: ‘They said: “Our Lord! We have wronged our own souls. If you forgive us not and bestow not upon us your mercy, we shall certainly be lost”’ (A l-A#r§f 7:23). In contrast, the íulm that Allah ordered us to fight is wrongdoing against other people because they are denied personal freedom, in particular the freedom of religion.

Second, to believe or disbelieve in God is a choice that Allah has left to human beings to make for themselves, by free will and safe from any form of compulsion (‘Say, “The truth is from your Lord”; let him who will believe, and let him who will, reject (it)…’, Al-Kahf 18:29). This point is emphasised more than once in the Book:

And have patience with what they say, and leave them with noble (dignity).* And leave Me (alone to deal with) those in possession of the good things of life, who (yet) deny the truth; and bear with them for a little while. (Al-Muzzammil 73:10–11)

This is clear proof that it is illegitimate to force anyone into adopting a specific religious belief. Any fight (a l-qit§l) that ignores this is in clear breach of 18:29 that, in unmistakable terms, guarantees every person the freedom to choose his or her religion.

Third, Allah has forbidden His noble Prophet (ß) to force people to accept his new message. He said, ‘If it had been your Lord’s will, they would all have believed—all who are on earth! Will you then compel mankind, against their will, to believe!’ (Yånus 10:99). This verse contains a prohibition against the use of force in spreading Êm§n or, as it is traditionally understood, Islam, so why do our fuqah§” insist on using the sword as the most viable means of spreading belief ‘in God’s way’. Does their call for a fight against unbelievers not violate the Book’s command to ‘invite (all) to the way of your Lord with wisdom and beautiful preaching; and argue with them in ways that are best and most gracious…’ (Al-NaÈl 16:125)?

Fourth, Allah has forbidden the believers—while they are ‘travelling the earth’—from passing judgement on other people on the basis of their religious convictions. He tells us that their faith should simply not matter when we do business with them or study at their universities. The Book says, ‘O you who believe! When you go abroad in the cause of God, investigate carefully, and say not to any one who offers you a salutation: “You are none of a believer!”…’ (A l-Nis§” 4:94). Given that this verse encourages us to deal open-heartedly with anyone who does not share our beliefs, is it not absolutely ludicrous on the part of our honourable scholars to call for a fight against infidels?

The existence of injustice does not allow the wronged person to immediately fight the oppressor—see 22:39. He must first exhaust other peaceful means such as appeals, exhortation, and dispute. Allah urges us to ‘noise injustice in public speech’ (‘God loves not that evil should be noised abroad in public speech, except where injustice (íulm) has been done; for God is He who hears and knows all things’, Al-Nis§” 4:148). Nevertheless, as a last resort (and if all peaceful means have failed), Allah does not consider the physical challenge of injustice to be an illicit assault under the condition that the fight is conducted within the limits that God has set: ‘Fight in the cause of God those who fight you, but do not transgress limits; for God loves not transgressors’ (Al-Baqara 2:190).

This last verse, 2:190, has often been read out of context. It is critical to put it in the context of its three preceding verses since 2:190–93 constitute a thematic unit.[438] This context tells us that any fight against someone ‘who does not fight you’ is illegitimate and that a fight must cease if the other side stops fighting back. This implies that it is forbidden to start an attack or to unconditionally continue with it, because the Book makes it absolutely clear that Allah does not love aggressors. Verse 2:193, however, ends with the command, ‘let there be no hostility except to those who practise oppression’. The exceptive particle in this sentence implies that all the preceding injunctions which restrict and condition offensive fights are only valid when we do not face a situation of injustice and oppression. This means that if all peaceful methods of al-amr bi’l-ma#råf wa-nahy #an a l-munkar have been exhausted, an offensive fight against an oppressor is not an act of aggression. If we turn to the example of the Prophet (ß), we know that he endured injustice, oppression, and physical assault for over thirteen years during his time in Mecca. It was a time of persecution and suppression of the freedom of religious choice, because the leaders of Meccan society persecuted people for accepting the new religion. The Prophet (ß) suffered great hardship but with admirable patience endured all the Meccan injustice, until things escalated and people were driven out of their homes. Only then did the hijra (or flight) take place.

In the light of the Book’s rulings against aggression and offensive attacks, a small minority of modern fuqaha” have gone as far as to rule that any kind of violence is illegitimate because they consider it to be politically incorrect to follow a religion that allows violence. On the other side of the extreme is the majority of our honourable scholars who still adhere—almost always with reference to the socalled sword verse 9:5—to the traditional concept of jih§d that unconditionally allows the use of force against infidels as a way of spreading the message of Islam. They continue the tradition, established during the reign of the Umayyads, of propagating militant concepts for the spread of Islam. These fuqaha” propose a doctrine of jih§d that leads, on the level of the individual, to suicide missions and an idealisation of martyrdom, and, on societal level, to military campaigns against infidels and idolaters (even if these do not show the slightest sign of hostility). Even more objectionable than their aggression towards other religions is their placidity in the face of injustice and oppression in their own countries. Their concept of qiã§l is thoroughly one-sided since it accepts only external aggression as a legitimate ground for ‘fighting’. Cases of internal aggression, for example, the existence of despotic rule by tyrannical rulers, have been met with acquiescent silence and political opportunism. These fuqah§” are responsible for the fact that the world currently does not associate Islam with a call for courage and resistance in the face of injustice and political oppression, and that we assume that Muslims would not stand up, if necessary by force, for justice, freedom, and equality.

The unholy alliance between religion and politics during the formative period of Islamic history meant that the fuqah§”, corrupted by their closeness to the people in power, constructed a militaristic doctrine of jih§d and qit§l that basically supported the colonialist expansions of the dynastic empires and the insatiable appetite for ever-more booty of the warlords under the pretext of spreading the call of Islam. In the current period, we observe an unfortunate reemergence of this fatal fusion between religion and politics within the groups of so-called Islamic revivalism, such as al-Jam§#at a l-Isl§miyya, a l-Jih§d, a l-Q§#ida, and such, which, in some way or another, are all subbranches of the Muslim Brotherhood (Jam§#at al-Ikhw§n al-MuslimÊn). Their new doctrines of jih§d and qit§l bear an alarming resemblance to the old doctrines of the medieval fuqah§”, in particular in their obsession with reading military connotations in every word of the Book. But they even go beyond that, and to their definition of the essential components of jih§d and qit§l they now add the seizure of political power in their home countries, for which they sanction all forms of violence, including assassination, physical assault, and the destruction of a country’s infrastructure. This movement has often been wrongly perceived as a legitimate protest against authoritarian regimes in the Arab-Muslim world, and some people in the West have indeed sympathised with the Islamists and have hailed their idealism as Islam’s form of a theology of liberation. It has often been overlooked that these groups simply want to replace one form of despotism with another, as their ideology still diffuses the old foul stench of the authoritarian rule and political oppression that we became accustomed to long time ago.

Such ideological revisionism began after the Second World War, as we detect the first traces of politicized doctrines in Egyptian publications of that time. We see, for example, how MaÈmåd Shaltåt, the rector of a l-Azhar University under Nasser, in his exegesis of the Qur'an[439] confuses cause and effect when he writes about al-qit§l and turns the whole universe into a continuous (eternal) battlefield, treating fighting, conflict, and war as essential rather than accidental (nonessential) conditions of human life. This signalled the end of a benevolent view on history and the beginning of an ideology that lacks any notion of cooperation, solidarity, and mutual understanding between nations and peoples of this world. We see, at the same time, how Sayyid Quãb writing about 'jih§d in God's way' in his book Signposts[440] not only invents an arsenal of completely new terminology but also creates an ideology that legitimises the dethronement of his own government by force for reasons that have nothing to do with the question of liberation or the struggle to end oppression or the fight for freedom, justice, and equality. Such thoughts became extremely influential in the creation of Islamist groups, and in 1997 we listened to Aim§n a l-£aw§hirÊ, who in an interview with a French news agency, declared how he permits the killing of a country's ruler on the basis that he is an apostate and that he does not rule according to Allah's law, that is, on the grounds of apostasy and the absence of Allah's rule (È§kimiyya), thus reminding us of what had been proposed earlier by Sayyid Quãb. A l-£aw§hirÊ basically calls for political assassination, heedless of the fact that the rulers of a country (president or prime minister, etc.) have been democratically elected, irrespective of the actual type of governance (republic, monarchy, constitutional monarchy, etc.), and regardless of whether people are enjoying a period of material prosperity and security, that is, completely ignorant of the actual socioeconomic situation of the country. The only thing that matters to him is whether the ruler is an apostate or not! This turns on its head the traditional politically quietist attitude of our fuqah§", for whom it was sacrosanct not to attack even the most despotic autocrat who in their opinion still deserved obedience even if he committed the most cruel crimes against humanity ('absolute obedience to those in power'!). And yet, for several reasons, it cannot be welcomed as a decisive turn away from the inadequacies of traditional Islamic thought. The most important reason is that both Sayyid

Quãb and Aim§n al-£aw§hirÊ call for the removal of an apostate ruler not because they want to restore Allah’s word by fighting for freedom, justice and equality, but purely because of their desire to take over political power. Having said this, we nevertheless agree with the two ideologues in that al-isl§m is a perfect divine system that is understood and applied by humans’ relative, historical, and contingent knowledge which structures the activities of those who embrace al-isl§m in a multitude of different areas of life, among which we find the area of al-qit§l. The two following verses, for example, express two fundamental aspects of such perfect divine system:

…[there is the law of equality]. If then any one transgresses the prohibition against you, transgress you likewise against him. But fear God, and know that God is with those who restrain themselves. (A l-Baqara

2:194)

Nor can a bearer of burdens bear another’s burdens if one heavily laden should call another to (bear) his load. Not the least portion of it can be carried (by the other). Even though he be nearly related… (Al-F§ãir 35:18)

Our ideologues have ignored the fact that the phrase ‘transgress you likewise against him’ (i.e., an oppressor) does not mean to become and act like an oppressor but rather asks us to fight against injustice and oppression. How could they ever define ‘fight in God’s way’ as the assassination of politicians and attacks on the security forces, the destruction of public buildings and explosions in overcrowded markets, when the Book rejects al-qit§l as a clash or conflict involving only one side and prohibits punishing people for the guilt of others?

It would have been easier for us and every sound-minded person to support the cause of the Islamist groups had they called, at home and abroad, for a full restoration of God’s word in freedom, justice, and equality for all people regardless of their religious or ethnical affiliations. Instead, they called for an immediate seizure of power. We would even have considered joining their ranks and participating in their activities had they been truthful and sincere in what they propounded. Instead, they not only committed the cold-blooded murder of politicians, civil servants, and soldiers, but also ruthlessly cut each other's throats. One of the most shocking examples was the assassination of \is§m al-Baãåj Ê, the leader of the military wing of the al-Jih§d al-Isl§mÊ group in BanÊ Swayf by #Us§ma 'iddÊq Ayoub, another leading member of the group which was then headed by Aim§n al-£aw§hirÊ, purely because of an internal dispute over leadership. Moreover, members of the Islamist groups are convicted criminals who committed daylight robbery by extorting, in the style of the real Mafiosi, protection money while claiming that as Muj§hidÊn they were entitled to receive a share of people's money even, if necessary, by force. They were similarly involved in money laundering in order to finance their clandestine activities, as frequently happened in Syria during the 1970s.[441] Such criminal activity has absolutely nothing to do with the fight in God's way as the Book describes it. Because of its character as a fight by only one side, the doctrine of assassination which the so-called Islamic insurgents adhere to is not al-qit§l but rather politically motivated murder in the tradition of assassinations of statesmen, for example, the killing of emperors in Ancient Rome, the killing of Husayn at Kerbala, or the assassinations of al-Naqr§shÊ B§sh§ in Egypt[442] and John F. Kennedy in the United States.

We would also look less critically at the Islamist movement's desire for power had it produced successful governments with a proud record of admirable cultural and civilisational achievements, but the pitiful nature of, for example, the Taliban regime in Afghanistan, makes us wish that the Muslim-Believer—in the words of the Prophet (ß)—'is not stung from the (same) hole twice'.[443]

The Islamists' slogan of God's rule on earth (a l-È§kimiyya) is, in reality, nothing more than their code word for political power. To call the only acceptable form of political governance 'the rule of God' is empirically nonsensical since there are many successful and powerful states in this world that do not represent 'God's rule' and yet are run by politicians who sincerely believe in God. The Islamists' seemingly religious slogan of God's rule on earth is, paradoxically, a purely political manifesto for the acquisition of political power. This is, because if religion, that is, any religion (in the conventional understanding of 'religious community'), came to power, it would, due to its exclusivist claims, deny the legitimacy of any other religion. In the case of Islamism, the ruler would be God's deputy on earth, while the mufti would—as Ibn Qayyim a l-Jauziyya said—'sign in God's name' or, according to a l-Sh§ãibÊ, 'stand in for the Messenger (ß)'. Once in power, the doctrines of Islamism would deny the existential right of any other belief and, since it would possess all legislative and executive powers, it would autocratically define the 'others' as heretics. A religious government is therefore by nature dictatorial, allpervasive, and, if in possession of an exclusivist ideology, despotic.

In contrast to the Islamists' understanding of al-È§kimiyya, we propose to define it in the light of the Book as a rule that no human being is allowed to participate in Allah's governance with regard to those things that are exclusively His prerogative:

1. Allah '…does not share His command with any person whatsoever' (Al-Kahf 18:26). Everyone (who claims to rule like God and) does not share his power with any other person, has acted unjustly towards Allah and has challenged His È§kimiyya.

2. 'He cannot be questioned for His acts, but they will be questioned (for theirs)' (A l-Anbiy§" 21:23). Every government which (claims to act like God and) refuses to be questioned for its acts has acted unjustly towards Allah and has challenged His È§kimiyya.

3. For '…your Lord is the (sure) accomplisher of what He plans' (Håd 11:107). Everyone who (claims to act like God and) thinks that he can do whatever he wishes, has acted unjustly towards Allah and has challenged His È§kimiyya.

4. '…No god do I know for you but myself…' (Al-Qaßaß 28:38). Everyone who challenges Allah's È§kimiyya—just like the Pharaoh in 28:38—by thinking he is God and by demanding unconditional obedience from his subjects has challenged Allah's sovereignty

(ulåhiyya).

5. ‘I am your Lord, most high’ (Al-N§zi#§t 79:24). Allah is the Lord of the worlds and the owner of all goods. Everyone who thinks that a nation’s wealth is his private property has challenged God’s lordship (rubåbiyya)—like the Pharaoh who, in his hybris, had declared: ‘Does not the dominion of Egypt belong to me, (witness) these streams flowing underneath my (palace)?...’ (Al-Zukhruf 43:51).

It follows from this that, as Muslim-Believers, we will never allow anyone to challenge Allah’s rule (al-È§kimiyya) by claiming attributes that are only His. Many states in this world adhere to this and are, in this respect, following Allah’s rule even though most of them are governed by non-Muslim-Believers, that is, by those who are not followers of MuÈammad’s (ß) message. In these countries we observe that the state’s main interest lies in the provision of service and good government in this life. It does not see its main task as administering people’s affairs in preparation for the Next World. It seems foolish to them to try to save people from Hell by obliging them to a life that promises Paradise. Instead, the state guarantees a good health service, proper education, traffic control, material prosperity, national security, defence of the state’s borders, and the like, all of which need proper planning and support from research institutions. Success and failure of these things are based on the amount of knowledge and competence that went into the planning of these things; success does not depend on how often and vociferous we call for ‘God’s rule on earth’.

The emergence of political Islam and the spread of armed militant groups in the Arab-Muslim world have been the cause of much concern. We believe that, historically, the existence of militancy and violence is the result of too much political interference from political rulers in matters of religious doctrine and practice. As a result, politics has suffered from too much interference from religious scholars in matters of policy and legal administration. This unholy alliance between religion and politics created a political culture in which our honourable scholars generally became too closely involved in the day-to-day running of the state, in particular during a l-MutawwakÊl’s inquisition. The calamitous consequence of this involvement is that our scholars have seemed to have turned a blind eye to political injustice if they were faced with tyranny, despotism, and autocratic rule. They never seemed to have the courage or intelligence to develop a theology of freedom, justice, and equality. For them, to be free, in purely technical terms of the law, meant not to be a slave. The lack of any moral concept of liberty meant that such important values as freedom of speech, the preservation of human dignity, individual autonomy, and freedom of religion have been entirely absent from the collective consciousness of Arab people. The Islamists’ craving for political power adequately reflects the lack of a mature and enlightened political culture in the Arab-Muslim world, since under a dictatorial, autocratic regime the radical seizure of power is the only way to participate in the political process, while in a society in which democracy, human rights, and the values of freedom of religion are fully implemented in the political culture, the radical seizure of power is the least viable way for full political participation. But the fatal closeness of the traditional, religious establishment to those in power has left a lethal legacy in the minds of modern Islamists as they, just like the old fuqah§”, believe that to mix religion into politics and to concoct an Islamic version of theocracy, teaming up H§m§n with Pharaoh and the Q§rån of this world (i.e., the financial oligarchs), is the shortest path to success. This legacy is also the reason why we, after the abolition of the Caliphate, still lack a viable theory of a modern state.

Reasons for the Corruption of al-qit§l

After having defined the aims and conditions of al-qit§l, we finally need to explain the reasons for its corruption, that is, its erroneous application or false practice. Inasmuch as one can invalidate the benefits of a charity donation if it is done through illegal channels (‘O you who believe! Cancel not your charity by reminders of your generosity or by injury…’, Al-Baqara 2:264), a fight is corrupt and fails to fulfil its proper aims if it is done in violation of the Book’s injunctions. This applies to all kinds of al-qit§l, including the fight in God’s way, mutual competition (in self-defence, for national security, or political interests—for example, a political mandate over another country, etc.), or the withdrawal from a battle, from troops, or from deployment in the field, that is, the withdrawal from fighting, the offering of peace; the avoidance of excessive retaliation;

the accusation of infidelity and other forms of ‘fights’. There are five things that make a fight invalid:

1. O you who believe! When you meet the [al-k§firÊn] in hostile array, never turn your backs to them.* If any do turn his back to them on such a day—unless it be in a stratagem of war, or to retreat to a troop (of his own)—he draws on himself the wrath of God, and his abode is Hell—an evil refuge (indeed)! (Al-Anf§l 8:15–16)

These two verses are from the Book’s section of definite verses (a l-muÈkam§t) in MuÈammad’s (ß) messengerhood (a l-ris§la) that contains orders and prohibitions. Both verses prohibit the MuslimBelievers (‘O you who believe!’) from avoiding a fight if faced with an imminent attack from the k§firÊn. The act of avoiding a fight is figuratively expressed as ‘a turn of your back’. It is, of course, not meant to be literally understood as a physical turn of one’s back, because people may withdraw or retreat from a fight while still facing the enemy. The term a l-k§firån here does not have the specific meaning of ‘infidels’ but points in a more general way to everyone who starts a conflict.[444] Every aggressor is a k§fir whatever his religious beliefs. Seen from the side of the Russians who were attacked, the troops of Nazi Germany were the k§firån; as was the Iraqi army of Saddam Hussein in the eyes of the people of Kuwait. Moreover, if we take the literal meaning of k§firån as ‘infidels’, it has always been the case that the enemy is taken to represent the dark side of heresy and unbelief, while orthodoxy and correct belief is reserved for oneself.[445] The text’s use of k§firån is hence more than adequate to express this historical phenomenon.

What invalidates any individual or collective fight in God’s way is a manner of fighting that ignores the word of Allah which wants to secure freedom, justice, and equality for all people. Such a fight would be corrupted and could not be considered as a fight in God’s way; it might still be a worthwhile fight for some other aims, but it cannot any longer be called a fight in God’s way.

God has purchased of the believers their persons and their goods; for theirs (in return) is the garden (of Paradise): they fight in His cause, and slay and are slain, a promise binding on Him in truth, through the Law, the Gospel, and the Qur”§n… (Al-Tawba 9:111)

The fight mentioned in 9:111 is such a fight. It does not fulfil the criteria for a fight in God’s way because, a) it promises the garden of Paradise as a reward, and b) it is only required from the Muslim-Believers, not universally from all humankind. Such a fight differs fundamentally from a fight in God’s way, for example in the form of a nations’ defence against an outside aggressor, because this latter would involve the whole nation and transcends religious, ethnic, and regional boundaries. In contrast to 9:111, the verses of 8:15–16 concern not only the Muslim-Believers but also everyone and refer to a general situation of conflict and opposition to people who attack (al-k§firån). We disagree with al-R§zÊ who, like any other exegete who bases his views on spurious ‘causes of revelation’, claims that 8:15–16 refer to the Battle of Badr. The conditional phrase ‘when you meet’, at the beginning of 8:15, implies a fulfillable condition for a situation in the future, rather than a historical account of a specific event in the past (which only starts with verse 17[446] and not before). The two verses are not a historical narrative but an instruction holding a general lesson—similar to verse 8:45 which also does not narrate events from the life of MuÈammad (ß) or his companions.[447] The feeble historicism of the exegetes’ rendering of 8:15–16 reduces the audience of ‘O you who believe!’ to a handful of companions and al-k§firån to a couple of thousand idolaters of the Banå Quraish in Mecca, which is, given the verse’s universal significance, highly unacceptable. A narrow (historicised) reading of the verse (i.e., believers against unbelievers) denies the possibility that a fight or even a war might take place whereby both sides are ‘those who believe’ (but where one side is called k§firÊn because it has started the conflict), which has indeed happened in history and still happens at the present time.

2. Truly God loves those who fight in His cause in battle array, as if they were a solid cemented structure. (Al-‘aff 61:4)

And obey God and His apostle; and fall into no disputes, lest you lose heart and your power depart; and be patient and persevering: for God is with those who patiently persevere. (Al-Anf§l 8:46)

These two verses underline the importance of comradeship and the spirit of brotherhood, not only on the battleground but also in all spheres of daily life. The first verse uses the picture of ‘a solid cemented structure’, similar to a well-built wall, to describe the fighters’ comradeship and mutual help. They stand shoulder to shoulder in their fight against injustice. We are told that this is what God truly loves. It creates an association to a similar picture: of people praying the ßal§t prayer, standing shoulder to shoulder in their prayer and forming one straight line, a ‘solid wall’ of brothers in faith. The opposite of such unity, as the second verse says, is to ‘fall into disputes’. This is why we are told to ‘hold fast, all together, by the rope which God (stretches out for you), and be not divided among yourselves…’ ($l #lmr§n 3:103). Quarrels cause discord; discord causes friction; and friction will weaken the united front of the believers, leading not only to disappointment and failure in the fight against injustice, but also to destruction of their own united front. We are told in the Book that Pharaoh of Egypt was able to establish his tyrannical regime only after he managed to ‘break up his people into section’,[448] and that the reason for the Prophet’s (ß) defeat at UÈud was disagreements about the aims of the campaign, leaving ‘huge holes in their wall’ of brotherhood and comradeship.

3. …Therefore if they withdraw from you but fight you not, and (instead) send you (guarantees of) peace, then God has opened no way for you

(to war against them). (Al-Nis§” 4:90)

As explained above, al-qit§l requires a fight in which at least two sides are actively involved. If one side withdraws, the fight either ends or, if the other side continues to fight, the two-sided fight (qit§l) turns into a one-sided fight (qatl). Verse 4:90 describes such a situation, as do verses 5:27–31 that narrate Cain’s killing (qatl) of Abel in a fight that the Book describes as unambiguously onesided.[449] It is useful to distinguish between a forced retreat and a voluntary withdrawal from the fight. We are told by #Us§ma bin L§din that ‘whoever is not for us is against us and with our enemies’, which is, oddly enough, mirrored by G. W. Bush’s dictum that ‘if any government sponsors the outlaws and killers of innocents, they have become outlaws and murderers themselves’.[450] In fact, both fundamentally contradict the message of 4:90 which first allows humans free choice in making their decisions (to withdraw) and, second, does not expect them to fight until the bitter end but allows compromise, resolution, and reconciliation.

4. Fight in the cause of God those who fight you, but do not transgress limits; for God loves not transgressors. (Al-Baqara 2:190)

…[there is the law of equality]. If then any one transgresses the prohibition against you, transgress you likewise against him. But fear God, and know that God is with those who restrain themselves. (Al-Baqara 2:194)

The first verse calls upon the followers of MuÈammad (ß) to fight those who fight them, but within the limits Allah has set ‘because Allah does not love those who transgress His limits’. In their exegesis of this verse, our honourable scholars have made the following mistakes:

a) They claimed things from the Book that Allah never said, by deliberately misplacing the words within the verses or reading them out of context, for example, out of 2:194, resulting in an understanding of al-qit§l as offensive warfare.

b) They ignored the fact that one of the following verses, 2:193, specifies the situation in which ‘fight in God’s way’ is required: ‘…let there be no hostility except to those who practise oppression.’ This requires the occurrence of injustice, which is confirmed by 22:39: ‘…because they are wronged’ (Al-\ajj 22:39). A fight against wrongdoing requires the existence of a wrongdoer and the act of wrongdoing. Aggression is an act of wrongdoing, so is despotism. This means that there are different kinds of fights: fights that want (unselfishly) to end tyranny, and fights that want (selfishly) to defend and protect one’s material, intellectual, political, and other interests. Only fights for the former are fights in ‘God’s way’.

c) They misread another relevant verse, 2:190, through using the wrong variant reading of 22:39 that says ‘to those against whom war is made [sic], permission is given (to fight), because they are wronged; and verily, God is most powerful for their aid’ (Al-\ajj 22:39). This has been understood as God’s permission of self-defence in the face of aggression or an attack. It has been overlooked that the phrase ‘to those against whom war is made’ (yuq§talån), using the passive voice, can also be read as ‘to those who make war’ (yuq§tilån), using the active voice.[451] Most exegetes have tended to accept the first reading (passive voice), but given that people are attacked by an aggressor, does it really need divine permission to fight back? Certainly not, because the right to defend one’s life, property, land, and dignity is God-given, a natural disposition instilled into all of His creation, humans, animals, and plants, and does not need Allah’s special permission, just like other natural acts such as eating, drinking, breathing, sleeping, and procreating.

Verse 2:194 expresses the principle of lex talionis in a response to an act of aggression, supported by 5:45.[452] The phrase ‘transgress you likewise against him’ implies restraint in one’s response and the avoidance of excessive and unjustified brutality. A violation of the principle of equal retaliation makes any fight in God’s way null and void, and it also invalidates a fight for any other reasons, for example, in defence of a nation’s security, or other forms of worldly struggle and contest.

5. O you who believe! When you go abroad in the cause of God, investigate carefully, and say not to any one who offers you a salutation: “You are none of a believer!” Coveting the perishable goods of this life: with God are profits and spoils abundant. Even thus were you yourselves before, till God conferred on you His favours: Therefore carefully investigate. For God is well aware of all that you do. (A l-Nis§” 4:94)

This verse disqualifies ‘unbelief’ as a legitimate reason for a l-qit§l. This applies equally to the context of qit§l as ‘going abroad in God’s way’ or qit§l as ‘seeking knowledge wherever you go’, or qit§l as providing for the family’s income, because if, in the case of the latter two, the material aims and the pursuit of worldly interests supersede Allah’s orders and prohibitions, such acts of qit§l cease to be ‘in God’s way’, since they have become thoroughly corrupted. As for the way in which one talks to the unbeliever while ‘travelling the world in God’s way’, the Book urges us to ‘speak fair to the people’ (Al-Baqara 2:83), that is, in a soft, mild-tempered and well-mannered way—and this applies to people of all religious schools and denominations.

He does not forbid you to deal kindly and justly with anyone who has not fought you for your faith or driven you out of your homes: God loves the just. (Al-MumtaÈana 60:8, AH)

Verse 60:8 demands us to be ‘kind and just’ to the unbelievers. In stating its first qualification (‘who has not fought you for your faith’), it stresses the principle of religious freedom and nonviolence in our fight in God’s way and, in its second qualification (‘or driven you out of your homes’), it stresses the necessity of establishing national security as well as the citizens’ right to shelter and privacy.

The ban to say ‘to any one who offers you a salutation “You are none of a believer!”’ reminds every Muslim-Believer that before their conversion to the new faith the first believers in MuÈammad’s message had all been unbelievers themselves, but their heart was opened by Allah’s forgiveness and mercy. Hence, the prohibition to fight unbelievers on the basis of their infidelity. This is because, first of all, they enjoy the God-given right to choose whatever faith they want; second, because Allah’s forgiveness and mercy extends to His entire creation (believers, hypocrites, and unbelievers alike); and third, it is Allah alone who knows the real extent of belief and disbelief, of sincerity and hypocrisy, of truth and falsehood, and it is He alone who will judge regarding the faith of the believers and the disbelief of the unbelievers. Those things (the Last Hour, the Day of Judgement, the books, the messengers, the angels) must be left to Him, while we better turn to the things that are left in our care (to act justly or unjustly, to tell the truth or a lie, and so on).

The five points that invalidate the fight in God’s way are certainly not exhaustive. Many more things could be identified as corrupting the cause of Allah. But it is important to show that the encroachment of even one minor item of the principles given above which qualify a fight as a fight in God’s way, would make such a fight null and void and would remove any reward that Allah has promised to give to those believers who fight for Him.

Concluding Remarks on ‘Fighting in God’s Way’

1. The acts of shah§da and shahÊd are, conceptually, entirely different from the acts of fighting (qit§l), killing (qatl), and the subject of death (maut). Nobody can be called a shahÊd if he is not alive and therefore unable to declare his shah§da publicly. The shuhad§” are those who, just like the ßiddÊqån, prophets, and ß§liÈån, give public witness against injustice (and even suffer for it by incarceration), or give witness to a major scientific discovery (e.g., new medicines that are first tested on themselves), or report under danger about world-changing events (as journalists)—in all instances regardless of whether they are killed during their witness or not. To call people killed in a war shuhad§” is a political ruse by Machiavellian politicians. Governments and army generals know only too well that after they have sent young men to their certain death they cannot do anything for those who are killed. But in order to encourage more people to go to war, they invent stories about an easy entry to Paradise and about beautiful maidens who will serve the killed martyrs in the Garden. These are naturally just empty promises because Allah alone can decide on such matters, not politicians. It is for life (not death) that God created the acts of shah§da and of the shahÊd. But the political caste and the religious establishment has conflated shah§da / shahÊd with qit§l / qatl, that is, with fighting and death. It has created a collective mindset in which the life of a human being does not count for much and wherein lies a mental numbness in which people seem to be no longer shocked by the number of people killed, even if it is indeed alarmingly high. In our feeblemindedness we boast that foreign armies employ spineless soldiers who are psychologically unable to sustain high casualties. For shock and awe we send our young men to certain death, hoping to produce the highest number of casualties possible. We completely ignore the fact that the so-called feeblemindedness of Western armies can be explained by their value for human life and their regarding the death of each single soldier as a tragic loss of life. We forget that in the West every military action undertaken by the army requires parliamentary consultation and the broad support of the electorate. We forget how praiseworthy it is that they treat the life God has given them as a precious gift which they try to preserve and prolong as long as they can. How bizarre is it, in contrast, that we celebrate and send our zagh§rÊd shrills over the whole town or village, announcing that we have a martyr in the family when one of us has died in a war. We proudly announce that this or that young man has now entered Paradise, even though this is downright nonsense because Allah alone is the Lord over Hell and Paradise, while we know nothing about Hell and Paradise. How foolish of us it is to claim we have knowledge of such things.

2. The concept of abrogation cannot be applied to the verses of military qit§l. These verses have been given to us as reports on historic events during the battles of Badr, UÈud, Khandaq, T§båk, the taking of Mecca and Khaybar, and so on. These are stories from MuÈammad’s life, belonging to the realm of prophethood, not messengerhood. They have, therefore, no legislative significance. Just like with the stories about Moses, Jesus, and Joseph, there is of course a lesson to learn for those who understand (‘There is, in their stories, instruction for men endued with understanding’ Yåsuf 12:11).[453] The phrase ‘in this is a warning for such as have eyes to see’ (3:13) implies that these stories are intended to teach, to edify, to admonish, and to warn; but they should not—and this includes the verses of qit§l in Sårat al-Tawba—serve as a basis for human legislation on international war.

3. Jih§d in God’s way is one specific kind of the many types of jih§d. Also, jih§d in God’s way is only one aspect of things that can be done ‘in God’s way’. One may provide food and shelter for a family in God’s way, one may travel the earth in God’s way, or one may seek knowledge in God’s way. ‘In God’s way’ means according to His method, not for God. Jih§d in God’s way is a jih§d that wants to ‘restore the word of God as most high’. Fight (qit§l) is one form of jih§d to achieve this goal. Jih§d in God’s way is a struggle for the freedom of all people, in particular for the freedom of religion (free choice in deciding which rituals to practice and which religious doctrine to adhere to). A struggle for freedom breeds free-minded people, and free-minded people are those who care for the justice and equality that we need so badly in the Arab-Muslim world.

4. Fight (qit§l) can be legally justifiable and still not be ‘in God’s way’. One may fight an opponent in God’s way (qit§l fÊ sabÊl All§h) in a peaceful contest pursuing one’s own material and intellectual interests. If, however, the contest gradually turns into a fierce battle that cannot be resolved by peaceful means, such a fight in God’s way turns into an ordinary fight (al-qit§l). Most wars in the history of humankind have originated and developed like this.

5. Fight (qit§l) can be legal in the event of an external invasion and foreign occupation, and self-defence in such cases does not need permission for anyone by anyone, because the defence of a nation is pure self-defence.

6. The protection of the life and safety of the population in any state, and defence of the territorial boundaries of a nation-state against external invasion are regulated by international law and are covered by the martial code of each individual state. Wars between entire armies cannot be defined as ‘in God’s way’ unless they are designed to liberate a population that suffers under the #ubådiyya of a repressive regime that suppresses freedom of speech, freedom of religion, and violates human rights openly. Very few wars in the history of humankind have been led in order to achieve such goals.

7. Jih§d in God’s way is always peaceful. In certain circumstances it might be necessary to turn jih§d into a fight (al-qiã§l) in God’s way. In this case it is a kind of ‘fighting jih§d’ that is fought to ensure freedom of choice for all people, in particular freedom of religion. This is a code only for the individual, not for groups, armies, or entire nations.

8. The Book does not contain a doctrine that regards humans as slaves of God. Human beings in this life—including believers and unbelievers, Muslim-Assenters and God dissenters, the pious and the impudent—are all worshippers of God (al-#ib§d) if they choose to worship God. Only in the Next Life are they God’s slaves (al-#abÊd). When slavery exists in this world, it always means subservience to someone other than God. Even though Arab-Muslims for centuries have been told that they are slaves of God—to the effect that today they believe that this is what their religion wants them to be—in reality they have been tricked into a kind of slavish obedience to someone other than God. Over a long period of time, acquiescence has become second nature for Arab-Muslims, and a mentality of (political) surrender has become fixed in their minds. The hangman-ruler who tyrannises his own people has—by this logic of surrender—become the epitome of a national hero. We believe that there is no other nation in this world where this type of #ubådiyya oppression has been so willingly and almost enthusiastically embraced as the Arab nation. That is why, sadly, people do not think that a jih§d for the freedom of expression is a cause worth fighting for. This is why the call for a fight for the liberation of all people regardless of their religious affiliation is still very alien to them. The corollary of this slavish mentality is the sense of inferiority Arab-Muslims have when faced with their own heritage, their traditions, and the people who represent the Arab past. For them, the past per se is superior to everything they think and do today. However, a person who feels like a dwarf vis-à-vis Ibn #Abb§s cannot act like a giant vis-à-vis the president of the United States. If he feels like a dwarf in comparison to someone in the distant past, he will also feel like a dwarf when faced with someone in the present. True, we vilify the West and abuse it with strong language, and yet the (actual) situation in our countries perpetuates our #ubådiyya towards the West. The West has hegemony over everything, so much so that it can silence our protests and futile outcries. Regrettably, all Arab regimes of whatever nature seem to be more aware of this than their own people. I predict, therefore, a long life and much stability for these regimes, because our culture totally defies a (peaceful and democratic) revolution against the political authorities; if revolts occur they are almost always accompanied by the dreadful ‘nights of long knives’: revenge killings, retaliations, assassinations, and bombings that kill hundreds of innocent people. The path of the Arabs is a cul-de-sac. We fear that the international community will not bet on a losing horse, and we can only hope that if Arab regimes do not see the need for reforms themselves they are pressurized to do so from outside.

9. We will not solve the problem of violence by simply giving more power to the security services. Such measures only have a temporary effect, like sedatives, because the disease requires a surgical operation. To remove the root cause of this illness requires a revision of the entire foundation upon which Islamic fiqh is based, and of the legal parameters that the fuqah§” have invented. Concepts of personal freedom and love of life are not rooted in Islamic fiqh. This revision cannot be done without the creation or adoption of a new epistemological system that is not hijacked by a notion of sacrality belonging to the past or by sacrosanct scholarly traditions. For more than forty years our main concern has been to propose and apply such a new epistemological system. Halfbaked compromises that stop short of a full revision are not good enough. Perfunctory proposals that do not tackle the root of the crisis, such as the idea of a ‘moderate Islam’ or of a rapprochement between the different legal schools, are, for us, an opportunity lost.

10. Most urgently, the concepts of jih§d and qit§l need to be revised. In the past, they were based on a dichotomist model by which the umma of kufr was opposed to the umma of Islam. The world was divided, in purely religious terms, into an abode of disbelief (d§r al-kufr) and an abode of belief (d§r al-isl§m). What appeared to be a religious conflict was in reality a war over economic interests, territorial gains, and political dominance. Such concepts must change because any war between nations, in particular in the current age, does not know winners and losers since all would lose out. The past has shown that religious wars are terribly destructive, and every Muslim-Believer who thinks that military battles for a religion are a kind of jih§d in God’s way has been misled by a murderous, criminal ideology.

11. To talk about ‘God’s rule on earth’ is naïve and theologically contestable. The È§kimiyya of God will not provide us with a viable modern state because it is the task of the state to look after the concerns of people in this life (health system, education, security, economy), whereas life in the Next World should always be the individual’s own prerogative.

12. It is not permissible to separate religion from society, but it is logical and pertinent to separate religion from politics. As soon as religion enters politics, a culture of exclusivist claims will spread and poison the relationship between groups and denominations. The many legal justifications for the discrimination of other believers in the books of fiqh should be a warning sign for everyone.

13. Democracy is a natural state of human beings. Democracy protects the principles of the freedom of choice, free elections, freedom of speech, and academic freedom. It projects life in society as a social contract that binds the rulers and the citizens. It provides the minimum of procedures to which humans naturally adhere to, for example, the practice of consultation (al-shåra). It has been prescribed in the Book as a duty but its exact modi operandi have been left open because people apply it differently according to their contingent political systems. Unfortunately, Arab-Muslims have not produced a single system of consultation that secures the above democratic principles.

14. The Caliphate, with all its despotic credentials, held its political legitimacy until its abolition in 1924; subsequent political regimes have continued with the Caliphate’s despotic tradition but have never gained its political legitimacy. We still lack a new concept of political rule that enjoys unchallenged legitimacy and differs from the notion of a Caliphate (which, hopefully, will never return).

15. The so-called Islamic awakening is a big swindle. Instead of an awakened morality we have gained a culture full of hypocrisy, dishonesty, and unreliability. And the more people focus solely on their prayers and rituals, and the more women decide to become muÈajjib§t (veiled), the more we will observe a decline in order and public morality.

16. The more people turn to the books of fiqh and the manuals of the medieval fuqah§”, such as al-Sh§fi#Ê’s al-Umm, or Ibn #$bidÊn’s \§shiyya, the more people are cut off from their natural disposition as laid out in the Book. Applied on the level of society, the more we rely on the political doctrines of our honourable scholars, the more politics will become undemocratic, authoritarian, and in flagrant violation of international law and universal human rights.

17. Isl§m and its three basic pillars exist for all people in this world. What Sårat al-An#§m prescribes are general human values that are applicable to everyone (e.g., the prohibition of usury and the maÈ§rim marriage rules). It implies that all must adhere to them— including secularists and liberalists—but, most importantly, politicians of whatever country. The ethical and moral values of a l-isl§m should influence the legal and political sphere of a society, but they should not force religion into politics, in the sense that state and government rule in favour of just one religious community and discriminate against others. Religious rituals should remain untouched by human legislation, inasmuch as the state’s concern for the material (this-worldly) welfare of its citizens should not be affected by the theological aspirations of one specific religious group. Even if all of a political party’s followers are devout religionists, this party should not just promote the interests of one specific Êm§n, but must care for the interests of all people, based on the ideals of isl§m.

18. It is morally, theologically, and intellectually dishonest to declare suicide missions to be part of istishh§d, promising young men and women the status of a shahÊd. No one but God is allowed to take life. Suicide bombings are against all rules of military combat and competition that requires the existence of two opposing sides. It is the task of humankind to prolong life, not to shorten it by whatever feeble justification. The real act of istishh§d does not take place on the battlefield but in the courtrooms of civil magistrates and in police stations where statements of (living) witnesses are given. Suicide missions are merely imitations of the Japanese kamikaze pilots who crashed to their deaths. This is alien to anything that al-isl§m stands for. Isl§m is a religion of life, not of death.

19. Our honourable scholars are spreading a mentality of conformism which persuades the masses to do what they are told by their religious leaders. They do not want to hear critical questions from their followers and prefer their brains to be completely switched off. They encourage the proliferation of the herd instinct which makes people feel insecure when they are not cuddled into the warmth of group conformity. People behave like sheep who hurry into mainstream (thinking) at the bark of the shepherd’s dogs (the mullahs, Imams, and leaders of sectarian groups). It will require an intellectual revolution to change this mentality of conformity and promote individuality and originality in thought and practice by both the men in the street and the most ordinary sharÊ#a student.

 Loyalty in Islam and the Question of Personal and Collective Identities

Current public discourse about Islamic identity in the Arab-Muslim world is marked by an enormous number of terminological inaccuracies and deliberate conceptual mystifications. People seem to constantly confuse their religious identity with their ethnic, national, political, or ideological affiliations, thereby blurring the boundaries of what constitutes a religious community, a racial group, a nation, a people, a political party, or an ideological movement. However, we cannot blame these people because the same confusion of terms and identities can be found in the books of our tur§th heritage. For many centuries, our honourable scholars have been discarding the clear distinctions that the Book made and, driven by the logic of party policies and sectarian strife, have concocted a religio-political amalgam that indiscriminately fuses religious, ethnic, and political identities. In this section, we want to complete our study of the relationship between religion and politics by looking at the concepts of wal§” and bar§”, which are both closely linked to the other concepts so far discussed in this chapter. Identity is expressed either through a sense of likeness (wal§”) or otherness (bar§”). It will therefore be necessary to define terms that describe the (multiple) identities of a person, as member of a family, clan, tribe, community, people, nation, and such, which we will do by closely adhering to the clear distinctions that the Book has drawn. We will, for example, examine the way the Book treats the term umma (community) as a sociological category. We will learn that a community is a group of people who share the same ideological convictions and behave similarly according to the group's shared cultural values. We notice that the followers of MuÈammad (ß) are described as such a community, as the umma of the Muslim-Believers. In contrast to the community, the term 'people' (qaum) refers to a body of persons who share the same language and ethnicity; we say, for example, the Arab people, the Turkish people, or the German people. Such a body is usually divided into several different (religious, political, and social) subunits, for example, communities, tribes, clans, and such. An Arab woman, on the other hand, belongs to the Arab people, but may also belong, in addition to her membership to her family, to a clan and a tribe, to a Marxist umma or to a Christian umma, or to the umma of the MuslimBelievers. A 'nation' (sha#b), on the other hand, is a more complex term as it refers to a self-defined cultural and social body that combines several languages (lis§n) and several ethnicities (qaum) with a multitude of ideological or religious communities (umma), but it is governed by a single political system and contained in a unified territory (the national homeland) which are both controlled and regulated within the realm of a nation-state (waãan). We will show that membership of each of these bodies is explicitly acknowledged by the Book and that the term a l-wal§" is uniquely employed in order to express the many different layers of personal and collective identities.

Al-wal§"

The Arabic term wal§" is derived from the root w-l-§, from which the Book has drawn 217 derivatives (e.g., walÊy; maulan; wil§ya; tawallin; muw§l§h): the first mentioned is in 2:64[454] and the last is in 96:13.[455] The semantic field of this verb root contains basically two (contradictory) meanings: a) a turn towards someone or something, and b) a turn away from someone or something. The first meaning is expressed in 5:56 and 2:115:

As to those who turn (for friendship) to God [yatawall[a] All§h], His Apostle, and the (fellowship of) believers—it is the fellowship of God that must certainly triumph. (Al-M§“ida 5:56)

To God belong the East and the West: whithersoever you turn [tuwallå], there is the presence of God. (Al-Baqara 2:115)

The second meaning is contained in 2:142 and 17:46:

The fools among the people will say: “What has turned them from [wall§hum #an] the qibla to which they were used?” (Al-Baqara 2:142) …when you do commemorate your Lord and Him alone in the Qur’an, they turn on their backs [wallau #al§ adb§rihim], fleeing (from the truth). (Al-Isr§” 17:46)

The terms al-walÊ and al-maul§ refer to a master or lord whose authority people are prepared to accept and willing to follow, that is, ‘to whom they turn’, and whose orders and prohibitions they obediently observe:

“For my protector is God [waliyÊy [a] All§h], who revealed the Book (from time to time), and He will choose and befriend [yatawall§] the righteous. (Al-A#r§f 7:196)

Behold! Verily on the friends of God [auliy§” All§h] there is no fear, nor shall they grieve. (Yånus 10:62)

Semantically and lexically, this is how the Book employs the terms that have their roots in w-l-§, and yet it is intriguing to see how differently al-wal§” has been defined as a technical term in Islamic fiqh (e.g., as ‘loyalty’). In this transition from a polysemous Qur’anic word to a rigidly defined terminus technicus of legal jurisprudence, al-wal§” shares the same destiny as other words and phrases we have discussed in this chapter (jih§d, qit§l, amr, nahy, ridda), so much so that these terms acquire nuances of meaning that did not exist in the Book—and this includes other words as well, such as #ulam§, fiqh, #ißma or taqiyya. This semantic shift has been completed to such a comprehensive degree that people today are no longer able to pierce through the hermeneutical covers that our noble scholars have put around the clear terminological core that Allah’s speech provided in His Book.

As we said above, al-wal§” is situated inside the semantic field of an apparent self-contradiction: it either means, a) a turn towards, or b) a turn away. We need to establish the object of such a turn, either towards or away. We also have to explore whether this move, towards or away, is meant to be purely intellectual or mental, or whether it also involves a practical, physical, and hence sociopolitical turn. In other words, we need to establish whether al-wal§” is an individual, personal feeling of belonging (that has no social consequences) or a social act of collective membership (that has huge social implications), or, perhaps, whether it is both at the same time. If it is a form of social behaviour, we need to ask whether al-wal§” is ‘a turn’ that is manifested in ostentatious acts of approval or disapproval or, rather, whether it is a psychological state of mind that influences but does not totally control our social and political activities. If al-wal§” is articulated on a collective level, how does it affect the relationship between the individual and his community, people, or nation but also his tribe, clan, and family? Finally, how does the Book harmonise the concept of al-wal§” with the notion of al-ta#§ruf, God’s will that ‘nations and tribes have been created that they know each other (and not despise each other)’?[456] Does a l-wal§” govern a l-ta#§ruf, or does al-ta#§ruf govern al-wal§”?

We begin by stating that a l-wal§” expresses a form of social identity that is realised first as a decision by an individual who wants to stay in a relationship with someone else. This can be a relationship between a master and his pupil who (intentionally and voluntarily) decides to follow his master and to imitate his behaviour. We are told that ‘to each is a goal to which God turns him (muwallÊh§); then strive together (as in a race) towards all that is good…’ (Al-Baqara 2:148). On a more advanced level, a l-wal§” is expressed as social behaviour, which means that a person’s decision is now embodied as social practice. If this social behaviour is shared by other people, for example, if the guidance and instructions by the leader of a group are widely accepted and observed by each of its members, if they constitute ‘goals to which they strive together’ (2:148), al-wal§” is articulated on the level of a community. The Book provides the term umma, as in 3:110. The community here shares the same goal, that is, ‘to prescribe what is right and proscribe what is wrong’, while the community also shares the same ideology, that is, ‘to believe in God’.[457] The identity of this community is relatively stable. Differences of opinion are permitted but they never deteriorate to the extent that they turn into antagonisms that endanger the group’s collective identity. (‘All people were originally one single community [ummat [an]], but later they differed…’, Yånus 10:19, AH.) The term umma can also be used to refer to smaller social units, for example, to a group, circle or club. But its defining characteristic is always that its members share a common activity, as in 28:23, where the ‘group of men in Madyan’ were all ‘watering their flocks’. [458] Furthermore, the Book says:

Abraham was indeed a model [ummat [an]], devoutly obedient to God, (and) true in faith, and he joined not gods with God: * He showed his gratitude for the favours of God, who chose him, and guided him to a straight way. * And We gave him good in this world, and he will be, in the Hereafter, in the ranks of the righteous. * So We have taught you the inspired (message), “Follow the ways of Abraham the true in faith, and he joined not gods with God.” (Al-NaÈl 16:120–3)

The verse describes Abraham as a model for a community (umma) which God wants us to emulate. Abraham’s model, his distinctive social behaviour, is characterised by four aspects: a) devout obedience to God; b) ÈanÊfiyya attitude in general and ÈanÊfiyya rejection of idolatry in particular; c) gratitude for the favours of God; and d) guidance to the straight path. Allah’s command to follow Abraham’s model was sent down as revelation directly into MuÈammad’s (ß) brain. The Book describes Abraham even as an ‘im§m to the nations’,[459] and it says k§n[a] ummat [an], implying that he embodies a collective identity—that his behaviour represents a path, course, or tradition that unites people who belong to his umma.[460] God has made it incumbent on everyone to follow his example (“Follow the ways of Abraham the true in faith…”, A l-NaÈl 16:123). Verses 16:120 and 16:123 reiterate twice why we should emulate Abraham’s example: because ‘he joined not gods with God’. This constitutes the shared value of Abraham’s community. A full commitment to this value expresses a person’s wal§” (likeness) to this community. If we look around and see who today would belong to Abraham’s ÈanÊfiyya community that does ‘not join gods with God’, we would have to frankly admit that we (Muslim-Believers) are the lowest ÈanÊfiyya community in the entire world and, hence, closer to committing shirk than any other community on earth. It is a truism to say that the more ÈanÊfiyya religiosity there is the less is there the possibility of shirk, but the reality is that in the Arab-Muslim world there is very little ÈanÊfiyya and a great deal of shirk.

If a l-wal§” expresses a social relationship based on a personal sense of likeness to someone who is both your guide and teacher, we need to establish the identity of such a guide or teacher and the role he or she fulfils. A direct instruction in this respect can be found in the following verse:

Your guardian [walÊyukum] can be only Allah; and His messenger and those who believe, who establish worship and pay the poor-due, and bow down (in prayer). (Al-M§“ida 5:55; MP)[461]

This verse demands adherence firstly to Allah, secondly to His messenger, and thirdly to those who believe. As for Allah, adherence is expressed by obedience to the Lord, by doing what He has ordered, and by refraining from what He has forbidden. As for adherence to His messenger, this is expressed by confirming MuÈammad’s messengerhood, by following what it prescribes as model behaviour—in the same way as MuÈammad (ß) once took Abraham as a model he wanted to follow—and by adhering to what was revealed to him by his Lord. As for adherence to ‘those who believe’, this means support for a group of people whose behaviour is characterised by three things: a) they believe in God and bow down (in prayer), b) they establish worship, and c) they pay zak§h. Adherence requires acquiescence, and acquiescence requires obedience. Obedience is undoubtedly one fundamental aspect of al-wal§”, which is shown in the form of both a positive affirmation (of what has been prescribed) and a negative refraining (from what has been proscribed). This is confirmed by the following verse:

O you who believe! Obey Allah, and obey the messenger and those of you who are in authority [ålÊ al-amr]... (Al-Nis§” 4:59, MP)

If we now compare 4:59 with 5:55, quoted in the previous paragraph, the parallel structure is immediately striking:

5:55 Your guardian can be only Allah | His messenger | and those who believe |

| 4:59 Obey Allah | His messenger | and those of you who are in authority | This parallelism suggests that ‘those of you who are in authority’ in 4:59 are defined as ‘those who believe’ in 5:55. Allah’s instruction orders us to show our ‘likeness’ (wal§”) to them by a) believing in God, b) bowing down in prayer, and c) paying zak§h. This implies that al-wal§” here (on the level of a community) requires conformity in terms of ritual practice and charitable activities. Now we understand the verse: ‘The Jews and the Christians will never be pleased with you unless you follow their ways (millatahum)’ (A l-Baqara 2:120, AH), because they practiced different rituals and different forms of charitable donations. In any case, verse 4:59 does not refer, as some claim, to political allegiance, and the phrase ‘those of you who are in authority’ (ålÊ ’l-amr) does not refer to those in power, that is, a ruler or government to which we should pledge allegiance. The Book defines group identity on the level of a religious community, not political loyalty on the level of a nation-state. This verse has been unjustifiably politicised by the opportunist fuqah§” who unashamedly wanted to please their masters by providing them with a legal cover for their despotic rule that required an ideology of political quietism and absolute obedience to a ruling tyrant.

Our definition of a l-wal§” in terms of a personal decision expressed through social relations implies the existence of a human society with its diverse networks and interconnectivities. Al-wal§” does not exist if someone is stranded on a desert island because there is no possible social relationship that can bear the fruits of his personal attitudes. Some people claim that in such circumstances al-wal§” must be shown to God, and this applies to even the most isolated monk in his cell or to someone hidden in the cellar of a house. Their argument is that all of them are God’s creation and they should make their a l-wal§” known to their Creator. This view, however, confuses the relationship between the Creator and His creation with the relationship between God and the believers. Whereas the relationship between God and His creation can be denied only by those who completely deny the existence of God, the relationship between God and the believers operates on a completely different level (of religious commitment). The confusion between the two is apparent in the widespread custom among Muslim-Believers to connect their sons’ names with one of the ninety-nine beautiful attributes of God, such as #Abd al-D§“im (slave of the Everlasting) or #Abd al-Maujåd (slave of the Existing) and assume thereby a special relationship between their sons as ‘slaves’ to a personified God, ‘their’ God. They ignore that the Book provides these attributes for the description of the entire universe in which all creation, believers and non-believers, live. Only when Allah is called by the names of al-walÊ or al-maul§ is it done exclusively for the benefit of those who believe in Him (and not for all His creation). This is clearly expressed in the following verse:

God is the protector [walÊ] of those who have faith: from the depths of darkness He will lead them forth into light. Of those who reject faith the patrons are the evil ones: from light they will lead them forth into the depths of darkness… (Al-Baqara 2:257)

In contrast, God in His capacity as Creator, is the walÊ for all humankind, whether they believe in Him or not. This is different from a l-wal§” that requires a conscious act of allegiance which only rational and sane people can perform, in contrast to the animals and the insane who just follow by instinct or habit.

As verse 49:13 makes clear, humankind is organised in many different ways: by their sex or social class and/or by their communal, tribal, and national affiliations. If a community (umma) is characterised by the relatively homogenous behaviour of its members, a tribe, or a nation, and so on, are obviously characterised by other criteria. We will have to establish these criteria in order to be able to discuss the different features of a l-wal§” with regard to each type of these social categories.

Looking at the general evolution of humankind we observe that even before a l-wal§” became articulated in social relationships, its dual composition of either affirmation or negation was always part of the natural set-up of living beings. Even before God breathed His spirit into His creation, through which animals turned into human beings capable of rational thought and social interaction, a social instinct had always been (naturally) instilled in them. When humans became God’s deputies on earth, their instinctive form of a l-wal§” acquired a new social dimension which had not existed before: they organised themselves into families, clans, and tribes. This new stage of social organisation was underscored by the existence of a social ideology that fostered humans’ social identification with these new social types (families, clans, and tribes). The aim of social ideologies was to hold the different articulations of a l-wal§” in harmony with human beings’ social instincts. Because of the fact that social organisations often create tensions between the demands of a society and the demands of nature, these social ideologies were needed in order to ease these tensions and stimulate a cultural context in which nature and society were not seen as antagonistically contradicting each other. Many verses in the Book fulfil this purpose:

1. And admonish thy nearest kinsmen. (Al-Shu#ar§” 26:214)

2. That day shall a man flee from his own brother, * and from his mother and his father, * and from his wife and his children. (#Abasa 80:36)

3. And Abraham prayed for his father’s forgiveness only because of a promise he had made to him… (Al-Tawba 9:114)

4. And when Abraham was tried by his Lord with certain commandments which he fulfilled, He said: “I am making you a spiritual exemplar to mankind.”… (Al-Baqara 2:124, MF)

5. Noah called out to his Lord, saying, ‘My Lord, my son was one of my family, though your promise is true, and you are the most just of all judges.’ (Håd 11:45, AH)

The first verse is addressed to God’s noble Prophet (ß). It advises him to start his call to believe in God and the Last Day with his nearest kinship. This advice corresponds with the natural order of social interaction that is instinctively part of the psychological and social nature of human beings. Human beings would naturally first start with those closest to them in their families: parents, brothers, sisters, spouses, (male and female) children, uncles, aunts, nieces, nephews, grandparents, and grandchildren etc.

The second verse describes the horrors of the Day of Resurrection. It describes the fear that the dead will feel when they congregate in order to be summoned by their Lord. It is the day when the wet nurse will abandon her suckling infant and men their closest relatives. Preoccupied with their own fate, people will forsake the wal§” to their family and clan, that is, they ‘flee from brother, mother, father, wife and children’, as 80:36 says, which provides a more elaborate description of ‘kinship’ than 26:214. In a different verse, men’s closest relatives are given the term ‘kindred’ (faßÊla), to whom they show wal§” because they are given ‘shelter’, that is, help and protection.[462] We deduce from the Book’s description of the Day of Resurrection that the wal§” to one’s own family and clan is the strongest form of social bond; it will last longer than any other relationship and only break if shattered by the might of these eschatological events.

The third verse describes two things: first, the obligation to show respect to one’s parents regardless of circumstances. We are given the example of Abraham’s prayer for forgiveness to his father (Azar). This is in spite of the fact that Allah does not forgive those who have committed shirk against Him (although Abraham could not have known this then). Second, the verse refers to the task to include into one’s call for belief in God even those family and clan members who are opposed to the call and are even prepared to fight it. We hear from the same verse: ‘…but when it became clear to him that he was an enemy to God, he dissociated himself (tabarra”a) from him…’.[463] The verse describes an attitude that requires the caller of God to become detached from those who oppose his faith. It is a form of withdrawal that does not involve any harshness or hardheartedness. We are told that even when faced with his father’s shirk ‘…Abraham was most tender-hearted, forbearing’ (Al-Tawba 9:114). It is rather a form of unengaged neutrality that still keeps the relationship intact but at the same time makes it clear that one does not endorse the position of the God-deniers. Through such disengagement the caller expresses his ‘otherness’ (al-bar§”) which is the opposite to the ‘likeness’ (al-wal§”) that is shown when in the company of like-minded people.

The fourth verse continues the (family) theme of the third verse but extends Abraham’s wal§” to his descendents. By the power of what was naturally given to him, Abraham wanted to secure for his descendants the same role of spiritual exemplars as that by which Allah had made him so special among humankind: ‘Abraham said: “And what about my posterity?” He replied: “My covenant does not apply to the evil-doers”’, implying God’s reluctance to secure privileges on the basis of lineage and pedigree. God objects to the principle of primogeniture and dynastic succession in deciding a nation’s im§m (the verse’s term for spiritual leadership), because the im§mate must be earned and cannot be inherited.

The fifth verse states a similar plea to assist members of a family. While 9:114 contains a petition for Abraham’s father, and 2:124 for Abraham’s descendants, 11:45 states Noah’s call to his Lord to forgive his son. In all three cases the pleas were issued because of the strong feeling of likeness (al-wal§”) that Abraham and Noah felt for their close relatives. The differences, however, between the pleas of Abraham and Noah are threefold: First, Abraham’s prayer for forgiveness was motivated by a promise that he had made to himself, as we hear in the verse: ‘Abraham said: “Peace be on you: I will pray to my Lord for your forgiveness: for He is to me most gracious’ (Maryam 19:47). In contrast, Noah’s plea was based on the promise (of truth regarding the parentage of Noah’s son) that Allah Himself gave. Second, God’s intention in addressing Abraham’s plea was to stress that the spiritual authority of the im§mate cannot be inherited by birth, while the intention in Noah’s case was to remind us that salvation by Allah’s command does not come to anyone without the delivery of good deeds. Noah is told that God’s command of rescue comes to him ‘… and [his] family—except those against whom the word has already gone forth… (Håd 11:40), that is, his son who might have betrayed his wife, therefore, God said: ‘“O Noah! He is not of your family: for his conduct is unrighteous…”’ (Håd 11:46). Third, Noah’s case contained an additional element, a warning that excessive forms of family loyalty could turn a blessed institution (kinship solidarity) into a cursed form of blind tribalism and zealous partisanship: ‘I give you counsel, lest you act like the ignorant!’ (Håd 11:46).

A family is defined as a small social unit that forms the nucleus of a genealogical line, that is, those who belong—seen from within a patriarchal system—to the father of the family (the wife and children). A clan unites all families that are descendants of the same grandfather, while a tribe unites all clans, divided into the buãån and afkh§dh subclans, which have a common ancestor. A l-wal§” to all three of those social institutions is a very natural form of association that is experienced and sustained according to the prevailing cultural traditions and inherited customs. Successive messengers, beginning with Noah (#a) and ending with MuÈammad (ß), with Abraham, Moses, Jesus, and others in between, have issued revelations that gradually purified these family-based forms of al-wal§”, refining them within the divine parameters of mutual support, coexistence, and cooperation—as 49:13 puts it.[464] The phrase ‘verily the most honoured of you in the sight of God is (he who is) the most righteous of you’ again stresses the necessity of doing good deeds for God’s blessing and deliverance. Based on this gradual improvement of familybased wal§”, God’s messengers were then eventually allowed to produce a new type of wal§” that goes beyond blood-related affiliations, because it is based on an intellectua l-doctrinal commitment that requests a higher form of loyalty. The Book says:

Say: If it be that your fathers, your sons, your brothers, your mates, or your kindred; the wealth that you have gained; the commerce in which you fear a decline; or the dwellings in which you delight—are dearer to you than God, or His Apostle, or the striving in His cause; then wait until God brings about His decision. And God guides not the rebellious. (Al-Tawba 9:24)

Verse 49:13 states that Allah ‘made [us] into nations (shu#åb[an]) and tribes’, indicating a level of social organisation that is superior to the institutions of family, clan, and tribe. The nation (sha#b, pl. shu#åb, derived from the root sh-#-b, meaning ‘to gather’ or ‘to assemble’), is defined as a body of people who share the same form of social system but who may differ in their ethnic and tribal origins. This is in contrast to ‘people’ (al-qaum), which is characterised by sharing the same language and hence a similar way of thinking and expressing thoughts. We are told that Allah ‘sent not an apostle except (to teach) in the language of his (own) people (bi-lis§n qaumihi), in order to make (things) clear to them…’ (Ibr§hÊm 14:4). In contrast with the wal§” to families, clans, and tribes, which is based on blood relationship and ethnic identity, the wal§” to a nation or a people is based on aspects of identity that are not determined by one’s birth. In some instances, ethnic origins may coincide with national, linguistic, and political identities (as in the case of Pakistani Sunni Muslim-Believers living in Pakistan), in other instances these different identities might not overlap (as for Pakistani Sunni Muslim-Believers living in Great Britain).

* Concluding Remarks on al-wal§” wa’l-bar§”

Let us sum up the most important results of our study. It has been shown that al-wal§” is derived from w-l-§ whose semantic field in the Book is characterised by an oppositional move between engagement (turning towards) and disengagement (turning away). This has been demonstrated by the quotation of a number of verses from the Book. It has also been shown that al-wal§” is articulated in concrete social relationships which human beings enter (or leave) after they have made a personal decision whether to commit themselves to this relationship or to disengage from it. This has also been supported by several verses from the Book. Such social commitment can be seen on several levels of collective institutions, for example, on the level of an umma (community) which is defined by a relative unity of beh aviour and conformity of thinking, or on the level of a family, clan, or tribe which is characterised by a unity of the social system that governs the behaviour of all its members. Finally, we reached the conclusion that the divine messages of successive apostles, culminating in the messengerhood of MuÈammad (ß), added a new type of social identity that transcended the level of family, clan, and tribe and introduced the notions of nation and people which required a higher, more abstract (or intellectual) commitment, and which neither abolished nor even contradicted the existing identities based on genealogy and blood relationship. History provides us with several examples of mutually overlapping identities, as for example with Hamza #Abd al-Muããalib, the uncle of the Prophet (ß), whose religious faith grew out of his family commitment and his animosities with Abå Jahl,[465] or the example of #Abdall§h b. ArÊqaã whose encounters with the Prophet (ß) and Abå Bakr (r) on the day of the hijra made his moral commitment (to the values of sincerity, loyalty, and altruism) grow so strongly that in the end they outweighed his former doctrinal commitment.[466] Similar is the case of al-Kh§ãib b. AbÊ Balta#a after his encounter with the Prophet (ß) and his people on the day of the conquest of Mecca.[467]

We conclude with a few comments that are drawn from the material we have presented. Firstly, the different social identities can coexist side by side and no one should be forced to abandon the one for the other. To accept social identities—beyond those based on blood relationship—is a matter of personal choice which should be taken individually and without force or interference from outside. The way these different identities are prioritised is also a matter of personal choice and varies from individual to individual. It has been a great danger that Islamist theories of the Islamic umma have tried to construct a unified Islamic identity—solely at the level of community— and to slice off aspects of Muslim-Believers’ other identities, such as their national and political identities, by defaming them as secondary or even contradictory to their religio-communal identity.

As a serious consequence of such misguided theories many Muslim-Believers thought that it is a duty of their religion to show loyalty only to their religious community and that a good believer drops all interest (and responsibility) to their families, nonbelieving friends, neighbourhoods, and schools. In extreme cases Muslim-Believers even turned to violence against their own people in pursuing the Islamists' cause— as happened in London, Madrid, Casablanca, Sham El-Sheikh, and Amman. Islamist propaganda made Pakistani youth in Great Britain feel guilty when they were happily combining their identities of being British, Pakistani, and Muslim-Believers. It confused young Turkish girls and boys in Germany when they were told that they should feel first and foremost as Muslim-Believers and that loyalty to German society is a betrayal to their religion. It misled so many French Muslim-Believers who heard from their Islamist Imams that their loyalty should be only with their fighting brothers in the Muslim world rather than with the country in which they were born and bred. The Islamists want us to have one single identity behind which they can nurture their dreams of a totalitarian society in which plurality is suppressed and otherness eradicated. This fundamentally contradicts the teachings of the Book which allows us to possess multiple identities and to live a mode of existence where both MuslimAssenters and Muslim-Believers overcome repressive forms of single identities. The Prophet (ß) himself acted successfully on the basis of several identities: he belonged to the smaller clan of the Banå #Abd al-Muããalib and the wider clan of the Banå H§shim; his tribe was that of the Quraish; he belonged to the Arab people (qaum), while his nation (sha#b) was, after his hijra from Mecca, the people of Medina, which included both believers and nonbelievers (e.g., Jews); and finally he founded the state in Medina where Muslim-Believers who followed his prophethood and attested his messengerhood constituted the umma that existed inside his multireligious state. Today, people can follow the example of the Prophet (ß) by accepting the possibility of multiple identities. As a Turkish Muslim-Believer in Germany, an Arab Muslim-Believer in France, or a Pakistani MuslimBeliever in Great Britain one follows the example of the Prophet (ß) by protecting first and foremost the welfare and safety of the country in which one has gained citizenship. Loyalty to the state—and this includes the right to fiercely criticise its government and administration—is a matter of absolute priority. As the example of MuÈammad's first state shows, such loyalty does not eliminate or even diminish loyalty to one's cultural tradition (language and customs), ethnic roots, or religious beliefs. The Prophet (ß) would not have accepted a Muslim-Believer who risked the welfare and safety of the state by exclusively adhering to religion and completely ignoring other loyalties.

Fortunately, more and more young Muslim-Believers in Europe realise that the exclusivist ideology of a l-Q§#ida and other Islamist groups have driven them unnecessarily to the brink of high treason when they were asked to place loyalty to their religion above loyalty to their home nation. They now realise that Allah's Book wants them instead to negotiate the sometimes difficult and often ambiguous relationship between religious and other identities and not combat one with the other. Even if their host societies make the mistake of perceiving Muslim-Believers primarily through their religious identity, it would be foolish to correspond to this stereotype and accept such discrimination. It is socially and economically always counterproductive to play the religious card and withdraw from society or dream of a paradisiacal life in a so-called d§r al-isl§m (which was an invention of the fuqah§" in any case!). Instead, Muslim-Believers should show that they first and foremost feel loyal to the constitution of their countries and that they are willing to harmonise their roles as citizens with their duties of a religious believer—as, by the way, everyone else does as well (Jews, Christian, Hindus, and Buddhists)— and that their religion is not different in this respect from any other religion in this world.

The Meccan verse urging MuÈammad (ß) to first 'admonish [his] nearest kinsmen' (26:214) demonstrates God's wisdom and foresight, given that it was very sensible for the Prophet (ß) to start his call with his own Arab people before taking it to other people who had an entirely different ethnic, linguistic, geographical, social, or national background. God eventually told him (ß): 'We sent you not but as a mercy for all creatures' (Al-Anbiy§" 21:107). Eventually, this introduced a form of wal§" that went beyond all existing forms of identities and social relationships.[468] On this basis, a new state was created by the Prophet (ß). Its new forms of social organisation and its principles of a multitude of identities differed from everything that had existed before on the political landscape of ancient Arabia. It is our hope that at some point in the near future these forms and principles can be revitalised and reintroduced into all societies of the Arab-Muslim world.

482 chapter six

 Conclusion

In the introduction to this volume we proposed to submit a radically new interpretation of Allah’s Book. We stressed the fact that our interpretation fundamentally questions what has been held sacrosanct in Islamic theology and jurisprudence. It is our hope that we could demonstrate to the reader that such a new interpretation is not only badly needed but also indeed possible provided that one succeeds in applying consistently a methodology that is different from the scholarly methods of our medieval ancestors. For the sake of full clarity as far as this methodology is concerned, we conclude this volume with a summary of the most important aspects that lie at the heart of our approach and that formed the foundation from which we developed a rereading of the individual verses of the Book.

1. The main task of our study was to demonstrate that there is no other way to understand the text but through rational analysis. By rational analysis we mean a study of the text whose results correspond with the objective reality around us. In this volume we have shown that any interpretation that contradicts reality is nonrational and undermines the purpose of Allah’s revelation which was sent down ‘so that people understand’.

2. We have shown that the truth of a text does not lie in its aesthetic or rhetorical beauty but in the substance and truthfulness of its content. Human ideas are either true or false only if they are assessed by the limits of philosophical thinking. The validity or falsity of a statement does not rely on whether it is linguistically or logically correct or incorrect. A lie, for example, can be expressed quite logically in the most beautiful, aesthetically pleasing way and still remain untrue. Thus, a rhetorically powerful sentence does not necessarily have to be true. That is why, in explaining the miraculous nature (al-i#j§z) of the Book, we did not just refer to its rhetorical or stylistic beauty. Instead, we referred to our belief that the content of the Qur’anic message is true and valid. Everyone who devotes his or her life to certifying the truthfulness of the Book, that is, the eternal validity of Allah’s laws, is one of those ‘who certify the truth’ (al-ßiddÊqån). It has now become clear to the reader of this volume that we were more concerned with the truthfulness and authenticity of the Qur’anic text than with the beauty and stylistic finesse of its expressions. Also, to attest to the authenticity of the divine text has been more important to us than to attest to the validity of the many (human) sources of the Islamic tradition, whether their authors are highly reputable or not.

3. When the Book was revealed it represented a new level of linguistic evolution. It displayed textual qualities that j§hiliyya Arabs had not known before. It contained vocabulary of nonArabic origins that j§hiliyya poetry had not used. It was arranged in a composition that is different from the entire textual corpus of the j§hiliyya period. In this volume we have therefore not used the common exegetical strategy to refer to j§hiliyya poetry in order to explain the text of the Book. We believe that this poetry reflects the specific cultural characteristics of its period, and its poetical expressions are only beneficial and pleasing for the people who lived at that time. It is therefore of no use for our contemporary understanding of the text. In j§hiliyya poetry we find, for example, no reference to the earth’s gravity or its roundness because Arabs then had not known anything about that. In our study we have instead applied the principle that the authenticity of Allah’s Book is confirmed by modern scientific discoveries and not by its aesthetic impact. In adding new discoveries to our knowledge, human societies take part in constructing the meaning of the text inasmuch as they find in the text the discoveries they have just made. No matter how rapidly societies develop, human beings will always remain in perfect harmony with the Qur’anic text, because creation evolves in the cosmic orbit which the qur”§n prescribes. To go back to j§hiliyya poetry would mean a regress in knowledge and a return to a primitive, premodern understanding of the divine text.

4. We have shown that the Book guarantees complete congruence between its content and the reality of our existence, including the laws of nature and the universe as well as the innate disposition of human beings. Nothing that the Book contains have we treated as insignificant, trivial, or banal. Divine revelation, by definition, is always of the utmost importance to human beings and can never lose its relevance, regardless of the circumstances in which it is perceived. One does not need revelation in order to learn, for example, that a jar will break if smashed to the ground. And one does not need revelation to learn that an elephant's tail is short and that its trunk is long. Let us look at another example which we have not yet discussed. We read in verse 196 of Sårat a l-Baqara that 'if he [the pilgrim] lacks the means, he should fast for three days during the pilgrimage, and seven days on his return, making ten days in all…' [AH]. We should not assume, as many exegetes did, that Allah wants to teach us here such trivial sums as three plus seven equals ten. Everyone, whether clever or stupid, would know that; no revelation is needed for such triviality. If we took away the ending phrase 'in all' (k§milat[un]) it would not change its message that three plus seven equals ten. But we are not allowed, as we explained, to take anything away from the text without changing its semantic meaning. The Book is purposefully composed; not a single syllable in it is redundant or insignificant. Hence, we cannot accept that the phrase 'in all' (k§milat[un]) does not change the meaning of the verse; thus, we need to find a different interpretation for it. We believe that the text here alludes to the existence of several different numeric systems. There is, for example, the decimal system, the seven-number system, the twelve-number system, and the sixteen-number system. In a twelve-number system, the number ten would have an inferior value—expressed as 10/12—compared to a ten in a decimal system, expressed as 10/10 or as one whole (k§milat[un]). We conclude that this verse contains not only the number of days to be fasted but also the identity of the number system (the decimal system) to be used for the calculation of the actual number of the fasting days.

5. The Book constitutes 'being' (al-kaynåna) in-and-for-itself, derived from Allah. As we have shown in chapter 2 it points to its selfsufficient existence, that is, 'being' without change or interference from external factors. This ontological quality is expressed in the eternal stability of the text, not in terms of its meaning but in terms of its linguistic, visual, and acoustic form. Its form will never change and is therefore not subject to ‘becoming’ (al-ßairåra) and ‘progressing’ (al-sairåra). No one, not even a prophet or a messenger, is able to grasp the total meaning of the Book because this would imply partnership with Allah in His self-sufficient ‘being’. Instead, we become gradually acquainted with its content through the process of ‘becoming’, that is, through a gradual growth and expansion of our knowledge.

We believe that the text of the Book is fixed but that its content moves. Its content moves because every reader will approach the text differently. Some will find things in the text that others do not, and some are better than others at understanding specific passages of the text. Even if the text’s form itself is fixed, its content displays the flexible qualities of everyday life that constantly changes. To put it differently, even if the text constitutes self-sufficient ‘being’, it contains sufficient ‘becoming’ and ‘progressing’ for its readers. Hence, the Book always allows its readers to understand the text in a contemporary manner (qir§“a mu#§ßira). Whether a reader approaches the text in the twelfth century or the twentieth century, the resulting interpretations will have been ‘contemporary’. Even if the two readings occurred at different times in history, both readers have realised to the same extent the logic of the dialectics between the form of the text and its content. In the twenty-first century, however, both readings have lost the status of ‘contemporary’, as a new, more contemporary reading is required for our current century.

6. The Book is the indirect speech of God (kal§m All§h). Our interpretations of the many verses of the Book are based on the understanding that we grasp the meaning of God’s speech through His words (kalim§t All§h) that exist in our universe. The words of Allah have both a natural and historical component, since they encapsulate all the universal laws that govern cosmos, nature, and human society. Through the study of these universal laws, manifested in our objective human and natural reality, we learn to know the words of Allah (kalim§t) through which, in turn, we come to learn His speech (kal§m). The words of Allah and His speech are not the same thing. While His speech represents self-sufficient ‘being’, which is eternally fixed, his words, that is, nature and human existence, are subject to ‘becoming’ and ‘progressing’. This means that our understanding of Allah’s speech is changing and developing because Allah’s words are changing and progressing, while the speech of Allah is fixed. Allah’s speech is present in the ‘being’ of the fixed divine text of the Book.

7. We have treated the Book as a guide for all humankind and a blessing for ‘the worlds’. It has a universal character and is not just an expression of Arabic thought. Its criterion of authenticity is applicable to the entire world, not just to some Arab societies. And it must carry this criterion for the entire span of time and history, not just for the prophetical period and the time of the Prophet’s companions. In addition, the Book has two further qualities:

a. Its revelation does not contradict reason.

b. Its revelation does not contradict reality.

8. The qur”§n verifies the existence of the material basis of human knowledge. The philosophical foundation of our interpretations is that knowledge (#ilm) is derived from what is known (ma#låm) in objective reality, that is, acquired through empirical data, implying that we receive information (ma#låm§t) from outside the human mind through sense perception or through revelation or inspiration. Both scientific sense perception and revelation/inspiration are based on empirical observations of our objective reality. But whereas the former is restricted to an observation of the present, the latter allows observations within a wider temporal framework and includes things of the past and the future. The inverse process, that empirical knowledge of objective reality (ma#låm) is derived from knowledge (#ilm), that is, the possibility of knowledge without sense perception or revelation/inspiration, does not apply to human beings and is the sole prerogative of Allah.

9. The foundation of human life is freedom. Freedom is the highest and most sacrosanct ideal of humankind. The notion of religion we have proposed in this volume is based on the conviction that the worship of God has its secret seat in the freedom that human beings enjoy. It is a form of existence or word of God (kalimat All§h) that existed even before this world was inhabited. The purpose of Allah's creation was to continue this form of existence and to set His creation free. The idea that believers are God's slaves is fundamentally and categorically false.

10. The Book contains 'between its two covers' MuÈammad's (ß) prophethood and MuÈammad's (ß) messengerhood, designating the two different roles of either prophet or messenger. We have shown that the verses of prophethood (§y§t al-nubåwa) explain the laws of this universe, the laws of historical development, and the stories of previous prophets and messengers. Their inherent quality allows for approval and disapproval. The verses of messengerhood (§y§t a l-ris§la) explain the legal injunctions, orders, and prohibitions. Their inherent quality allows for obedience and disobedience. The verses of prophethood are called the ambiguous verses (al-mutash§bih§t); their outward textual form is fixed but their content is moving. This means that they can be constantly reread in the light of new progress in our knowledge of nature and the universe. This may happen throughout the entire history of humankind. The verses of messengerhood are called the unambiguous or definite verses (a l-muÈkam§t); they are valid at all times but are never to be fixed once and for all. They are to be implemented within the limits that Allah has set and in the light of changing cultural, social, and political circumstances. It has been stressed that we are allowed to exercise ijtih§d so that the verses of messengerhood always remain in harmony with the objective realities that have been newly introduced into human societies. Ijtih§d has to be carried out within the confinements of the divine text.

11. The legal injunctions of the Book, as exemplified in chapters 3 and 4, are to be implemented within the limits that Allah has set (Èudåd All§h). There are two types of rules and their implementation: 1) human beings are not allowed to step over these limits even if they are allowed to stand on them. That is applicable, as we have shown, to the question of inheritance in verses 13 and 14 of Sårat al-Nis§": 'These are the limits of Allah…But whoever disobeys Allah and His messenger and transgresses his bounds, He will admit him into the Fire' [MF]; 2) human beings are not allowed to stand on the boundaries, not even to come close to them, as we gave the example of verse 187 of Sårat al-Baqara that instructs us how to fast: 'Eat and drink until you can discern the white thread from the black thread of dawn. Then complete the fast till nightfall […]; those are the bounds of Allah; do not approach them' [MF]. We learn that the fast is like a time field: it has a beginning which is the moment when you can discern the white thread from the black thread of dawn, and an ending which is the night. Allah instructs us not to come near its borders, neither at the beginning nor at the end. Instead, we are supposed to keep a safe distance of a couple of seconds both before dawn and after sunset.

12. We have shown the need to rethink the notion of abrogation in the Book. As such, there are no abrogating or abrogated verses that were stated within a one single messengerhood. Every verse owns an area for itself, and every injunction possesses a legal space in which it operates independently. However, based on verse 106 of Sårat a l-Baqara, which says 'whichever verse We abrogate or cause [over long periods of time] to be forgotten, We bring instead a better or similar one. Did you not know that Allah has the power over all things?' [MF], we maintain that abrogation did occur but only between different systems of legislation. There had been, for example, the legal proscriptions in Moses' sharÊ#a which were abrogated by the legal proscriptions as issued in the sharÊ#a of Jesus. We have given the example of verse 50 of Sårat $l #Imr§n: 'I [Jesus] have come to confirm what came before me of the Torah and make lawful to you some of the things that were forbidden to you' [MF]. We then said that MuÈammad's (ß) message came next which abrogated some more injunctions of Moses' sharÊ#a, such as those concerning adultery and homosexuality, and replaced them with different injunctions and added new ones for areas of law where previously there had not been any legal prescription, such as for issues of inheritance and lesbian relationships.

We have stressed that our criticism is directed against the current confused understanding of abrogation, by which hundreds of verses are deemed to be abrogating or abrogated, to such an extent that, on the basis of eccentric hermeneutical manoeuvres, peaceful jih§d is interpreted as military conquest and moral admonition is interpreted as militant fight, to name but a few of such misinterpretations we have cited in chapter 6. For us, every legal injunction, whether revealed first or second, earlier or later, will count equally. In fact, we apply the same measures of authentication and explanation of abrogations that were used by the councils at the time of Abå Bakr, #Umar, and #Uthm§n. We also believe that the right of abrogation lies solely with the Creator and the author of the Book. And we believe that He would have told us explicitly what verse of which såra was abrogated by what verse. But there is no explicit text about such a thing. And apart from a few hints scattered around in the texts of Islamic fiqh, which do not do justice to the importance of the subject, we do not have a theory of abrogation firmly rooted in the Book. All we have are flimsy justifications of abrogation that reflect the ideologies and particular political interests of historical periods in which political rulers demanded to get rid of certain verses that challenged their unIslamic morality and aggressive worldviews.

13. Our understanding of the Book required us to introduce the two categories of ‘historicity’ and ‘historicality’. The first category refers to passages of the Book that narrate the stories of the qur”§n. These are historic narratives, that is, stories about events that really happened in human history. Such stories only contain moral lessons and no legal injunctions, for example, reports about events in the life of God’s messenger, references to the battles of Badr, UÈud, Tabåk, the battle of the ditch, the seizure of Mecca, and so forth.[469] Such reports, as they can be found in Sårat al-Tawba, are ‘historic texts’ (nußåß ta”rÊkhiyya), narratives of events that took place in history. No human legislation can ever be derived from them. They do not belong to MuÈammad’s (ß) messengerhood since their revelation was the result of specific historic circumstances as they are reflected in the so-called occasions of revelation.

The second category of ‘historicality’ is a hermeneutical term that refers to the context-based nature and historical bias of our understanding and interpretation of texts. Our understanding for instance of the verses of messengerhood, such as, the injunctions about inheritance law and the different ritual obligations, is ‘rooted in history’, due to both the historicity of the text (ta”rÊkhiyyat al-naßß) and the historicality of our understanding (ta”rÊkhiyyat al-fahm). Thus, if we read the ‘stories’ of the Book we need to understand them as being historic (events that actually took place in history) and our understanding of them as historical (shaped by our historical context). Likewise, if we read the legal injunctions of messengerhood we need to consider both their nature as being historic (as legal measures for a concrete period of time in history) and our understanding of them as historical (because we study them with the epistemological paradigms of the twenty-first century).

14. The freedom to exercise ijtih§d, the individual interpretation of the sacred text, is conditioned. One should not allow people to apply it too freely or too narrowly. We have stressed that the criterion of a legitimate ijtih§d is whether its outcome corresponds with social reality. We defined an ijtih§d as correct and acceptable if it brings the sacred text into harmony with objective reality. And because objective reality constantly changes, the outcome of our ijtih§ds will also constantly change. If no congruence between objective reality and the sacred text is established, an ijtih§d shall be deemed unsuccessful or even false. We applied the same criteria for modern parliamentary legislation. A law is effective when the existing social order of everyday life has been successfully analysed and when appropriate legislation has been found to administer and govern the social affairs of the citizens in an efficient way. As we heard in verse 137 of Sårat $l #Imr§n[470] and verse 20 of Al-#Ankabåt[471], such congruence establishes a perfect line from ‘becoming’ to ‘progressing’, running from Adam to the Last Hour, and it is the sole criteria of truth by which the authenticity of Allah’s word is confirmed. The criterion of a successful ijtih§d is certainly not whether the Prophet’s companions, their successors, or any of the traditional jurists would agree with it or not.

15. The act of ijm§#, of a consensus about sharÊ#a law, is carried out collectively by living people, not dead fuqah§”. One may dispute public injunctions, such as what is permitted and forbidden, but one should never touch the thirteen absolute taboos (muÈarram§t) which we have discussed in chapters 1 and 2. One may, for example, introduce a ban on smoking in public places as a result of scientific research into the health risk of smoking, by issuing fatw§s or resolutions of national assemblies or through bills of parliament. Or one may forbid or allow polygyny by fatw§s or state law but one should never absolutely allow or forbid smoking or polygamy, since this is the prerogative of Allah.

16. The act of qiy§s, of drawing analogies between two or more legal cases, must be done on the basis of empirical evidence and scientific proof provided by sociologists, economists, mathematicians, and natural scientists. These scholars function as the real advisers of state authorities and political legislators. This should not be done by the #ulam§” and the jurists of fatw§ bureaus. The primary task of these religious ‘experts’ is to give advice on what should be prohibited and permitted in matters of ritual worship. They should not be consulted in matters that are absolutely forbidden or absolutely allowed (which is God’s prerogative).

17. We distinguished between different categories of injunctions and different types of legal authority. We avoided confusing the type of absolute, religious taboos (taÈrÊm) with types of prohibitions (nahy wa-mana#) that can be changed by positive law. And we did not confuse the seat of authority for such legislations. We distinguished between the role of the divine legislator on the one hand, and the role of the state, customary practice, and popular traditions on the other. We have pointed out that the thirteen absolute taboos cannot be made subject to ijtih§d, ijm§#, and qiy§s, and that includes the prohibition to eat dead meat, blood from slaughtered animals, and the flesh of swine (see verse 173 of Sårat al-Baqara). We believe that in keeping the thirteen taboos sacrosanct the contemporary Islamic discourse will lose its current reputation of being provincial and inward-looking and will thus regain universal acceptance. No one, be they muftis, politicians, bureaucrats, or generals, is allowed to add any more absolute taboos to the existing thirteen which Allah decreed in the Book. If someone did make any such illegitimate addition, God’s response would be: ‘How dare you say things about God without any knowledge!’ (Yånus 10:68, AH).

18. The role of a prophet is to exercise ijtih§d for a specific historical period. In his effort to create a viable state and a functioning society, the Messenger MuÈammad (ß) used his independent judgement to issue prohibitions or permissions which he had to qualify in accordance with the shifting historical context and changing circumstances. This is (also for us) the only way to apply the dictum of the #ulam§” that ‘the legal injunctions change with the changes of time’ (a l-aÈk§m tataghayyar bi-taghayyur al-azm§n). It is the only chance to turn the current geographically and temporally very narrow-minded Êm§nic discourse— caged into the space of the Arabian Peninsula at the time of the seventh century—into a universal isl§mic discourse that integrates all people on this globe and covers all periods of time until the coming of the Last Hour.

19. The sunna of MuÈammad (ß) has been defined as the first ijtih§d ever, a deliberate application of the rules of the Book to a concrete historical situation. We have shown that the sunna embodies MuÈammad’s (ß) interpretations of how to transform the divine and absolute rules into practiced norms of everyday life on the Arabian Peninsula in the seventh century. It was not the only and certainly not the last application of the Book. What MuÈammad (ß) did was to consider the cultural, political, and economic situation of seventh-century Arabia and to position its ‘becoming’ and ‘progressing’ vis-à-vis the divine and transhistorical ‘being’ of the divine text. In applying universal injunctions to his concrete historical milieu, he built the foundation of a centralized state on the Arabian Peninsula which was, at that time and in terms of ancient Arabia, an enormous qualitative leap. In this role, MuÈammad (ß) was a truly pragmatic leader and an immensely convincing bearer of a new, revolutionary message. As the first mujtahid and greatest messenger (ß), who received a divine, absolute message from God, he transformed the eternal into the temporal, the abstract into the concrete, the universal into the particular. Because of this intrinsic link between MuÈammad’s (ß) ijtih§d and the concrete, contingent circumstances of seventh-century Arabia, we stated that we do not draw analogies from the decisions we face in our contemporary world to his decisions of the seventh century. We must apply our own ijtih§d and use our own intellect to bring the rules of the Book in line with objective reality as we face it today and in accordance with the epistemological paradigms we possess now. Therefore, we did not apply the method of qiy§s, of drawing analogies, between contemporary and ancient legal rulings but between current, contingent realities and the divine text.

20. We stressed the need to distinguish between the sunna of the Prophet and the sunna of the Messenger. We defined the sunna of the Messenger as consisting of those acts and deeds of MuÈammad (ß) which are, and already have been during his life and immediately after his death, deemed to be worthy of imitation. These are the ritual obligations by which MuÈammad's (ß) followers differ from other groups that follow other messengers. The form of these ritual obligations (e.g., the act of prayer as such) is once and for all fixed but their content moves (e.g., how exactly to pray). The ritual content is transmitted from generation to generation through actual performance—the books of ÈadÊths do not have a say in this.

The sunna of the Prophet, in contrast, was said to consist of MuÈammad's (ß) words and sayings about society, the state, politics, governance, dress codes, and popular practices during his time. We proposed to regard them as words of wisdom to which one should listen attentively. But they do not possess absolute authority or eternal validity, and they should not be made a source of modern legislation. The books of ÈadÊths and the many volumes of ÈadÊth criticism are a real burden for us today, since they force us to constantly authenticate our modern positions in accordance with the sunna of MuÈammad (ß). We stressed that it is important to realise that MuÈammad's (ß) views are neither absolute nor do they possess everlasting truth, as their validity is restricted and subject to interpretation.

21. MuÈammad's (ß) major role was to transmit the divine message that came down to him by revelation.[472] We have shown that in judging this role one should avoid two extremes. One is to say that the Qur'anic text is what MuÈammad (ß) understood of the divine message and how he explained it to his followers. In this view the divine text has turned into MuÈammad's prophetic announcements. The other extreme is to give MuÈammad’s sunna the function of explaining the obscure and ambiguous in the Qur’an, of specifying general meanings, and of particularising general rules. In chapter 2 we thoroughly criticised those who outrageously attributed divine wisdom to the sunna and even gave it the authority to abrogate Qur’anic injunctions, an attitude that resulted in the slogan that ‘the Qur’an is more in need of the sunna than the sunna of the Qur’an”—may Allah protect us from what they are saying!

In several passages, the Book says that the aim of proclaiming the divine message is to ‘make it public’, that is, the opposite of keeping it hidden or private.[473] We therefore defined the role of the Prophet as that of a messenger whose task it was to bring the divine message out into the open, that is, to announce its news loudly and clearly to the people. His task was not to interfere with the transmission of the phonetic and lexical format of the Book, al-dhikr (i.e., with the process of linguistic transformation or al-inz§l into Arabic) nor with the actual content (i.e., with the act of revelation, or al-tanzÊl), inasmuch as he was forbidden to alter the revealed commands and prohibitions by his prophetical practice.

We discussed the need to keep two different steps of revelation separate: first, the transformation of the text of divine revelations into a linguistic format (Arabic) so that human beings are able to perceive it. Second, the reception of these divine revelations by the Prophet (ß). We said that MuÈammad (ß) enjoyed the status of a messenger of God only because of his task to make revelations public and to deliver Allah’s message in a clear manner without any distortion, alteration, or addition. MuÈammad (ß) performed this role in the most perfect and complete manner. However, we refused the idea that he was chosen to explain and elucidate the divine message. Our argument is that the very long såras of the Book, such as A l-An#§m, Al-A#r§f, Håd, Yåsuf, or Yånus, whose complex meanings unquestionably demand further explanations, were entirely left unexplained by MuÈammad (ß). This shows that it was never MuÈammad’s (ß) self-understanding that he should comment on everything he proclaimed as revelation. This confirms our view that MuÈammad’s (ß) role was only that of a transmitter of the divine message. He represented

‘the completion of prophethoods’ but not the ultimate level of the Book’s interpretation.

22. We have shown the importance of recognising the differences between Islamic sharÊ#a and Islamic fiqh. Islamic sharÊ#a, as we defined it, contains those legal verses of the Book that share Allah’s absolute ‘being’, whereas Islamic fiqh or jurisprudence represents the contingent nature of human interaction with and understanding of the divine legislation at a specific time and place in human history. Whereas Islamic sharÊ#a is divine, Islamic fiqh is human. The distinction between sharÊ#a and fiqh helps us to further differentiate between al-isl§m and al-muslimån. Whereas al-isl§m is represented by the Book, the term muslimån refers to human beings who interact, historically, intellectually, and socially with the divine text. In other words, the muslimån personify the historical presence of the Book and, by doing so, differ immensely in their interpretation of it.

We have made it clear in all chapters of this volume that we regard the whole literature of Islamic fiqh as a first reading or first understanding (i.e., context-based application) of the divine text and its sacred injunctions. We see it as our task today to add to this a second reading which is firmly rooted in the twenty-first century. This requires us to fully apply modern paradigms of knowledge and learning so that we may go beyond the premodern foundations and sources of Islamic fiqh. Following this logic, we are convinced that in the future there will be further readings, for example, a third rereading, a fourth rereading, a fifth … and so forth, until the coming of the Last Hour.

23. In our interpretations of the legal verses of the Book we applied the scholarly principle ‘legal injunctions change with the changes of time’. We are convinced that legal rulings do change as a result of epistemological and scientific developments that take place in our societies. Being true to this principle, we have interpreted the verses of inheritance more in line with modern statistics and mathematics than with explanatory models that existed in ninth-century Arabia. Consequently, we were able to remove insignificant factors of medieval fiqh thinking, such as questions of obedience and disobedience, of mental soundness and madness, and were thus able to see things from a different perspective which led to completely different results. After us, of course, others might come and see again new things and create new results because of their own perspective, which will differ from ours.

24. We have proposed throughout the volume that Islamic law should be applied as human and civil legislation within the limits that Allah has set. It requires the principle of ÈanÊfiyya which allows change and plurality of opinions. It requires the institutions of civil society and the existence of legislative assemblies, a fair electoral system, democratic elections, and the possibility of correcting and revising religious fatw§s. Muftis should give fatw§s only on matters of ritual duties. This self-restriction will be their contribution to a fair, democratic, open, and pluralistic Islamic society.

25. We have shown that the fuqah§”’s harsh penalties for apostasy deviates from the spirit and explicit text of the Book. According to Allah’s Book, apostates should not be punished for their change of religious affiliation because every human being enjoys the freedom of religion and the freedom to choose membership to whatever religious community he or she wants. We have shown that Islamic jurists interpreted politically motivated secessions by Arabian tribes as religious apostasy as a result of which, basically until today, an individual’s renunciation of Islam is treated as high treason for which the death penalty is demanded. It is important to disentangle this political history from the religious message of the Book and reestablish the freedom to change religious communities or the freedom to not follow any religious community at all.

26. The fuqah§”’s indiscriminate treatment of a l-jih§d and a l-qit§l has been exposed as insufficient. We have shown that the Book cites a large number of activities that are subsumed under the category of al-jih§d, for example the pursuit of knowledge, the provision of sustenance, and the peaceful struggle for freedom, justice, and equality. A struggle is defined as ‘jih§d in God’s way’ (a l-jih§d fÊ sabÊl All§h) if the intention is to fight for freedom, justice, and equality for all people on earth (that is not restricted to a particular religious community, ethnic tribe or nationstate).

27. Al-qit§l is one possible type of al-jih§d, that is, a type of fighting that implies violence and involves a considerable amount of force. It is the last resort in any kind of confrontation between two sides, and it is tried or done when everything else has failed. A fight is defined as ‘fight in God’s way’ (al-qit§l fÊ sabÊl All§h) if the intention is to forcefully resist internal oppression by an unjust totalitarian regime and to fight for freedom, justice, and equality in one’s own country. A military fight against an external invasion may be legitimate but it cannot be defined as ‘fight in God’s way’. We have shown how important it is to differentiate between normal warfare (undertaken in order to pursue political, economic, and military objectives) and fights in God’s way that refer to the struggle against injustice, totalitarianism, and discriminations on the basis of people’s social class, ethnic race, religion, or gender.

28. ‘To prescribe what is right and to proscribe what is wrong’ is a powerful activity of al-jih§d that is done in God’s way. If this activity is carried out in the correct spirit of the Book (that is, without the use of force and violence), it helps to spread peace, prosperity, and happiness in a nation. We have argued that the best agents of this activity are the civil rights and civil society organisations of a country, and that the highest level of ‘prescribing what is right and proscribing what is wrong’ can be found in groups or movements who peacefully protest against political oppression, the breach of human rights, and the lack of political transparency in government and state administration.

29. The persistent usage of the term war§” for ‘loyalty’ purely on the communal level was exposed as inadequate, as it was shown to be a convenient tool to silence political opposition. We have shown that the two terms al-wal§” and al-bar§” are used in the Book in order to describe the process of identity formation, and its dissolution respectively, on several collective levels, that is, within a family, clan, tribe, community, people, and nation. It was emphasised that an individual person can adopt several identities that need not necessarily contradict one another. Rather than instrumentalising these terms in order to enforce a single, monolithic identity on Muslims (favouring the religious over all other), we have shown that it is possible to reconcile the religious with the ethnic, political, linguistic, and tribal affiliations that a person might have. It is hoped that this will help contemporary Muslims to liberate themselves from the fetters of a religio-centric worldview, which forces us to become more and more alienated from mainstream society, and to open their minds to the possibility that they can harmonise their multiple modern existence with their religious faith.

<right>

Praise be to the Lord of the worlds!

</right>

 Appendix

 Interview With Muhammad Shahrur by Dale F. Eickelman (1996)

The first interview was conducted by Dale F. Eickelman who in 1996 met Muhammad Shahrur in Damascus to ask him about his personal and intellectual biography. Professor Eickelman was one of the first Western academics to discover the significance of Muhammad Shahrur's writings within the context of the emergence of a Muslim public space in the Arab and Islamic world.[474] The interview took place at D§r al-Istish§r§t al-\andasiyya, the engineering firm in which Shahrur is a senior partner and where he does his writing. Professor Eickelman told me that the interview was conducted in a combination of English and Arabic, with the choice of language left to Muhammad Shahrur. In practice, he switched to Arabic in discussing theology and technical points in Qur'anic interpretation, using English to discuss the more general aspects of his life and career. The language switching was facilitated by the presence of ‘§diq Jaw§d Sulaim§n (‘SS’ in the interview transcript), an Islamic activist, who accompanied Dale Eickelman to Damascus. Sulaim§n, a former journalist and senior official of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Sultanate of Oman, was also interested in Shahrur’s work, although from the vantage point of a fellow participant in Islamic reform. I wish to thank Dale Eickelman for allowing me to include in this volume his interview which has not yet been printed or published elsewhere. [475]

* Coming of Age in Damascus

DFE: When we first spoke about your family and youth in Damascus, you mentioned an occasion when your father took you past the shrine of MuÈyÊ al-DÊn Ibn #ArabÊ, in the ‘§liÈiyya quarter of Damascus where you were born and raised.[476] Why did you begin with this episode?

MS: The episode took place after the 1967 Six Day War. My father and I were passing by the shrine. He pointed to it and asked me, ‘Do you know who defeated us?’ ‘No,’ I replied. He said, ‘The man who is buried under this shrine’. He told me that Ibn #ArabÊ ruined our ability to reason. He turned our focus away from the physical world to a hallucinatory one existing only in our minds.

DFE: How old were you in 1967?

MS: I was born in 1938, so I was twenty-nine. I had graduated from the university in 1964, three years earlier.

I: Is your father religious?

MS: He’s a conservative. People call us conservative. He prays and fasts. He went on the pilgrimage in 1946, and I went with him, when I was eight years old.

DFE: Did he speak with you often about religion?

MS: No. He talked mostly about how to be honest and truthful. He thought that to worship God is good, as was honesty with people, work, and following the objective laws of nature.

DFE: How would he say ‘the objective laws of nature’ to a young child? This sounds like a phrase you might have learned later in Russia.

MS: Objective knowledge? He used the example of a stove. If you want to warm yourself, don’t recite the Qur’an, but light a fire in the stove. This is how he explained the idea to us. Anyone could understand his example. He still explains things this way.

DFE: What role did your mother play in your early life?

MS: In 1953, I wanted to drop out of school. My father had no objections, but my mother was opposed to it. She was illiterate, but she quarreled with my father and cried. Finally, to secure peace, he said, ‘Okay, go to school’ [laughter]. She insisted that I continue, and he finally agreed with her.

DFE: Why did you want to leave school?

MS: I was attracted by money. I worked, earned money, and liked it. At the time, I considered school as a kind of confinement. You had to go every morning, sit on a chair all day, and then go home. I thought that working allowed more freedom.

DFE: Did you have religious lessons in school?

MS: Yes.

DFE: What did you think of them?

MS: My interest for each subject depended on the teacher. My religious teacher was good, although he didn’t pay much attention to prayer and fasting. He knew that he had to teach us the main framework of Islam and he was good at that. He wore a suit like anyone else.

DFE: As you look back on your youth, would you consider yourself particularly interested in religious issues?

MS: No [laughter]. I was not particularly interested in religious issues. But my family is religious. In our neighborhood, we were considered quite odd. Our father was strict about not fasting and praying. He fasted and prayed himself, but considered religion as more than this. He was more concerned with how people treated one another and how to deliver goods or work to people. He emphasized this all the time.

DFE: After you finished primary school, did you have a choice in your studies?

MS: We could choose between humanities and science, and I chose science. I liked it, and think that I have a scientific disposition. I was good at mathematics and physics, and understood them easily.

 Studies in Moscow

DFE: Why did you choose the Soviet Union for advanced studies in 1958?

MS: I didn’t choose. There was a competition for twenty-eight students to go to Russia as part of a cultural agreement, and I wanted to continue my studies abroad.

DFE: How did you find life in Russia?

MS: At first, everything was odd and strange. I didn’t know Russian, and Russia was a new society for me. It took me four to six months to adapt to my new circumstances. Then I enjoyed it. It was a new experience and gave my life a new scope. I had never been outside Damascus and was only nineteen years old, a very young man in Russia.

I was very curious about Russia. I asked about the October Revolution and how it came about. I learned Russian quickly, and read a lot of books that weren’t on the syllabus. Russians were obliged to study Marxist philosophy, the history of the Communist Party, and political economy. Foreigners from the United Arab Republic, as we were at the time, were exempt from this requirement. We had no examinations on these subjects, but I studied them anyway. I read books on the history of the Communist Party, Marxism, and the work of Engels, although no one obliged me. I discussed philosophy with many people. This was my hobby, and physics and mathematics helped me to understand more.

DFE: What were your living conditions like in Russia? Were you living with Syrians or with Russians?

MS: Syrians and Russians together. I lived only the first year with another Syrian. All the other years I lived with Russians. They are good people, ordinary and direct. I liked them as people and enjoyed their company. I married a Russian in 1963, a girl from my institute. We lived together in a student hostel and she had a son by me in 1964, the year I graduated.

DFE: Did you speak about religion with Russians or Syrians?

MS: With both, but from a philosophical point of view, not about prayer or fasting. I asked questions like: Does God exist? What is morality? Why do we need it? I asked about the existence of God. Marxist philosophy is atheistic. This was hard for me to accept, especially because the Russians sometimes advanced arguments which I could not answer. I felt defeated and disappointed when this happened. I believed in God and read the Qur’an, but I could not convince them and they could not convince me.

How could I convince them? When I was in Russia, a Qur’anic verse ran through my head: ‘Say: God’s is the argument that reaches home. Had He wanted, He could indeed have guided you all’ (Qul: Fa-li’ll§h al-Èujja al-b§ligha, fa-law sh§” la-had§kum ajma#Ên) (Al-An#§m, 6:149). I didn’t know how to explain this verse repeatedly coming to mind. At the time, I hardly knew the Qur’an at all.

I read newspapers a lot, especially a newspaper called Za rubezhom.[477] It translated stories from foreign news broadcasts and periodicals into Russian. I liked reading. I took a book with me and read wherever I went, because my Russian was like a Russian’s and I enjoyed Pushkin and poetry.

DFE: How long did it take you to become fluent in Russian?

MS: One year and three months.

DFE: Were other Syrian students also interested in talking about religion?

MS: No. We gathered as friends on Sundays and feast days. We talked about lots of things, including philosophy, religion, and politics. At the time, Syria and Egypt were combined in the United Arab Republic and the Arab world was turbulent. There was the Algerian revolution for independence and troubles in Egypt, Yemen, Tunisia, and Africa. We were wrapped up in politics and proud that we were from the United Arab Republic.

So I was astonished when the United Arab Republic broke up. In Russia, I repeatedly told my friends that Arabs had no theories of society. I felt that we Arabs needed to understand concepts of freedom and society. On this issue, I was influenced by Marxist philosophy. I understood from Russia that people need concepts about society, so that if a man in Casablanca and another in Damascus were asked a question, they would give the same answer and take the same stand. This is what we call ideology or culture now. In Russia I called it theory. I felt that we were all in urgent need of theory. This made me read more books on how to formulate theory. I also felt that theory without strength and progress means nothing.

DFE: You speak of a strong sense of Arab identity during this turbulent period in the Arab world. How do you feel now about the idea of Arab nationalism (#uråba)?

MS: It’s a good idea, but overwhelming. It’s romance.

DFE: What did it mean to you in 1958 and 1959?

MS: Romantic meanings only.

DFE: You called it ‘romantic’ then?

MS: Yes. You see, we are Arabs. We have one culture and one language. We express Arab unity in poetry but not in theory.

SS: Did Arab unity have any political implications for you?

MS: No. Only the union between Syria and Egypt had political implications.

SS: When you say you were astonished, were you also frustrated or pained?

MS: Yes, I was convinced that it was wrong that some political parties were banished and that democracy was abolished. It must be revived. In addition, Lenin’s definition of party was useful to me. He defined the party as an objective expression of thought. This made sense for me. Until now it makes sense that a party is an objective expression of thought, that common thought gives birth to parties, that parties were born from thought. I still think that this expression is valid.

DFE: When you arrived in the Soviet Union, Nikolai Bulganin was Prime Minister (1955–58), and he was replaced by Nikita Khrushchev about a month after your arrival. What did you think about the Soviet system at the time?

MS: In the first two or three years of my stay in Moscow, the Soviet system had a great impact on me. I knew that the Soviet Union was a backward nation in 1917. Then they built a strong army and won the Second World War. Later, when I went into the Russian countryside and saw Russian peasants, I was astonished by the many government lies. Then I stopped believing in the Soviet system. There was something fishy about it. There is a Communist Party slogan, which I put in my third book: The party is the mind, heart, and conscience of the people (al-Èizb huwa #itq wa-·amÊr wa-sharaf al-sha#b). It disgusted me, I felt sick when I read this slogan. I put my views in my compact for national action (mith§q a l-#amal a l-waãanÊ). All parties and universities, scientific research institutions, a free press, and all organizations together express the mind, conscience, and honour of the people, but no one party. It’s impossible.

* Arab Nationalism and Theories of Society

SS: Let’s return to the notion of #uråba. At the time did you think that the Arab world would unite?

MS: Yes, the pan-Arab world. For instance, we supported the Algerian revolution. For us, that was the immediate concrete application of #uråba, so objectively we had to support Algeria. The Algerian issue concerned all the Arab countries, as did the 1958 revolution in Iraq. These events were concrete. I thought that Iraq would join the United Arab Republic. These were the immediate implications of #uråba.

However, we didn’t think about theory at that time. Our thoughts were driven by events. After the break-up of the union between Syria and Egypt, I realized something was wrong with #uråba Islam, although I didn’t yet know what it was. We had to look at where we went wrong.

SS: You say that you still believe in the Arab nation. Do you mean this only in an emotional sense or do you see in pan-Arabism a practical means of uniting the Arab world on the basis of a common culture? Do you see pan-Arabism as the basis for a political movement?

MS: I believe that it could serve as the basis for a political movement, to bring Arabs together with one language, one culture, and one state. This remains my ambition. I hope by my writing to contribute something useful to the Arabs in their fight for unity. We have to give up romance. My writing doesn’t deal with romance.

I call [the earlier period] the romantic one.

DFE: Your studies in the Soviet Union gave you fluency in Russian, a solid basis in civil engineering, a love for Pushkin, a wife, a son, and frustration that the Russians could talk theory but you couldn”t.

MS: Exactly. When I returned to Syria I repeatedly said that we had no theory. I vaguely understood in 1964–65 that any ideology that doesn’t include a theory of knowledge is not really complete. At that time I realized that the first step was to formulate a theory of human knowledge and consciousness, the relationship between things outside yourself and things in your mind (al-#al§qa bayn a l-wujåd fi’l-#ay§n wa-ßuwar a l-mawjåd§t fi’l-adhh§n). This relationship is the main issue in philosophy, and how to improve our understanding of it will remain the main issue until the Hereafter.

DFE: In the 1960s did you think of theories of society primarily in terms of #uråba, Islam, or both?

MS: After the break-up (infiß§l) of the union between Syria and Egypt in 1961, I realized that we needed a theory of society for the pan-Arab movement.

DFE: And religion?

MS: No. Religion at that time meant to me only to believe in God or atheism, because I was confronted with Russian atheism and Marxism. Does God exist or not? I didn’t go into details because the main issue confronting me was atheistic philosophy. I had to defend myself and my beliefs. I didn’t think about praying or fasting. You see, the main issue—whether God exists—was so big a problem that I forget about fasting and everything else.

DFE: So Islam was not then central to your thought?

MS: No.

SS: And theory was?

MS: Theory for #uråba, for pan-Arabism. Arabs needed a party system with a theory so that they could understand words and the universe.

SS: You didn’t think that Ba#thist ideology was adequate?

MS: The Ba#th party recognized that it had no theory to its credit. They offered only revolutionary principles (al-munãalaq§t al-thaw riyya). The unionists (al-waÈdawiyån) now say the same thing.

Professor F§“iz Ism§#Êl K§mil[478] says that we have no theory. After the 1967 Six Day War, when my father pointed to the shrine of MuÈyÊ a l-DÊn Ibn a l-#ArabÊ, I knew that Ibn #ArabÊ was a philosopher. I realized then that the principle of making theory had to come from inside Arab culture in order to change Arab thought. Islam and the Qur’an are at the basis of how Arab culture is formed. Islam defines our thinking, our way of doing things. All the books written through the fourteenth century, our social and scientific consciousness, had been worked out through the philosophy of Islam. I realized that even Arab atheists are Islamic in their culture.

SS: So it was Arab identity and #uråba that led you to an interest in Islam?

MS: Because Islam has shaped our culture. I believe in God. I was never in my life an atheist. Not even for one minute.

DFE: Did you ever have doubts?

MS: Yes. When I was in Russia, when I began to read the Qur’an, I knew that I had to eliminate my doubts. How? I wanted to see the Qur’an’s credibility. Abraham himself had doubts and from his doubts he came to certainty. I read about a theory of doubts in René Descartes’ On the Method of Seeking Truth in the Sciences (arÊqat al-wußål il§’l-ÈaqÊqa). It is good to have doubts because you reach truth through them.

* Return to Syria (1964)

MS: When I returned to Syria, I was appointed as [teaching] assistant after a competition at the university. The Faculty of Civil Engineering was founded 1961. There were few engineers in Syria at that time and the faculty needed them. My registration number in the Syrian Syndicate of Engineers is 750. That was the number of all engineers in Syria at the time, not just civil engineers.

DFE: Did you return with your wife and child in 1964?

MS: No my wife was still a student. She joined me after she finished her studies in 1965. Unfortunately, she did not bring our son, Leonid, with her.

She was a pioneer, the first or second Russian wife to come to Syria. She lived here one year and couldn’t stand our different environment. Finally we agreed to divorce without a quarrel. I told her, ‘Keep Leonid because you are the mother and he will be happy with you. It would kill you if I kept him here. I still provide for our son. It’s my obligation.’ Two months after my first wife returned to Russia, I married my present wife, ‘AzÊza.

DFE: Were you active in politics or discussion circles when you returned to Syria?

MS: In politics no, but discussion circles yes, on Arabness, #uråba, until 1967.

DFE: Why just 1967?

MS: The 1967 war had an impact on all Arabs in different ways, but it affected the consciousness of us all. I was then twenty-nine years old.

DFE: When did the idea to write The Book and the Qur’an first come to you?

MS: The project began to form in my head after 1967. I became convinced that our problem was in the Arab understanding of thought and society. The problem was ourselves, not America or the West. I was convinced of that.

DFE: Did you intend from the outset to develop new interpretations of Islam?

MS: Yes. I wanted to understand Islamic culture thoroughly, to see where we went wrong in order to correct our consciousness. There was an incident which was very clear and upsetting to me. At the first Friday sermon in Damascus after the Six Day War, the preacher in the mosque said that the reason for our defeat was women. ‘[Our] women are cruel, naked’ (al-nis§” q§siy§t #§riy§t). The people sitting there in the mosque believed him. How can we say that the disaster occurred because God was punishing us for the conduct of our women? I rejected that explanation, but not all people did. They were astonished but they accepted the idea that God might be punishing us.

DFE: How do you know?

MS: They remained silent. They were astonished at the sermon but said nothing. ‘Oh no, it’s women. God is punishing us because women are not wearing head scarves.’ I said to myself, ‘How could that be? Israeli women are in bikinis and they defeated us’ [laughter].

After the sermon I became convinced that something was wrong with our shared understandings, since the preachers were blaming our problems on the two or three tons of textiles used to veil women. You see why I thought that there is something wrong with our worldview. One of my friends told me that the first Friday sermon in the Prophet’s mosque in Medina after the Six Day War concerned the rules for divorce (aÈk§m al-ãal§q) in Islam. I became convinced that our thought was wrong. We had to revise how we reason.

DFE: Did you express your ideas to other people in 1967?

MS: Only the idea that our worldview (dhihniyya)—our mentality or way of thinking—was wrong. We were living in another sphere.

DFE: Did you write anything down?

MS: Not until I went to Dublin in September 1968. There I was alone.

DFE: Were other Syrians with you?

MS: Only four. One was my business partner. The four of us had been accepted at the Imperial College in London, but after the Six Day War, Syria broke diplomatic ties with Britain and we went to Dublin instead. In September 1969 I received my master’s degree and in July 1969, §riq, my first son by my second marriage, was born.

I learned about a new world in Dublin: Western schools, Irish society, a new university, a style of life different from Syria and Russia. As always, I read more, including Alfred North Whitehead, Science and the Modern World. When I returned to Syria, I brought new ideas about logic with me.

DFE: Did you begin writing in Dublin?

MS: In my last year there, 1972. I wrote four or five pages about idolatry (al-shirk). I began to read the Qur’an and to understand that al-shirk is remaining static or unchanging in one’s thinking. That was my first conclusion, that our thinking was static, that we were dead. When I returned to Syria in 1972, I still only discussed my ideas with people and read books. I was expanding my understanding. I began to read such things as commentaries on the Qur’an (tafsÊr). Much of what I read was not convincing.

In 1980, during Ramadan, I began to define the difference between a historically specific act (al-fi#l) and the notion of action in general (al-#amal). This was the first distinction which I recognized. It took me all of Ramadan to sort out the Qur’anic verses related to these two terms. As I see the distinction, fi#l refers to a specific act. No generalizations can be drawn from it. ‘Amal refers to a more generalized, objective activity or category of activities, like ‘good deeds.’

At the time I didn’t even know that there was a concordance of the Qur’an. I had to extract all the related verses on my own. Although I asked Arabic-language experts for guidance, they did not tell me the distinction between fi#l and #amal. I discovered it myself. Similarly, it took me two years, from 1980 to 1982, to understand the difference between the two elements of the Qur’an: the book (al-kit§b), which is the subjective element, and al-qur”§n, which is the objective one. These two elements together constitute the holy book, the tanzÊl al-ÈakÊm. The Prophet is the messenger for a l-kit§b, and the rules of jurisprudence, of what to do and what not to do must be subject to interpretation (ijtih§d) within the limits set down by God. Al-kit§b is dynamic and has such a close relation to social life that it must be reinterpreted to apply to different places and historical periods.[479] Al-qur”§n is objective truth, prophecy. It exists independently of human knowledge or consent and is unchanging.

Think of a fresco at the Vatican. The fresco is fixed, objective. But as the viewer changes position, he sees the fresco in a different way. Each time we move, we see the fresco in a different way. The mullahs want us to stand still and see the fresco as it was in the seventh century. We want to move around and see the fresco in a dialectic between text and context. Our interpretation of the fresco as we move around is subjective. With the kit§b we can use interpretation, and interpret how a verse complies with objective truth. The qur”§n involves prophecy, which is objective truth. I was perplexed when I looked at the Qur’anic verses containing these two terms, kit§b and qur”§n. I looked at their meanings interactively and then understood them.

SS: With whom did you first discuss your ideas?

MS: Primarily with the linguist Ja#far DÊk al-B§b.[480] In the 1980s, we had long discussions on the meaning of kit§b.

DFE: In the early 1980s political events and economic conditions in Syria obliged some people to leave the country, and your business was reorganized. You also found yourself more free to focus on writing ...

MS: Yes, and in May 1982 I discovered the difference between kit§b and qur”§n. It was very surprising to me. I told my family about it. My father was the first to understand the distinction. He became interested, asked me difficult questions, and forced me to answer them.

DFE: After 1982, you began to discuss your ideas with others, especially Ja#far DÊk al-B§b when he returned during summer from his teaching post in Algeria.

MS: I showed him what I had written. I kept the manuscript in my house. I gave it to my son for safekeeping, saying: ‘Look, this is my first book. The manuscript is in this envelope. Now I will prepare a second book.’

After discovering the difference between kit§b and qur”§n, I discovered the meaning of tartÊl, a term usually referring to the slow, elegant recitation of the Qur’an: ‘Or add to it; and recite the Qur’an in slow, measured rhythmic tones’ (aw zid #alayhi wa-rattil a l-qur”§n tartÊl[an]) (A l-Muzzammil 73:4).[481] I discovered the distinction between comprehension (through inz§l), which is the phrasing of objective truth or doctrines in a manner which humans can understand in a particular historical setting, and the delivery of revelation (tanzÊl), the objective transmission from God to humankind via Gabriel. TanzÊl exists outside of ourselves, like radio waves, which exist whether or not we are aware of them. Inz§l is the act of explaining the tanzÊl.

I also discovered the distinction between the ‘record clear’ (al-im§m al-mubÊn) that makes matters clear for a specific place and time—these actions collectively constitute an archive of human deeds—and the ‘tablet preserved’ (a l-lawÈ a l-maÈfåí), which are the general laws of existence—life, death, resurrection. To understand these distinctions, I had to reread each Qur’anic occurrence and write out all the verses on the subject. At the time I had no computer. I bought one and began word processing only in 1987.

DFE: When did you consider your manuscript finished?

MS: The third version, which I completed in 1988. I read it out loud to some of my former students who were interested in my ideas. We gathered weekly in a friend’s house. [A former student] read the text and I would interrupt and comment on various points.[482] I made final corrections to the manuscript in October 1989.

I delayed publishing until then because I felt that my section on Islamic personal and family law (al-aÈw§l al-shakhßiyya) was anemic. [483]

Let me explain. One day an idea occurred to me when I was lecturing at the university on civil engineering on how to make compaction roads. We have what we call a proctor test, in which we sample and test the soil used in fills and embankments. In this test, we follow a mathematical pattern of exclusion and interpolation. We have two vectors, x and y, a hyperbole. We have a basic risk. We plot a curve and put a line on the top of it. This line is the upper limit, and there is a lower limit. Then I thought of the concept of ‘God’s limits’ (Èudåd All§h). I returned here to the office and opened the Qur’an. Just as in mathematics we have five ways of representing limits, I found five cases in which the notion of God’s limits occurred. What they have in common is the idea that God has not set down exact rules of conduct in such matters as inheritance, criminal punishments, marriage, interest, and banking practices, but only the limits within which societies can create their own rules and laws. Thieves do not have to have their hands amputated. That is merely the maximum punishment allowed.

I have written about ideas of ‘straightness’ (al-istiq§ma) and universal moral codes and ethics. The idea was at first only a footnote in my last chapter, but I saw that it applied to my main argument, so I corrected everything I wrote about Èudåd All§h in the book in order to be consistent. Then I considered my argument sound. Ja#far returned to Syria in February 1990. I showed him the text and he said, ‘Congratulations. Now your argument is strong.’ On April 1, 1990, I gave the book to a specialist in Arabic grammar and style, who corrected only the mistakes in written expression. He took about a month. Then we sent the book to censorship for approval and then it went to press.

DFE: Did the censor change anything?

MS: Nothing.

DFE: What were the first reactions to the book after publication?

MS: This was a most amazing time for me. My publisher, \usayn al-#^d§ of D§r al-Ah§lÊ, and I had an argument. I was publishing at my own expense, as I still do, and he wanted to print only 1,000 copies. He said, ‘No, maybe it won’t sell.’ I told him I was paying the expenses and could decide for myself. So we agreed on 2,000 copies.

The Book and the Qur’an was a bestseller at the September 1990 Damascus Book Fair. I was an unknown author, yet 400 copies were sold right away, and the entire first edition was sold out by December, only three months later. Then we reprinted, and the Lebanese publisher, Riyad a l-

Rayyes, asked \usayn a l-#^d§ to provide 1,000 copies, a special order for Oman. D§r a l-Ah§lÊ keeps reprinting the book and it has now sold over 10,000 copies in Syria alone.[484]

DFE: Riyad al-Rayyes asked for 1,000 copies for Oman?

MS: Yes, we printed the books, which al-Rayyes shipped to Oman. Riyad told \usayn that the Sultan wanted this number to distribute in Oman.[485]

DFE: So the first sign you had of interest in the book was that it sold out quickly ...?

MS: And by December 1990, the preachers began to attack it in the mosques of Damascus.

DFE: What were the principal arguments against the book?

MS: That I was against Islam. I was pleased [laughter]. I was pleased because I knew that my book was controversial. I knew that I was introducing a new theory. If it was not criticized, I would have doubted myself. ‘Dr. Shahrur has done nothing.’ Silence would have been a bad sign. The accusations began that the Zionists and their agents supported the book. Some religious authorities asked [a prominent Syrian religious figure] to request the government to withdraw the book. The government refused, saying to my opponents that it would not ban the book because it was published in Syria, but that they had the right to answer the book’s argument in print. To date, seventeen books, from Syria, Jordan, Lebanon, and Saudi Arabia, have been written against my first book.

DFE: What was the personal effect of the attacks against you in the Friday sermons?

MS: From the first sermon after the publication of my book, Jam§l Qaßß§ß, who is now the person who checks my writing for Arabic style, knew about the book. He didn’t realize, however, that Muhammad Shahrur was his neighbour. He just knew me as Muhammad, but thought that Shahrur was someone else [laughter]. He telephoned me to say that he wanted to meet me and discuss my book. At first I replied that I was busy because I didn’t recognize his name. Then he said, ‘My name is so-and-so, the son of so-and-so.’ I replied, ‘In that case, you are my neighbour!’ Only then did we recognize each other.

* Style and Method

DFE: Moroccans, Pakistanis fluent in Arabic, and others have explained to me that you differ in style from other interpreters of the Qur’an. You gather all the verses related to a given subject—what you call tartÊl—and write about them as a unit rather than as they occur in the Qur’an. How did you develop this method?

MS: From the Qur’an itself. As I told you, I discovered it after learning the difference between kit§b and qur”§n. Second, I realized the meaning of tartÊl is identical to arrangement (tartÊl), so I immediately gave the term a concrete application.

As I told you, I also discovered the difference between comprehension (inz§l) and reve lation (tanzÊl). Some things are objective and common to all, like air and the first principles embedded in nature and the human condition. Others relate to the circumstances of society, which can be modified.

SS: What were the main criticisms against you? What was said in the mosques?

MS: First of all, I knew that the preachers were ignorant of philosophy and logic, but I didn’t know the extent of their ignorance. What I write touches at the foundations of conventional belief: the difference between kit§b and qur”§n, between a ‘record clear’ (im§m mubayyin) and a ‘tablet preserved’ (lawÈ maÈfåí), and what I said about women. One preacher said that women must be veiled. He said: ‘Do you accept that your mother can be nude, that a daughter can be nude in front of her father?’

SS: Did they speak in terms of veiling (Èij§b) or equality (mus§w§h)?

MS: Only Èij§b.

SS: What do you consider to be the main points of difference between your interpretation and the classical one?

MS: My approach is totally different. For example, in all classical writing the authors have not considered the credibility of the sayings of the Prophet. They only state that various witnesses said certain things. The result is the total reality of the Qur’an and the total unreality of their writing. I begin by reflecting on this distinction.

SS: Would you consider, for instance, your idea that inspiration (waÈy) occurs within nature and not just as prophecy a great departure?

MS: Yes, a person can have a moment of inspiration about issues on which he is thinking. You are thinking about atomic energy and then you do something else, but your mind is still thinking about atomic energy and inspiration may come to you. It is absurd. Inspiration came to Newton when he saw the apple dropping and the land attracting it. He had some unconnected ideas in his mind, but after he saw the apple fall the conscious connection happened. This occurred to me, yes.

SS: I think that your acceptance of evolution is another major point of departure.

MS: Yes, because of the stories in the Qur’an (al-qißaß al-qur”§niyya) which reflect the process of evolution. They are meant for teaching: ‘Listen, people who lived at the time of Noah did not live in a society like ours. They lived in another era and we gave a revelation related to their circumstances. Islamic revelation began at the time of Noah and evolved through the time of MuÈammad.’ I explain why this is so in my writings.

In the current era, humanity no longer needs revelation. Let us say that you have a child in school. Once she is four or five years old, what do you teach her? Only A, B, C, D. Later she goes to school and gets a diploma, a bachelor’s degree. She will be much older. She spends, say, fifteen or sixteen years learning. After that, she will conduct research on her own. I consider that Noah is at the A, B, C level of human society and that MuÈammad came to humanity at the bachelor’s degree level. Humanity now goes it alone. We discover the universe by ourselves. We can now, because we have graduated.

DFE: So prophecy and revelation are now finished?

MS: Finished. People can now do it by themselves. And the principle of moral law is closed. The Qur’anic story proves this: ‘Legislate for yourself, discover the universe for yourself, and you will have legislative authority. But don’t forget My [God’s] limits. That’s all.’ Therefore I say that Islamic legislation is civil legislation enacted within the limits set down by God.

* Islam and Civil Society

DFE: This brings us to issues perhaps best developed in your third book, al-Isl§m wa’l-Êm§n [Islam and Faith]: Islam, Freedom, and Civil society.

MS: Democracy operates on two levels and is as basic to belief as prayer. The Qur’an (42:38) says: ‘And those who respond attentively to their Lord, pray regularly, and conduct their affairs by consultation among themselves, and give charity out of what we bestow on them’ (wa-alladhÊna istaj§bå li-rabbihim wa-aq§må al-ßal§t wa-amruhum shår§ baynahum wa-mimm§ razaqn§hum yunfiqån). This is one of the Meccan verses. In the Meccan period there was no state, yet the Qur’an mentions democracy, which I consider the equivalent of shår§, as a concept of belief. Its application is historical because it’s not an absolute. You have to adapt the concept of democracy to social and economic conditions and the level of development. The Prophet applied democracy according to the social forms of his own tribal period. The main theory of democracy is in the Qur’an, the same concept (nafs al-mafhåm).

Some people criticize democracies because they make mistakes, and they conclude that democracy is not good. Mistakes in democracy don’t give us the right to abolish it. When the Prophet asked people to go to UÈud, he didn’t want to go himself. But most of his followers said, ‘We have to go’ and the Prophet replied, ‘OK, vote on the decision.’ They voted to go and were defeated. The Prophet didn’t blame them by saying: ‘See I didn’t want to go but you went anyway.’ He didn’t blame anybody. He taught that mistakes do not give us a right to abolish democracy.

They make mistakes, but don’t abolish democracy.

DFE: The other day, one of your university colleagues said, ‘I have read Muhammad Shahrur’s book. I respect it, but I cannot agree with it. For me Islam is prayer, fasting, and obedience.”

MS: I think that this view of Islam indicates a lack of comp rehension.

DFE: Our friend was suggesting that Islam has nothing to do with democracy and civil society, that Islam is separate from state and political authority.

MS: As an ideal, Islam is separate from the state. Do you think that Syria is an Islamic state? Islam is a charter for humanity. Society by its nature is Muslim. Therefore, the state is a contract. It is a contract for governing, and the contract is Islamic. That means that I vote for you, for your programme. If you fulfill your programme, you have fulfilled your contract. If you do not, I will not vote for you again. In this sense, the state is Islamic, contractual. In this situation, Islam asks only one thing: don't exceed the limits set down by God. Do whatever you please, but don't oppress people. There is a contract between people and the state. And in legislation, don't exceed the limits of God.

The ideal of Islam will not be subject to vote. 'Honour to your parents.' How do you vote for it? 'Be a good liar.' How can you vote for it? It's impossible. Nobody will accept this because it is against morality.

DFE: Ernest Gellner has said that the religious tradition in which fundamentalism is the strongest is Islam and that Islam prevents the growth of civil society.[486] How would you reply?

MS: Gellner understands Islam as it was understood by al-Sh§fi#Ê, from the point of view of fundamentalists themselves. He has not studied the concept of Islam as a philosopher—from the source itself, as civil society, as spirituality, as morality. Gellner understands Islam as presented in Qur'anic commentary (tafsÊr) and Islamic jurisprudence (fiqh) and most of these structures are now absurd.

DFE: Gellner writes that Islam is so pervasive and powerful in the Muslim world that it has blocked people from developing the sorts of reasoning and civil society that have emerged in the West.

MS: I agree with that. It is our fault and the West has exploited our weaknesses neatly. The West is smart. We didn’t criticize our method of knowledge and reasoning when Napoleon came into Egypt. Instead, we turned our backs and said that we have to preserve our identity and our own sciences. Some of our religious scholars meant by this everything that was developed in the first three centuries after the death of the Prophet, that the knowledge and reasoning present in that period constituted the core of our identity.

America, England, and France didn’t create anything new in the Arab world. They just read it well, accepted it as it was, and exploited it for their own ends. America didn’t do anything new in the Arab world but she knew our mentality and how we do things. The Arab world was created before England and before America but they exploited us.

Now, if you have a new mentality according to my thesis, you will have new people. Then it will be difficult for the West to exploit us. We’ll have a new method to deal with other people. We’ll be scientific and have a civil society, and people will learn to deal with us in a different way.

I hope that the Arab world will change by itself. We cannot afford not to remain as we are, and I hope that the British and American attitude to our region of the world also changes. If our society and habits of thought change, then we can match the rest of the world. I know that. Pragmatism will help [laughter]. That’s right.

DFE: Let us consider another type of change. Your first book took eight years to write. Now you have completed a third book, and envisage a fourth. How has writing and publication changed how you think about yourself?

MS: I am changing and my thinking is making progress. I am now beginning to see the product of my thinking over the past twenty years. I have developed my method of analysis, and therefore I write more quickly. Recently, for instance, it took me only two weeks to write an essay on the difference between birth-givers (al-w§lid§n) and caregiver-parents (al-abaw§n), and its implications for Islamic ideas of the family. It took me only two weeks sitting here.[487]

SS: Do you think of yourself primarily as a university faculty member, as the proprietor of an engineering firm, or as a writer?

MS: I am all of these things, but my main activity now is philosophy. Because of my experience in engineering, I have associates and an assistant, so I make executive decisions only. My duties at the University of Damascus take one day a week. In the university, I am a teacher, a professor. But outside of the university, people consider me a thinker.

SS: That’s right, but do you consider yourself a ... ?

MS: An amateur! I am an ordinary human. I am afraid of one thing: that one day I will be hit by old age, and I will not be able to develop my ideas any longer. I prefer to die before that happens to me. I discuss my ideas even with my children. I don’t feel bothered that they criticize me, saying ‘You are so modest that you speak with anybody. Anybody can ask you a question, and you give longer replies than they expect.’ I answer my children, ‘So what? That’s the way I am.”

I am afraid to consider myself as a thinker. Even if I am invited to some place, I purposely go a bit late in order not to sit at the front. I want to sit at the back, where nobody will notice me, so that I can pay better attention to what others say.

DFE: Now that your work is published and your ideas better known, you”re invited to places such as Morocco and Bahrain, and journalists and diplomats pay attention to your writings. Your publisher told me that he once asked you to prepare a public talk explaining your ideas in one hour, explain everything you believe in one hour, to attract people to reading your work.

MS: I honestly can”t. Sometimes, I develop one small point and talk for two hours about it. But I don’t talk rubbish. Not all ideas can be explained in one hour. This is me. I can’t change myself, I can’t. [Laughter.]

DFE: What is the reaction to your public lectures in Syria?

MS: I gave the first one only last week, in northern Syria. Four years ago, at noon on May 3, 1992, I was scheduled to lecture during the Cultural Week at our university’s Faculty of Medicine. I went there about a quarter to twelve. There were about 5,000 people there. The scene was fascinating and impressive. The authorities—and they were right—felt that it was not safe for me to lecture and so I did not. More recently, the same thing happened in Bahrain.

DFE: Some people express surprise that a book exploring such basic principles of conventional belief and democracy should be published in Syria. Are you surprised?

MS: No, because I think that in Syria, objectively speaking, our society is now stable. We have an ancient civilization. And there are other writers, such as Dr. ‘§diq Jal§l al-#Aím, who also challenge conventional belief. My book is also allowed. I don’t know why, but it is. I know that my book could not have been published in any other Arab state, even in Egypt. N§ßr \§mid Abå Zayd’s writings are less controversial than mine, and we know what happened to him.[488]

 Interview With Muhammad Shahrur by Andreas Christmann (2007)

The second interview took place in October 2007 in one of the nice rooms of the Rotana Hotel in Abu Dhabi. Muhammad Shahrur had agreed to go through the manuscript of this volume and on this occasion accepted the idea to do a follow-up interview eleven years after the first interview with Dale Eickelman in 1996. The main purpose of this interview was to go over the first interview again and discuss some details that emerged from the answers Muhammad Shahrur had given then. The interview also wanted to cover the period between the two interviews and enquire about Muhammad Shahrur’s intellectual development since then. As with the first interview, some of Shahrur’s answers are short, condensed versions of ideas that are fully laid out in the book, and yet his oral accounts (now, of course, transcribed) reveal, more than his written essays, the freshness, directness, and originality of his thinking as well as the honesty, modesty, and sincerity of his personality. […] I wish to thank my student MuÈammad Khaled for transcribing the interview from the tape recorder.

AC: I would like to start with a few questions that I had when I read the interview back in 1996. When you were asked about your time in Moscow and your confrontation with atheism, the state doctrine of the Soviet Union at that time, you said that the study of physics and mathematics helped you to understand philosophy better and to find an adequate response to atheism.

MS: Yes, that is right.

AC: The link between physics/mathematics and philosophy/atheism is not clear to me. How did the study of physics and mathematics help you to understand philosophy better?

MS: Because mathematics and physics are rational…[Laughter] Yes…that's all. Physics is the science about nature and mathematics is the science about logic and how to ask questions and find a rational answer for them. Both serve together. They helped me to create in myself a rational mind… [Laughter]…that's all.

AC: How difficult is it for someone who has no degree in physics or mathematics to understand your ideas?

MS: It is not difficult at all provided that the reader uses his or her rational mind and follows my logical arguments. Because when you read my work you will see that it is very consistent. You don't need a degree in mathematics to find this out. This is the main thing of my work: it is consistent and you either take it all or leave it. You cannot just take one chapter and leave the rest. It is a whole package and it is a consistent one.

AC: My question was more about the mathematical parts in this volume, for example, the application of geometrical formulas and theories for inheritance laws and the theory of limits. Does this not pose a problem for those without a mathematical background?

MS: Yes, I can see that, but people with a secondary school certificate will understand it. Because they do geometry, integration, and coordinates in schools, don't they? And people will know what equations are, what a mean is, and that groups might be one, or two, or three, etc. It is pure logic that anybody can understand.

AC: When you talked about your confrontation with atheism you quoted verse 149 of Sårat a l-An#§m and said that it helped you to find an answer to atheism. How exactly did it help you?

MS: The verse says: 'Say: God's is the argument that reaches home. Had He wanted, He could indeed have guided you all'. It tells me that when I have a debate with an atheist the best argument for God is the strongest argument. I then asked myself where this argument was, I could not see it anywhere!

AC: And back then you were unable to find a strong argument for God?

MS: That is right. You see, our education in the Muslim world is very weak. It is not based on logical reasoning. We confront atheism with animosity and that is all, hostility but no argument. But in the Soviet Union I could not be hostile; I had to argue for my belief. At that time I could not find a good argument for God, now I have found it, but then I asked myself 'where is the proof of God?' I want to see it. Back home, our Sheikhs still could not confront atheism, but now I have found strong arguments for it so that I can have a debate with atheists. Although I know that there is a 50:50 chance, as Stephen Hawking says, that God exists, at least I can tell people why I believe in God and then leave it to others to decide how convincing it is. I do not want to defeat atheism, I will not prove that God exists—and I don't want an atheist to disprove my belief—all that I have now is a strong argument for God and people will judge how good it is.

AC: In another answer to a question about post-1967 you talked about the necessity for a new theory about society, but then you seemed to equate this with a call for an ideology. Maybe the translation didn’t capture what you said then, but can you clarify what you meant by this link between theory and ideology?

MS: Yes, my point was that we have got many ideologies but very little theory. The Arab world is a world of ideologies that are not based on a sound theory of knowledge based on the Qur’an; and we don’t have a theory of state and society. The views of Islamists are pure ideology, an ideology of how to rule and how to seize power. I am interested in theory, not ideology. I know how ideologies have damaged societies in the past. When they [i.e., ideologies or their followers] become dogmatic, they suppress freedom of choice and turn into [ideologies for a] dictatorship. Communism and Islamism are very similar in that; they are dogmatic, oppressive ideologies. The only difference is that Islamists believe in God and communists don”t, but other than that they are very similar. I want to oppose that with theory, because we need more theory, not more ideology. Ideology without theory is dogmatism.

AC: Then you said, and also reiterated it in your book, that the opposite of dogmatism is freedom, and that freedom is linked to democracy. However, you don’t really specify how exactly you define democracy. What is democracy?

MS: We need to distinguish between democracy and the dictatorship of a majority. It is not the same. Democracy means that your opposition is alive. Dictatorship of majority does not allow any opposition. Democracy means that you allow an opposition to criticize your government, to target your authority and to eventually replace you in government through elections. People here in the Arab world don’t know this. They think that once you are in power you have the right to ban and censor everyone who speaks out against your government. This is why I say that we have to learn from America and Great Britain what democracy means. Democracy is measured by the freedom that the oppositional parties enjoy. In this, both countries are truly democratic states— whatever their other faults are.

AC: Quite often one hears from Arabs in the Middle East that the democracies in the West are as flawed as their own. For them, the censorship on Holocaust debates is just proof of the fact that each society has its taboos and won’t allow freedom of speech [on them] whatever the state of democracy. Do you agree with that?

MS: No, I don”t, because there is a difference of scale. There might be some issue where even the most democratic societies feel a certain sensibility and constrain an open debate. But this cannot be compared to the autocracy and lack of freedom we have here [in the Arab world]. I think Muslims and Arabs have no right to criticize Western democracy. The man riding a donkey, does he have the right to criticize airplanes [laughter]? Whatever he may criticize…, maybe the engines are too noisy or the seats are a little bit uncomfortable, but look at him, look what he is travelling on! No, really, we have to be realistic. Because some democracies are not without flaws does not mean that we should throw the baby out with the bathwater and demand the abolition of democracy. Flawed democracies are better than no democracy, don’t you think?!!

AC: Do you believe it is worth thinking about different types of democracy that develop naturally from within the Arab-Muslim world rather than being imposed by force and imported from the West?

MS: Only insofar as it allows different types of political systems, but democracy is the same everywhere. It means the freedom of political opposition—as long as this is done peacefully. Which party you form and whether you have a monarchy or a parliamentary system or both—that may differ from country to country. But no one should be allowed, under whatever name or slogan, to suppress freedom of speech and your personal freedom to speak out against the ruling party. Democracy does not mean the rule of the majority. Democracy means the right of a minority to criticize the majority. This is democracy and it should be applied everywhere.

AC: The question of Arab unity was a big topic in the previous interview. You said in 1996 that ‘I hope my writings will contribute to something useful for the Arabs to fight for unity’. In the book itself, however, you almost never touch on this topic. How do your writings contribute to an Arab unity?

MS: I did not mean that I support a political unity of Arab states like we had between Egypt and Syria. This failed miserably and such unity remains a political dream that we Arabs can perhaps realize in the future, possibly as gradually as it happened in the United States or as it is happening now with the European Union. But I am more concerned with an intellectual unity, a similar thinking that unites the people of the twenty or so Arab states in the Middle East. I want a man in Casablanca to share the same theory as I do, to tackle problems in the same way as I do, and that means that he (hopefully) adopts my method that I propose in my books. Because if a man in Morocco and a man in Kuwait think similarly about a problem, they might come to an agreement, even though the Moroccan remains a Moroccan and the Kuwaiti remains a Kuwaiti.

AC: In terms of this unity of method, how much unity have you achieved since 1996?

MS: I believe I have formed an intellectual stream—from Morocco to the United Arab Emirates—that is always growing.

AC: How can you measure this stream?

MS: By the number of e-mails people keep sending me and their questions about my ideas and interpretations of the Qur’an. I know that my books are being reprinted without my consent [laughter], and read everywhere. I know it through the personal contacts I have with people when I travel to other Arab countries. My books have started a common thinking and common understanding.

AC: Let me come back to the beginning of your work on Islam which started after 1967 and which was a response, as you called it, to the irrational reaction to the defeat. What was your own analysis of the situation?

MS: We lost the war because of our wishful thinking. We thought Israel is so small and we are so big that we can defeat it in one day. We said to the world leave us Israel, we can deal with it alone—and they did leave us with Israel and we lost miserably. We were so convinced we would win that on the first day of the war the PLO invited all Arabs to come to a reception party in Palestine—which shows that they had completely lost touch with reality. 1973 was different, because the Arabs were better organized and also much more determined, in particular the Egyptians who could not tolerate the occupation of Sinai and the seizure of the Suez Canal. The Golan Heights are different, for Syria they don’t mean anything.

The problem is that these events shook people tremendously. They said we were defeated because we were remote from God, and thus the Islamist movement was born.

AC: You said what we needed was a revision of how we reason.

MS: Until now I have been saying this, and I am still working on this.

AC: Do you think it is possible to do this revision by returning to the philosophical tradition of Ibn Rushd and other rationalist thinkers?

MS: Yes, I believe that. The problem with Ibn Rushd is that what links him to us Arabs is only his name, his ideas however have been forgotten. Not even 1 percent of our thinking is influenced by Ibn Rushd. Arabs keep talking about Ibn Rushd and how great he was and how proud we should be that we have such a prominent Arab philosopher, but our thinking is influenced by a l-Ghaz§lÊ, not by Ibn Rushd. Ibn Rushd went to Europe and we were left with al-Ghaz§lÊ. I wish it was the other way round, then we would flourish and Europe would stagnate [laughter]. Unfor tunately, Ibn Rushd revolutionized only the European mind, while the Arabs were entirely left untouched.

AC: And yet we seem to have a kind of revival of interest in Ibn Rushd in Arab countries. More and more people call for a rational enlightenment (a l-tanwÊr) in the tradition of Ibn Rushd and the ideas of the European Enlightenment. Would you yourself identify with this movement?

MS: Not really, for the simple reason that, even though Ibn Rushd has influenced European rational thoughts, European philosophy has gone beyond his ideas and progressed much further than Ibn Rushd. For them, Ibn Rushd is history. The same goes for me. Ibn Rushd is a medieval philosopher who for me, as someone who writes in a modern context, is no longer relevant.

Epistemologically, I should stand on his shoulders, not in his shoes [laughter]. If I think and speak like Ibn Rushd, I will end up in a museum like he is.

AC: Many of your critics have called you a Marxist because of your use of dialectical criticism as your main method. Have you any sympathies for the work of the so-called Islamic left and the attempt to combine Marxist ideas with Islamic concepts?

MS: As a method, that is, as dialectical criticism, I believe it is worthwhile studying Marxism, but not as an ideology. I want to explore the causal connections between the form and content (and interpretations) of ideas at a given historical moment, and the economic, social, and ideological factors that have shaped and determined their content or form. This is why dialectical criticism is so important in my theory of knowledge. But apart from that I don’t take anything from Marxism. I have read all their work. I can understand their critique and I often share it, but they don’t seem to offer any alternative. They are locked into a barrage of criticism but have no idea about what to do and how we can change the current situation. They are well-minded people but they cannot produce anything that is substantially different from what we already have.

AC: How different is your method from theirs?

MS: I went straight back to the context of the Qur’an but used a contemporary perspective. I went back to the origins of Islam itself and yet used a modern approach in studying it. I said to myself, if the Qur’an is from God, it will be possible to analyze it by the most modern methods available. If it cannot be analyzed by modern methods, it is not from God. This is my argument, and I have every right to think this because the Qur’an is a divine text that allows us to bridge the historical gap between then and now. It does not mean that my acceptance of God makes my ideas and how I understand it sacred. One day, a student came up to me and said ‘If you believe that it [i.e., the Qur’an] is from God, how will I ever be able to argue [rationally] with you about it?’ I told him that the text itself is absolute but for us it is relative. Therefore, you can argue with me about it. You do not argue with God about the Qur’an, do you? Your and my understanding is relative and human. The essence of the Qur’an is one thing, but its essence for us is another thing altogether.

AC: Some critics, like Naßr \§mid Abå Zayd, have argued that in spite of your claim to be modern you are not modern enough because you have not applied historical criticism to the Qur’anic text. What would you say to this criticism?

MS: Maybe I wasn’t radical enough, and maybe I wasn’t modern enough, but I do encourage people to surpass me and continue my work and be more modern and radical than I am. This nation will be damned if in three hundred years they are still quoting me as the authority on this. Time is moving on and new things will have to be applied—and if someone wants to apply historical criticism, I would welcome it.

AC: Let us now move on and talk about the period after the first interview in 1996. Have the events of 9/11 changed your writings?

MS: Of course, they have. They are the reason why I stopped for a couple of years to work on my current project about Islamic prophetology. Instead, I began to write the chapters of al-jih§d, a l-amr bi'l-ma#råf, a l-wal§" wa'l-bar§" and the parts on apostasy [that are now summarized in chapter six of this volume]. I began to realize that one cannot treat these topics in isolation from one another but that they had to be tackled together. When I heard about Aim§n a l-£aw§hirÊ's condemnation of all Arab rulers as apostates and that British Asian Muslims are killing their own fellow countrymen [in London 2005] because of their confused understanding of a l-wal§" wa'l-bar§" and that terrorism and violence is justified with the term al-jih§d I knew that I had to clarify these concepts and connect them together.

AC: When did you realize that you had to tackle these issues? Was it immediately after 9/11?

MS: Yes, after 9/11 but I didn't rush into it because I didn't want to react too quickly and too hastily to what had happened. Since 2004 I have begun to work on these problems seriously. Initially,

<right>

I could not find the answer to the problem of Sårat a l-Tauba and Sårat a l-Anf§l that both talk about the military expeditions in early Islam. For almost two years I worked on this problem, and only two years ago, that is, five years after 9/11, I found the solution in the difference between al-khabar and al-naba". I began to realize that these events were khabar events for MuÈammad because he had witnessed them himself, but that they are naba" events for us who live so many centuries after them. They belong to prophecy, not to MuÈammad's message, and hence are not relevant for the legal rules of the sharÊ#a. It was clear to me that abrogation cannot be the solution because these events are part of the Qur'anic stories about MuÈammad, just like we have the Qur’anic stories about Adam and Qur’anic stories about Moses. We should draw our historical lessons from these stories but should not base our legislation on them.

</right>

AC: They are only historical narratives about events in the past?

MS: Exactly. That is why we are required to analyze them from an historical perceptive and formulate historical laws that are based on them, but we are not required to draw conclusions as far as sharÊ#a law is concerned.

AC: Why did it take so long for you to begin tackling these major concepts of political Islam?

MS: I began to think about all these things much earlier than this but it took me some time to come to satisfactory answers. You see, I don’t want to write things that are forgotten tomorrow; I want to make a real impact and change things for the better. I wanted to find a profound, logical, and consistent answer to all these problems, and in the end it doesn’t matter how long it takes you to produce something substantial, it is the result that counts, that is, how good your thoughts are.

AC: You have been tackling the question of why Islamists and political Islam are so obsessed with the question of political authority. Did you find the answer to this?

MS: Since MuÈammad died we have had a long tradition of authoritarian rule in the Arab-Muslim world and no political opposition whatsoever. Political authority for a ruler meant to be in a position to exercise excessive force. Political rule meant oppression and corruption, and because of the absence of any form of opposition, there was no transparency. Our scholars, the fuqah§”, did not tackle this problem at all, on the contrary, they provided the rulers with the legal rulings they wanted in order to consolidate their power. As long as we had the biggest empire in the world, everything was all right. But now we are politically weak and so all the scholars’ concepts and theories do not work any longer. That is why we have this frustration and anger, this rush to solve our political problems and to tackle political authority so that these old concepts fit with reality again.

AC: There is a specific group among Western scholars that explains the Islamist movement as a form of protest against the problems of despotism, authoritarian rule, corruption, and the collapse of the national economy, etc. that exist in the Middle East. Would that not contradict your view on this movement?

MS: Do the Islamists really tackle these problems? I don’t think they do. They don’t even live and apply Islam. All they want to achieve is a change of power and rule for themselves. If they take over, we will face the same kind of oppression and autocracy as we are facing now. I haven’t seen a single suicide bomber who died as a martyr for freedom; I don’t know of anyone who says he is fighting for the freedom of choice and he defends anyone who wants to be a Christian, or a Muslim, or a Buddhist and that he defends my freedom to choose whatever I want. Freedom is not a value in our culture, and I am afraid. I can’t see that freedom of choice is on the agenda of any of the Islamist groups I know of.

AC: Do you share the view that Arab governments have not handled the problem of Islamism very wisely? Many have accused them of unnecessary brutality and of adopting a rather one-sided view on solving the crisis.

MS: Islamism and religious extremism is a disease that is spreading the fear of anarchy, upheaval, and violence among the common people. I agree that the security forces have reacted in a very harsh manner, but you should not forget that this is a dangerous disease. And yet, the security side of it is like Panadol, a painkiller that can’t cure the disease. Too much painkiller and you kill the patient. The cure has to come from something else, and I am convinced that my books are part of the cure.

AC: Do you think that one could also solve the political crisis by allowing Islamist parties to participate in the political process?

MS: I doubt that this is possible. They are politically not experienced enough and are too impatient and want to get to power very fast. Do you know why in October 1917 Lenin refused to accept the idea that one should delay the revolution because it seemed certain that the Bolsheviks could win the next elections anyway? Do you know why he insisted on seizing political power by force? Because he knew that five years down the line he would have to be reelected in the normal democratic way, but if he once took power by force that would be the end of it and someone else would have to use the same force to take it away from him. And he preferred this to democratic elections. The Islamists think like that, they are not true democrats. Their model is the salaf forefathers, but think about what happened after MuÈammad's death when they gathered at ThaqÊfat BanÊ S§#ida and where they removed the Anß§r from power by force, or during the battles of the Camel and at 'iffÊn when fifteen thousand people were killed: not for al-isl§m, not for al-Êm§n, not because of the legal aÈk§m or apostasy—they were all killed because of their ruthless fight for political authority. This is what I fear when Islamists say that this is the model they want to emulate. This is what I want to address in my current writings.

AC: You said that your current writing is applied theory. Is it true that your period of writing theory is really over?

MS: Yes, that is done. I am now applying the very same theory and using it to solve the problem of jih§d, loyalty and disloyalty, apostasy, and the issue of MuÈammad's state which will be my next project.

 Back Matter

 Glossary of Terms and Concepts

| TERM IN ARABIC | TRANSLITERATION | ENGLISH TRANSLATION |

| الكتاب | al-kit§b | The Book

This contains the total content of Allah’s revelation to MuÈammad (ß). |

| التنزيل الحكيم | al-tanzÊl al-ÈakÊm | The authoritative revelation

This comprises all revealed topics which the Book contains from the first to its last page; it is verbatim revealed in form and content—it is not just divinely inspired knowledge (see similarly al-kit§b). |

| كتاب النبوة | kit§b al-nubåwa | The book of prophethood (contained in the Book and, hence, in the tanzÊl al-ÈakÊm)

This approves and confirms the ‘book of messengerhood’. |

| النبوة | al-nubåwa | The prophethood

This contains all the subjects that fall into the category of historical and cosmological knowledge. |

| كتاب الرسالة | kit§b al-ris§la | The book of messengerhood (contained in the Book and, hence, in the tanzÊl al-ÈakÊm)

It is approved and confirmed by the ‘book of prophethood’. |

| الرسالة | al-ris§la | The messengerhood

The totality of instructions which human beings are obliged to follow and which fall into the categories of religious worship, social etiquette, morals, and legal rules. |

| الكتاب المحكم | al-kit§b

al-muÈkam | The book that contains definite verses

These are rules of human behaviour; it separates things that are allowed from things that are absolute taboos. |

| أم الكتاب | umm al-kit§b | Mother of the book

This is one part of the Book; it contains the definite verses which prescribe the duties and principles of human behaviour in terms of what is absolutely permitted or absolutely taboo and what is contingently allowed and contingently prohibited, i.e., ethical and legal rules; it belongs to MuÈammad’s (ß) messengerhood;

(it falls into the same category as al-kit§b al-muÈkam and al-ris§la). |

| القرآن | al-qur”§n | The prophetical revelation

This is one part of the Book; it belongs to MuÈammad’s (ß) prophethood. |

| الكتابالمتشابه | al-kit§b al-mutash§bih | The book that contains ambiguous verses

This is one part of the Book; it contains the ambiguous verses and deals with the realities of truth which Allah gave MuÈammad’s (ß) prophethood; it separates truth from falsehood; it is divided into two categories: sab# al-math§nÊ and al-qur”§n al-#aíÊm. |

| المتشابهة الآيات | al-§y§t al-mutash§bih§t | Ambiguous verses

These belong to the prophetical revelation (which is contained in al-qur”§n and sab# al-math§nÊ). |

| القرآن يد | al-qur”§n al-majÊd | The glorious qur”§n

This is the fixed part of al-qur”§n; it originated in the Tablet Preserved; it contains the general and universal laws of all existence, e.g., of the creation (first explosion), the laws of development, change, alteration, and destruction, including the eschatological teachings of life after death, Hell and Paradise, etc.; these laws are universal and unchangeable. |

| الإمام المبين | al-im§m al-mubÊn | The clear record

This is the changeable part of al-qur”§n; it contains two sides: the Clear Book and the stories of prophets and messengers such as Moses and Jesus. |

| القصص—

</right>

<right>

الكتاب المبين | al-qaßaß

— al-kit§b al-mubÊn | The stories and the clear book

These are things that can change within human history and which are told in the qur”§n as stories; such historical narratives are stored in the Clear Record, not in the Tablet Preserved; their recording takes place after their historical occurrence. |

| السبع المثاني | al-sab# al-math§nÊ | The seven oft-recited that introduce chapters of the Book These are part of the Book, and part of the prophethood; they are in quantity and quality on the same level as the qur”§n and as equally abstract in information but not expressed in clear Arabic, rather in the form of incomprehensible utterances, e.g., in the form of the seven openings of some såras (such as alif-l§m-mÊm, etc.). |

| اللوح المحفوظ | al-lawÈ al-maÈfåí | The tablet preserved

This contains laws that control the universe and objective existence; it has programmed the Glorious Qur’an from within. |

| الكتاب لا محكم و لامتشابه | al-kit§b l§

muÈkam wa-l§ mutash§bih | This is the book that contains neither definite nor ambiguous verses and neither legal rules (aÈk§m) nor historical information (anb§”). |

| تفصيل الكتاب | tafßÊl al-kit§b | Explanation of the Book

This is one part of the Book; it contains those verses that are neither definite nor ambiguous; they are directly revealed from God; they belong to

MuÈammad’s (ß) prophethood; (the same as al-kit§b l§ muÈkam wa-l§ mutash§bih). |

| الذكر | al-dhikr | The remembrance

This is the textual, i.e., linguistic and acoustic, format of the Book in the Arabic language; Allah has ordered us to venerate and preserve this remembrance forever. |

| الموضوعيوالذاتي | al-maw·å#Ê wa’l-dh§tÊ | Objective and subjective

Objective refers to the existence of the laws of existence that exist outside human consciousness

(e.g., the existence of the sun); subjective refers to the existence of things that do not exist independently from human consciousness; their acceptance depends on human behaviour; hence, the prophetical revelation (al-qur”§n, i.e., the prophethood) is the objective part of the Book, and the Mother of the Book

(umm al-kit§b, i.e., the messengerhood) is the subjective part of the Book. |

| الكرسي | al-kursÊ | The chair

The total of all knowledge of the Lord of Heavens; it has no spatial meaning and no connotation of ‘seat’; the ‘throne’ (al-#arsh) is superior to the Chair insofar as the latter’s commands and prohibitions are only applicable to things that the ‘One who commands and prohibits’ has previously made known. |

| الإسلام/المسلمون | al-isl§m / al-muslimån | Islam / Muslim-Assenters

These are those who believe in the existence of God and in the Last Day (and the Resurrection), those who do good deeds and adhere to the Straight Path; they witness that: ‘there is no god but God’.

This cannot be reasoned nor scientifically proven. |

| الإجرام | al-ijr§m | Interruption of the relationship with God

This is the opposite of al-isl§m, i.e., disbelief in the existence of God, the Last Day, Resurrection, and the Day of Judgement; the modern term for it is ‘atheism’. |

| رمون□وا | al-mujrimån | God-dissenters, i.e., those who sever their ties with God This is the opposite term for al-muslimån. |

| المصلون | al-mußallån | God-connected people

Those who have not severed their connection with God, like the dissenters or atheists, and who believe in Him and remember Him; they are the MuslimAssenters who, as the Book states, fight the dissenters or atheists. |

| الإيمان

والمؤمنون | al-Êm§n / al-mu”minån | Faith / Muslim-Believers

These are those who believe in the prophecy and messengerhood of MuÈammad (ß): there are two types of faith: a) the category of al-isl§m (see above); b) the specific faith in following MuÈammad (ß); those who follow MuÈammad and have faith in his message are the ‘Muslim-Believers who have faith in MuÈammad (ß)’ (al-mu”minån); they witness that:

‘MuÈammad is the Messenger of God’. |

| مقيموالصلوة | muqÊmå al-ßalawa or al-ßal§t | Those who perform the ritual prayer of ablution, prostration, and rak#a-positions

These are by necessity God-connected people (and hence also al-muslimån) but not all God-connected people need to perform the ritual prayer because it is part of al-Êm§n, not al-isl§m. |

| الرحمن | al-raÈm§n | The merciful

This is an attribute of God and one of His ninety-nine beautiful names; together with the name “All§h” it is the most distinguished; it contains a notion of God that expresses dialectically opposite attributes, such as merciful and mighty or mild-tempered and quick in punishment, etc. |

| العـدم | al-#adam | Nothingness

Expressed in linguistic terms, this refers to a signifiant (signifying) that has no signifié (signified), or in philosophical terms it refers to knowledge that is not (yet) known (ma#låm); in cosmological terms it refers to the existence of the world when it was not yet created, i.e., it was only in God’s knowledge but not yet known (i.e., not visible), it was a signifiant without a signifié; when it became known, creation became the signifié insofar as Allah’s words (kalim§t) are the source of all existence which are the significant; currently ‘nothingness’ refers to all abstract (theoretic al-mathematical) relationships in nature and the cosmos that appear to be at random but are studied logically by theoretical mathematicians. |

| الوجـود | al-wujåd | Existence

The term refers to Allah’s words which are the truth; it refers to the existence of creation which became the signifié of Allah’s words (kalim§t) which are the source of all existence and the significant; such existence is subject to time and place in that it is ‘Being’ (kaynåna) which is subject to ‘Progressing’

(sayråra) and ‘Becoming’ (ßayråra), whereas Allah’s ‘Being’ (and only this) is not subject to ‘Progressing’ and ‘Becoming’, because He is the First and the Last, the Outward and the Inward. |

| الحـرام | al-Èar§m | Taboo

This is an absolute prohibition issued by God alone; there are thirteen taboos in the Book; they belong to al-isl§m, not al-Êm§n and cannot be extended or reduced, e.g., by parliament or a mufti. |

| المحـرمات | al-muÈarram§t | Taboos

These are absolute, universal, eternal, and comprehensive prohibitions that are to be enforced in all cultures and time periods; they are idolatry; recalcitrance; infanticide; acts of indecency; torment of the soul; misappropriation of the possession of orphans; corruption and tampering with weights and measures; false witness (perjury); redemption by committing Allah; marriage with maÈ§rim relatives; consumption of dead animals, blood, pork, and everything that does not suit Allah; usury of alms; to speak against Allah or say ill-informed things about Allah. |

| السنة | al-sunna | MuÈammad’s (ß) law

This contains MuÈammad’s application of al-ris§la and, hence, the umm al-kit§b during the seventh century on the Arabian Peninsula; his interpretations are only applicable for the period in which he lived, with the exception of the rituals that form the (transhistorical) foundation of the ‘pillars of faith’ (ark§n al-Êm§n). |

| الكلاموالقول | al-kal§m wa’l-qawl | Speech act and meaningful speech

A speech act consists of phonetic utterances by a human voice through the mouth, in orderly sequence and comprehensible form; meaningful speech means that the uttered words have achieved meaningfulness in the mind of the listener who has thus understood them. |

| ا كلمات | kalim§t All§h | Words of God

These are the source of objective, material existence and its general laws as well as of existence’s particular events at the time of their occurrences; human beings have no power to alter them or prevent them from happening; they constitute what is termed ‘divine preordainment’ (al-qadar), within whose limits, however, human beings can exercise choice. |

| الربوبيةوالألوهية | al-rubåbiyya wa’l-ulåhiyya | God’s sovereignty and God’s divinity

God’s sovereignty refers to the objective reality of existence outside human consciousness; it is a relationship of Allah to all of His creation, which is a relationship of dominance, power, and prepotency; this relationship is untouchable and unalterable; God’s divinity, however, can be acknowledged by men of reason and this entails conscious and voluntary acts of devotion and submission; God’s sovereignty always precedes God’s divinity, therefore the umm al-kit§b is a book of God’s divinity, while the qur”§n is a book of God’s sovereignty as it contains eternal cosmological laws. |

| القدروالقضاء | al-qadar wa’l-qa·§” | Divine preordainment and human will

Divine preordainment refers to the absolute existence of things and events outside human consciousness, while human will refers to the conscious human movement within the limits of this existence as it moves between assent and dissent; knowledge (al-ma#rifa) forms the bridge between divine preordainment and human will in the sense that if knowledge grows so does human will and human freedom, and in the sense that Allah means the maximum of knowledge and freedom, and the more humans know the closer they get to Allah; accordingly, before an event occurs in human history it is part of human will but part of the divine preordainment after it has occurred, since there is no regress possible. |

| التنزيل والإنزال والجعل | al-tanzÊl wa’l-inz§l wa’l-ja#l | Objective revelation, transfer to the human mind, and transformation

Al-tanzÊl refers to the process of an objective transport (of revelation) outside human consciousness; al-inz§l refers to the transport (of the revelation) which enters human consciousness and knowledge; al-ja#l refers to the process of change in “Progressing” (ßayråra): this could be a transformation from a nonperceptible format into another nonperceptible format, or from a nonperceptible format into a perceptible format (al-ja#l + al-inz§l); the Book inseparably combines both al-ja#l and al-inz§l, whereas with the aÈk§m (legal rules) there is only a combination of al-tanzÊl and al-inz§l, but no transformation. |

| الناسخوالمنسوخ | al-n§sikh

wa’l-mansåkh | The abrogating and the abrogated

Abrogation refers to the replacement of a rule as stated in a preceding message (ris§la) by a lighter rule in the succeeding message (e.g., the punishment of adultery by stoning in Mås§’s message with flogging and chastisement in MuÈammad’s (ß) message); it takes place only with regard to the legal rules (aÈk§m) and only between messages

(alterations, annullment, supplements are possible), but never within one and the same message. |

| مواقعالنجوم | maw§qi# al-nujåm | The positions of the asterisks

Asterisks separate the verses of the Book and decide whether a stop is allowed or not; there is no relationship to the galactic stars whatsoever. |

| القلم | al-qalam | The pen or axis of human knowledge see below; note that in the Book it does not refer to ‘reed pen’, ‘pencil’, or ‘crayon’ as it has often been too literally translated; instead the term qalam refers to the cognitive process of ‘identification’. |

| والتقليم | al-taqlÊm | Identification

This refers to the process of distinguishing things, which is the vertebral column of human knowledge that expands constantly and which circles the axis that is called al-qalam. |

| التسطير | al-tasãÊr | Classification

This refers to the process of classifying things in human knowledge; it is the process of human thinking that is based on identification; this is why identification, the basis of human thinking, precedes classification. |

| التأويل

الاوجتهاد | al-ta”wÊl wa’l-ijtih§d | Interpretation and legal deduction

Interpretation is possible for the book of ambiguous verses and those things that are changeable; interpretations are carried out from the perspective of a rationally derived theoretical law or on the basis of insights into objective reality; it is an interaction between the text (al-naßß) and human perception; interpretations are relative, subject to change and debate among people; legal deduction takes place in the realm of rules, admonitions, and commandments; these carry the distinctive characteristics of the historical period in which they are made; they are made continuously; outside the realm of rules, admonitions, and commandments no legal deduction takes place, because these other things are subject to general human interests upon which human beings come to a mutual agreement (for which they do not need legal rules). |

| الترتيل | al-tartÊl | Well-ordered arrangement

This is one of the tasks of interpretation: the arrangement of thematically connected

verses in a sensible and systematic order; it is applicable for the understanding of the qur”§n where the relevant passages are scattered around in different chapters. |

| التراث | al-tur§th | The Islamic heritage

This is not congruent with the Book because the latter has no human agency, whereas those who contributed to Islamic heritage, including the salaf forefathers, are all humans. |

| التسبيح

”الشيء”جدل هلاك | al-tasbÊÈ #jadal hal§k al-shay” | Glorification and ‘the dialectics of negation/destruction” This is an internal dialectical movement that contains a battle between two antagonistic elements in everything which create constant change and development, as one thing may be destroyed and reappear in another thing; such dialectics of a constant battle between antagonistic elements guarantees progress; while we say ‘Glory be to God’ we acknowledge that He is beyond negation and change while everyone else in existence changes and, thus, praises God. In other words: this is the dialectics of the interpenetration of opposites and the negation of the negation. |

| البعث | al-ba#th | The resurrection

This refers to the resurrection of men after their death and their entry into a new material ‘Being’ (kaynåna), but without changing their ‘Progressing’ (ßayråra); resurrection is the final step and the last progress of this universe as it transcends into another universe; but because in that world the dialectics of antagonistic battles does not exist, there is no death or birth, but rather eternal immortality. |

| الآخرة | al-§khira | Life after death

This refers to existence in the Next World after the Day of Resurrection; the dialectics of antagonistic battles is replaced by the law of ‘eternal immortality’; however, the law of ‘duality’ and the law of interrelationships (cause and effect) between things do not disappear but rather operate in a different way; there will be oppositional pairs in Hell and Paradise, but their essential quality is different from this world. |

| الحقوالباطل | al-Èaqq wa’l-b§ãil | Truth and falsehood

Truth refers to the material, objective existence outside human consciousness; Allah is the truth, and existence which is Allah’s words (kalim§t) is true;

falsehood is illusion and deceptive imagination or idealistic philosophical thinking. |

| الغيبوالشهادة | al-ghayb wa’l-shah§da | The unknown world and the visible world

Unknown means not yet identified, it refers to those material things and human and natural events that are partially or wholly invisible or not yet present in human understanding and knowledge; visible refers to those things and events that are known or present in human understanding, either through physical awareness of the human senses or through abstract, theoretical thinking. |

| السمع والبصروالفؤاد | al-sam# wa’l-baßar wa’l-fu”§d | Hearing, seeing, and perceptual understanding

Whereas hearing and seeing are bound to an organ of the human body (eye or ear) and form the material basis of human thinking, perceptual understanding is linked to the brain and is the result of the perceptual process of hearing and seeing; it implies that there is no human thinking and understanding without prior perceptions through the senses. |

| البشر والإنسانوالأنسنة | al-bashar wa’l-ins§n wa’l-ansana (or al-unsana) | Human race, human being, and becoming human Human race refers to the material, physiological existence of the human body as a living creature (the Homo erectus); human being refers to mankind as social and rational beings that form relationships and are able to think; becoming human is the process of transforming the human race into rational beings by breathing the spirit of God (al-råÈ) into them. |

| آدم المصطفى | §dam al-mußãaf§ | Adam, the chosen man

He is the father of mankind; he was not alone in this world but always with other people; Allah chose him and taught him how to think in abstract terms; Adam’s task was then to teach this to other people; human beings are ‘his descendants’ (not genealogically his children) in the figurative sense of following him in the process of becoming human. |

| النفس والروحوالوفاة والموت | al-nafs wa’l-råÈ wa’l-waf§t wa’l-mawt | The soul, the spirit, the death of the spirit, and the death of the soul

The term soul has two meanings: first, the ‘body’ and second the ‘soul’. In the first sense, it is like a normal human organ that can die; in the second sense it embodies the human feelings and emotions, such as love and hatred, happiness and pain. In this sense, the soul is the result of the spirit (al-råÈ) and through the spirit human perceptions of things take place. The spirit itself is not a bodily organ; it is the human secret that transforms the human race into human beings; as a result of possessing ‘spirit’, human beings possess knowledge and legislate what is right and wrong, which is part of their responsibility given to them by God (al-taklÊf). |

| الإكراه

والإضطرار | al-ikr§h wa’l-i·ãir§r | Force and compulsion

Force refers to the reduction of possible options with regard to the choice and free will of a person, a reduction carried out by other people; ‘knowledge of God’ is beyond such a force from outside as this would make His knowledge deficient. Compulsion is the reduction of possible options with regards to the choice and free will of a person because of the (objective) circumstances and social context in which the person lives, i.e., it is not induced (subjectively) by other people. |

| قضاء الله وإرادة الله | qa·§” All§h wa-ir§dat All§h | Allah’s will and Allah’s desire

Allah’s will refers to the omnipotent, ubiquitous divine will that originates in the words of God, i.e., all existence and its objective laws, which means that Allah’s will is firm, irrevocable, and preordained (encapsulated in kun fa-yakån; yaqål; naqål). Allah’s desire is of two kinds: a) prescriptions and proscriptions, as stated in the ‘Mother of the Book’, given in the form of moral laws and ‘subjective’ legislation; and b) conditioned orders (to be implemented in nature, the cosmos, and history) as stated in the qur”§n, which are not eternally fixed but circumstantial and context-bound. |

| الإذن والمشيئة | al-idhn

wa”-mashÊ”a | God’s authority and God’s intent

God’s authority will inevitably be manifested—in the form of the objective, material laws of existence; there is no way to interfere or change the way these laws are implemented. However, God’s intent is changeable and capable of becoming either positive or negative; it is a circumstantial intent and linked with human behaviour and historical context. |

| الأجر | al-ajr | Reward

A reward is given by the Lord to a human being as a result of his acts; it is the ultimate outcome of human acquisition (kasab). |

| خلق | al-khulq | Creation (design)

This refers to the planning of an act before its execution; in modern usage it would be called ‘design’; Allah creates and human beings create, but Allah is the superior creator. Creation does not mean creating something ex nihilio as some believe. |

| سوى-

تسوية | saw§ / taswiyya | Implementation

This refers to the complete execution of the design without any omission or fault; this, naturally, happens after the stage of planning. |

| الاستقامة | al-istiq§ma | Straightness

This is an attribute of al-isl§m and the opposite term to ‘Curvature’ with which it stands in a dialectical relationship; it contains the fixed elements (‘the Straight Path’) around or within which the more flexible elements move; these are only to be found in the ‘Mother of the Book’. |

| الحنيفية | al-ÈanÊfiyya | Curvature

This is an attribute of al-isl§m and the opposite term to ‘Straightness’ with which it stands in a dialectical relationship; it is the more dynamic part that contains changes and alterations (of legislation and human behaviour in general) within the limits of the fixed parts of ‘Straightness’. |

| □ا حدود | Èudåd All§h | God’s limits

These refer to the ‘Straightness’ in al-isl§m; they are the outward boundaries of human behaviour which Allah has set down in the Book and which humans are not allowed to step over but are permitted to move between. |

| الحد الأدنى | al-Èadd al-adn§ | Lower limit

This defines the lowest denominator of acceptable (legitimate) human behaviour (or of legal punishment) that no one is allowed to step under. |

| الحد الأعلى | al-Èadd al-a#l§ | Upper limit

This defines the most extreme possible amount of legality in human behaviour (or of legal punishment) that no one is allowed to step over. |

| الزكاة والصدقاتوالربا | al-zak§h wa’l-ßadaq§t wa’l-rib§ | Duty of alms tax, general charity; and usury

Duty of alms is an act of charity that contains no obligation for a return of the amount given (money or otherwise); it forms the lower limit of general charity and belongs to the pillars of al-Êm§n. General charity is a much broader term. Duty of alms is performed by and for followers of MuÈammad’s (ß) messengerhood, while general charity can be given by and to any person of whatever belief or religious community. Usury is the abuse or misuse of the charity system, however small the amount is. It is also to wrongly give interest-free loans to people who do not need them (businessmen, farmers, traders, etc.). Finally, it is also to falsely reduce or increase the amount of debt a person has accumulated. |

| الشعائر | al-sha#§“ir | Rituals

These define the connection between human beings and God; they are firmly fixed and unchangeable but differ from one religious community to the next; prayer is the most common form of a ritual as it is the most direct form of communication between a worshipper and the Lord. Typical of rituals is that they are not subject to objective, rational research reflecting the limits of legislation and commandments, because they are fixed and because they express loyalty to a specific messenger. This is also the case with the rituals of al-Êm§n (e.g., prayer, fasting, pilgrimage, and alms) that are performed while adhering to Muhammad’s (ß) messengerhood; they are wrongly called pillars of al-isl§m since they are only pillars of al-Êm§n. |

| الفقراءوالمساكين | al-fuqar§”

wa’l-mas§kÊn | Poor people and handicapped people

Poor people are those with little or no income; they are not necessarily handicapped people; what constitutes poverty differs from one historical period to the other and from one country to the next; handicapped people are those who are mentally and physically disabled. This term is often used in the Book but not mentioned in Islamic fiqh which reflects a derisory attitude towards handicapped people as they were thought of as not fully human. |

| الفرقان أو الوصايا العشر(الأخلاق) | al-furq§n aw al-waß§y§ al-#ashr (al-akhl§q) | Moral guidance or the ten commandments

(ethics) The term al-furq§n refers to the common moral ground of the three monotheistic religions: it includes the straight path of Moses, the wise guidance of Jesus, and the straight path of MuÈammad; Jewish, Christian and ^m§nic (based on MuÈammad’s messengerhood) principles of moral behaviour are the common denominator that is called al-furq§n. There are two types of al-furq§n: a) general guidance and b) specific guidance; general guidance refers to the ten commandments which are the lower limit of moral guidance given to all human beings; this forms the common moral ground of all human communities through which one may achieve high standards of morality; specific guidance refers to the set of commandments given by MuÈammad (ß) that are applicable not only to those who want to realise social ethics as they are specified by its lower level (i.e., general guidance) but who also want to increase their commitment and become leaders of the devout and pious. These commandments are not given in clear, explicit commands since they are stated in the ‘general guidance’, but only in the form of (indirect) notifications. |

| التقوى | al-taqw§ | Piety

This refers to the act of doing what is permitted and abstaining from what is prohibited, as stated in the umm al-kit§b; it refers to human behaviour and not to human knowledge about objective existence; there are 1) individual piety (rituals), 2) social piety (ethics, al-isl§m), and 3) public (legal) piety (legislating within the limits of Allah); interference in matters of individual piety should be prohibited. |

| الأعرافوالأخلاق | al- a#r§f

wa’l-akhl§q | Customs and ethics

Customs are changeable and variable as they differ from one social and cultural milieu to the next; ethics are the common ground of human interaction and intermundane communication and have therefore a more comprehensive, universal character. Hence, they are directly and precisely revealed by God, while customs are, because of their changeable nature, only loosely mentioned. |

| الامر بالمعروف والنهي عنالمنكر | al-amr bi’lma#råf wa’l-nahy

#an al-munkar | The prescription of what is right and the proscription of what is wrong

This refers to the duty of human beings to (politely and in a civilized manner) urge people to do what is generally accepted as right and to (equally politely) urge them to refrain from what is generally regarded as wrong in a given society. These things cannot be implemented by force and coercion. |

| متاع الحياةالدنيا | mat§# al-Èay§h al-duny§ | The delights of this world

These include things that human beings can legitimately use as enjoyable products of society’s human economy; they cannot be fixed once and for all because they are subject to changes (in human economy and in what humans wish to enjoy). The qur”§n has defined six fundamental human wishes and called them the ‘delights of this world’. |

| النساء | al-nis§” | Women or those who come later

The term al-nis§” carries two meanings: a) the partners of men, i.e., women (in this case it is the plural of imra”a); and b) those who or that which come later (in this case it is the plural of nasÊ’). In the latter meaning it may refer to what is most recent of the delights of this world (i.e., the latest fashion); a desire for this is only natural for all human beings. |

| الفسوقوالفساد | al-fusåq wa’l-fas§d | Disobedience and corruption

Disobedience refers to the act of rejecting the orders and injunctions of the Lord of the Heavens; corruption, however, is a structural phenomenon, e.g., when because of bureaucracy and bribery a state cannot function properly. |

| بر الوالدين | birr al-w§lidain | Respect of parents

This was the first ethical concept in the history of mankind which separated humans from animals; it first appeared at the time of Noah and signalled a change from matriarchy to patriarchy, in the sense that the son now respected both his parents, not only his mother, and it provided the development from the small nuclear family to the extended family and to the tribe; it also marked a transition from the council of the elders to the social classes, the police, and then later on to the state. |

| الأمة | al-umma | Community

This is a group of people who share a common behaviour; or a group of animals whose behaviour follows the same instincts; in social terms, it is perhaps better expressed with the modern term ‘culture’ (al-thaq§fa) and might extend to people who lived in the past, including ancient, medieval, and modern historical epochs; Muslim-Believers form the community of MuÈammad, and they respect other communities. |

| القوم | al-qawm | People

This is defined by the use of a common language, e.g., the Arabs are the people of MuÈammad (ß); they trade and cooperate with other peoples. In the Book the term al-qawm is a concept that is more advanced than the concept of ‘community’ and was, chronologically, revealed later. |

| الشعب | al-sha#b | Nation

This is a more complex term as it refers to a self-defined cultural and social body that combines several languages (lis§n) and several ethnicities (qawm) with a multitude of ideological communities (umma), but is governed by a single political system and contained in a unified territory (the national homeland) that both are controlled and regulated within the realm of a nation-state (waãan); today, there is one community of believers of Arab ethnicity within twenty-one Arab nation-states, consisting of many nationalities and communities. The relationship between peoples is based on tolerance and cooperation, not force or hatred. It refers to citizenship if it is applied on the level of individuals. |

| الحرية والعدالةوالمساواة | al-ÈurrÊya wa’l-#ad§la wa’l-mus§w§h | Freedom, justice, and equality

These are the main aims of jih§d in God’s way. |

| فرعون وهامان وقارون و المستضعفونفي الأرض | far#ån wa-h§m§n wa-q§rån wa’l-musta·#ifån fi’l-“ar· | Pharaoh, H§m§n, Q§rån, and the ‘wretched souls of this world”

The name Pharaoh stands for political despotism, tyranny, and government based on violence; the name H§m§n stands for religious policing and power in collaboration with the political administration; in a theocracy both types of power come together in just one person; the name Q§rån stands for the power of global companies in business and commerce with enormous economic might and political influence; people or the ‘wretched souls of this world’ will always fight political, religious, and economic despotism even though the face of such despotism may change over time, e.g., today, political and religious despotism is less severe, and economic force has become less inhuman than it used to be. |

| القصاص

والعقوبة | al-qiß§ß

wa’l-#uqåba | Punishment and retribution

A punishment follows a criminal act and may be different in kind from the criminal act, whereas retribution is quantitatively and qualitatively of the same kind, so for example the flogging of the adulterer is a punishment, whereas the killing of the murderer is retribution. |

| العبد والعبادوالعبادة | al-#abd wa’l-#ubb§d wa’l-#ib§da | The Worshipper, the worshippers, and the worship

The worshipper of God is a free human being who is able to choose between obeying or disobeying orders; the worshippers are those for whom messengers have issued orders but they are free to choose between obedience and disobedience; worship is the way to follow the straight path, not in the sense of performing rituals such as pilgrimage and fasting, etc. which are the rituals of al-Êm§n (and not of the straight path). |

| العبد الحر(الآمر) | al-#abd al-Èurr (al-§mir) | A free worshipper of God

This is someone who can issue orders to others. |

| العبد والعبيدوالعبودية | al-#abd wa’l-#abÊd wa’l-#ubådÊya | A worshipper of God / slaves / slavery

The Book states that worshippers have a choice between obedience and disobedience, while slaves do not enjoy such a choice. To forbid free choice is a human invention—it would never have been allowed by God. Slavish obedience towards God is not requested in this world, only on the Day of Judgement when people indeed become slaves of God. |

| العبد الرق(المملوك) | al-#abd al-riqq (al-mamlåk) | Slave

A slave is owned as private property by someone else; he has no free choice as he must always say yes to whatever his owner demands from him. |

| الميثاق وميثاقالإسلام | al-mÊth§q

wa-mÊth§q

al-isl§m | Covenant and the covenant of Islam

A covenant is a voluntary bond based on trust and acceptance between two partners; it is of a lesser and historically earlier level than a law or a constitution; a covenant of God contains an oath of allegiance to God, this means that the fulfilment or breach of that oath in respect to God is the fulfilment or breach of the covenant; the covenant of al-isl§m is the ultimate model for a human society (and what we would call ‘moral law’ (al-q§nån al-akhl§qÊ), i.e., the general human law, based on following the straight path (the worship of God). |

| الشهيد والشهادة الحضورية و الشاهد والشاهدةالمعرفية | al-shahÊd wa’l-shah§da al-Èu·årÊya + al-sh§hid wa’l-sh§hida al-ma#rifÊya | ShahÊd-witness and sh§hid-witness

A shahÊd-witness directly observes things and events as an eyewitness, while a sh§hid-witness observes (nonsensually) these things from a distance; the first term relates to witness in its strictly empirical sense (i.e., perception through the senses), while the second term refers to a theoretical observation (e.g., in the case of an epistemological recognition); the meaning of ‘martyr in a battle’ is an invention and cannot be found in the Book; the one who is an eyewitness to a financial contract is, of course, a shahÊd-witness. |

| الوالد والأبوالوالدة والأم | al-w§lid wa’l-ab

wa’l-w§lida wa’l-umm | The biological father (i.e., the birth-giver) and the caregiverfather (who may not be the biological father); the biological mother (the birth-giver) and the caregiver-mother (who may not be the biological mother) |

| الوالدانوالأبوان | al-w§lid§n wa’l-abaw§n | The biological parents (i.e., the birth-givers) and the caregiver-parents (who may not be the biological parents) If the caregiver-parents are also the biological parents they would never be called caregiver-parents (al-abaw§n) but always birth-givers (al-w§lid§n). |

| التبني | al-tabann§ | Adoption of a child

If adoption is carried out within the first two years of a child’s life, the foster parents achieve the same status as the biological parents of the child, since the child would have no other recollection of his/her parents than that of his/her foster parents. |

| الشرك با | al-shirk bi’l-ll§h | Violation of God’s unity

There are three different ways of violating God’s unity but only the first is regarded as an unforgivable ‘sin’ (al-dhanb), and that is, a) to make an image of God, which is to give God a concrete temporal, spatial, and material dimension (ignoring that He is beyond any such dimension or description); the other two less severe but equally condemnable sins are: b) a violation of God’s divinity, which is to declare the generation of the forefathers and of the medieval jurists infallible, or to regard what is called ‘Islamic jurisprudence’ as eternally valid. This is a violation of the ÈanÊfiyya principle as it renders fixed something that is subject to historical change; it is a form of an indirect violation of God’s unity, since it attempts to call something fixed and everlasting, while these are attributes that can only be applied to God; c) a violation of God’s sovereignty, i.e., the visit of the tombs of saints, ‘åfÊ brotherhoods, the call for human intermediaries between God and human beings, etc. |

| الربا | al-rib§ | Interest

The verses of the Book allow to propose a flexible banking system that can incorporate, if need be, the taking of interest and which, by holding to the limits that Allah has set, can also prevent its misuse (i.e., usury). |

| الخمر | al-khamr | Intoxicating substance

The Book mentions the benefits of intoxicating substances, such as in drugs or anaesthetics which some people need during surgical operations. Al-khamr always connotes substances that lead to intoxication and a total confusion of a person’s mind; in instances where a person consumes alcohol but does not get intoxicated the term al-khamr is not applicable. |

| الرجس | al-rajas | Confusion

This refers basically to a conflation or confusion between two things and is usually caused by doing something (beneficial and useful) to excess, e.g., excess in terms of al-khamr leads to intoxication, and excess in terms of games of chance is to bet on a large amount of money. |

| الحلال والحرام | al-Èal§l

wa’l-Èar§m | The permitted and the absolutely taboo

Forbidden things are those acts which Allah has explicitly forbidden in the Book; if God did not explicitly forbid a thing, it is permitted. The absolute taboos are universally and eternally forbidden, while the permitted things are universally allowed. However, the latter might be, if the cultural context makes it necessary, further qualified (and hence limited) within the boundaries of God and according to historical circumstances. Only God can absolutely forbid and permit things, while human legislators can temporarily allow or prohibit (yasmaÈ wa-yamna#) things. The latter are not subject to authorisation by the religious scholars (al-istift§”). |

| الأمر والنهي | al-amr wa’l-nahy | Prescription and proscription

Prescriptions and proscriptions can be issued

both by God and human beings, but while God absolutely permits and forbids as well as prescribes and proscribes, human beings prescribe and proscribe. This implies that there are divine proscriptions and human proscriptions; divine proscriptions are either absolute or relative, but human proscriptions can only be relative and temporary; divine proscriptions are within a grey zone of black and white, i.e., permitted or prohibited (the ‘ambiguous decrees’), e.g., in the case of the consumption of intoxicated substances; however, human proscriptions, including those by MuÈammad (ß), are relative and subject to historical circumstances, e.g., to forbid intercourse between a girl and her maternal or paternal uncle is a human proscription not a (divine) prohibition and we may add further interdictions of this kind, e.g., concerning intercourse between a girl and her male cousin, but we are not allowed to regard this interdiction as an absolute taboo. |

| الحكمة | al-Èikma | Wisdom

This refers to the teaching of general moral instructions that are applicable to all people; however, one must not issue legal or doctrinal rules on the basis of these moral instructions; wisdom comes through revelation, but revelation is not always necessary; it can be found with the wisest men in all periods of time even in those times when divine revelation has ceased to come down. |

| اليتيم | al-yatÊm | Orphan

This is a minor who has lost his/her caregiverfather, while the mother may still be alive; if an orphan reaches adulthood he/she legally ceases to be an orphan. |

| الحجابوالجلباب | al-Èij§b wa’l-jilb§b | \ij§b is an item of clothing to cover the breasts of a woman; Jilb§b is an item of clothing that covers a woman’s body outside her home; this belongs to the field of social dress codes, not official legislation, and the only criteria is that the way a woman dresses should prevent ‘harm’ or ‘insult’ in public (this might vary from one culture to another). |

| زينة المرأة

والجيوب | zÊnat al-mar”a wa’l-juyåb | Beauty of a woman

This might be external (face), which should not be covered, or internal (hidden), like the area from the neck downwards to the buttocks, which should be covered. There is no textual proof that the head of a woman needs to be covered. |

| العورة | al-#awra | Feeling of shame

This refers to the desire of a person not to reveal something of his or her body or behaviour. But shame is relative, not absolute, as it expresses current customary practices and may change over time; there is no connection to things that are absolutely forbidden or permitted. |

| الزواج | al-zaw§j | Marital relationship

This refers to a marital relationship between a man and a woman who are adults and compos mentis; the purpose of this relationship is to establish a family and have children with the perspective of a long-term relationship that is, however, permitted to be terminated by divorce. |

| علاقة ملك اليمين

 | #il§qat mulk al-yamÊn | Partnership

This pertains to a voluntary relationship between a man and woman who are both adults and compos mentis, but who are not married and whose relationship is short-term but of a sexual nature; there are several types of partnerhships, e.g., zaw§j al-mut#a (temporary partnership) where the male partner provides for the female partner; zaw§j al-misy§r (controlled or guided partnership) where the female partner has no right to demand such provision; and zaw§j al-frind (friendship) where there is mutual provision and care; all these types, are not absolutely forbidden though they do not constitute marriage. |

| البعل | al-ba#l | Partner or companion

He is someone who fulfils the roles of a family provider, eating companion, drinking companion and play mate; if he does all of this and fulfils his conjugal rights he is regarded as a women’s (sexually active) husband (al-zawj). |

| □ا حاكمية | È§kimÊyat All§h | The immutable domination of God

This is expressed in the following way:

1. a demand for absolute obedience (God’s divinity) by human beings

2. the absolute power over everything (God’s sovereignty)

3. absolute singularity (oneness) in such divinity

4. absolute arbitrariness in His actions (‘He does what He wants’)

5. … He is beyond examination and enquiry. |

| التبذيـر | al-tabdhÊr | Squandering

This efers to an excess in (legitimate) spending, e.g., when someone spends 90% of his income on charity, or spends the cost of food for thirty people on only three guests; it is a quantitative excess, i.e., it means to transgress the limits of a (normally) permitted act. |

| الإسراف | al-isr§f | Excess

Excess turns a permitted act into a forbidden act by acting in too extreme a manner. It is quantitative excess, for example, when someone not only kills a murderer (which is permitted) but also his whole family (which is forbidden); it is qualitative excess, for example, when one eats only one slice of (the absolutely forbidden) meat pork. |

 Bibliography

* Monographs by Muhammad Shahrur

ShaÈrår, MuÈammad. Al-Kit§b wa’l-qur”§n—Qir§“a mu#§ßira (The Book and the Qur’an— A Contemporary Reading). Damascus: D§r al-Ah§lÊ li’l-Nashr wa’l-TawzÊ#, 1990.

———. A l-Dawla wa’l-mujtama# (The State and the Society). Damascus: D§r a l-Ah§lÊ li’l-Nashr wa’l-Taw·Ê”, 1994.

———. Al-Isl§m wa’l-Êm§n—Maníåmat al-qiyam (Islam and Faith—The Versification of Values). Damascus: D§r al-Ah§lÊ li’l-Nashr wa’l-TawzÊ#, 1996.

———. NaÈw uß̊l jadÊda li’l-fiqh al-isl§mÊ—Fiqh a l-mar”a (Towards New Principles of Islamic Jurisprudence With Regards to Women). Damascus: D§r a l-Ah§lÊ li’l-Nashr wa’l-TawzÊ#, 2000.

———. Mashrå# mÊth§q al-#amal al-isl§mÊ (Proposal for a Covenant of Islamic Action). Damascus: D§r al-Ah§lÊ li’l-Nashr wa’l-TawzÊ#, 1999; translated into English by Dale F. Eickelman (with Ismail S. Abu Shehadeh) and published as Proposal for an Islamic Covenant. Damascus: al-Ah§lÊ, 2000 (also published on ISIM and Islam21 Web sites).

———. TajfÊf man§bi# al-irh§b (Draining the Sources of Terrorism). Damascus: D§r al-Ah§lÊ li’l-Nashr wa’l-TawzÊ#, 2008.

* Journal, newspaper, and Web Site articles by Muhammad Shahrur

ShaÈrår, MuÈammad, Al-Qir§“a al-mu#§ßira li’l-qur”§n (“A Contemporary Reading of the Qur’an.”) Al-Hil§l (Egypt) (January 1992)—this is a response to Abå Zayd’s article in Hil§l (October 1991): 128–34.

———. “The Divine Text and Pluralism in Muslim Societies.” Muslim Politics Report (August 14, 1997); republished on the Web site of Dr. Muhammad Shahrur— hereafter: (also: www.shahrour.org); also appeared In The New Voices of Islam: Reforming Politics and Modernity, edited by Mehran Kamrava. London, New York: I. B. Tauris, 2006, 143–51.

———. “Islam and the 1995 Beijing World Conference on Women.” (Translated from Arabic by Dale F. Eickelman) In Liberal Islam: A Sourcebook, edited by Charles Kurzman. New York/Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1998, 139–42.

———. “Modernists”, Islam 21 (UK), (January 1999).

———. A l-\arak§t a l-lÊbr§liyya rafa·at al-fiqh wa-tashrÊ#§tih§ wa-lakinnah§ lam tarfu· al-isl§m ka-tawÈÊd wa-ris§la sam§wiyya (“The Liberal Movements Have Rejected Islamic Jurisprudence and Its Legislations, and Yet They Did Not Reject Islam As Monotheistic Belief and Divine Message.”) Akhb§r al-#Arab al-KhalÊjiyya (UAE), no. 20 (December 16, 2000).

———. Al-\arak§t al-isl§miyya lan tafåz bi’l-shar#iyya il§ idh§ ãaraÈat nazhariyya isl§miyya mu#§ßira fi’l-dawla wa’l-mujtama# (“The Islamic Movements Will Only Gain Legality If They Propose A Contemporary Theory of State and Society.”) Akhb§r al-#Arab al-KhalÊjiyya (UAE), no. 21 (December 17, 2000).

———. Al-Uß åliyya al-isl§miyya… il§ “ayn? (1) (“Islamic Fundamentalism…Quo Vadis?.”) Al-WaÈdawÊ (Syria), no. 1 (February 15, 2001).

———. Al-Uß åliyya al-isl§miyya… il§ “ayn? (2) (“Islamic Fundamentalism…Quo Vadis?.”) Al-WaÈdawÊ (Syria), no. 2 (March 1, 2001).

———. Qawl fi’l-Èurriyya (“The Talk About Freedom.”) TaqrÊr al-Tanmiyya al-Ins§niyya al-#Arabiyya, Markaz Ibn Khaldån (Egypt), (March 2003).

———. Kayf nadmuj bayn qiyam a l-isl§m wa’l-gharb wa-man yaqåd h§dh§ al-damj (“How to Assimilate Islamic and Western Values and Who Will Drive Such Assimilation.”) (April 2003)—(also: www.shahrour.org).

———. Al-Iß l§h al-dÊnÊ awwal[an] thumm[a] al-siy§sÊ wa’l-iqtiß§dÊ— al-#Aql al-#arabÊ ‘aql qiy§sÊ wa’l-#aql al-qiy§sÊ l§ yuntij (“Religious Reforms First then Political and Economic [Reforms]: The Arabic Mind is Analogical and the Analogical Mind is Unproductive.”) Al-Når (Syria), no. 93 (July 5, 2003)—(also: www.shahrour. org).

———. Inn§ li’l-ll§h wa-inn§ ilayh[i] r§ji#ån (“We are for God, and to Him We Will Return.”) Al-IttiÈ§d (UAE), (April 2004)—(also: www.shahrour.org).

———. A l-Irh§b wa-Èarb a l-mußãalaÈ§t (“Terrorism and the War of Words.”) A l-IttiÈ§d (UAE), (April 2004)—(also: www.shahrour.org).

———. Al-Gharb…wa’l-isl§m (“The West…and Islam.”) Al-IttiÈ§d (UAE), (April 2004)—(also: www.shahrour.org).

———. L§ aqbal[u] al-julås ‘ind aqd§m: Ibn ‘Abb§s wa- al-Sh§fi#Ê (“I Do Not Accept Sitting Near the Feet of Ibn ‘Abb§s and al-Sh§fi#Ê.”) Al-Rajul al-Yawm (UAE), no. 1 (July 1, 2004)—(also: www.shahrour.org).

———. Bi-naßß al-qur”§n al-karÊm: kull atb§# al-diy§n§t al-sam§wiyya muslimån (“According to the Text of the Noble Qur”§n: All the Followers of the Heavenly Religions Are Muslims.”) Rawz a l-Yåsuf (Egypt), no. 3988 (November 19, 2004)—(also: www.shahrour.org).

———. Al-Isl§m wa’l-Êm§n (1) (“Islam and Im§n”, 1) Rawz al-Yåsuf (Egypt), no. 3988 (November 19, 2004)—(also: www.shahrour.org).

———. Isl§m wa’l-Êm§n (2) (“Islam and Im§n”, 2) Rawz al-Yåsuf (Egypt), no. 3990 (December 3, 2004)—(also: www.shahrour.org).

———. #$lamiyyat §y§t al-aÈk§m (al-ris§la) fÊ #aßr m§ ba#d al-ris§l§t (“The Universality of the Verses of Legal Rulings (the Message) In an Age that Followed [the Period of Prophetical] Messages.”) Rawz al-Yåsuf (Egypt), no. 3994 (December 31, 2004)—(also: www.shahrour.org).

———. Al-Qiyam: al-akhl§q wa’l-shar§“i# wa’l-sha#§“ir (“Values: Morality, Legal Rules and Religious Rituals.”) Rawz al-Yåsuf (Egypt), no. 3994 (December 31, 2004)— (also: www.shahrour.org).

———. \awl nash”at §dam wa-nash”at al-ins§n (1) (“About the Birth of Adam and the Birth of Humankind”, 1) Rawz al-Yåsuf (Egypt), no. 3995 (January 7, 2005)—(also: www.shahrour.org).

———. \awl nash”at §dam wa-nash”at al-ins§n (2) (“About the Birth of Adam and the Birth of Humankind”, 2) Rawz al-Yåsuf (Egypt), no. 3996 (January 14, 2005)—(also: www.shahrour.org).

———. \awl nash”at §dam wa-nash”at al-ins§n: nafkhat a l-råÈ (3) (“About the Birth of Adam and the Birth of Humankind: [Allah] Breathes the Spirit Into Humans.”) Rawz al-Yåsuf (Egypt), no. 3996 (January 21, 2005)—(also: www.shahrour.org).

———. A l-Ta#addudiyya a l-zawjiyya (“Polygyny.”) Rawz a l-Yåsuf (Egypt), no. 3997 (January 28, 2005)—(also: www.shahrour.org).

———. Kayf #abbara al-qur”§n #an mar§Èil nash”at al-kal§m al-ins§nÊ (“How Did the Qur’an Express the Evolutionary Stages of Human Speech.”) Rawz al-Yåsuf (Egypt), no. 4000 (February 11, 2005)—(also: www.shahrour.org).

———. Al-Qiw§ma (1) (“Guardianship”, 1) Rawz al-Yåsuf (Egypt), no. 4000 (February 11, 2005)—(also: www.shahrour.org).

———. A l-Qiw§ma (2) (“Guardianship”, 2) Rawz a l-Yåsuf (Egypt), Rawz a l-Yåsuf (Egypt), no. 4001 (February 18, 2005)—(also: www.shahrour.org).

———. Sab# qa·§y§ yuthÊruh§ a l-Ikhw§n a l-Muslimån wa-ya#jizån[a] #an Èallih§ (“Seven Issues that the Muslim Brotherhood Has Raised and Failed to Solve.”) Rawz al-Yåsuf (Egypt), no. 4022 (July 15, 2005).

———. Al-Uß åliyya al-isl§miyya… il§ “ayn? (1): al-Jih§d fÊ sabÊl al-jahl (“Islamic Fundamentalism…Quo Vadis: Struggle in the Way of Ignorance”, 1) Rawz al-Yåsuf, (Egypt), no. 4026 (August 12, 2005)—(also: www.shahrour.org).

———. Al-Uß åliyya al-isl§miyya… il§ “ayn? (2) (“Islamic Fundamentalism…Quo Vadis?”, 2) Rawz al-Yåsuf (Egypt), Rawz al-Yåsuf (Egypt), no. 4027 (August 19, 2005)—(also: www.shahrour.org).

———. NaÈw tartÊb awlawiyy§t al-thaq§fa al-#arabiyya al-isl§miyya (“Towards A Restructuring of Priorities of the Arabic-Islamic Culture.”), (September 2005)— (also: www.shahrour.org).

———. Qir§“a mu#§ßira fi’l-tanzÊl al-ÈakÊm Èawl al-mujtama# al-ins§nÊ wa’l-mus§w§h bayn al-afr§d wa’l-majmå#§t fi’l-irth wa’l-siy§sa wa’l-iqtiß§d (“A Contemporary Reading of the Wise Revelation On Human Society and the Equality Between Individuals and Groups In Inheritance Law, Politics, and Economy.”), (October 2005)—(also: www.shahrour.org).

———. #$lamiyyat §y§t al-aÈk§m (al-ris§la) fÊ #aßr m§ ba#d al-ris§l§t (“The Universality of the Verses of Legal Rulings (the Message) in an Age that Followed [the Period of Prophetical] Messages.”), (November 2005)—(also: www.shahrour.org).

———. L§ yåjad wukal§” Èaßriyyån li’l-fiqh a l-isl§mÊ (“Complete Lawyers of Islamic Jurisprudence Do Not Exist.”) A l-Når (Syria), (March 26, 2006)—(also: www. shahrour.org).

———. Liq§” al-duktår MuÈammad ShaÈrår ma# muntad§ al-Shurfa— al-Juz” al-awwal wa’l-th§nÊ wa’l-th§lith (“A Meeting With Dr. Muhammad Shahrur: The Shurfa Forum— First, Second, and Third Parts.”); an Internet Forum (February 2007)—(also: www.shahrour.org).

———. “Islamic Politics of the Second Great Fitna”, Islam 21 (UK), nos. 43–44 (May 2007).

* Partly unpublished material (manuscripts or recordings of lectures, television interviews and colloquia)

– The Book and the Qur”§n, Boston University, Department of Anthropology, November 23, 1998.

– Satellite Channel ‘Orbit’, interview by Dr. Ri·w§n a l-Sayyid, December 4, 1999.

– Rights of Women in the Holy Book and in Islamic Jurisprudence, Seminar on Middle Eastern Legal Studies, Yale Law School, Istanbul, May 2000.

– Satellite Channel ‘Orbit’, Programme ‘Al§’l-haw§’, June 4, 2000.

– Satellite Channel ‘Orbit’, Programme ‘Al§’l-haw§’, together with Dr. #Abd al-‘abår Sh§hÊn and Dr. #Abd al-Mu#ãÊ BayåmÊ, June 5, 2000.

– Satellite Channel ‘Orbit’, Programme ‘Al§’l-haw§’, together with Dr. #Abd al-‘abår Sh§hÊn and Dr. #Abd al-Mu#ãÊ BayåmÊ, June 6, 2000.

– Satellite Channel ‘Orbit’, Programme Ab#§d, together with Dr. Su#§d ‘§liÈ, presented by Jam§l ‘In§yat, June/July 2000.

– Satellite Channel ‘Orbit’, Programme ‘Al§’l-haw§’, January 10, 2001.

– Satellite Channel ‘Orbit’, Programme ‘Al§’l-haw§’, January 13, 2001.

– Satellite Channel ‘Orbit’, Programme ‘Al§’l-haw§’, January 14, 2001.

– Satellite Channel ‘Orbit’, Programme ‘Al§’l-haw§’, together with Dr. Su#§d ‘§liÈ, January 15, 2001.

– Satellite Channel ‘Orbit’, Programme ‘Al§’l-haw§’, together with Dr. Su#§d ‘§liÈ, January 22, 2001.

– Satellite Channel ‘Orbit’, Programme ‘Al§’l-haw§’, December 2, 2001.

– Satellite Channel ‘Orbit’, Programme ‘Al§’l-haw§’, December 3, 2001.

– Satellite Channel ‘Orbit’, Programme ‘Al§’l-haw§’, December 4, 2001.

– Al-Mar”a fi’l-isl§m wa-muqta·ay§t al-#aßr (Women In Islam and the Demands of the Modern Era). Lecture held at the South-Lebanese Council of Culture in Beirut (Lebanon), published in Al-Kif§È al-#arabÊ (Lebanon), no. 3198 (June 8, 2002).

– Al-Irh§b wa’l-ady§n (Terrorism and World Religions). Lecture held at the Cultural Forum of Dialogue in Damascus (Syria), published in A l-Kif§È a l-#arabÊ (Lebanon), no. 3226 (July 11, 2002).

– Al-\§ja al-muliÈÈa li’l-ißl§È al-thaq§fÊ (al-dÊnÊ) fÊ buld§n al-sharqayn al-adn§ wa’l-awsaã (The Pressing Need for Cultural [and Religious] Reforms in the Near and Middle East). Lecture at the Institut für Auslandsbeziehungen (IfA) (Germany), conference on “Transformation Processes in the Countries of the Middle East”, (December 17–19, 2003)—(also: www.shahrour.org).

– Islamic Fundamentalism: Where Is It Going? Published in Current History (Boston University, Department of Anthropology), (January 1, 2005).

– \aqÊqat al-isl§m bayn a l-tashaddud wa’l-tas§muÈ (The Reality of Islam between Harshness and Tolerance). Participation in a round table discussion, published in Rawz al-Yåsuf (Egypt), no. 3993 (December 24, 2004).

– Mawqif al-l§-mub§l§h li’l-ins§n al-#arabÊ min í§hirat munaííam§t al-mujtama# al-madanÊ (The Position of Indifference by the Arab People Towards Civil Society Organizations). Paper sent to the conference about Human Rights in Egypt, held in Alexandria (Egypt), (April 2006)—(also: www.shahrour.org).

– \awl í§hirat nukåß al-ins§n al-#arabÊ il§ mustaw§ È§j§t al-sal§ma wa’l-ma#§sh (About the Phenomenon of the Arab’s Retreat Onto the Level of Security and Welfare). Second Arab Forum for Human Resources in Manama (Bahrain), (April 2006)— (also: www.shahrour.org).

– #Ilm§niyyat a l-dawla fi’l-isl§m (The Secular Nature of the State In Islam). Lecture at the Jam#iyyat al-TaÈdÊd in Manama (Bahrain), (April 2006)—(also: www. shahrour.org).

– Dhukåriyyat al-mujtama# fi’l-tur§th al-#arabÊ al-isl§mÊ (The Masculinity of Society In the Arab-Islamic Heritage). Paper given to the Symposium about Violence against Women, Beirut (Lebanon), (November 22, 2002)—(also: www.shahrour. org).

* Interviews, portraits and features in newspapers

– Ad#å li-iq§mat al-dawla al-dimåqr§ãiyya al-madaniyya— al-Naßß al-qur”§nÊ kaynåna waßayråra wa-fahmuhu yakh·a# li’l-tabaddul wa’l-taãawwur (I Call for the Establishment of a Civil, Democratic State—The Qur”§nic Text, Being and Becoming, and Its Understanding that is Subject to Change and Development) Al-Nah§r (Lebanon), (August 5, 2000).

– Al-Ußåliyya wa’l-#unf wa’l-irh§b (1) (Fundamentalism: Violence and Terrorism, 1) Akhb§r al-#Arab (UAE), no. 20 (December 16, 2000).

– Al-Ußåliyya wa’l-#unf wa’l-irh§b (2) (Fundamentalism: Violence and Terrorism, 2) Akhb§r al-#Arab (UAE), no. 21 (December 17, 2000).

– Al-Shår§ mabda’ wa’l-dimåqr§ãiyya §liyat al-tanfÊdh (Consultation is a Fundamental Principle and Democracy is the Tool of [Its] Implementation) Al-Majd (Jordan), no. 291 (January 11, 2001).

– Ußål al-fiqh allatÊ wa·a#ah§ a l-Sh§fi#Ê istanfadat (The Principles of Jurisprudence, Which al-Sh§fi#Ê Had Laid Down, Have Been Exhausted) Al-WaÈdawÊ (Syria), no. 6 (May 1, 2001).

– Al-Thaq§fat a l-isl§miyya fÊ khaãar (Islamic Culture In Danger) A l-SafÊr (Lebanon), no. 9089 (December 29, 2001).

– Al-Dawla a l-isl§miyya #ilm§niyya (An Islamic State Is Secular) A l-\adath a l-#ArabÊ wa’l-DuwalÊ (France), no. 5 (January/February 2002).

– Al-Fikr al-isl§mÊ ihtamma bi’l #ad§la dån al-Èurriyya (Islamic Thought Was Interested In Justice Without Freedom) Al-Majd (Jordan), no. 401 (July 8, 2002).

– Al-Ißl§È al-dÊnÊ qabl al-ißl§È al-siy§sÊ (Religious Reforms Must Precede Political Reforms) Al-Nah§r (Lebanon), no. 21412 (July 11, 2002)—(also: www.shahrour. org).

– 4arårat faßl al-dÊn #an al-siy§sa (The Necessity of Separating Religion from Politics) Al-R§yah (Qaãar), (February 6, 2003).

– Al-Ißl§È al-dÊnÊ awwal[an] thumm[a] al-siy§sÊ wa’l-iqtiß§dÊ (Religious Reforms [Must Come] First Then the Political and Economic [Reforms]) Al-Når (Syria), no. 93 (March 19, 2003).

– \awl mash§kil al-thaq§fa al-dÊniyya (About the Problems of Religious Culture) Al-Rajul al-Yawm (UAE), no. 1 (July 1, 2004).

– L§ Amal fÊ ißl§È siy§sÊ dån ißl§È dÊnÊ (No Hope for Political Reforms Without a [Previous] Religious Reform) Qantara—Dialogue with the Islamic World, Deutsche Welle, (September 14, 2004)—(also: www.shahrour.org)

– Interview by Neil MacFarquhar in Cairo (Egypt) and Damascus (Syria), summarised in the New York Times, (December 10, 2004) as “Muslim Scholars Increasingly Debate Unholy War.”

– Afk§rÊ satantashir wa-tafriz aÈz§b[an] siy§siyyat[an] taßna# a l-ißl§È a l-dÊnÊ (My Views Will Spread [Soon] and Will Set Apart Political Parties that Produce A Religious Reform) Al-Ghadd (Jordan), (April 8, 2005).

– Arfu·[u] taÈwÊl a l-mawt il§ mu”assasa taÈt ayy shi#§r (I Oppose the Institutionalization of Death In Whatever Name) Al-R§yah (Qaãar), no. 8666 (January 28, 2006).

– FÊ al-dawla al-dimåqr§ãiyya yastaãÊ# al-isl§m an yaíhar wajhah[u] al-È a·§rÊ (In A Democratic State Islam Will Be Able to Show Its Civil Side) Al-Mar§qib al-#ArabÊ (Lebanon), no. 8 (January 2006).

– L§ naÈt§j fÊ al-dawla al-madaniyya il§ fuqah§” bal il§ maj§lis tashrÊ#iyya tataqayyad bi-Èudåd All§h–\iw§r al-dawla al-madaniyya (In A Civil State We Do Not Need Religious Jurists But [We Need] Legislative Councils that Are Restricted By the Limits of God—A Debate About the Civil State) Al-Waãan (Saudi Arabia), no. 2070 (May 31, 2006).

– Ilgh§” al-#aql al-qiy§sÊ wa-khalq #aql mubdi# fi’l-fiqh yu”addiy§n il§ int§j al-ma#rifa (Abolition of the Analogical Mind and Creation of An Innovative Mind in Islamic Jurisprudence that Will Lead to the Formulation of [Real] Knowledge) Al-Når (Syria), no. 302 (July 25, 2007).

– Interview with Mona Sarkis in Zeitschrift für KulturAustausch (Germany), no. 16 (April 21, 2005).

– Interview with Mona Sarkis in Der Aufbruch: Zeitung für Religion und Gesellschaft (Switzerland), no. 135 (June 2005).

* Reviews of his work in Arabic

 A. Books

Abå KhalÊl, ShawqÊ. Qir§“a #ilmiyya li’l-qir§”§t al-mu#§ßira (A Critical Reading of the ‘Contemporary Readings’). Damascus/Beirut: D§r al-Fikr, 1990.

Abå Zayd, Naßr \§mid. Al-Naßß; al-sulãa; al-ÈaqÊqa (Text, Authority, Truth). Beirut and Casablanca, 1995.

#Aff§na, Jaw§d Mås§ MuÈammad. A l-Qur”§n wa-awh§m a l-qir§“a a l-mu#§ßira—Radd #ilmÊ sh§milÊ #al§ kit§b: “ al-Kit§b wa’l-qur”§n: qir§“a mu#§ßira” (The Qur’an and the Delusions of ‘Contemporary Readings’—A Comprehensive, Critical Refutation of the Book: ‘The Book and the Qur’an: a Contemporary Reading’). Amman: D§r al-BashÊr, 1994.

#Akk, Kh§lid #Abd al-RaÈm§n al-. Al-Furq§n wa’l-qur”§n: qir§“a isl§miyya mu#§ßira ·imn al-thaw§bit al-#ilmiyya wa’l-·aw§biã al-manhajiyya;

wa-hiyya muqaddim§t li’l-tafsÊr al-#ilmÊ li’l-qur”§n al-karÊm (The Furqan and the Qur’an: A Contemporary Islamic Reading Within the Well-established Scholarly Parameter and Methodological Rules which are the Premises of a Scholarly Exegesis of the Noble Qur’an). Damascus: \ikma, 1994.

#Imr§n, AÈmad. A l-Qir§“a a l-mu#§ßira li’l-qur”§n fi’l-mÊz§n (An Impartial Review of ‘The Contemporary Reading of the Qur’an’). Beirut: D§r al-Naq§sh 1995.

Isl§mbålÊ, MuÈammad Haytham. A l-Radd #al§ a l-duktår ShaÈrår fÊ mas’alat lib§s a l-mar”a (A Refutation of Dr ShaÈrår With Regards to the Issue of Women’s dress). Damas cus: D§r al-#Ilm, 1992; 2[nd] ed. 1994.

J§bÊ, SalÊm al-. Al-Qir§“a al-mu#§ßira li’l-duktår MuÈammad ShaÈrår: Mujarrad tanjÊm— kadhaba al-munajjimån wa-law ßadaqå (The Contemporary Reading of Dr. Muhammad Shahrur: Pure Astrology—Astrologers Lied Even If They [Spoke] Sincerely). Damascus: Ak§d, 1991.

JawÊj§tÊ, Ma”mån al-. Al-Usus al-kh§sira li’l-qir§“a al-mu#§ßira (The Corrupt Foundations of the ‘Contemporary Reading’). Damacus/Limassol: D§r al-Jaf§n and al-J§bÊ, 2nd ed. 1993.

Ma#arr§wiyya, MuÈammad ‘ayy§È al-. Al-M§rksl§miyya wa’l-qur”§n, aw: al-b§Èithån #an #im§ma li-D§rwin wa-M§rks wa-zawjat a l-ni#m§n: “qir§“a fÊ da#w§ al-mu#§ßira” (Marx-Islamism and the Qur’an, or: The Seekers of a Turban for Darwin, Marx and Nu#m§n’s wife—A Study of the ‘Call for Modernity’). n.p., 2000.

ManfÊkhÊ, MuÈammad FarÊz. TaqwÊm #ilmÊ li-kit§b “ al-Kit§b wa’l-qur”§n” (A Critical Assessment of the Book ‘The Book and the Qur’an’). Beirut: D§r a l-RashÊd, 1993.

Mayd§nÊ, #Abd a l-RaÈm§n \asan \abannaka a l-. A l-TaÈrÊf a l-mu#§ßir fi’l-dÊn: Tasallul fi’l-anf§q ba#d a l-suqåã fi’l-a#m§q—makÊda a l-m§rksiyya wa’l-b§ãiniyya a l-mu#§ßira taÈt sha#§r qir§“at mu#§ßira li’l-nußåß a l-isl§miyya (The Contemporary Deviation from Religion: The Infiltration Into Tunnels After Going Underground—The Conspiracy of Marxism and of the Contemporary B§ãiniyya Sect With the Slogan of a Contemporary Reading of the Islamic Texts). Damascus: D§r a l-Qalam, 1997.

Munajjid, M§hir al-. Al-Ishk§liyya a l-manhajiyya fÊ “Al-Kit§b wa’l-qur”§n”—Dir§sa naqdiyya (Methodological Problems in ‘The Book and the Qur’an’—A Critical Investigation). Damascus/Beirut: D§r al-Fikr, 1994. See also his review “Mun§qashat al-ishk§liyya a l-manhajiyya fi’l-Kit§b wa’l-Qur”§n.” #$lam al-Fikr (1993): 162.

‘ayd§wÊ, Yåsuf al-. Bay·at al-dÊk: Naqd lughawÊ li-kit§b “ al-Kit§b wa’l-qur”§n” (The Egg of a Rooster: A Linguistic Critique of the Book ‘The Book and the Qur’an’).

Damascus: al-Maãba#a al-Ta#§wuniyya, 1993.

Shaww§f, MunÊr MuÈammad •§hir al-. Tah§fut al-dir§s§t al-mu#§ßira fi’l-dawla wa’lmujtama# (Refutation of Contemporary Studies on State and Society). Beirut, 1993; Riy§dh: D§r al-Shaww§f, 1995 (Already in 1994 also published as: Tah§fut al-dir§s§t al-mu#§ßira. Limassol: D§r al-Shaww§f).

Shaykh§nÊ, MuÈammad. Al-Radd al-qur”§nÊ #al§ awh§m al-duktår MuÈammad ShaÈrår fÊ kit§bih[i] al-Isl§m wa’l-^m§n (A Qur’anic Refutation of the Delusions of Dr. Muhammad Shahrur In His Book ‘Al-Isl§m and a l-^m§n’). Damascus: D§r Qutayba, 1996.

Tall, #$dil a l-. Al-Naz#a al-m§diyya fi’l-#§lam al-isl§mÊ (The Materialist Tendency in the Islamic World). n.p., 1995.

- abb§#, MuÈammad Sa#Êd al-. Ris§la…wa-radd il§ dh§k al-rajul (A Message…and A Refutation for That Man). Damascus: Maãba#at al-‘ubul, n.d.

Zhiby§n, Nash”at MuÈammad Ri·§. Dh§k radd?!! #An qir§“a mu#§ßira li’l-kit§b wa’l-qur”§n (That Is a Refutation?!!—About the Contemporary Reading of the Book and the Qur’an). Damascus: D§r Qutayba, 1992.

 B. Articles

Abå KhalÊl, ShawqÊ. “Taq§ãu#§t khaãira fÊ darib al-qir§”§t al-mu#§ßira.” (Dangerous Crossings on the Path of ‘Contemporary Readings’) Nahj al-Isl§m, no. 43 (March 1991): 17–21.

Abå Zayd, Naßr \§mid, “Lim§dha ãaghat al-talfÊqiyya #al§ kathÊr min mashrå#§t tajdÊd al-isl§m.” (Why Have Patch-ups Come to Dominate So Many Projects on the Renewal of Islam?) Al-Hil§l (October 1991): 17–27.

———. “Al-Manhaj a l-naf#Ê fÊ fahm a l-nußåß al-dÊniyya.” (The Utilitarian Method in the Understanding of Religious Texts) Al-Hil§l, March 1992.

#$nÊ, BashÊr. “MuÈammad ShaÈrår: Manhaj fi’l-qira”a al-mu#§ßira.” (Muhammad Shahrur: A Method of ‘Contemporary Reading’) Dir§s§t Ishtir§kiyya, no. 164/65 (1996): 46–54.

BåãÊ, MuÈammad Sa#Êd Rama·§n a l-. “Al-Khalfiyya a l-yahådiyya li-shi#§r qir§“a mu#§ßira.” (The Jewish Origins of the Call for a ‘Contemporary Reading’) Nahj al-Isl§m, no. 42 (December 1990): 17–21.

Munajjid, M§hir. “Mun§qashat al-ishk§liyya al-manhajiyya fi’l-Kit§b wa’l-Qur”§n.” (Methodological Problems in ‘The Book and the Qur”§n”—A Critical Investigation) #$lam al-Fikr (1993): 162.

NåÈ, #AlÊ. “Al-Kit§b wa’l-Qur”§n, mu”allifuhu: MuÈammad Shahrår—qir§“a # ilmiyya: #aßriyya amm m§·awiyya.” (‘The Book and the Qur’an’, Its Author:

Muhammad Shahrur—A Critical Reading: [Is it] Modern or Pre-modern?) Al-Fikr al-#ArabÊ, no. 4 (Summer 1994): 192–209.

Shaykh§nÊ, MuÈammad. “Dir§sa a-taÈlÊl li-kit§b ‘Tah§fut al-qir§“a al-mu#§ßira’ li-mu”allifih[i] al-duktår MunÊr al-Shaww§f.” (A Study and Analysis of the Book ‘A Refutation of ‘Contemporary Readings’ by Dr. MunÊr al-Shaww§f) Nahj al-Isl§m, no. 58 (November 1994).

Tawba, Gh§zÊ al-. “Duktår ShaÈrår yulawwi a”n§q al-nußåß li’l-ajr§d ghayr #ilmiyya wa-taftaqir il§’l-bar§“a.” (Dr. ShaÈrår Distorts the Texts) Al-Mujtama#, no.1301 (May 26, 1998).

Y§fÊ, Na#Êm al-. “Al-Qur”§n wa’l-Kit§b [sic]: Qir§“a Mu#§ßira.”, Al-Usbå# al-AdabÊ, no. 247 (January 1991): 3.

Y§sÊn, MuÈammad ShafÊq. “Qir§“a naqdiyya fÊ mu”allaf ‘al-Kit§b wa’l-Qur”§n’.” (A Critical Reading of the Book ‘The Book and the Qur’an’) Nahj al-Isl§m, no. 46 (December 1991): 35–43.

———. “Qir§“a naqdiyya fÊ mu”allaf ‘al-Kit§b wa’l-Qur”§n’— al-Maw·å# al-th§nÊ: a l-Èudåd fi’l-Isl§m.” (A Critical Reading of the Book ‘The Book and the Qur’an’ —Second Topic: The \udåd Limits in Islam) Nahj a l-Isl§m, no. 47 (March 1992): 136–44.

———. “Qir§“a naqdiyya fÊ mu”allaf ‘al-Kit§b wa’l-Qur”§n’— al-Maw·å# al-th§lith: a l-sunna.” (A Critical Reading of the Book ‘The Book and the Qur’an’—Third Topic: the Sunna) Nahj al-Isl§m, no. 48 (June 1992): 84–95.

———. “Qir§“a naqdiyya fÊ mu”allaf ‘al-Kit§b wa’l-Qur”§n’— al-Maw·å# al-r§bi#: qa·§y§ fi’l-#aqÊda.” (A Critical Reading of the Book ‘The Book and the Qur’an’— Fourth Topic: Problems of Doctrine) Nahj al-Isl§m, no. 49 (September 1992).

———. “Qir§“a naqdiyya fÊ mu”allaf ‘al-Kit§b wa’l-Qur”§n’— al-Maw·å# al-kh§mis: qa·§y§ fi’l-fikr.” (A Critical Reading of the Book ‘The Book and the Qur’an’— Fifth Topic: Problems of Thinking) Nahj al-Isl§m, no. 50 (December 1992).

Ziy§da, •§riq. “•ar§fa fi’l-taqsÊm wa-ghar§ba fi’l-ta”wÊl.” (Strange Division and Grotesque Interpretation) Al-N§qid, no. 45 (March 1992): 57–60.

* Reviews of Muhammad Shahrur’s work in English

Christmann, Andreas. “‘The Form Is Permanent, but the Content Moves’: Text and Interpretations in the Writings of Mohamad Shahrour.” Die Welt des Islam 43, no. 2 (2003): 143–72.

———. “73 Proofs of Dilettantism: The Construction of Norm and Deviancy in the Responses to ‘al-Kit§b wa’l-Qur”§n: Qir§“a Mu#§ßira’ by Mohamad Shahrour.” Die Welt des Islam 45, no. 1 (2005): 20–73.

Clarke, Peter. “The ShaÈrår Phenomenon: A Liberal Islamic Voice from Syria.” Islam and Christian-Muslim Relations 7, no. 3 (1996): 337–41.

Eickelman, Dale F. “Islamic Liberalism Strikes Back.” Middle East Studies Association Bulletin 27, no. 2 (December 1993): 163–68.

———. “Islam and the Languages of Modernity.” Daedalus 129, no. 1 (Winter 2000): 119–35.

———. “Muhammad Shahrur and the Printed Word.” ISIM Newsletter 7 (2001):

7.

——— and Jon W. Anderson, “Print, Islam, and the Prospects for Civic Pluralism: New Religious Writings and their Audiences.” Journal of Islamic Studies 8, no. 1 (1997): 43–62.

Körner, Felix. “MuÈammad ’aÈrårs Koranhermeneutik in a l-Kit§b wa’l-Qur”§n”. MA (Magisterarbeit), Otto-Friedrich-University Bamberg, 2000.

Marcotte, Roxanne. “Shahrur, the Status of Women, and Polygamy in Islam.” Oriente Moderno 20 (2001): 313–28.

Mudhoon, Loay. “Muhammad Schahrûr, Syrien: Für ein zeitgenössisches Koran- und Islamverständnis.” In Der Islam am Wendepunkt: Liberale und Konservative Reformer einer Weltreligion, edited by Katajun Amirpur, and Ludwig Amman. Freiburg, Basel, Wien: Herder, 2006, 136–45.

Nabielek, Rainer. “Muhammad Shahrur, ein ‘Martin Luther’ des Islam.” inamo 23/24, no. 6 (Autumn/Winter 2000): 73–74. (The same issue contains an interview with Muhammad Shahrur carried out by the journalist Ali a l-Atasi, titled: “Ein Staat, wo kein Zwang in der Religion besteht” [A State In Which There Is No Compulsion in Religion, 75–79].)

Syamsuddin, Sahiron. “The Qur”§n in Syria: MuÈammad ShaÈrår’s Inner-Qur”§nic Exegetical Method.” In Coming to Terms with the Qur”§n, edited by Khaleel Mohammed, and Andrew Rippin. North Haledon, NJ: Islamic Publications International, 2008, 267–83.

Additional secondary literature about liberal Islamic thought (not mentioned in the footnotes and only titles in English)

Abou-Nimer, Mohammed. “Framework for Nonviolence and Peacebuilding in Islam.” In Contemporary Islam: Dynamic, not Static, edited by Abdul Aziz Said, M. Abou-Nimer, and Meena Sharify-Funk. London and New York: Routledge, 2006, 131–72.

Abu Fakr, Saqir. “Trends in Arab Thought (Interview with Sadek Jalal a l-Azm).” Journal of Palestine Studies 27 (1998): 68–81.

Abu-Hamdiyyah, Mohammad. The Qur’an: An Introduction. London and New York: Routledge, 2000.

Abu-Rabi#, Ibrahim M. Contemporary Arab Thought: Studies in Post-1967 Arab Intellectual History. London, Sterling (Virginia): Pluto Press, 2004.

Abu Zayd, Nasr Hamid. Reformation of Islamic Thought: A Critical Historical Analysis. Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 2006.

Ali Engineer, Asghar. “TashrÊ# (Process of Law-Making) in Islam.” In Religion, Law and Society: A Christian-Muslim Discussion, edited by Tarik Mitri. Geneva: WCC Publications, 1995, 33–43.

Anderson, Jon W. “The Internet and Islam’s New Interpreters.” In New Media in the Muslim World, edited by Dale F. Eickelman and Jon W. Anderson. 2nd ed., Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2003.

Aras, Bülent. “Turkish Islam’s Moderate Face.” Middle East Quarterly 5, no. 3 (September 1998): 23–30.

Arkoun, Mohammed. Islam: To Reform or To Subvert? London: Saqi Books, 2002.

Azra, Azyumardi. “Pluralism, Coexistence and Religious Harmony in Southeast Asia.” In Contemporary Islam: Dynamic, not Static, edited by Said, Abou-Nimer, and Sharify-Funk, 227–41.

Barazangi, Nimat Hafez. Women’s Identity and the Qur’an: A New Reading. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 2004.

Barlas, Asma. “Reviving Islamic Universalism.” In Contemporary Islam: Dynamic, not Static, edited by Said, Abou-Nimer, and Sharify-Funk, 242–53.

Barton, Greg. Abdurrahman Wahid: Muslim Democrat, Indonesian President—A View from the Inside. Sydney: UNSW Press, 2002.

Binder, Leonard. Islamic Liberalism: A Critique of Development Ideologies. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1988.

Boroujerdi, Mehrzad. Iranian Intellectuals and the West: The Tormented Triumph of Nativism. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 1996.

Boullata, Issa, J. Trends and Issues in Contemporary Arab Thought. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1990.

Browers, Michaelle. “Islam and Political Sinn: The Hermeneutics of Contemporary Islamic Reformists.” In An Islamic Reformation? Edited by Michaelle Browers and Charles Kurzman. Lanham: Lexington Books, 2004, 54–78.

Casanova, Jose. “Civil Society and Religion: Retrospective Reflections on Catholicism and Prospective Reflections on Islam.” Social Research 68 (2001): 1041–81.

El Fadl, Abou Khaled. Speaking in God’s Name: Islamic Law, Authority, and Women. Oxford: One World, 2001.

———. Islam and the Challenge of Democracy, edited by Joshua Cohen and Deborah Chasman. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2004.

———. The Great Theft: Wrestling Islam from the Extremists. New York: HarperCollins, 2005.

El Guindi, Fadwa. Veil: Modesty, Privacy, and Resistance. Oxford, New York: Berg, 1999.

Esack, Farid. Qur”§n, Liberation & Pluralism. An Islamic Perspective of Interreligious Solidarity against Oppression. Oxford: One World, 1997.

———. The Qur’an: A Short Introduction. Oxford: One World, 2002.

Esposito, John, and John O. Voll. The Makers of Contemporary Islam. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2001.

Gerholm, Tomas. “Two Muslim Intellectuals in the Postmodern West: Akbar Ahmed and Ziauddin Sardar.” In Islam, Globalization and Postmodernity, edited by Akbar S. Ahmed and Hastings Donnan. London: Routledge, 1994.

Günther, Ursula. “Mohammad Arkoun: Towards a Radical Rethinking of Islamic thought.” In Modern Muslim Intellectuals and the Qur’an, edited by Suha Taji-Farouki. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2004, 125–67.

Gülen, Fethullah. “A Comparative Approach to Islam and Democracy.” In The New Voices of Islam: Reforming Politics and Modernity—A Reader, edited by Mehran Kamrava. London and New York: I.B. Tauris, 2006, 99–104.

Hanafi, Hasan. From Faith to Revolution. Tokyo: United Nationa University Publications, 1985.

———. “Facts and Values: An Islamic Approach.” In The New Voices of Islam: Reforming Politics and Modernity—A Reader, edited by Kamrava, 231–41.

Hashmi, Sohail H. “Islamic Ethics in International Society.” In Islamic Political Ethics: Civil Society, Pluralism, and Conflict, edited by Sohail H. Hashmi. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 2002, 148–72.

Ibn Ally, Mashuq M. “Islam in the European Context.” In Islam in the Contemporary World, edited by Theodore Gabriel. New Delhi: Vikas Publishing House, 2000, 64–87.

Ismail, Salwa. “The Politics of Historical Revisionism: New Re-Readings of the Early Islamic Period.” In An Islamic Reformation? Edited by Browers and Kurzman, 101–24.

Johns, Anthony H., Abdullah Saeed, “Nurcholish Madjid and the Interpretation of the Qur’an: Religious Pluralism and Tolerance.” In Modern Muslim Intellectuals and the Qur’an, edited by Taji-Farouki, 67–96.

Kadivar, Mohsen. “Freedom of Religion and Belief in Islam.” In The New Voices of Islam: Reforming Politics and Modernity—A Reader, edited by Kamrava, 119–42.

Kamrava, Mehran. “Introduction: Reformist Islam in Comparative Perspective.” In The New Voices of Islam: Reforming Politics and Modernity—A Reader, edited by Kamrava, 1–28.

Kermani, Navid. “From revelation to interpretation: Nasr Hamid Abu Zayd and the literary study of the Qur’an.” In Modern Muslim Intellectuals and the Qur’an, edited by Taji-Farouki, 169–92.

Körner, Felix. Revisionist Koran Hermeneutics in Contemporary Turkish University Theology: Rethinking Islam. Würzburg: Ergon Verlag, 2005.

Kubba, Laith. “Faith and Modernity.” In Islam and Democracy in the Middle East, edited by Larry Diamond, Marc F. Plattner, and Daniel Brumberg. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2003.

Kurzman, Charles, ed. Liberal Islam: A Sourcebook. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.

———. Modernist Islam, 1840–1940: A Sourcebook. New York: Oxford University Press, 2002.

———. “The Globalization of Rights in Islamic Discourse.” In Islam Encountering Globalization, edited by Ali Mohammadi. London RoutledgeCurzon, 2002.

———. “Critics Within: Islamic Scholar’s Protest against the Islamic State in Iran.” In An Islamic Reformation? Edited by Browers and Kurzman, 79–100.

Mahmoud, Mohamed A. Quest for Divinity: A Critical Examination of the Thought of Mahmud Muhammad Taha. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 2007.

Martin, Richard, and Mark R. Woodward, with Dwi S. Atmaja. Defenders of Reason in Islam. Mu#tazilizm from Medieval School to Modern Symbol. Oxford: One World, 1997.

Mir-Hosseini, Ziba. “Stretching the Limits: A Feminist Reading of the Shari#a in Post-Khomeini Iran.” In Feminism and Islam, edited by Mai Yamani. Berkshire, England: Ithaca Press, 1996, 284–320.

Moaddel, Mansoor, and Kamran Talattof, eds. Modernist and Fundamentalist Debates in Islam: A Reader. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2002.

Mostafa, Nadia Mahmoud. “The Missing Logic in Discourses of Violence and Peace in Islam.” In Contemporary Islam: Dynamic, not Static, edited by Said, Abou-Nimer, and Sharify-Funk, 173–88.

Muzaffar, Chandra. Rights, Religion, and Reform: Enhancing Human Dignity through Spiritual and Moral Transformation. London: RoutledgeCurzon, 2002.

Najjar, Fauizi. “Islamic Fundamentalism and the Intellectuals: The Case of Nasr Hamid Abu Zayd.” British Journal of Middle Eastern Studies 27, no. 2 (2000): 177–200.

Na#im, Abdullahi Ahmed al-. Toward an Islamic Reformation: Civil Liberties, Human Rights, and International Law. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 1996.

———. “The Islamic Counter-Reformation.” New Perspectives Quarterly 19 (2002): 29–35.

Nettler, Ronald L. “Mohamed Talbi on Understanding the Qur’an.” In Modern Muslim Intellectuals and the Qur’an, edited by Taji-Farouki, 225–39.

Opwis, Felicitas. “Changes in Modern Islamic Legal Theory: Reform or Reformation.” In An Islamic Reformation? Edited by Browers and Kurzman, 28–53.

Öztürk, Yaâar Nuri. Reconstruction of Religious Life in Islam (Returning to the Koran). Istanbul: Yeni Boyut, 1999.

Rahman, Fazlur. Islam and Modernity: Transformation of an Intellectual Tradition. Chicago: Chicago University Press, 1982.

Roberson, B. A., ed. Shaping the Current Islamic Reformation. London and Portland, OR: Frank Cass, 2003.

Sachedina, Abdulaziz. The Islamic Roots of Democratic Pluralism. Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.

Saif, Walid. “SharÊ#ah and Modernity.” In Religion, Law and Society: A Christian-Muslim Discussion, edited by Mitri, 11–19.

Smith, Charles D. “The Crisis of Orientation: The Shift of Egyptian Intellectuals to Islamic Subjects in the 1930’s.” International Journal of Middle Eastern Studies 4 (1973): 382–410.

Talbi, Mohamed. “Religious Liberty: A Muslim Perspective.” In Muslims in Dialogue: The Evolution of a Dialogue, edited by Leonard Swindler, Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellon Press, 1992, 465–82.

Sadri, Mahmoud, and Ahmad Sadri, eds. Reason, Freedom, and Democracy: The Essential Writings of Abdolkarim Soroush. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000.

Saeed, Abdullah. “Fazlur Rahman: A Framework for Interpreting the Ethico-legal Content of the Qur’an.” In Modern Muslim Intellectuals and the Qur’an, edited by Taji-Farouki, 37–66.

Saeed, Abdullah, ed. Approaches to the Qur’an in Contemporary Indonesia. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2005.

Sajoo, Amyn B., ed. Civil Society in the Muslim World: Contemporary Perspectives. London and New York: I. B. Tauris, 2002.

Sharabi, Hisham. “Cultural Critics of Contemporary Arab Society.” Arab Studies Quarterly 9, no. 1 (1987): 1–19.

Taha, Mahmoud Mohamed. The Second Message of Islam. Translated and introduced by Abdullahi Ahmed An-Na”im. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 1987.

Taji-Farouki, Suha. “Modern Intellectuals, Islam, and the Qur’an: The Example of Sadiq Nayhum.” In Modern Muslim Intellectuals and the Qur’an, edited by TajiFarouki, 297–332.

Vahdat, Farzin. God and Juggernaut: Iran’s Intellectual Encounter with Modernity. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 2002.

———. “Post-revolutionary Islamic Modernity in Iran: The Intersubjective Herme neutics of Mohamad Mojtahed Shabestari.” In Modern Muslim Intellectuals and the Qur’an, edited by Taji-Farouki, 193–224.

Wadud-Muhsin, Amina. Qur’an and Women. Kuala Lumpur: Penerbit Fajar Bakti, 1992.

Watt, W. Montgomery. “A contemporary Muslim Thinker” [on Mohammad Arkoun]. Journal of Religious Studies 4, no. 1 (1985): 5–10.

Wright, Robin. “Islam and Liberal Democracy: Two Visions of Reformation.” Journal of Democracy 7 (1996): 64–75.

Ziadeh, Khalid. “On the Urgency of Ijtih§d.” In Religion, Law and Society: A ChristianMuslim Discussion, edited by Mitri, 48–50.

 Index

al-abaw§n (caregiver-parents) 9, 521–22, 553; bequests 231–32, 257; inheritance of ascendant members of family 249–53

Abbasids 336, 343, 352, 377

#Abd al-Malik b. Marw§n 351

#Abd al-Muããalib, Hamza 478

Abraham 29, 36, 38, 86, 89; al-wal§” (likeness) 474, 475–76, 477; community of 63, 470; al-ÈanÊfiyya 185–86, 188; role model 96 abrogation (al-naskh) 489–90, 533; codex of #Uthm§n 81; of earlier messengerhoods by later 18, 45–46, 217, 396–402, 489, 543; inheritance 227; al-jih§d 396, 402, 489; jurists 102–103, 396–98, 489–90, 495; alqit§l (fight) 425, 460

Ab å #AlÊ al-F§risÊ 10

Ab å Bakr 81, 342, 343, 346–47, 349,

350, 351, 352, 361, 408, 489

Ab å D§wå d al-Sijist§nÊ 389

Ab å Dharr al-Ghif§rÊ 359

Ab å Ja#far al-Manß år 351, 363 Ab å Jahl 478

Ab å KhalÊl, ShawqÊ xxiv Ab å Lahab 55

Ab å Zayd, Naßr \§mid xxv, 523

Adam 16, 299–301, 367–68, 369, 371,

374, 546

#adl and qisã (equality and justice) 261 adultery 206–208, 306, 378, 399–400 #Aff§na, Jaw§d Mås§ MuÈammad xxvi

Afghanistan 395, 449

Afterlife 13–14, 18; life in this world 62; obsession with 70; pillar of al-isl§m 34–35; slavery 59, 462

#$“isha bint Ab å Bakr 221, 275, 324,

347, 348, 350 #Akk, Kh§lid #Abd al-RaÈm§n al- xxiii alcohol 99–100, 374, 379–80; al-khamr (intoxicating substance) 554 #AlÊ 358–59

Allah/God, concept of xxix–xxx, xxxi, 2; divinity and sovereignty 119, 166–69, 542; kalim§t All§h (words of God) 136–38, 430–431, 486; unity

17, 95–97, 334, 399; unity: violation of (shirk) 37–38, 136, 554; war against Allah/God 201

Allah/God’s rule (al-È§kimiyya) 450–451,

463–64, 557 alms tax (al-zak§h) 22, 24, 25, 53–54, 59, 66, 336, 548; al-isl§m and al-Êm§n 53–54, 68; early history; refusal to pay 362; recipients 44, 211–214; theory of limits 93, 209–14

al-#amal al-ß§liÈ (righteous, doing what is)

27, 35–37, 52–53 ambiguous verses (§y§t mutash§bih§t) 26,

116, 121, 123, 124, 127, 129, 488, 538 amputation as penalty for theft 189–90, al-amr bi’l-ma#r åf wa’l-nahy #an al-munkar see prescribing right, proscribing wrong analogy (al-qiy§s) 71, 85, 97, 110, 192, 215,

196–201

225, 493–94; empirical evidence 492 angels 22, 158, 161, 165, 166, 171, 369– 70; JibrÊl 156, 158, 160 #$nÊ, BashÊr xxvi antisocial behaviour 201 antitraditionalism and anticlericalism xxxii–xxxiii, xlvi

apostasy 72, 330, 338–39, 497; allowing religious 363; amalgamation of politics with 353–54, 363; Arabic term: al-ridda 339; early history 343, 347– 52, 358–61, 362, 363–64; from al-Êm§n 357–64; from al-isl§m 356–57, 364; ÈadÊths 343–47, 348, 349; political apostasy/separatism 355, 361–62; punishment 341–42, 497; removal of rulers for 447–48; standing away from religion 340–341; turning back from faith 339–40

Arab nationalism xx, 506, 507–509, 510,

529

arts, visual 9

#Ashm§wÊ, MuÈammad Sa#Êd al- 360 #Asqal§nÊ, AÈmad B. \ajar al- 350 assassinations 449 assimilatability (al-tash§buh) xxxvi, xxxix, 4, 138, 140, 142, 143–44, 145, 148,

149

atheists see dissent from God Averroes (Ibn Rushd) 530–531

Ayoub, #Us§ma ‘iddÊq 449

B§b, Ja#far DÊk al- xxxiv, 513 backgammon 100

al-ba#l/zawj (partner/conjugal husband) 287–89; female dress code 294, 310–311, 312, 321, 326 Balta#a, al-Kh§ãib b. AbÊ 479 banking 381; interest (al-rib§) 209–14, 554 al-bar§” (otherness) 466, 475, see also identities, multiple

Baãå jÊ, \is§m al- 448–49 beauty 308–309 becoming (al-ßayrå ra) xxix, xxx, 11–19, 76, 78–79, 111, 112, 485–86 Bedouin culture 333 being (al-kaynå na) xxix, xxx, 11–19; al-

<right>

kit§b (the book): being in-and-for-itself

</right>

76–79, 485–86 bequests 229–34, 253–54, 353; specified and unspecified shares 228–29; summary 255–57; wills: religious duty 233

Bible 117, 143–44, 145; Corinthians 296; Deuteronomy 379, 400; Exodus 401; Genesis 295–96; John 400;

Leviticus 401 Big Bang 13, 14, 15 bin L§din, #Us§ma 456 birth control 39–40 Brahmanism 295

Buddhism 295, 438 Bush, G.W. 456 business 68, 381, 415; duress (al-ikr§h) 386; interest (al-rib§) 209–14, 554; occupational associations 41; pollution 201; standard measures 40–41, 64, 378

Bå ãÊ, MuÈammad Sa#Êd Rama·§n al- xxiii, xxiv

Cain and Abel 299, 455 Caliphate 336, 464 chastity 40; punishment for unchasteness 206–208, 399–400 children 396; adoption of 381, 554; ban on killing of 39–40, 378; female infanticide 297; orphans see orphans; preference of boys to girls 281–82; sense of shame 318; walad (pl aul§d)

227, 235, 252–53

China 438

Christianity/Christians 25, 30, 52, 53,

132, 295–96, 357–58, 439 civil society 392–93, 497, 519–21 Clark, Peter xvii clear book (al-kit§b al-mubÊn) 140–141,

142, 538 clear record (al-im§m al-mubÊn) 140,

141–42, 156, 159, 514, 538 commandments 36; al-furq§n al-#§mm

36–42, 46–50 communism 431, 437, 439, 527 companies, global 415 competition 435–37, 438–39 compulsion 194, 385–86, 547 comradeship, importance of 454–55 conduct, book of (kit§b al-sul åk) 72–73 confederation of states 393 conformism 465–66 consensus (al-ijm§#) 426–27, 491–92 consultation (al-sh år§) 54, 59, 336,

417–418, 464 contracts, debt 45, 194–95; interest (alrib§) 209–14, 554 covenant 553; of Allah/God 41, 553 creation story 276 curvature (al-ÈanÊfiyya) 4, 63–65, 181–83, 230, 548; messengerhood, book of 75 dancing 94, 320 Darfur 362 death, praise of 354 debt contracts 45, 194–95; interest (al-rib§) 209–14, 554

decimal system 485 defamation 99, 375–76, 380 definite verses (§y§t muÈkam§t) 26, 116, 121, 123, 124, 125–26, 488 democracy 333, 335, 336, 464, 497, 519; acceptance of 337–38; oppositional parties 527–29 Descartes, René 226, 509 despotism 337, 338, 343, 409, 431, 432, 446–47, 462–63; individualism 333; peaceful opposition 201; proscribing wrong 391–92

determinism see predestination al-dhikr (remembrance) 77, 115, 133–35, 157, 495, 539 dialectical criticism xxx, xxxv, xxxvi, 531; glorification and dialectics of negation/destruction 545

discrimination see equality disobedience see obedience dissent from God (al-ijr§m) 31–34, 55,

540 divorce 288–89, 290–292; pre-Islamic

Arabia 297 doctors 354, 372, 378 domestic violence xl–xlvi, 285–86 dress requirements: men 304, 305–307,

318, 326, 327 dress requirements: women xxxvii, 49, 61; first line: 24:30/31 305–306; second line: 24:30/31 306–307; third line: 24:31 307–309; fourth line: 24:31 309–10; fifth line: 24:31 310–311; sixth line 24:31 313–314; seventh line 24:31 315–316; eighth line 24:31 316–317; ninth line 24:31 317–319; tenth line 24:31 319–320; eleventh line 24:31 320–321; #awra, zone of (intimate private parts) 294, 296, 299, 310, 311, 317–319, 321, 323, 325, 326; ba#l partner 294, 310–311, 312, 321, 326; being covered (lib§s) 294, 298–99; conclusion 325–28; face 310, 323; fitna (social and sexual disturbance) 303–304; furå j (lower private parts) 306–307, 310, 311, 321; ÈadÊths 302, 323, 326; hands 323; headscarf (Èij§b) 292–94, 303–304, 324, 327, 556; jilb§b 322, 556; juyå b 309–10, 311, 312, 318, 320, 321; khim§r (cover) 309–10; limits, upper and lower 196, 304, 313, 320, 321, 323, 326, 328; maÈ§rim relatives 310, 312–313, 315, 319, 321, 326; private parts/hidden beauty (zÊna) 288, 304–12; problem of original sin 295–301; righteousness 303, 327; seventh-century Arabia 311, 321, 323–24; shame (saw”a) 294, 299–304; slavery

303–304, 315–316; striking of feet 319–20; three kinds of beauty 308–309; wives of Muhammad 313–314, 324; zawj husband 294, 310, 311, 312, 321,

<right>

326; zÊna, m eaning of 288, 308–309,

</right>

312–313

duress (ikr§h) 194, 385–86, 547 Eastern Europe 437

Egypt xxvii, 69, 362, 395, 447, 521, 523

Eickelman, Dale F. xvii–xviii, 501 Einstein, A. 1

elite, intellectual 29 environment 77, 308; pollution 201 epistemology xxi, xxx, xxxviii, 1, 364, 463, 496 epochs, historical 1–2 equality; before law 431; gender: inheritance laws 238, 251; gender:

verse 4:34 xl–xlvi

espionage 42, 99 ethics (al-furq§n) 17–18, 36–37, 113, 549; particular 37, 39–40, 42–45; universal 36–42, 46–50 evolution 149, 276 explanation of the book (tafßÊl al-kit§b) 125, 130–132, 162, 163, 539; summary 174–75 face, covering of 310, 323 fair and just, doing what is (al-iÈs§n) 27, 30, 44–45, 53, 60–65 family planning 39–40 fast (ßaum) 22, 24, 25–26, 54, 66, 67, 336–37; limits of Allah/God 207, 488–89; obedience 93; reparation of crime 203, 204; sickness 59

extortion 449

fatalism 67 feet, striking of 319–20 feminism/feminists xlii–xliii, 220, 279 fingernails 49

First World War 439 al-fiãra (human nature) 25–26, 54, 56–57, flexibility see curvature food 192–94 fornication 40, 206–208 France 480, 521 freedom xl, 59, 113, 330–338, 463, 487; democracy 333, 335, 336, 337–38, 464, 528; dialectics between opposition and unity 331; individualistic concept of 333; not to follow a religious community 497; personal 332–33, 335; of religion 330, 335, 337, 356, 363, 431–34, 438, 440, 443–44, 445, 451, 452, 497; of speech 354, 392; war against Allah/

183, 214

God 201

al-fuqar§” (poor) 44, 549; charity money

211, 212

al-furq§n (moral guidance) 36–37, 113, 549; al-furq§n al-#§mm (universal ethics) 36–42, 46–50; al-furq§n al-kh§ßß (particular ethics) 37, 39–40, 42–45

gender equality see equality

general ethics see universal ethics

Germany 479–80 global companies 415 God/Allah, concept of xxix–xxx, xxxi, 2; divinity and sovereignty 119, 166–69, 542; kalim§t All§h (words of God) 136–38, 430–431, 486; unity 17, 95–97, 334, 399; unity: violation of (shirk) 37–38, 136, 554; war against Allah/God 201

God/Allah’s rule (al-È§kimiyya) 450–451,

463–64, 557 grammar, rules of Arabic 10–11 grandparents/grandchildren: grandchildren 24:31 313; inheritance laws

<right>

</right>

227, 251–52 graves, visiting of 102–103 Greenwood, David xxxv guardianship see al-qiw§ma guidance, moral (al-furq§n) 36–37; particular ethics 37, 42–45; universal ethics 36–42, 46–50 Gulf states xxiii gynaecologists 317

ÈadÊths 79–81, 85, 94–95, 97, 101, 110, 391, 494; abrogation 102–103; apostasy 343–47, 348, 349; beating 285; companions of MuÈammad 80–81, 343; compulsion 386; content of prophetic 103–108; defamation of women 375–76; dress 323, 326; hostility to women 302; inheritance laws 226–27; jih§d 396, 419; major sins and absolute taboos 375–77; rituals 93; shahÊd 405–406, 407, 408; theft, penalty for 197; see also MuÈammad, sunna of al-Èajj 22, 24, 25, 26, 54, 59, 66; obedience 93 \ajj§j b. Yå suf, al- 355 al-È§kimiyya (rule of Allah/God) 450–451, 463–64, 557 al-Èal§l (absolutely permitted) 49, 90,

102, 271, 365, 491–92, 555

Hallaq, Wael xvii handicapped people (al-mas§kÊn) 44, 549; bequests 232; charity money 211,

212, 213 hands, covering of 323

al-ÈanÊfiyya 92, 497; curvature 4, 63–65, 181–83, 230, 548; messengerhood, book of 75

al-Èar§m (absolutely taboo) 49–50, 90, 92, 271, 365, 377–81, 492, 541, 555; consensus 491–92; food 192–94; nahy and 98–100, 365, 370–372, 492; types of marriage 191–92, 194

al-Èasan 49, 365

Hawking, Stephen 527 headscarf (Èij§b) 292–94, 303–304, 324, 327, 392, 556 health care 67 Hell 13–14, 18, 32, 62, 460

Hereafter see Afterlife

Èij§b (headscarf) 292–94, 303–304, 324,

327, 392, 556 Hinduism 295, 438 historicality 490–491 historicity 490–491 homicide 40, 47, 202–204, 378, 400–

402 homosexuality 40, 204–206, 375, 378 al-Èudå d see limits, theory of human existence, tripartite model of xxix, xxx, 11–19, 541; becoming (alßayrå ra) xxix, xxx, 11–19, 76, 78–79, 111, 112, 485–86; being (al-kaynån a) xxix, xxx, 11–19; being in-and-for-itself: al-kit§b (the Book) 76–79, 485–86; progressing (al-sayrår a) xxix, xxx,

11–19, 78–79, 112, 485–86 human nature (al-fiãra) 25–26, 54, 56–57,

183, 214 human rights xxxvii, xxxix, xl, 201, 337,

356; verse 4:34 xl–xlvi human speech, categories of 136 husband see ba#l/zawj (partner/conjugal husband)

hypocrites/hypocrisy 59–60, 347

IblÊs (jinn) 368, 369, 370, 374

Ibn #Abb§s 146, 344, 346, 347 Ibn #ArabÊ 119, 172, 502, 509 Ibn ArÊqaã, #Abdall§h 478–79

Ibn F§ris al-QazwÊnÊ, Abå ’l-\usayn

AÈ mad 131, 197

Ibn JinnÊ, Ab å ’l-FatÈ #Uthm§n 10 Ibn KathÊr 146

Ibn Qayyim al-Jauziyya 450 Ibn Rushd (Averroes) 530–531 identities, multiple 330, 466–67, 498–99; al-bar§” (otherness) 466, 475; al-wal§” (likeness) 467–78; clans 476–77, 478; conclusion 478–81; families 476–77, 478; MuÈammad 480; obedience 471; qaum (people) 466–67, 477–78, 551; sha#b (nation) 467, 477–78, 551; tribes 476–77, 478; umma (community) 466, 467, 469–70, 473, 478, 479, 551; w-l-a: contradictory meanings 467–69, 473, 478; waãan (nation state) 467 idolatry 94, 96, 373, 374, 378, 443 al-iÈs§n (fair and just, doing what is) 27, 30, 44–45, 53, 60–65 al-ijm§# (consensus) 426–27, 491–92

al-ijr§m (dissent from God) 31–34, 55,

540

al-ijtih§d xxxvii, 111–112, 177, 216–217,

491, 492–93, 512; forgiveness for sin 374; MuÈammad 84, 92, 94, 101, 102, 106, 109, 110, 271–72, 493; pro hibited marriage partners 192; pro phets xxxii; punishment for theft 197; rituals: relative obedience 93; scientific evidence 192; taboos 492; umm al-kit§b xxxvi; verses of messengerhood 402, 488; women and

Islamic law 225 al-ikr§h (duress) 194, 385–86, 547 images of Allah/God 38 al-im§m al-mubÊn (clear record) 7, 140, 141–42, 156, 159, 514, 538 im§mate 476 al-Êm§n see al-isl§m and al-Êm§n; pillars of

al-Êm§n

#Imr§n, AÈmad xxvi individualism 333 infanticide, female 297 infidelity 443 inheritance xxxvii, 68, 226–28, 353–54, 496, 526; bequests 228–34, 253–54; conclusion 255–58; contrasted: inheritance laws and bequests 229–30; laws 230, 233, 234–38; laws: analytical geometry 243–49, 258; laws: ascendant members of family 249–53; laws: collateral heirs 254–55; laws: ratio of female to male shares 240–243; laws: spouses 253–54; limits of Allah/ God 206, 239–40, 258, 488; meaning of words 6, 9; social justice 238, 251; specified and unspecified shares

228–29; summary 255–58

injustice (al-íulm) 441–45, see also justice interest (al-rib§) 209–14, 554 interpretation: al-ijtih§d see al-ijtih§d; alta”wÊl xxxvi, xxxvi–xxxvii, 111, 127, 142, 147–50, 544; assimilatability

(al-tash§buh) xxxix, xxxvi, 4, 138, 140,

142, 143–44, 145, 148, 149; proposed process of xxxviii–xl; see also limits, theory of al-inz§l (transfer to human mind) xxxi, 150–155, 161–63, 495, 514, 543; alqur”§n 155–58, 161–63; umm al-kit§b

159–61, 162–63 Iran 395 al-isl§m and al-Êm§n xxviii–xxix, xxxv– xxxvi, 334–36; abrogation see abrogation; conventional view 21–22, 49; differences between 55–60; disproving conventional view 23–26; dissent from God 31–34, 55; ethics: particular 37, 39–40, 42–45; ethics: universal 36–42, 46–50; fair and just, doing what is (al-iÈs§n) 27, 30, 44–45, 53, 60–65; history 334–37; hypocrites 59–60; Islamic revival/reawakening xxxiii, 27, 67–70, 96–97, 464, 465; redefinitions 26–28; redefinition: al-Êm§n xxix, 50–53; redefinition: alisl§m xxix, 28–31, 393, 438; redefinition: pillars of al-Êm§n 53–55, 59; redefinition: pillars of al-isl§m 34–35, 59; religion other than al-isl§m 27; revised priorities 65–67; righteous, doing what is (al-#amal al-ß§liÈ) 27,

35–37, 52–53; taboos 49

Isl§mbå lÊ, MuÈammad Haytham xxv

Islamic revival/reawakening xxxiii, 27, 67–70, 96–97, 464, 465

Islamism/Islamists xxviii, 329, 330, 394, 446–50, 451–52, 533–35; Abå

Zayd, Naßr \§mid 523; al-ßaÈwa 27, 68; apostasy 352–53, 447–48; Islamic umma 479–80; oppressive ideology 527; rituals and sharÊ#a law xl, xlviii, xxxviii, 113; start of 530

Israel 426

al-istiq§ma (straightness) 180–181, 230, 548

J§bÊ, SalÊm al- xxv

Jacob 29, 38, 371 Jainism 438

al-ja#l (transformation) 154, 161, 162,

163, 543 al-Jam§#at al-Isl§miyya 446 al-j§mi# 334 JawÊj§tÊ, Ma”må n al- xxvi

Jesus 24, 29, 36, 52, 160, 296, 404, 477

Jews/Judaism 25, 30, 52, 53, 132, 160,

188–89, 295–96, 357–58 al-Jih§d 446 al-jih§d 24, 54, 59, 336, 337, 394–95, 497; abrogation (naskh) 396–402; act of witness 402–422; ‘in Allah/God’s way’ 410–415; characteristics of witnesses 404–405; derivation of 395; difference between qit§l and 424–25; fight for oppressed 442; martyrdom: 3:169 420–422; martyrdom concept, emergence of 416–419; politics and religion 394–95, 409, 416–420; sh-h-d, use in the Book of 402–404, 407; shahÊd: death not deciding factor 408–410; shahÊd: ÈadÊths 405–406, 407, 408; sh§hid and shahÊd witness 403, 405, 407; shuhad§” (sing shahÊd) 403, 407; textual evidence of meaning 396; verses of messengerhood and prophethood 402

al-jilb§b (outer garment) 322, 556 jinns 368, 369–70

al-jizya (head tax on free nonbelievers) 359–60

Joseph 29, 198, 403

Jurj§nÊ, #Abd al-Q§hir Ibn #Abd al-

RaÈm§n al- 5, 10 justice; al-iÈs§n (doing what is fair and just) 27, 30, 44–45, 53, 60–65; freedom and 431; human societies 67; inheritance laws 238, 251; for orphans and polygyny 260–268; al-qisã and al-#adl 261; truth telling 41; al-íulm (injustice) 441–45 al-k§fir ån (unbelievers) 27, 55, 444, 458–59; different meaning 452–53,

454

kalim§t All§h (words of God) 136–38,

337, 430–431, 486, 487, 542 al-kaynå na see being khabar news 74–75, 402, 533 Kh§lid b. al-WalÊd 351

KhalÊl, Ibn AÈmad al-Far§hÊdÊ al-

9–10

Khaula bint al-Azwar 221 Khrushchev, Nikita xx killing 40, 47, 202–204, 378, 400–402 al-kit§b al-mubÊn (clear book) 140–141, 142, 538 al-kit§b (the Book) 122–24, 162, 163, 537; being in-and-for-itself 76–79, 485–86; indirect speech of God (kal§m All§h) 486; multistructure composition xxxvii–xxxviii, 132–33; prophethood and messengerhood 72–79; al-qur”§n and 116–17, 120–122, 512, 513; use of term 2, 7–8, 23, 537 knowledge xxx–xxxi, xlvii, 75, 140, 383, 487; absolute and relative 4, 143; absolute taboo: to say things about Allah/God without 381; freedom and 113, 331–32

Kurdistan 362 Kuwait xxvii

language, function of 5 al-lawÈ al-maÈf åí (tablet preserved) 7, 140, 142, 156, 159, 160, 514, 538 leadership see al-qiw§ma Lebanon xxiii

lexicography 10–11

likeness (al-wal§”) see identities, political limits, theory of (al-Èudå d) xxii, xxx, 92–93, 177, 190–191, 515, 548; Abraham 185–86, 188; concept of upper and lower limits: examples 184–85; conjoined upper and lower limits 206; corruption in the land 201–202; curvature (al-ÈanÊfiyya) 4, 63–64, 181–83, 230, 548; curvature between positive upper and negative lower 209–14; debt contracts 194–95; dialectical opposition 183; differences between conventional view and 214–17; dress requirements 196, 304, 313, 320, 321, 323, 326, 328; fight (al-qit§l) 456; food 192–94; homicide and physical harm

<right>

202–204; homosexual activities, public 204–206; human behaviour and social interaction 186–87; inheritance 206, 239–40, 258, 488; Jews 188–89; limits untouched by curvature 208; lower limits 191–96, 548; marriage 191–92, 194; meeting of upper and lower limits 206–208; messengerhood, book of 75; mitigation of punishments 189–91, 197; MuÈammad’s limits 94; MuÈammad’s messengerhood 187–88, 191; need: change in Islamic legislation 177–80; occupations 320, 328; polygyny 265–68; religion, lower and upper limits of 340; straightness (al-istiq§ma) 180–181, 230, 548; theft, penalty for 189–90, 196–201; upper limits 196–206, 548; war against Allah/God 201–202 linguistic principles 3–11, 82, 90 logic, mathematical xxxiv Lot 40, 384 lot-casting 380 loyalty see identities, multiple al-mamnå# (temporary ban) 49, 271 Ma”m ån b. Al-RashÊd, al- 363

</right>

ManfÊkhÊ, MuÈammad FarÊz xxvi

Manichaeism 295

Ma#arr§wiyya, MuÈammad ‘ayy§È al- xxii–xxiii, xxvii marriage 41, 379; al-ba#l/zawj (partner/conjugal husband) 287–89; lower limit 191–92, 194; misy§r 316

martyrdom 330, 403, 405, 446, 459–60; emergence of concept 416–18; Sumayya bint al-Khayy§ã 221; see also al-shahÊd; suicide missions

al-ma#rå f 49, 381–83, see also prescribing right, proscribing wrong

Marxism/Marxists xx, xxi, 22, 48, 504,

505, 531 al-mas§kÊn (handicapped people) 44, 549; bequests 232; charity money 211,

212, 213 mathematics and physics 525–26; mathematical logic xxxiv

Mayd§nÊ, #Abd al-RaÈm§n \asan

\aban naka al- xxvii Mazdaism 295, 438 meaning of words xxxvi, 4–9, 82, 90, see also nonsynonymity medical treatment/research 67, 354 men: ba#l/zawj (partner/conjugal husband) 287–89; ba#l/zawj and f emale dress code 294, 310–311, 312, 321, 326; dress requirements 304, 305–307, 318, 326, 327; homosexuality, public 205–206; nushå z 273,

<right>

287–90; relationship with women

</right>

272–73; rij§l xliii–xliv, xlvi, 274–76; messengerhood, concept of (al-ris§la) xxxv, 72–79, 217, 336, 487–88, 537; definite verses 124, 488; historic/ historical 490–491; al-jih§d 402; prescription or proscription 370; al-qit§l

(fight) 424 minorities, religious xl misy§r marriages 316 money laundering 449 monopolies 415 moral guidance see al-furq§n

Morocco xxiii

Moses 24, 29, 36, 37, 40, 52, 224, 299,

371, 477; miracles 145 mosque, meaning of (al-masjid) 334, 433, mother of the book see umm al-kit§b Mu#§wiya b. AbÊ Sufy§n 336, 361

MuÈammad 35, 36, 38, 40, 42, 144; abrogation 18, 45–46, 400; al-Êm§n 51, 56, 69; al-isl§m 57; Bedouin society 333–34; believers 52, 53, 56; companions of 80–81, 97, 109, 111, 179, 335–36, 342–43, 376; defeat at UÈud 455; disbelief 55; dress 323–24; establishment of centralised state 89, 90, 358–61, 493; fallibility 83–84, 92; family-based forms of al-wal§” 477; al-ijtih§d 84, 92, 94, 101, 102, 106, 109, 110, 271–72, 493; impeccability (al-#ißma) 84, 109; infallibility 83–84, 92; interest 210; justice 41; last message sent by Allah/God to human beings 216; major sins, understanding of 375–76; Meccan injustice 445; multiple identities 480; Muslims and 23–24; obedience to 90–95, 109; wives of 56, 126, 268–70, 313–314, 324; wives of: #$“isha 221, 275, 324, 347, 348, 350; words of Allah/God and 81–82

MuÈammad, sunna of xxxix, 271–72, 377, 493–94, 542; conclusion 108–13; content of prophetic ÈadÊths 103–108; critique of traditional view of 79–101; exaggeration of MuÈammad’s prophetic role 84–88, 494–96; human and divine interdiction 100; introduction 71–72; MuÈammad’s ijtih§d 84, 92, 94,101, 102, 106, 109, 110, 271–72, 493; nahy and Èar§m 98–100; prophethood and messengerhood xxxv, 72–79, 110, 402; role model: al-tauÈÊd 95–97; secondary issues 97; six errors of interpretation 81–91; specific, circumstantial nature of 101–103; theory of limits 215; togetherness, piety and good work 97–98; two types of obedience 91–95; see also ÈadÊths al-muÈarram§t see taboo, absolutely al-mujrimå n (dissenters from God) 27, multiple identities see identities al-mu”min ån (Muslim-Believers) 32, 34,

Muhammedans 56

31–34, 540

540; al-Êm§n and see al-isl§m and al-

Êm§n; nonsynonymity 9, 21 Munajjid, M§hir al- xxvi al-munkar 49, 384–85; see also prescribing right, proscribing wrong

music 49, 94, 381

Muslim-Assenters (al-muslim ån) 32, 34, 496, 539; al-isl§m and see al-isl§m and al-Êm§n; nonsynonymity 9, 21

Muslim-Believers (al-mu”minå n) 32, 34,

540; al-Êm§n and see al-isl§m and al-

Êm§n; nonsynonymity 9, 21

Muslim Brotherhood (Jam§#at al-Ikhw§n al-MuslimÊn) 446, 449

al-muslim ån (Muslim-Assenters) 32, 34, 496, 539; al-isl§m and see al-isl§m and al-Êm§n; nonsynonymity 9, 21

mystics xxix, xxxii, 353, 383, 502

naba” news 74–75, 402, 533 Nabielek, Rainer xviii–xix al-nafs and al-r åÈ (soul and spirit) 118–119,

164–66, 421–22, 546 names of sons 473 al-n§s (humankind) 222–24, 277 al-naskh see abrogation naßß text 111–112 Nasser, Gamal Abdel 362 nation (al-sha#b) 467, 477–78, 551 nationalism/nationalists 22; Arab xx,

506, 507–509, 510, 529

natural resources, use of 77, 308 NawawÊ, YaÈy§ b. al-Sharaf al- 388–89

New Age groups 53 Newton, Isaac 219, 226 al-nis§” xliii–xliv, xlvi, 275, 276–78, 313, 550; inheritance 222–24, 227, 244–45

Noah xxxi, 29, 35, 36, 38, 334, 335,

474, 476, 477 nongovernmental organisations 392–93 nonsynonymity 6–9, 21, 27–28, 82, 115,

151, 294, 365 nothingness (al-#adam) 541 Nå È, #AlÊ xxv numeric systems 485 al-nushå z xliv; men 273, 287–90; women 273, 284–86, 287 obedience 471; freedom of religion 335, 337, 431–34, 438; to MuÈammad as messenger 90–91, 109; to prescribe and to proscribe 367–70; two types of obedience 91–95; women 283 objectivity of al-qur”§n xxxv–xxxvi,

163–66, 487, 512–513 occupations 416; women 320, 328 original sin 295–301 orphans 68, 556; bequests 232; charity money 211, 212; definition of 261, 265, 556; inheritance laws 227, 251–52; polygyny and justice for 40, 260–268; property of 40, 260, 261–62, 378 otherness (al-bar§”) 466, 475, see also identities, multiple painting 94 Palestine 362

Paradise 13–14, 35, 62, 327, 459, 460 parents 9, 396, 521–22, 553; ban on killing children 39–40; bequests 231–32; inheritance of ascendant members of family 249–53, 257; respect for 38–39, 47, 164, 171–72, 378, 475,

551

Paul (Corinthians) 296 peace (al-sal§m) 42, 43 perjury 378 permission 49, 89–90, 491–92; absolute (al-Èal§l) 49, 90, 102, 271, 365,

<right>

</right>

491–92, 555 philosophical principles 11–19 photographs 49

pilgrimage (al-Èajj) 22, 24, 25, 26, 54, 59,

66, 336–37; obedience 93 pillars of al-Êm§n 112, 336–37; conventional view 22; definition of rituals 549; fair and just, doing what is (al-iÈs§n) 27, 30, 44–45, 53, 60–65; obedience 93; redefinition 53–55, 59,

66–67; see also individual pillars pillars of al-isl§m 336–37; conventional view 21–22; disproving conventional view 23–26; redefinition 34–35, 59; righteous, doing what is (al-#amal alß§liÈ) 27, 35–37, 52–53 poetry 100, 484 political Islam 329–30; apostasy see apostasy; freedom see freedom; identity see identities, multiple; jih§d see al-jih§d; qit§l see al-qit§l (fight); right and wrong see prescribing right, proscribing wrong political parties 41, 393 pollution 201 polygyny 40, 258–60, 290, 492; conclusion 270–272; historical context 264; limits, theory of 265–68; m§ ã§ba lakum 262–63; orphan, definition of 261, 265; purpose: justice for orphans 260–265; qisã and #adl 261; Sår at al-Nis§” 4:1–6 260–261; Så rat al-Nis§” 4:127 265; wives of polysemy xlv, 198, 285, 294, 319, 367,

MuÈammad 268–70

468

poor (al-fuqar§”) 44, 549; charity money

211, 212 power, financial and economic

280–281

prayer (al-ßal§h) 22, 24, 25, 26, 34, 53, 66, 67, 336–37; burial 69; obedience

93 predestination 67, 127, 140, 337, 354; al-qadar and al-qa·§” 169–73, 331, 543; conventional view of al-Êm§n 22; possible acts 16

prescribing right, proscribing wrong (alamr bi’l-ma#rå f wa’l-nahy #an al-munkar) 330, 364–67, 498, 550, 555; absolute taboos 49–50, 374, 375, 376, 377–81; compulsion/duress (ikr§h) 385–86; conclusion 392–94; definition of 387–88; harshness (faí§ía) 385; in and idh§ 372–73; legitimate sins 379–80; legitimate transgressions 380–381; major sins: companions 376; major sins: later generations

376–78; major sins: MuÈammad 375–76; major sins: qur”§n 373–75; misconstrued 388–92; nahy and Èar§m 365, 370–372; to prescribe (al-amr) 367–68; to proscribe (al-nahy) 368–70; verses containing injunction 365–66; verses referring to major/minor sins 373; what is right (ma#r åf) 381–83; what is wrong (munkar) 384–85 prison system 200–202 privacy 43 progressing (al-sayrå ra) xxix, xxx, 11–19, 78–79, 112, 485–86 prohibition 49, 89–90, 491–92 property 43 prophethood, concept of (al-nubåw a) xxxi– xxxii, xxxv, 72–79, 487–88; ambiguous verses 124, 488; al-jih§d 402; alqit§l (fight) 424, 460

proscribing wrong see prescribing right, proscribing wrong

prostitution 320, 328 protection money 449 prudence 45 punishments 92–93, 552; amputation as penalty for theft 189–90, 196–201; apostasy 341–42, 497; corruption of the land 201–202; homicide and physical harm 202–204; mitigation 189–91, 197; prison 200–202; public homosexual activities 204–6; unchasteness 206–208, 399–400; war against Allah/God 201–202 al-qabÊÈ 49, 365 al-qadar and al-qa·§” (divine preordain-ment and human will) 169–73, 331,

<right>

</right>

543 al-Q§#ida 395, 446 al-qaum (people) 466–67, 477–78, 551 al-qiw§ma (leadership/guardianship) xl–xlvi, 272–74; al-nis§”, meaning of term 276–78; al-rij§l: meaning of term 274–76; ba#l/zawj (partner/ conjugal husband) 287–89; beating 285–86; definition of 273; divorce 288–89, 290–92; financial and economic power 280–81; interpreting verse of 279–86; men: nush åz 273, 287–90; in and outside family 281; righteous women and obedience 283; technological progress and physical strength 282; women: nushåz 273, al-qit§l (fight) 54, 336, 337, 497–98; aims 429–30, 438–40; aim, first: exultation of Allah/God’s word 430–34; aim, second: protection of earth 434–37; aim, third: protection of house of the Lord 437–38; al-isl§m: perfect divine system 448; Allah/God’s rule (al-È§kimiyya) 450–51, 463–64; causes of, three legitimate 441; competition 435–37, 438–39; conclusion 460–66; context in the Book 439–40; derivation of 423; difference between al-jih§d and 424–25; early Islamic period 445–46; exhaust peaceful means 444; al-ijm§ # (consensus) 426–27; injustice (al-íulm) 441–45; mistakes in interpretation 424, 425–26, 428, 434, 436, 443–44, 445–46, 447, 456–57; non-Muslim-Believers 443–44; offensive fight against oppressor 445; one-sided fights 423–24, 445, 449, 455–56, 465; politics and religion 445–50, 451–52, 464–65; prescribed and disliked 424, 425, 427–28; reasons for corruption of 452–59; tyranny and despotism 431, 432, 446–47, 462–63; verses of prophethood 424 al-qiy§s (analogy) 71, 85, 97, 110, 192, 215, 225, 493–94; empirical evidence qisã and #adl (justice and equality) 261 al-qur”§n 127–28, 129, 132, 135, 487, 538; al-inz§l and al-tanzÊl 155–58, 161–63; al-kit§b and 116–17, 120–22, 512, 513; ambiguous nature of 143–44, 145, 149; approving and controlling nature of 145–47; content of 139–43; determinism 169–73; glorious qur”§n 139–40, 142–43, 538; not to touch 120, 157–58, 172–73; objectivity of xxxv–xxxvi, 163–66, 487, 512–13; summary 173–75; use of term 2, 7–8,

284–86, 287

492

23, 538

Quãb, Sayyid 447, 448

Rahman, Fazlur xlvii

al-r§sikhå n fi’l-#ilm (intellectual elite) 29 R§zÊ, Fakhr al-DÊn MuÈammad al- 299, 341–42, 343, 347, 375, 454 redundancy 6–7, 485 remembrance (al-dhikr) 77, 115, 133–35,

157, 495, 539 revelation; ‘Allah/God’ and ‘Lord’ 119, 166–69, 542; ambiguous verses (§y§t mutash§bih§t) 26, 116, 121, 123, 124, 127, 129, 488, 538; ‘And God said’ (q§la All§h) 82, 126; categories of human speech 136; clear book (kit§b mubÊn) 140–141, 142, 538; clear record (im§m mubÊn) 140, 141–42, 156, 159, 514, 538; definite verses (§y§t muÈkam§t) 26, 116, 121, 123, 124, 125–26, 488; explanation of the book (tafßÊl al-kit§b) 125, 130–132, 162, 163, 539; glorious qur”§n (qur”§n majÊd) 139–40, 142–43, 538; al-inz§l see al-inz§l; al-kit§b (the Book) 72–79, 122–24, 162, 163; al-qur”§n 127–28, 129, 132, 135, 155–58, 161–63, 173, 538; al-qur”§n and al-kit§b 116–117, 120–122, 512, 513; al-qur”§n, ambiguous nature of 143–44, 145, 149; al-qur”§n, approving and controlling nature of 145–47; al-qur”§n, content of 139–43; al-qur”§n, objectivity of xxxv–xxxvi, 163–66, 487, 512–513; reason for multistructure composition xxxvii–xxxviii, 132–33; reason and reality xxxi, 487; remembrance (al-dhikr) 77, 133–35, 157, 495, 539; seven oft-recited (sab# al-math§nÊ) 73, 124, 127, 128–30, 135, 145, 146,

162, 163, 538; signs of God (§yat All§h) 140; spirit and soul (al-r åÈ and al-nafs) 118–119, 164–66, 421, 546;

summary 173–75; tablet preserved (al-lawÈ al-maÈf åí) 7, 140, 142, 156, 159, 160, 514, 538; al-tanzÊl see altanzÊl; Truth (al-Èaqq) 121, 138–39, 545; umm al-kit§b see umm al-kit§b; words of God (kalim§t All§h) 136–38,

337, 430–31, 486, 487 revival/reawakening, Islamic (al-ßaÈwa)

xxxiii, 27, 67–70, 96–97, 464, 465

al-rib§ (interest) 209–14, 554 right and wrong see prescribing right, proscribing wrong righteous, doing what is (al-#amal al-ß§liÈ)

27, 35–37, 52–53

al-rij§l xliii–xliv, xlvi, 274–76

rituals see pillars of al-Êm§n Rousseau, Jean-Jacques 337 al-rå È and al-nafs (spirit and soul) 118–119, 164–66, 421–22, 546 Russell, Bertrand xxi, xxxiv sab# al-math§nÊ (seven oft-recited) 73, 124, 127, 128–30, 135, 145, 146, 162, 163, 538; summary 174–75 Sabians 30 al-ßaÈwa (Islamic revival/reawakening) xxxiii, 27, 67–70, 96–97, 464, 465 Salafi Islam xxix, xxxii al-ßal§h (prayer) 22, 24, 25, 26, 34, 53,

66, 67; burial 69; obedience 93 al-sal§m (peace) 42, 43, 413–414 Saudi Arabia xxvii al-ßaum (fast) 22, 24, 25–26, 54, 66, 67; limits of Allah/God 207, 488–89; obedience 93; reparation of crime

203, 204; sickness 59 al-saw”a (shame) 294, 299–304 ‘ayd§wÊ, Yå suf al- xxvi al-ßayrå ra (becoming) xxix, xxx, 11–19, 76, 78–79, 111, 112, 485–86 al-sayr åra (progressing) xxix, xxx, 11–19, 78–79, 112, 485–86 schoolism 354 sculptures 49, 94 Second World War 439

secularists 22 security services 42, 380, 413, 463 seven oft-recited (sab# al-math§nÊ) 73, 124, 127, 128–30, 135, 145, 146, 162, 163, 538; summary 174–75 sexual relations 40, 206–208, 306, 378; al-ba#l/zawj (partner/conjugal husband) 287–89, 557; homosexuality 40, 204–206, 375, 378; partnerships

557; prostitution 320, 328 al-sha#b (nation) 467, 477–78, 551 Sh§fi#Ê, MuÈammad, sunna of IdrÊs al-

104

al-shah§da 22, 24, 53, 111, 169; first part 34–35, 37–38, 340–341, 430; second part 340

al-shahÊd 553; ‘in Allah/God’s way’ 410–416; characteristics of witnesses 405; politics and religion 409, 416–420; sh-h-d, use in the Book of

<right>

402–404, 407; shahÊd: death not deciding factor 408–10; shahÊd: ÈadÊths 405–406, 407, 408; sh§hid and shahÊd witness 403, 405, 407, 548; Så rat $l #Imr§n 3:169 420–22; verses of messengerhood and prophethood 402

</right>

Shahrur, Muhammad: 1967 war xxi, 510, 511, 530; antitraditionalism xxxii–xxxiii; Arab nationalism xx, 506, 507–509, 510, 529; birth and early life xix, 502–503; civil engineering career xx–xxi, 509, 522; civil society and Islam 519–521; controversy xxii–xxviii; democracy 527–29; Dublin, time in xx, 511; education xix–xx, 503; events of 9/11 532–33; existence of Allah/God xx, 504–505, 508, 509, 526–27; Ibn Rushd 530–531; influences on xxi–xxii; Islamists 533–35; marriages and children xx, 510, 511, 522; Marxism xx, xxi, 504, 505, 531; mathematics and physics xxxiv, 525–26; public lectures 522–23; Soviet Union, time in xix– xx, 504–507; style and method xxi– xxii, 517–519, 531–32; teacher xx, 509, 522; The Book and the Qur”§n xvii, xviii, xxii–xxvii, xxxiv, 510–517, 523; theories of society 505–506, 508–509, 527; theory: al-isl§m and al-Êm§n xxviii–xxix, xxxii–xxxiii, xxxv–xxxvi; theory: Allah/God, concept of xxix– xxxi; theory: applied xl–xlviii; theory: prophethood, concept of xxxi–xxxii; theory: understanding of the Qur”§n xxxiii–xl; works xvii, xviii, xxii–xxviii, 510–517, 521–22, 523 Shaltå t, MaÈmå d 447 shame (saw”a) 294, 299–304 sharÊ#a law xl, xlvi–xlvii, xlviii, xxxvii– xxxviii, 533; Islamic fiqh and 496; limits see limits, theory of

Shaww§f, MunÊr MuÈammad •§hir al- xxvi Shintoism 438

al-shå r§ (consultation) 54, 59, 336, 417–

418, 464

SÊbawayh, #Amr b. #Uthm§n 9–10, 11 sins: original sin 295–301; see also prescribing right, proscribing wrong

slander 99, 380 slavery 59, 220, 315–316, 553; freeing enslaved as reparation 203–204; heads carf 303–304; worship of Allah/ God and not 432–34, 438, 462, 487,

553 smoking 831; ban on smoking in public

271, 372, 491–92 social contract 337, 393, 464, 520 Solomon 29

speech, categories of human 136 spirit and soul (al-r åÈ and al-nafs) 118–119,

164–66, 421, 546 sports clubs 41 spying 42, 99 straightness (al-istiq§ma) 180–181, 230, 548 striptease 320, 328 structuralism xxii, xxxiii–xxxv, xlvi subjectivity xxxv, 163, 164 succession: im§mate 476; inheritance see inheritance

suicide missions 363, 409, 423–24, 446, 465; praise of death 354; see also alshahÊd; martyrdom

Sulaim§n, ‘§diq Jaw§d 501

Sumayya bint al-Khayy§ã 221

Så rat #Abasa (80): (1–4) 83, 159; (11–16) 158; (36) 474–75

Så rat al-AÈq§f (46): (3) 138; (7) 121, 135, 139; (15) 39, 235, 386

Så rat al-AÈz§b (33): (6) 314, 382; (13) 318; (20–22) 95–96; (21) 79, 95, 269; (32) 269–70, 314; (34) 104; (35) 9, 23; (38) 269; (53) 126, 314; (55) 278, 313–314; (59) 126, 321–23, 325, 326

Så rat $l #Imr§n (3): (3) 123–24; (7) 123, 144, 148; (13) 460; (14) 222–23, 277;

(19) 27, 56; (33) 165; (36) 281–82; (45) 430; (47) 138, 141, 231; (50) 160, 400, 489; (52) 24, 30; (67) 182, 188; (83) 29; (85) 27, 56; (93) 371; (95) 182; (97) 22, 54; (102) 48, 57, 58,

397; (103) 455; (104) 365, 384, 387, 389; (108) 441; (110) 366, 387, 390, 469; (114) 366, 387; (128) 346, 367; (130) 209, 210, 213; (132) 90, 91; (137) 491; (145) 164; (159) 367, 385; (169) 420–422; (187) 86, 108, 495

Så rat al-#Alaq (96): (9–10) 371; (13) 467

Så rat al-An#§m (6) 465, 495; (7) 157;

(11) 17; (19) 136; (23) 303; (45) 199; (47) 143; (48) 36; (53) 150; (59) 140, 142; (67) 146; (73) 118, 138, 164, 370; (79) 182, 183; (93) 165; (100) 85; (114) 107, 131; (115) 430; (119) 193–94; (122) 421–22; (126) 87; (145) 193; (146) 160; (149) 505, 526; (151) 39, 371; (151–53) 37, 47, 399; (152) 261–62; (153) 180, 378; (161) 36, 180, 185; (162–63) 34

Så rat al-Anbiy§” (21): (2) 134; (7) 135;

(10) 133, 134; (23) 450; (35) 47, 421; (40) 339; (48) 399; (51) 188; (89–90) 283; (106) 432; (107) 481; (108) 30, 35

Så rat al-Anf§l (8) 357, 533; (15–16) 452–53, 454; (17) 454; (28) 303; (45) 454; (46) 454; (61) 43; (64) 24, 52; (67) 83–84

Så rat al-#Ankab åt (29): (8) 235, 396; (20) 410, 491; (29) 384; (39) 383; (40) 383; (45) 366

Så rat al-A#r§f (7) 495; (12) 368; (20–22) 297, 300; (22) 298; (23) 443; (26) 151, 294; (26–27) 298; (31) 308; (32) 308; (33) 381; (38) 411; (43) 327; (44) 293; (46–47) 293; (50) 293; (53) 147; (54) 160, 161; (79) 153; (89) 419; (93) 152, 153; (96) 420; (101) 74; (126) 24; (154) 157; (157) 366, 400; (160) 200; (164) 469; (165) 442; (196) 468;

(199) 390

Så rat al-Balad (90): (3) 235

Sår at al-Baqara (2) 132, 196; (2) 72, 117, 120; (3) 72; (11) 372; (23) 402, 410; (27) 199; (30) 165, 167; (31) 165; (35) 368; (42) 299; (57) 151, 155;

(62) 30; (64) 467; (67–71) 189; (79) 132; (83) 415, 458; (87) 76; (89) 381; (102) 303; (105) 398; (106) 217, 398, 399, 489; (109) 339; (110) 24;

(111–112) 25, 66; (112) 30, 36, 62; (115) 467; (117) 339–40; (120) 357, 472; (124) 470, 474, 475–76; (128) 30; (132) 24, 38; (133) 30; (141) 352; (142) 467; (148) 469; (156) 96; (158) 117; (159) 85; (173) 379, 492; (177) 25, 44, 203–204, 211, 212; (178) 24, 202–203, 424, 427; (180) 44, 226, 230, 232, 233; (181) 233; (182) 182, 233; (183) 24, 54, 230, 424, 427;

(185) 24, 91, 120, 139, 377, 399, 404; (187) xli, 86, 126, 207, 224, 272–73, 299, 488, 495; (190) 412, 423, 456, 457; (190–93) 444–45;

(193) 456; (194) 441, 448, 456, 457; (195) 412; (196) 485; (208) 43; (215) 428; (216) 24, 54, 385–86, 424, 425, 427, 429, 436, 437; (217) 341, 346, 347; (222) 158; (223) 222–23; (228) 288–89, 382; (229) 441; (239) 274;

(239) xliii; (241) 366; (246) 428; (251) 429, 434–37, 438; (255) 181; (256) 38, 54, 363, 386, 397, 402, 432; (257) 473; (262) 412; (264) 452–53; (269) 103; (272) 54; (275) 209, 210, 213–214; (276) 209, 210, 214; (278) 209, 210; (279) 210, 213; (280) 209; (282) 45, 194–95, 275, 404, 405, 410, 416; (283) 45, 195, 379; (284) 310; (285) 59; (286) 57–58, 386

Så rat al-Bayyina (98): (1–2) 122; (2–3) 122; (5) 181

Så rat al-Burå j (85): (1–2) 139; (9) 402–403; (21–22) 139

Sår at al-Dh§riyy§t (51): (35–36) 24; (49) 223; (56) 59, 432

Så rat al-Fajr (89): (20) 25; (27–28) 165

Så rat al-FatÈ (48): (1) 419, 429; (2–3) 419, 429; (4) 51; (25) 275

Så rat al-F§tiÈa (1): (2) 166; (5–6) 35; (6) 180, 183

Så rat F§ãir (35): (18) 302, 342, 448; (29) 135; (31) 121, 145; (33) 299

Sår at al-Furq§n (25): (30) 180; (32) 156; (39) 319; (45) 149; (48) 151; (67) 45

Så rat Fußßilat (41): (2) 152; (6) 108; (33)

30; (53) 146

Så rat al-Gh§shiyya (88): (21–24) 346

Så rat al-\adÊd (57): (4) 403; (20) 25; (25) 151; (28) 51, 60

Så rat al-\ajj (22): (1) 91; (5) 12, 15; (18) 440; (19) 11; (27) 274; (27) xliii; (31) 181; (34) 168; (38) 436, 439, 440; (39) 439, 440, 441, 442, 444, 456, 457; (40) 430, 437–40, 441; (41) 366, 387–88, 440; (44) 384; (46) 385; (62) 138; (65) 167; (78) 408

Så rat al-\§qqa (69): (17) 160, 161; (44–46) 107

Så rat al-\ashr (59): (7) 88–90; (9) 385 Sår at al-\ijr (15): (1) 7–8, 116, 120–121; (2) 57; (6) 133; (9) 77, 80, 88, 115, 133; (29) 165; (87) 124, 128, 139; (95) 32

Sår at al-\ujur§t (49): (6) 372; (7) 374; (11) 42, 98; (12) 42, 98; (13) 97, 223–24, 302, 382, 390, 429, 469, 473, 477; (14) 23, 50; (15) 24, 52;

(17) 57

Så rat al-Ikhl§ß (112): (1) 136; (3) 235

Så rat al-Ins§n (76): (3) 341; (23) 151, 162

Sår at al-Isr§” (17); (20) 169; (21) 280; (23) 38, 119, 171; (31) 39; (33) 202, 401; (36) 43; (36–39) 104; (42) 161; (45) 293; (46) 468; (59) 443; (70) 223–24; (85) 118, 164, 166

Så rat al-J§thiyya (45): (2) 151, 162; (6) 140; (13) 168

Så rat al-Jinn (72): (14) 24, 370; (15) 261;

(18) 440; (28) 153

Så rat al-K§firå n (109): (3) 432

Så rat al-Kahf (18): (1) 162; (26) 450;

(27) 137, 139; (29) 397, 443, 444; (33) 441; (35) 138; (50) 368, 369, 370, 374; (51) 410; (63) 411; (71) 367; (74) 384; (82) 261; (107) 35; (109) 118, 137–38; (110) 57, 108, 335

Så rat al-Ma#§rij (70): (11–13) 475; (19–20) 25; (30) 316

Sår at al-M§“ida (5) 132; (1) 24, 45; (3) 81, 192–93, 194; (6) 158; (8) 410; (15) 86, 142, 398, 495; (21) 339; (23) 52; (27–31) 455; (28) 423; (31) 299; (33) 199, 201; (34) 201; (38–39) 196; (39) 200; (42) 261; (44) 30, 401; (45) 189, 401, 457; (48) 159; (52) 420; (54) 340, 346, 347; (55) 471–72; (56) 467; (67) 84, 152, 153, 494; (69) 36; (92) 93; (93) 53, 60; (99) 152; (101) 156; (106)

319; (116) 404; (117) 404, 405, 421 Så rat al-M§# ån (107): (1–7) 33

Så rat al-Muddaththir (74): (39–46) 32;

(42) 32; (43) 33

Så rat al-Muj§dila (58): (11) 284, 335 Så rat al-Mulk (67): (1–2) 97; (18) 384

Så rat al-Mu”minån (23): (1) 54; (4) 54; (5) 311; (5–6) 288, 307, 311

Så rat al-MumtaÈana (60): (4) 95; (5–6)

95; (8) 458

Så rat al-Mun§fiqå n (63): (1) 60

Så rat al-Mursal§t (77): (18–19) 32

Så rat al-MuãaffifÊn (83): (1–3) 41; (24) 381; (29) 32

Så rat al-Muzzammil (73): (4) 28, 513;

(10–11) 443; (20) 412, 423 Så rat al-Naba” (78): (29) 123 Så rat al-NaÈl (16): (2) 166; (8) 308; (44) 84–85, 135, 151; (68) 57; (89) 87; (90)

126, 380; (97) 327; (101) 217, 398; (102) 398; (106) 385; (116) 381; (120) 182, 186; (120–23) 470; (123) 182; (125) 346, 397, 411, 415, 444

Så rat al-Najm (53): (3–4) 82; (32) 98, 99, 373, 379; (45) 223, 244

Så rat al-Naml (27): (1) 142; (12) 309;

(44) 30; (55) 275; (69) 32; (75) 142;

(91) 30; (92) 135

Så rat al-Naßr (110): (1) 372, 419

Så rat al-N§zi#§t (79): (24) 450

Så rat al-Nis§” (4) 40, 132, 308; (1) xli, 235, 260, 276; (2) 260, 262; (3) 260–268; (4) 261; (5) 261; (6) 261, 265; (7) 233, 354; (8) 232; (9) 232–33; (11) 6, 9, 126, 137, 227, 234, 235–53, 256; (11–12) 225; (11–13) 226, 239, 240; (12) 234–35, 245, 253–55; (13) 225, 235, 236, 239, 488; (14) 92, 225, 488; (15) 204, 405, 410, 416; (16) 204, 205; (19) 427; (22) 191; (23) 192, 312, 314–315; (29) 209–10; (31) 7, 98, 196, 372, 372–73, 374; (34) 181, 273–75, 279–86, 391; (34) xl– xlvi; (35) 273, 286; (36) 44, 61; (37) 374; (43) 158; (48) 38; (58) 367, 431;

(59) 93, 94, 471–72; (63) 136; (69) 91;

(76) 411, 431; (78) 170–171; (79) 171;

(90) 43, 455, 456; (92) 203, 401–402; (94) 43, 319, 413, 444, 458; (100) 415; (101) 319; (103) 24, 53, 122, 230; (113) 103; (114) 380; (116) 38; (125) 30, 36, 62–63, 181; (127) 265; (128) xliv, xlv, 273, 287–90; (129) 290; (130) 290; (135) 41; (136) 51, 55, 60; (137) 50–51, 55, 60; (148) 444; (161) 210; (176) 255

Så rat al-Når (24): (1) 304; (2) 206, 400; (3) 206; (4–10) 207; (22) 44; (27) 24, 43; (28) 43; (29) 43; (30) 304; (31) 7, 196, 225, 278, 288, 304–305, 304–26; (36–37) 433; (37) xliii, 33,

275; (41) 34; (56) 24, 93

Sår at al-Qadr (97): (1) 151, 156; (4) 166

Så rat al-Qalam (68): (1) 129; (35–36)

31; (44) 32

Så rat al-Qamar (54): (17) 135

Så rat al-Qaßaß (28): (2) 142; (4) 455; (6) 383; (8) 383; (9) 231; (13) 339; (15) 425; (23) 470; (32) 309; (34) 136; (38)

383, 450; (53–54) 52; (78) 32; (88) 14

Så rat al-Qiy§ma (75): (3) 422; (18–19)

87

Så rat al-Ra#d (13): (1) 118; (4) 12; (11) 339; (20) 41; (37) 162; (39) 159

Så rat al-RaÈm§n (55): (3–4) 86; (9) 64; (17) 167; (41–43) 32

Så rat al-R åm (30): (4) 411; (12) 32; (21) 302; (22) 140; (30) 25, 36, 181, 183;

(39) 209, 210; (58) 320

Så rat al-‘aff (61): (4) 454–55; (9) 386

Så rat al-‘§ff§t (37): (118) 180 Så rat al-SharÈ (94): (4) 134

Sår at al-Shu#ar§” (26): (2) 142; (49) 198–99; (214) 474, 475, 481

Så rat al-Shå r§ (42): (1–2) 129–30; (13) 36; (27) 380; (37) 98, 373, 379; (38) 24, 54, 417, 519; (47) 384; (52) 166

Så rat al-Tagh§bun (64): (16) 48, 57, 58, 397

Så rat al-TaÈrÊm (66): (1) 83; (3) 73; (5) 128; (6) 370; (10) 303; (11–12) 303

Så rat al-TakwÊr (81): (8–9) 297 Så rat al-•al§q (65): (1) 292

Så rat al-Tawba (9) 461, 490, 532–33; (5) 397, 402, 425, 445; (6) 430; (24) 477; (29) 397; (36) 371; (37) 276; (37) xliii; (40) 429, 430, 438, 442; (60) 44, 203, 212–213; (67) 366; (71) 366, 387, 388; (73) 397; (86) 481; (97) 179; (111) 453; (112) 387; (114) 86, 474, 475, 476; (121) 199; (124–25) 51

Så rat al-W§qi#a (56); (60) 408; (77–79) 120, 172; (77–80) 157–58; (79) 158;

(80) 152

Så rat al-Zalzala (99): (6–8) 340

Så rat al-Zukhruf (43): (3) 134, 149, 156, 161; (22) 470; (51) 450; (81) 433

Så rat al-Zumar (39): (1) 162; (23) 116, 123, 128–29, 162; (42) 118, 164; (47) 421; (65) 35

Så rat Gh§fir (40): (2) 162; (15) 165; (24) 383; (36) 383; (78) 399

Så rat H åd (11) 495; (1) 116, 123, 131; (6) 142; (7) 160, 161; (28) 386; (38) 307; (40) 369, 476; (45) 474, 476; (46) 476; (57) 153; (58) 52; (72) 288; (87) 367; (94) 52; (106–7) 13; (107) 450

Sår at Ibr§hÊm (14): (4) 477; (37) 371; (42) 422; (45) 319

Så rat Luqm§n (31): (12) 104; (13) 443;

(14) 38–39; (15) 382, 396; (17) 366; (20) 167; (22) 65; (25) 35

Sår at Maryam (19): (43) 88–89; (47)

Så rat MuÈammad (47) 357; (2) 51, 53, 60, 69; (3) 82; (4) 453; (6) 382; (15)

53; (19) 168; (22) 200; (38) 412

Så rat Nå È (71): (3) 334; (28) 38, 335

Sår at Q§f (50): (9) 152; (16) 403; (29) 370

Så rat Saba” (34): (3) 142; (26) 420; (31)

145; (50) 372

Så rat ‘§d (38): (1) 133; (72) 165

Sår at •§-H§” (20): (5) 161; (14) 433; (22) 299; (37–38) 57; (39) 307; (44) 136; (67) 411; (80) 152, 155; (82) 36; (115) 300; (118–19) 300; (120–21) 297; (121) 310, 374

Så rat Y§-SÊn (36): (12) 140, 141; (59) 32; (61) 36; (82) 138

Så rat Y ånus (10) 495; (15) 121, 135; (19) 470; (24) 308–309; (33) 430; (37) 117, 125, 130; (39) 146; (61) 142; (62) 468; (68) 492; (72–73) 24; (82) 118, 138, 430; (84) 30; (90) 24, 30; (99) 346, 363, 386, 438, 444; (105) 181; (107) 339; (108) 341

Sår at Yås uf (12) 142, 495; (1) 142; (2) 5, 88, 156, 162; (3) 141; (11) 460; (26–27) 403; (31) 196, 198; (38) 252; (39) 168; (40) 168; (65) 339; (100) 160; (101) 24, 30; (106) 35, 38; (111)

17, 87, 131 synonymity 6–9, 21, 27–28, 82, 115, 151, 294, 365, 425

Syria 362, 449, 523; inheritance laws

252; regional tradition in dress 324 Syria xxiii, xxiv, xxvii–xxviii

- abarÊ, MuÈammad b. JarÊr al- 301,

348–49

- abb§#, MuÈammad Sa#Êd al- xxvii tablet preserved (al-lawÈ al-maÈfå í) 7, 140, 142, 156, 159, 160, 514, 538 taboo, absolutely (al-Èar§m) 49–50, 90, 92, 271, 365, 377–81, 492, 541, 555; consensus 491–92; food 192–94; nahy and Èar§m 98–100, 365, 370–372,

492; types of marriage 191–92, 194 tafßÊl al-kit§b (explanation of the book) 125, 130–132, 162, 163, 539; summary 174–75 al-tafsÊr, traditional ix, xxxiii, xxxviii,

127

Taliban 395, 449

al-tanzÊl (objective revelation) xxxi, 150–155, 161–63, 495, 514, 543; alqur”§n 155–58, 161–63; umm al-kit§b

159–61, 162–63 al-tartÊl, method of 28, 513, 517, 544 al-tash§buh (assimilatability) xxxvi, xxxix,

4, 138, 140, 142, 143–44, 145, 148, 149 al-tauÈÊd 334; unity of Allah/God 17, 37–38, 95–97, 136, 334, 399, 556 Tawba, Gh§zÊ al- xxvi al-ta”wÊl xxxvi, xxxvi–xxxvii, 111, 127,

142, 147–50, 544 tax: al-isl§m and al-Êm§n 53–54, 68; alms see zak§h; jizya (head tax on free nonbelievers) 359–60; recipients of alms

44 telephone tapping 42 theft, penalty for 189–90, 196–201 Tibet 362

TÊzÊnÊ, •ayyib xxi, xxv

Torah 117, 143, 144, 145; Deuteronomy

379, 401; Exodus 401; Leviticus 401 trade transactions see business tripartite model see human existence tying and loosening (taqyÊd wa-iãl§q) 90,

94, 101–103 tyranny 337, 338, 343, 409, 431, 432, 446–47, 462–63; individualism 333; peaceful opposition 201; proscribing wrong 391–92

#Umar b. al-Khaãã§b 56, 335, 342, 343, 347, 362, 434, 489; interest 210; penalty for theft 189–90, 197 Umayyads 336, 343, 352, 377 umm al-kit§b (mother of the book) xxxvii– xxxviii, 73, 124, 125–26, 128, 132, 145, 148, 194, 537; al-inz§l and altanzÊl 159–61, 162–63; Allah/God’s spirit 166; determinism 169–73; fast (al-ßaum) 207, 488–89; messengerhood 73; nontextual structure xxxvi; subjectivity xxxv, 164; summary 173–75; theory of limits 191; verse

4:34 xli, xlvi; see also al-ijtih§d umma (community) 466, 467, 469–70, 473, 478, 479, 551; consensus of 426 unbelievers 27, 55, 444, 458–59; dif fer —

<right>

ent meaning given to k§fir ån 452–53,

</right>

454

United Kingdom xlviii, 479, 521, 532 United Nations 178, 362, 436 United States 337, 361–62, 521 unity of Allah/God see al-tauÈÊd universal ethics (al-furq§n al-#§mm) 36–42,

46–50 unseen, book of the (kit§b al-ghayb)

72–73 usury 209–14, 371, 374, 379 #Uthm§n b. #Aff§n 81, 395, 417, 489

vandalism 201 vows 378

al-wal§’ (likeness) see identities, political al-w§lid§n (birthgiver-parents) 9, 521–22, 553; bequests 231–32, 257; inheritance of ascendant members of family 249–53

Whitehead, Alfred North xxi–xxii, xxix, xxxiv wills see bequests witnessing, act of see al-shahÊd women xl, 61, 510–511, 517–18; al-nis§”, interpretation of see al-nis§”; ba#l/zawj (partner/conjugal husband) 287–89; childbirth 120, 173, 301, 409; debt contracts 195; defamation of 375–76; divorce 288–89, 290–292, 297; dress see dress requirements; failure to reevaluate situation of 219–24; fundamental principles 225; gender equality and verse 4:34 xl–xlvi; guardianship see al-qiw§ma; homosexuality, public 204–205; inheritance see inheritance; leadership see al-qiw§ma; limits and human legislation 224–25; menstruation 120, 173, 301, 303, 410; nushå z

<right>

273, 284–86, 287; obedience 283; occupations 320, 328; Paradise 327; polygyny see polygyny; pre-Islamic Arabia 297, 323–24; relationship with men 272–73; righteousness 303, 327; shuhad§” (sing shahÊd) 407; surrogate motherhood 381; taboos

</right>

49; voice 296, 325 worship of Allah/God (#ib§diyya) 432–34,

487, 552–53, 462 wrong see prescribing right, proscribing wrong

Y§fÊ, Na#Êm al- xxiii-xxiv Y§sÊn, MuÈammad ShafÊq xxiv yawning 49

al-zak§h (alms tax) 22, 24, 25, 53–54, 59, 66, 336, 548; al-isl§m and alÊm§n 53–54, 68; early history: refusal to pay 362; recipients 44, 211–214; theory of limits 93, 209–14

ZamakhsharÊ, Abå ’l-Q§sim MaÈmå d al- 339, 342–43, 347, 348, 380, 382, 414

£aw§hirÊ, Aim§n al- 352, 447, 448, 449,

532 zawj/ba#l (conjugal husband/partner) 287–89; female dress code 294, 310–311, 312, 321, 326

Zhiby§n, Nash”at MuÈammad Ri·§ xxvi zÊna, meaning of 288, 308–309, 312–13 zin§ (unchasteness) 206–208, see also sexual relations

Ziy§da, •§riq xxv Zoroastrianism 295 al-íulm (injustice) 441–45; see also justice

 Social, Economic and Political Studies of the Middle East and Asia

59. Skovgaard-Petersen, J. Defining Islam for the Egyptian State. Muftis and Fatwas of the Da[-]r al-Ifta[-]. 1997. ISBN 90 04 10947 1

60. Arnon, A. et al. The Palestinian Economy. Between Imposed Integration and Voluntary Separation.1997. ISBN 90 04 10538 7

61. Frank, A.J. Islamic Historiography and ‘Bulghar’ Identity among the Tatars and Bashkirs of Russia. 1998. ISBN 90 04 11021 6..

62. Heper, M. Ismet Inönü. The Making of a Turkish Statesman. 1998. ISBN 90 04 09919 0

63. Stiansen, E. and M. Kevane (eds.) Kordofan invaded. Peripheral Incorporation and Social Transformation in Islamic Africa. 1998. ISBN 90 04 11049 6

64. Firro, K.M. The Druzes in the Jewish State. A Brief History. 1999. ISBN 90 04 11251 0

65. Azarya, V., A. Breedveld and H. van Dijk (eds.). Pastoralists under Pressure? Fulbe Societies Confronting Change in West Africa. 1999. ISBN 90 04 11364 9

66. Qureshi, M. Naeem. Pan-Islam in British Indian Politics. A Study of the Khilafat Movement, 1918–1924. 1999. ISBN 90 04 11371 1

67. Ensel, R. Saints and Servants in Southern Morocco. 1999. ISBN 90 04 11429 7

68. Acar, F. and A. Günes-Ayata, Gender and Identity Construction. Women of Central Asia, the Caucasus and Turkey 2000. ISBN 90 04 11561 7

69. Masud, M.Kh. (ed.). Travellers in Faith. Studies of the TablÊghÊ Jam§#at as a Transnational Islamic Movement for Faith Renewal. 2000. ISBN 90 04 11622 2

70. Kansu, A. Politics in Post-Revolutionary Turkey, 1908–1913. 2000. ISBN 90 04 11587 0

71. Hafez, K. (ed.). The Islamic World and the West. An Introduction to Political Cultures and International Relations. 2000. ISBN 90 04 11651 6

72. Brunner, R. and W. Ende (eds.). The Twelver Shia in Modern Times. Religious Culture and Political History. 2001. ISBN 90 04 11803 9

73. Malik, J. (ed.). Perspectives of Mutual Encounters in South Asian History, 1760–1860. 2000. ISBN 90 04 11802 0

74. Ahmed, H. Islam in Nineteenth Century Wallo, Ethiopia. Revival, Reform and Reaction. 2001. ISBN 90 04 11909 4

75. Fischbach, M.R. State, Society and Land in Jordan. 2000. ISBN 90 04 11912 4

76. Karpat, K.H. (ed.). Ottoman Past and Today’s Turkey. 2000. ISBN 90 04 11562 5

77. Jahanbakhsh, F. Islam, Democracy and Religious Modernism in Iran (1953–2000). From B§zarg§n to Soroush. 2001. ISBN 90 04 11982 5

78. Federspiel, H.M. Islam and ideology in the emerging Indonesian state : The Persatuan Islam (PERSIS), 1923 to 1957. 2001. ISBN 90 04 12047 5

79. Saleh, F. Modern Trends in Islamic Theological Discourse in 20th Century Indonesia. A Critical Survey. 2001. ISBN 90 04 12305 9

80. Kü±ük, H. The Role of the Bekt§shÊs in Turkey’s National Struggle. 2002. ISBN 90 04 12443 8

81. Karpat, K.H. Studies on Ottoman Social and Political History. Selected Articles and Essays. 2002. ISBN 90 04 12101 3

82. Ali El-Dean, B. Privatisation and the Creation of a Market-Based Legal System. The Case of Egypt. 2002. ISBN 90 04 12580 9

83. Bos, M. van den. Mystic Regimes. Sufim and the State in Iran, from the late Qajar Era to the Islamic Republic. 2002. ISBN 90 04 12815 8

85. Carré, O. Mysticism and Politics. A Critical Reading of FÊ £il§l al-Qur”§n by Sayyid Quãb (1906–1966). 2003. ISBN 90 04 12590 6

86. Strohmeier, M. Crucial Images in the Presentation of a Kurdish National Identity. Heroes and Patriots, Traitors and Foes. 2003. ISBN 90 04 12584 1

87. Freitag, U. Indian Ocean Migrants and State Formation in Hadhramaut. Re form ing the Homeland. 2003. ISBN 90 0412850 6

88. White, P.J. and J. Jongerden (eds.). Turkey’s Alevi Enigma. A Comprehensive Overview. 2003. ISBN 90 04 12538 8

89. Kaschl, E. Dance and Authenticity in Israel and Palestine. Performing the Nation. 2003. ISBN 90 04 13238 4

90. Burr, J.M. and R.O. Collins, Revolutionary Sudan. Hasan al-Turabi and the Islamist State, 1989–2000. 2003. ISBN 90 04 13196 5

91. Brunner, R. Islamic Ecumenism in the 20th Century. The Azhar and Shiism between Rapprochement and Restraint. 2004. ISBN 90 04 12548 5

92. Gaspard, T.K. A Political Economy of Lebanon, 1948–2003. The Limits of Laissez-faire. 2004. ISBN 90 04 13259 7

93. Méouchy, N. and P. Sluglett (eds.). The British and French Mandates in Comp arative Perspectives /Les Mandats Français et Anglais dans une Perspective Comparative. 2004. ISBN 90 04 13313 5

94. Karpat, K.H. Studies on Turkish Politics and Society. Selected Articles and Essays. 2004. ISBN 90 04 13322 4

95. Salvatore, A. and D.F. Eickelman (eds.). Public Islam and the Common Good. 2004. ISBN 90 04 13621 5. Paperback 2006. ISBN 978 90 04 15622 7

96. Hollander, I. Jews and Muslims in Lower Yemen. A Study in Protection and Restraint, 1918–1949. 2005. ISBN 90 04 14012 3

97. Sedgwick, M. Saints and Sons, The Making and Remaking of the RashÊdi AÈmadi SufÊ Order, 1799–2000. 2005. ISBN 90 04 14013 1

98. Zachs, F. The Making of a Syrian Identity. Intellectuals and Merchants in Nineteenth Century Beirut. 2005. ISBN 90 04 14169 3

99. Wood, M. Official History in Modern Indonesia. New Order Perceptions and Counterviews. 2005. ISBN 90 04 14478 1

100. Krämer, G. and S. Schmidtke (eds.). Speaking for Islam. Religious Authorities in Muslim Societies. 2006. ISBN 978 90 04 14949 6

101. Abaza, M. The Changing Consumer Cultures of Modern Egypt. Cairo’s Urban Reshaping. 2006. ISBN 978 90 04 15277 9

102. Jongerden, J. The Settlement Issue in Turkey and the Kurds. An Analysis of Spatial Policies, Modernity and War. 2007. ISBN 978 90 04 15557 2

103. Naguib, N. and I.M. Okkenhaug (eds.). Interpreting Welfare and Relief in the Middle East. 2008. ISBN 978 90 04 16436 9

104. Schumann, C. (ed.). Liberal Thought in the Eastern Mediterranean. Late 19th Century until the 1960s. 2008. ISBN 978 90 04 16548 9

105. Hatina, M. (ed.). Guardians of Faith in Modern Times: #Ulama” in the Middle East. 2009. ISBN 978 90 04 16953 1

106. Christmann, A. (Translated, Edited, and with an Introduction by). The Qur’an, Morality and Critical Reason. The Essential Muhammad Shahrur. 2009. ISBN 978 90 04 17103 9

107. Abushouk, A.I and H.A. Ibrahim (eds.). The Hadhrami Diaspora in Southeast Asia. Identity Maintenance or Assimilation? 2009. ISBN 978 90 04 17231 9

[[m-s-muhammad-shahrur-the-qur-an-morality-and-criti-4.png]]

[[m-s-muhammad-shahrur-the-qur-an-morality-and-criti-3.png]]

[[m-s-muhammad-shahrur-the-qur-an-morality-and-criti-2.png]]

[1] MuÈammad ShaÈrår, Al-Kit§b wa’l-qur”§n—Qir§“a mu#§ßira (The Book and the Qur’an: A Contemporary Reading), (Damascus: D§r a l-Ah§lÊ li’l-Nashr wa’l-TawzÊ#, 1990).

[2] Peter Clarke, “The ShaÈrår Phenomenon: A Liberal Islamic Voice from Syria,” Islam and Christian-Muslim Relations 7, no. 3 (1996): 337–41 (337).

[3] Wael Hallaq, A History of Islamic Legal Theories: An Introduction to SunnÊ uß§l al-fiqh (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1999), 246.

[4] Dale F. Eickelman, The Coming Transformation of the Muslim World. The 1999 Templeton Lecture on Religion and World Affairs (June 9, 1999).

[5] Shahrur wrote his second book in 1994, entitled Dir§s§t isl§miyya mu#§ßira fi’l-dawla wa’l-mujtama# (Contemporary Islamic Studies on State and Society), in which he applies his methodology and the evolutionary philosophy of human knowledge, as developed in A l-Kit§b wa’l-qur”§n, to the sphere of Islamic politics, arguing for the need drastically to revise its traditional understanding. In 1996, he wrote a l-Isl§m wa’l-^m§n (Islam and Faith), and finally, in 2000, he published NaÈw uß§l jadÊda li’l-fiqh al-isl§mÊ (Towards New Foundations of Islamic Jurisprudence), in which he presents a more systematized and considered version of his Èudåd theory from Al-Kit§b, applied to Islamic family law and law of inheritance. He also gives a clearer account of his views about the historicity of the Prophetic Sunna, which he takes as the starting point to revolutionize Islamic fiqh.

[6] MuÈammad ShaÈrår, TajfÊf man§bi# al-irh§b (Draining the Sources of Terrorism), (Damascus: D§r al-Ah§lÊ li’l-Nashr wa’l-TawzÊ#, 2008).

[7] Dale F. Eickelman, “Muhammad Shahrur and the Printed Word,” ISIM Newsletter 7 (2001): 7.

[8] Rainer Nabielek, “Muhammad Shahrur, ein ‘Martin Luther’ des Islam,” inamo 23/24, no. 6 (Autumn and Winter 2000): 73–74, and Dale F. Eickelman, “Inside the Islamic Reformation,” Wilson Quarterly (Winter 1998): 86.

[9] The full transcript of the interview can be found in this volume on pages 501–523.

[10] Ibid, 504–505, and 508.

[11] Alfred N. Whitehead, Science in the Modern World (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1926). Whitehead’s dictum that “the progress of science must result in the unceasing modification of religious thought, to the great advantage of religion” (p. 264) could indeed serve as Shahrur’s own philosophical credo.

[12] Despite the fact that Whitehead only confessed a modest indebtedness to the nineteenth-century school of German philosophy, its influences, in particular of G. F. Hegel, have been unambiguously established by Whiteheadian scholars: see George R. Jr. Lucas, ed., Hegel and Whitehead: Contemporary Perspectives on Systematic Philosophy (Albany: State University of New York Press, 1986).

[13] Interview, 514–515.

[14] MuÈammad ‘ayy§È al-Ma#arr§wiyya, al-M§rksl§miyya wa’l-qur”§n, aw: al-b§Èithån #an #im§ma li-D§rwin wa-M§rks wa-zawjat al-nu#m§n: “qir§“a fÊ da#w§ al-mu#§ßira” (Marx-Islamism and the Qur’an, or; The Seekers of a Turban for Darwin, Marx, and Nu#m§n’s wife—“A Study of the Call for Modernity”), (n.p., 2000).

[15] See, for example, Sheikh a l-BåãÊ’s publications in the 1990s after the release of Al-Kit§b, in which al-BåãÊ extensively argues against secularism, historicism, and feminism etc., which he condemns as alien to the Islamic tradition, referring indirectly to the debate which Al-Kit§b has initiated. This is to be seen in particular in: Yugh§liãånak idh yaqålån…uslåb Èiw§rÊ yakshif #an mugh§laã§t khaãÊra fÊ maw·å#§t h§ma (They Deceive you when they are talking…A Dialogical Method that makes Evident the Dangerous Swindles with regards to Important Topics), 2nd ed., (Damascus, 2000); a l-Mar”ah bayna tughy§n a l-nií§m a l-gharbÊ wa-laã§“if a l-tashri# a l-rabb§nÊ (Women between the Tyranny of the Western System and the Mercy of the Divine Law), (Damascus, 1996); al-TaghyÊr: Mafhåmuhu wa-ãar§“iquhu (Change: Its Concept and its Methods), (Damascus, 1996); H§dhihi mushkil§tuhum (Such are their Problems), (Damascus, 1990—new ed. 1992); al-Isl§m wa’l-#aßr: TaÈadiy§t wa-§f§q (Islam and the Modern Age: Challenges and Horizons), (Damascus, 1998).

[16] Kh§lid #Abd al-RaÈm§n al-#Akk, al-Furq§n wa’l-qur”§n: qir§“at isl§miyya mu#§ßira ·imn al-thaw§bit al-#ilmiyya wa’l-·aw§biã al-manhajiyya; wa-hiyya muqaddim§t li’l-tafsÊr al-#ilmÊ li’l-qur”§n al-karÊm (The Furqan and the Qur’an: A Contemporary Islamic Reading within the well-established Scholarly Principles and Methodological Rules which are the Premises of a Scholarly Exegesis of the Noble Qur’an), (Damascus: \ikma, 1994), 64.

[17] Na#Êm al-Y§fÊ, “ al-Qur”§n wa’l-Kit§b [sic]: Qir§“a Mu#§ßira,” Al-Usbå# Al-AdabÊ 247 (January 1991): 3.

[18] MuÈammad Sa#Êd Rama·§n al-BåãÊ, “ al-Khalfiyya al-Yahådiyya li-shi#§r qir§“a mu#§ßira,” (The Jewish Origins of the Call for a Contemporary Reading) Nahj al-Isl§m 42 (December 1990): 17–21 (17).

[19] ShawqÊ Abå KhalÊl, “Taq§ãu#§t khaãÊra fÊ darb a l-qir§”§t a l-mu#§ßira” (Dangerous Crossings on the Path of Contemporary Readings) Nahj al-Isl§m 43 (March 1991): 17–21. One year earlier, in 1990, he had already published a little booklet titled Qir§#a #ilmiyya li’l-qir§”§t al-mu#§ßira (A Critical Reading of the ‘Contemporary Readings’), (Damascus/Beirut: D§r al-Fikr 1990), in which he attacked ‘contemporary readings’ of the Qur’an as a form of warfare against the religion of Islam, without specifically mentioning Al-Kit§b.

[20] MuÈammad ShafÊq Y§sÊn, 1. “Qir§“a naqdiyya fÊ mu”allaf ‘al-Kit§b wa’lQur”§n’” (A Critical Reading of the Book ‘The Book and the Qur’an’”; 2. “Qir§“a naqdiyya fÊ mu”allaf ‘al-Kit§b wa’l-Qur”§n’— al-Maw·å# al-th§nÊ: al-Èudåd fi’lisl§m” (A Critical Reading of the Book ‘The Book and the Qur’an’—the Second Topic: The \udåd Limits in Islam); 3. “Qir§“a naqdiyya fÊ mu”allaf ‘al-Kit§b wa’l-Qur”§n’—a l-Maw·å# a l-th§lith: a l-sunna” (A Critical Reading of the Book ‘The Book and the Qur’an’—the Third Topic: The Sunna) Nahj al-Isl§m 46 (December 1991): 35–43; 47 (March 1992): 136–44; 48 (June 1992): 84–95; 4. “Qir§“a naqdÊya fÊ mu”allaf #al-Kit§b wa’l-Qur”§n”—al-Mau·å# al-r§bi#: qa·§y§ fi’l-#aqÊda (A Critical Reading of the Book ‘The Book and the Qur’an’—the Fourth Topic: Problems of Doctrine) Nahj al-Isl§m 49 (September 1992); 5. “Qir§“a naqdÊya fÊ mu”allaf ‘al-Kit§b wa’l-Qur”§n’—a l-Mau·å# a l-kh§mis: qa·§y§ fi’l-fikr (A Critical Reading of the Book ‘The Book and the Qur’an’—the Fifth Topic: Problems of Thinking) Nahj a l-Isl§m 50 (December 1992).

[21] SalÊm a l-J§bÊ, a l-Qir§“a a l-mu#§ßira li-Duktår MuÈammad ShaÈrår: Mujarrad tanjÊm— kadhaba a l-munajjimån wa-law ßadaqå (The Contemporary Reading of Dr. Muhammad Shahrur: Pure Astrology—Astrologers Lied Even If They [Spoke] Sincerely), (Damascus: Ak§d, 1991).

[22] Isl§mbålÊ, MuÈammad Haytham. al-Radd #al§ al-Duktår ShaÈrår fÊ mas’alat lib§s al-mar”a (Refutation of Dr. Shahrour with regards to the Issue of Women’s Dress), (Damascus: D§r al-#Ilm, 1992—2nd ed., 1994).

[23] Naßr \§mid Abå Zayd, “Lim§dha ãaghat al-talfÊqiyya #al§ kathÊr min mashrå#§t tajdÊd a l-isl§m,” (Why have Patch-ups come to dominate so many Projects on the Renewal of Islam?) Al-Hil§l (October 1991): 17–27; “a l-Manhaj a l-naf#Ê fÊ fahm al-nußåß al-dÊniyya,” (The Utilitarian Method in the Understanding of Religious Texts) Al-Hil§l (March 1992).

[24] Tayyib •ÊzÊnÊ, “FÊ mun§qashatihi li’l-isl§m wa-mushkilat a l-taqaddum al-ijtim§#Ê” (About his Discussion of Islam and the Problem of Social Progress) Al-Usbå# al-adabÊ (The Magazine of the Arab Writers’ Organization—al-IttiÈ§d al-Kutt§b al-#Arab), no. 204 (1990): 12.

[25] •§riq Ziy§da, “•ar§fa fi’l-taqsÊm wa-ghar§ba fi’l-ta”wÊl” (Strange Division and Grotesque Interpretation) Al-N§qid 45 (March 1992): 57–60.

[26] #AlÊ NåÈ, “Al-Kit§b wa’l-Qur”§n, Mu”allifuhu: MuÈammad Shahrår—Qir§“a #ilmiyya: #aßriyya am m§·awiyya,” (‘The Book and the Qur’an’, its Author: Muhammad Shahrur—A Critical Reading: [Is is] Modern or Pre-Modern?) Al-Fikr al-#ArabÊ 4 (Summer 1994): 192–209.

[27] M§hir al-Munajjid, al-Ishk§liyya a l-manhajiyya fÊ #Al-Kit§b wa’l-qur”§n’—Dir§sa naqdiyya (Methodological Problems in ‘The Book and the Qur’an’—A Critical Investigation), (Damascus/Beirut: D§r a l-Fikr, 1994). See also his review “Mun§qashat al-ishk§liyya al-manhajiyya fi’l-Kit§b wa’l-Qur”§n,” #$lam al-Fikr (1993): 162.

[28] Yåsuf al-‘ayd§wÊ, Bai·at al-dÊk: Naqd lughawÊ li-kit§b ‘al-Kit§b wa’l-qur”§n’ (The Egg of a Rooster: A Linguistic Critique of the Book ‘The Book and the Qur’an’), (Damascus: al-Maãba#a al-Ta#§wunÊya, 1993); Nash”at MuÈammad Ri·§ Zhiby§n, Dh§k radd?!! #An qir§“a mu#§ßira li’l-kit§b wa’l-qur”§n (That Is a Refutation?!!—About the Contemporary Reading of the Book and the Qur’an), (Damascus: D§r Qutayba, 1992).

[29] MuÈammad FarÊz ManfÊkhÊ, TaqwÊm #ilmÊ li-kit§b “ al-Kit§b wa’l-qur”§n” (A Critical Assessment of the Book ‘The Book and the Qur’an’), (Beirut: D§r al-RashÊd, 1993).

[30] Ma”mån al-JawÊj§tÊ, al-Ußuß al-kh§sira li’l-qir§“a al-mu#§ßira (The Corrupt Foundations of the ‘Contemporary Reading’), 2nd ed., (Limassol: A l-Jaffan & A l-Jabi, 1993); Jaw§d Mås§ MuÈammad #Aff§na, al-Qur”§n wa-awh§m al-qir§“a al-mu#§ßira— Radd #ilmÊ sh§milÊ #al§ kit§b: ‘al-Kit§b wa’l-qur”§n: qir§“a mu#§ßira’ (The Qur’an and the Delusions of Contemporary Reading—A Comprehensive Critical Rejection of ‘The Book and the Qur’an: A Contemporary Reading’), (Amman: D§r al-BashÊr, 1994).

[31] AÈmad #Imr§n, al-Qir§“a al-mu#§ßira li’l-Qur”§n fi’l-mÊz§n (An Impartial Review of ‘The Contemporary Reading of the Qur’an’), (Beirut: D§r al-Naq§sh, 1995).

[32] BashÊr #$nÊ, “MuÈammad ShaÈrår: Manhaj fi’l-qir§“a al-mu#§ßira,” (Muhammad Shahrur: A Method in Contemporary Reading) Dir§s§t Ishtir§kiyya 164/65 (1996): 46–54; Gh§zÊ al-Tawba, “Duktår ShaÈrår yulawwi a”n§q al-nußåß li’l-ajr§d ghayr #ilmiyya wa-taftaqir il§’l-bar§“a,” (Dr. Shahrur Distorts the Texts Ignorantly and with no Authority) al-Mujtama#, no. 1301 (May 26, 1998).

[33] MunÊr MuÈammad •§hir al-Shaww§f, Tah§fut al-dir§s§t al-mu#§ßira fi’l-dawla wa’l-mujtama# (Refutation of Contemporary Studies on State and Society), (Beirut, 1993), (Riy§dh: D§r al-Shaww§f, 1995), also published as: Tah§fut al-dir§s§t al-mu#§ßira (Limassol: D§r al-Shaww§f, 1994).

[34] al-Munajjid, al-Ishk§liyya, 11.

[35] Most vividly: MuÈammad Sa#Êd al-•abb§#, Ris§la…wa-Radd il§ dh§k al-rajul (A Message…and A Refutation for that Man), (Damascus: Maãba#at al-‘ubul, n.d). Compare this to similar responses in Egypt after the publication of a series of articles on the Qur’an (“MuÈ§wala li-fahm #aßrÊ li’l-qur”§n”) by Mußãaf§ MaÈmåd in the magazine ‘ab§È al-Khayr, see: J. J. G. Jansen, “Polemics on Mustafa Mahmud’s Koran Exegesis,” in Proceedings of the Ninth Congress of the Union Européenne des Arabisants et Islamists (1978), ed. R. Peters, 110–22 (Leiden: Brill, 1981).

[36] #Abd al-RaÈm§n \asan \abannaka al-Mayd§nÊ, al-TaÈrÊf al-mu#§ßir fi'l-dÊn: Tasallul fi'l-anf§q ba#d al-suqåã fi'l-a#m§q—makÊda al-m§rksiyya wa'l-b§ãiniyya al-mu#§ßira taÈt shi#§r qir§"at mu#§ßira li'l-nußåß al-isl§miyya (The Contemporary Deviation from Religion: The Infiltration into Tunnels after going Underground—The Conspiracy of Marxism and of the Contemporary Batiniyya Sect with the Slogan of a Contemporary Reading of the Islamic Texts), (Damascus: D§r al-Qalam, 1997).

[37] This summary of the Shahrur controversy is a shortened version of the account published in: Andreas Christmann, "73 Proofs of Dilettantism: The Construction of Norm and Deviancy in the Responses to 'al-Kit§b wa'l-Qur"§n: Qir§"a Mu#§ßira' by Mohamad Shahrour," Die Welt des Islam 45, no. 1 (2005): 20–73.

[38] Interview, 518.

[39] For a good survey, see David Greenwood, Structuralism and the Biblical Text (Berlin: Mouton Publishers, 1985).

[40] With the exception of Izutsu, structuralism never made a big impression in non-Muslim studies of the Qur'an either. While traditionally the historica l-critical (and hence diachronic) method dominated the field, a more recent trend to study the Qur'an (synchronically) as literary text has not shown any inclination to apply linguistic or philosophical structuralism. For Izutsu, see Toshihiko Izutsu, God and Men in the Koran: Semantics of the Koranic Weltanschauung (Keio Institute of Cultural and Linguistic Studies, 1964); Ethico-religious Concepts in the Qur'an: The Structure of the Ethical Terms in the Koran (Montreal: McGill University Press, 1966).

[41] A. N. Whitehead and Bertrand Russell. Principia Mathematica (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, vol. 1, 1910; vol. 2, 1912; vol. 3, 1913).

[42] Bertrand Russell, Introduction to Mathematical Philosophy (London: Allen & Unwin, 1919).

[43] Greenwood, Structuralism, 6.

[44] Interview, 512–513.

[45] A common translation in English would be “Men are in charge of women, because Allah has made some of them excel over the others, and because they spend some of their wealth. Hence righteous women are obedient, guarding the unseen which Allah has guarded. As for those of them that you fear might rebel, admonish them and abandon them in their beds and beat them. Should they obey you, do not seek a way of harming them; for Allah is Sublime and Great!” Translation by Majid Fakhry, An Interpretation of the Qur’an: English Translation of the Meanings (New York: New York University Press, 2000).

[46] Chapter 5 in this book, pp. 279–280.

[47] Asma Barlas, “Believing Women” in Islam: Unreading Patriarchal Interpretations of the Qur”§n (Karachi: Sama, 2004), 186.

[48] #$“isha#Abd al-RaÈm§n, Al-Mafhåm al-isl§mÊ li’l-taÈrÊr al-mar”ah (Khartoum: J§mi#at Umm Durm§n, 1967), 12.

[49] Barlas, “Believing Women”, 187.

[50] Amina Wadud-Muhsin, Qur’an and Women (Kuala Lumpur: Penerbit Fajar Bakti, 1992), 72.

[51] Wadud-Muhsin, Qur’an and Women, 73.

[52] Aziza A l-Hibri, “A Story of Islamic Herstory: Or How did We ever get into this Mess?,” Women and Islam: Women’s Studies International Forum Magazine 5, no. 2 (1982): 207–19 (217).

[53] Aziza a l-Hibri, “Islam, Law and Custom: Re-defining Muslim Women’s Rights,” In Women and Islam, ed. Aziza a l-Hibri, 32 (Oxford: Pergamon Press, 1997)—an argument that slightly contradicts her earlier one published in 1982, see previous footnote.

[54] Barlas, “Believing Women”, 188.

[55] Wadud-Muhsin, Qur’an and Women, 76–77.

[56] Ibid.

[57] Murad Hofmann, Islam: The Alternative (Reading: Garnet Publishing, 1993), 141.

[58] Riffat Hassan, “An Islamic Perspective,” In Sexuality: A Reader, ed. Karen Le bacqz, 355–56 (Cleveland: Pilgrim Press, 1999).

[59] Hadia Mubarak, “Breaking the Interpretive Monopoly: A Re-Examination of Verse 4:34,” Hawwa 2, no. 3 (2004): 261–89 (284–85).

[60] Dahlia Eissa, “Constructing the Notion of Male Superiority over Women in Islam: The Influence of Sex and Gender Stereotyping in the Interpretation of the Qur’an and the Implications for a Modernist Exegesis of Rights.” WLUML Occasional Paper, no. 11 (November 1999): 45.

[61] Verse 4:128 is then understood to be paired with 4:34 and to be read as follows: “If a woman fears lack of respect and loss of good leadership on her male partner’s part (married or not), she should strongly object to this and be firm in her protest, aiming for an amicable agreement between them, for such an agreement is best, even though men’s souls are swayed by greed (that is, lack of self-criticism). But if you do good and practice self-restraint, God is well-acquainted with all that you do”.

[62] The transliterated Arabic letter (ß) stands for: ßall§ All§h #alayhi wa-sallam (God bless him and grant him salvation!) by which Muhammad Shahrur [henceforth he will be referred to as MS] adopts the standard eulogy applied when the name of the Prophet MuÈammad is mentioned; (r) stands for: ra·iyya All§h #anhu (May God be pleased with him!), which MS occasionally employs as a eulogy for the prophets that came before MuÈammad.

[63] The English term ‘God’ and the transliterated Arabic term ‘Allah’ will be used interchangeably for the Arabic word الله . The aim of using these terms interchangeably is to avoid perceiving الله as primarily the God of the Arabs or Muslims (if only ‘Allah’ were used) or as ‘God’ of the Judeo-Christian tradition with all its specific (Biblical) connotations (if only ‘God’ were used). For MS, الله is the indeterminable, nontemporal, nonspatial and nonreducible entity of mere creativity and objective existentiality that is, philosophically and epistemologically, a wider category than the traditional categories of either ‘Allah’ or ‘God’.

[64] MS does not use the term a l-qur”§n because, as it will be fully explained in chapter 3, al-qur”§n constitutes only one subunit of Allah’s Book, not the entire revelation. Instead, he uses the term al-kit§b, translated as ‘the Book’ (written in italics and with capital initial letter), which contains both alqur”§n and the other parts of Allah’s revelation. When the author refers to the conventional understanding of the Qur’an (i.e., the entire Book), the term is capitalized and not italicized in order to distinguish it from al-qur”§n as MS defines it. The same rule will apply for other terms that are differently interpreted by MS, e.g., al-isl§m ↔ Islam; al-Êm§n ↔ Iman; sunna ↔ Sunna; a l-shah§da ↔ Shahada; a l-zak§h ↔ Zakah, while in other cases different spelling + translation indicates a departure from the conventional rendering of the terms, e.g., Muslim-Assenters for al-muslimån or Muslim-Believers for al-mu”minån. For further clarifications on the different understanding of the Qur’anic terms, see the Glossary of Terms and Concepts.

[65] References to the Qur’an will normally include the full name of the såra, its number and the number of the verse that is quoted. If the name of the såra has already been given or is mentioned in a footnote, a shorter version is used that only cites the number of the såra followed by the number of the verse, e.g., 33:35.

[66] #Abd al-Q§hir Ibn #Abd al-RaÈm§n al-Jurj§nÊ, Kit§b asr§r al-bal§gha, ed., Hellmut Ritter (Istanbul: Maãba#at Wiz§rat al-Ma#§rif, 1954), 3.

[67] Ibn AÈmad al-Far§hÊdÊ al-KhalÊl (d. 175/791), was one of the earliest Arab grammarians. He was also a lexicographer and phonologist who belonged, like SÊbawayh (his pupil), to the Baßra School of Arabic grammar. With his other pupil Layth b. al-Muíaffar he compiled the first dictionary of the Arabic language called Kit§b al-#Ain (the Book of #Ain—because it begins with the letter #Ain). His methodology, which was to exemplify his entries with references to Arabic poetry, became the standard method in Arabic lexicography for many centuries.

[68] #Amr b. #Uthm§n SÊbawayh (d. 177/793), was a philologist and grammarian from the Iranian province of Fars who belonged to the so-called Baßra School of Arabic grammar. His only work, al-Kit§b, is a compendium of Arabic grammar that he compiled from the texts of the Qur’an and the ÈadÊths of the Prophet aiming at deducing the rules of the Arabic language from the way Arabic was used in those two sources. It has been the standard work of Arabic grammar for many centuries in spite of the fact that it was severely criticized for its often flawed methodology and implausible conclusions.

[69] Abå #AlÊ a l-F§risÊ (d. 377/987) was a grammarian and lexicographer from Iran but lived most of his life in Baghdad. His teachers were Ibn a l-Sarr§j and a l-Zajj§j, while he himself became the teacher of the famous grammarian Ibn JinnÊ. His most significant book, al-^·§È fi’l-naÈw wa’l-takmila, is a compendium of Arabic grammar and rhetoric that has been the subject of numerous commentaries.

[70] Abå ’l-FatÈ #Uthm§n Ibn JinnÊ (d. 392/1002) was a grammarian from Baßra, a pupil of al-F§risÊ, and befriended the poet al-MutanabbÊ. He is the author of several books on Arabic grammar and rhetoric, e.g., Sirr ßin§#at al-i#r§b, al-Khaß§“iß or al-Munßif. He wrote a commentary on the DÊw§n of a l-MutanabbÊ and of Ibn Aws al-T§“Ê (al-\am§sa).

[71] #Abd al-Q§hir Ibn #Abd al-RaÈm§n al-Jurj§nÊ (d. 470/1078) is a well-known linguist and rhetorician who wrote seminal books such as al-#Aw§mil al-mi”a, Kit§b asr§r al-bal§gha, and Dal§“il al-i#j§z.

[72] ‘H§dh§n[i] khaßm§n[i] ikhtaßamå fÊ rabbihim…’ (Al-\ajj 22:19); according to the rules of Arabic grammar (about congruence in gender and number) it should be as follows: ‘H§dh§n[i] khaßm§n[i] ikhtaßam§ fÊ rabbihim…’.

[73] See also: ‘And in the earth are plots adjoining each other and gardens of vines, tillage and palm trees, from one or different roots, which are irrigated by the same water…’ (Al-Ra#d 13:4, MF)

[74] [Italics as in the Arabic text.] MS explains in a footnote that to know the outcome of an act beforehand, before the act has been carried out, would mean that Allah can work Himself through history from the end towards the beginning, against the flow of history, regressing in time. But this is, according to MS, a logical impossibility, since even God has to obey the law of evolution and progressing of time. The im§m mubÊn, says MS, stores the events in history in a kind of historical archive, but nowhere are future events and developments recorded. Acts are not predetermined, only determined after they have been done. Strictly speaking, the notion of the divine predestination of human acts and events in nature and society contradicts Allah's objective law of existence and is, hence, to be rejected both theologically and empirically.

[75] MS's definition of the term al-qur"§n is different from the definition of the term al-kit§b. Whereas in traditional tafsÊr both terms refer more or less synonymously to the Qur'an—the holy scripture as we understand it—he differentiates al-qur"§n from a l-kit§b. In his arrangement a l-kit§b is the generic term (ism #§mm) which stands for the whole content of the written copy (al-mußÈaf), beginning with al-F§tiÈa and ending with Sårat al-N§s, while al-qur"§n is the more specific term (ism kh§ßß) that comprises only one part of al-kit§b. Hence, what we normally describe as Qur'an (the entire copy of all chapters) should be defined as al-kit§b, the Book, which is henceforth written in italics and with a capitalised initial letter in order to distinguish it from other books that the Book also contains. The exact definition of this term and its difference from al-qur"§n is given in chapter 3.

[76] 'For Muslim men and women [al-muslimÊn wa'l-muslim§t] [and] for believing men and women [al-mu"minÊn wa'l-mu"min§t]' (Al-AÈz§b 33:35); MF: 'men and women who have submitted'; MP: 'men who surrender to Allah, and women who surrender'; AH: 'for men and women who are devoted to God'; AhA: 'men and women who have come to submission'; AA: 'men and women who have surrendered'; AB: 'men and women who are Muslims'.

[77] ‘The desert Arabs say, “We have faith [amann§].” [Prophet], tell them, “You do not have faith [lam tu”minå]. What you should say instead, ‘We have submitted [aslamn§],’ for faith [al-Êm§n] has not yet entered your hearts’ (A l-\ujur§t 49:14, AH).

[78] ‘Abraham was not a Jew nor yet a Christian, but he was upright, and bowed his will to Allah’s (ÈanÊf [an] muslim[an])’ (Al-Jinn 72:14); see also $l #Imr§n 3:52, 67; Al-Baqara 2:132; Yåsuf 12:101; Al-A#r§f 7:126; Yånus 10:90; Yånus 10:72–73; Al-Dh§riyy§t 51:35–36; Al-Nis§” 4:103; Al-Baqara 2:110; Al-Når 24:56; Al-Baqara 2:185.

[79] ‘For such prayers are enjoined on believers (al-mu”minÊn) at stated times’ (Al-Nis§” 4:103); see also Al-Baqara 2:110, 183, 185; Al-Når 24:56.

[80] ‘Those who believe, and emigrate, and fight for the faith, in the cause of Allah; as well as those who give (them) asylum and aid,—these are (all) in very truth the believers: for them is forgiveness of sins and a provision most generous.’ (Al-Anf§l 8:64); see also A l-\ujur§t 49:15; A l-Baqara 2:178, 216; A l-Shår§ 42:38; A l-M§“ida 5:1; Al-Isr§” 17:34–37; Al-Når 24:27.

[81] ‘And you love wealth with a passion’ (A l-Fajr 89:20, AH); see also A l-Baqara 2:177; Al-\adÊd 57:20; Al-Ma#§rij 70:19–20.

[82] MS distinguishes between verses that are ambiguous (mutash§biha), designating verses relating to prophethood; and those that are definite (muÈkama), the verses relating to messengerhood. These are supplemented by verses that are neither fully definite nor fully ambiguous. The ambiguous verses represent what MS calls a l-Èaqq: the objective sources of existence, inasmuch as they are the general, absolute, and eternal laws of the universe, unaltered since the creation of the world, but for the first time revealed in a human (Arabic) language. The definite verses designate al-sulåk: guidance for human attitude and specific rules of social behaviour. They are not part of al-Èaqq. The distinction between ambiguous and definite verses is fully explained in chapter 3, but it is already clear from this that MS departs from the conventional exegetical understanding of ‘ambiguous’ and ‘definite’, in which the latter refers to divine commands that are universal and never change, and the former refers to commands that are limited and do change. In this understanding, the muÈkama verses contain the basic commandments, shared by all religions, while the mutash§biha verses contain the practical aspects of these commandents and may vary from one religion to another (Encyclopaedia of the Qur’an, s.v. “Ambiguous.” (L. Kinberg), 70–77). In MS’s interpretation it is exactly the opposite.

[83] MS understands the current phenomenon of al-ßaÈwa al-isl§miyya, represented by the diverse streams of contemporary Islamism, as consisting of the following aspects: a) obsessive focus on ritualism (veiling, fasting, and pilgrimage), b) veneration of the sal§f forefathers, and c) exclusion of an ethical discourse and hatred of the West and everything non-Islamic. His own concept of al-ßaÈwa al-isl§miyya is meant to reverse the current Islamist agenda and advance an ethical ‘awakening’ that emphasises morality against a rigid ritualism; see the conclusion of this chapter and also chapters 2 and 6.

[84] E.g., jazama: ‘to cut off’ and ‘to give an apodictic judgement’; jarama: ‘to cut off’ and ‘to commit an offence, crime’; jazza: ‘to cut off’ and ‘to clip, shear’; Èazza: ‘to cut’ and ‘to incise, indent’; batta: ‘to cut off’ and ‘to decide, settle’; qaãåa: ‘to cut’ and ‘to trim, shorten’; batara: ‘to cut off’ and ‘to amputate, mutilate’; shaãara: ‘to cut off’ and ‘to halve, bisect’; qaãa#: ‘to cut off’ and ‘to separate, disjoin, interrupt’. The additional meanings of these words have been highlighted by the underlined and because, according to MS, these additional or indirect meanings make them unique and different to those terms with which they share the common or direct meaning of ‘to cut (off)’.

[85] This term is conventionally understood as a Qur’anic self-reference (Al-Muz zammil 73:4 says: “Or a little more; recite the Qur’an slowly and distinctly [tartÊl[an]]”, AH), urging readers of the Qur’an to perform a ‘measured recitation’. In contrast, MS interprets wa-rattil a l-qur”§n tartÊlan as Allah’s request to group together the many different subject themes (maw·å#§t) that are scattered throughout the entire Book and to create a logical order or meaningful sequence (tartÊl) which allows a proper interpretation of a specific theme or topic. Ambros translates the verbal root r-t-l as “to arrange s.th. in good order” (Ambros, Dictionary, 108) which exactly renders MS’s literal understanding of the term tartÊl.

[86] Al-r§sikhån fi’l-#ilm: the term does not refer, as it is commonly understood, to the most learned and devout among the #ulam§” and fuqah§” but, according to MS, to scholars and philosophers (religious or not) who occupy the most eminent place in society because of their exceptional knowledge and expertise.

[87] ‘They replied: “We shall worship your God and the God of your fathers, Abraham, Ishmael, and Isaac, one single God: we devote ourselves to Him (wa-naÈnu lahu muslimån).’ (Al-Baqara 2:133, AH; also 2:62, 112,128); see also Al-Naml 27:44,91; Yåsuf 12:101; Yånus 10:84,90; $l #Imr§n 3:52; Fußßilat 41:33; Al-Anbiy§” 21:108; Al-Nis§” 4:125; Al-M§“ida 5:44.

[88] MF: ‘one of those who submit’; AB: ‘one of the Muslims’; AA: ‘of them that surrender’; AhA: ‘of the obedient’; AH: ‘one of those devoted to God’; MP: ‘of those who surrender’; closest to MS is AH because it does not keep the notion of total surrender (passive servitude) that MS wants to avoid, hence his ‘those who assent to God’, which reflects an active, conscious, emancipated, and enlightened decision to believe in God’s existence.

[89] MS interprets a l-ß§bi”Ên not as a specific religious group (e.g., the Manichaeans, as proposed by Bellamy in JAOS 116 (1996)) or sect (‘most commonly they are assumed to be a group called after their baptismal practices, bearing a name derived from Aramaic’ (Ambros, Dictionary, 309)), but as a generic term, used by the text in order to refer to any other religious community that does not belong to Judaism, Christianity, or Islam.

[90] No translation captures the meanings that MS intended; e.g. mujrimån: MP: ‘the guilty’; AH: ‘those who do evil’; AhA: ‘those who are culpable’; AA: ‘the sinners’; AB: ‘the evildoers’; MF: ‘who are criminals’, although MS would accept MF’s rendering as ‘criminals’, since the term has acquired this meaning in modern Standard Arabic; see further below.

[91] ‘The guilty (a l-mujrimån) will be known by their mark and will be seized by their foreheads and their feet. Which, then, of your Lord’s blessings do you both deny? This is the Hell the guilty (a l-mujrimån) deny…’ (A l-RaÈm§n 55:41–43, AH); see also Y§-SÊn 36:59; Al-Råm 30:12; Al-Naml 27:69; Al-Mursal§t 77:18–19. For even more details about the Mujrimån see A l-MuãaffifÊn 83:29; A l-Qaßaß 28:78; A l-Qalam 68:44; Al-\ijr 15:95; Al-Muddaththir 74:42.

[92] ‘The guilty will not be questioned about their sins’ (Al-Qaßaß 28:78, AH).

[93] Verbs of the root s-l-m, in particular sallama/yusallimu and aslama/yuslimu, are commonly translated as ‘to submit’, ‘to resign’, even ‘to surrender’, which all connote a passive act of submission and lack the element of putting obedience to God into active practice, an element that the verbs sallama and aslama also contain in the sense of ‘to consent’, ‘to approve’, or ‘to accept’. In the light of MS’s thesis that the opposite of disobedient dissent (an active practice) is not surrender or submission but an active process of approval, al-muslimån has been translated as assenters or, in order to distinguish them from the Muslim-Believers, as Muslim-Assenters.

[94] All translators render al-mußallån as ‘those who pray’ as they go back to the root ß-l-w, whereas MS prefers an association with the root w-ß-l ‘to connect’ and its derivation ßila (connection, link, tie); see also his distinction between ß-l-w and ß-l-§ below.

[95] ‘By men whom neither trade nor sale can divert from the remembrance of Allah, nor from regular prayer (al-ßalawa), nor from paying zakah, their only fear is for the day when hearts and eyes will be turned about’ (Al-Når 24:37).

[96] ‘Do you not see that it is Allah whose praises all beings in the heavens and on earth do celebrate, and the birds with wings outspread? Each one knows its own [ßal§tahu] and praise. And Allah knows well that they all do.’ (A l-Når 24:41); YA: ‘(mode of) prayer’; MF: ‘the prayer of each’ and most translators, except MP: ‘He knows verily the worship’, AhA: ‘each one knows its obligations’, who seem to share the view of MS that ßal§tahu does not refer to ‘prayer’. Ambros also distinguishes between ßal§(t) and ßalaw§t and admits that 24:41 cannot mean ‘ritual prayer’ (Ambros. Dictionary: 163). The root is an import from Aramaic, meaning ‘prayer’, derived from the root ß-l-y, meaning ‘inclining’ (ibid.) that can be figuratively understood and may support ‘symbolic or spiritual connection to God’ as proposed by

MS.

[97] ‘Say: “Truly, my prayer (ßal§tÊ) and my service of sacrifice, my life and my death, are (all) for Allah, the Cherisher of the worlds; no partner has He: this am I commanded, and I am the first of those who submit to His will (al-muslimÊn)”’ (Al-An#§m 6:162–3).

[98] E.g., ‘Say: “What has come to me by inspiration is that your God is One God: Will you therefore bow to his will (fa-hal antum muslimån)” (Al-Anbiy§” 21:108); see also Yåsuf 12:106; Luqm§n 31:25; Al-Zumar 39:65.

[99] ‘As to those who believe and work righteous deeds, they have, for their entertainment, the gardens of Paradise’ (Al-Kahf 18:107).

[100] ‘You do we worship (na#budu), and Your aid we seek. Show us the straight way (al-ßir§ã al-mustaqÊm).’ (Al-F§tiÈa 1:5–6); ‘Say: “Verily, my Lord has guided me to a way that is straight (ßir§ã [in] mustaqÊm[in]), a religion of right (dÊn[an] qiyam[an]), the path (trod) by Abraham, the true in faith, and he joined not gods with Allah” (A l-An#§m 6:161); see also Al-Råm 30:30.

[101] ‘And that you should worship Me, (for that) is the straight way’ –, refer to acts of ‘doing what is righteous and beautiful’ (Y§-SÊn 36:61).

[102] ‘Nay, whoever submits (man aslama) his whole self to Allah and is a doer of good (wa-huwa muÈsin)’ (Al-Baqara 2:112); see also Al-Nis§” 4:125; Al-An#§m 6:48; •§-H§” 20:82; Al-M§“ida 5:69.

[103] ‘Most of them will only believe in God while also joining others with Him’ (Yåsuf 12:106, AH).

[104] ‘And Abraham enjoined upon his sons and so did Jacob; “Oh my sons! God has chosen the faith for you; then die not except in the state of submission (to Me)” (Al-Baqara 2:132).

[105] ‘Allah forgives not that partners should be set up with Him; but He forgives anything else, to whom He pleases; to set up partners with Allah is to devise a sin most heinous indeed’ (Al-Nis§” 4:48, also 116).

[106] Reference to 2:256.

[107] ‘O my Lord! Forgive me, my parents, all who enter my house in Faith’ (NåÈ 71:28).

[108] ‘Your Lord has decreed that you worship none but Him, and that you be kind to parents. Whether one or both of them attain old age in your life, say not to them a word of contempt, nor repel them, but address them in terms of honour’ (A l-Isr§” 17:23).

[109] ‘And We have enjoined on man (to be good) to his parents: in travail upon travail did his mother bear him, and in years twain was his weaning: (hear the command), “Show gratitude to Me and to your parents: to Me is (your final) goal.’ (Luqm§n 31:14), and ‘We have enjoined on man kindness to his parents: In pain did his mother bear him, and in pain did she give him birth’ (Al-AÈq§f 46:15).

[110] ‘Kill not your children for fear of want: We shall provide sustenance for them as well as for you. Verily the killing of them is a great sin’ (Al-Isr§” 17:31).

[111] Also, ‘You who believe, be steadfast in your devotion to God and bear witness impartially’ (Al-M§“ida 5:8, AH).

[112] YA translates salm as ‘Islam’; AB: ‘enter Islam totally’; AH: ‘submission to God’; MP: ‘into submission (to Him)’; AhA: ‘to full submission to God’, but clearly MS understands it as ‘peace’, like AA: ‘O believers, enter the peace, all of you’. MF translates ‘O believer, enter into complete peace’, but adds in a footnote that this is synonymous with ‘complete submission’ or ‘true religion’ (fn. 156), which tries to link al-salm with al-isl§m.

[113] YA translates al-sal§m as ‘a salutation’; AB: ‘who greets you as a Muslim’; AA: ‘a greeting’; MF: ‘who greets you’, but clearly MS understands it as ‘an offer of peace’, which is wider in its meaning than a ‘greeting of peace’ (AhA: ‘who greets you in peace’; AH: ‘a greeting of peace’), more like MP: ‘who offers you peace’.

[114] The translation of these two verses has been adapted to the interpretation of the Arabic terms that MS introduces in chapter 3. The conventional rendering would be as follows (MF): near of kin (dhawÊ ’l-qurba), orphans (al-yat§mÊ), the needy (al-mas§kÊn), the wayfarers (ibn al-sabÊl), the poor (al-fuqar§”), their collectors (al-#§milÊn #alayh§), whose hearts are bound together (a l-mu”allafa qulåbuhum); the slaves (fi’l-riq§b), the debtors (al-gh§rimÊn); spending in Allah’s path (fÊ sabÊl All§h). As we will see in chapter 3, it is MS’s intention to replace the often archaic renderings of those terms that have lost their relevance in a modern society (e.g., slaves and slavery) with a contemporary understanding.

[115] This is a very novel understanding of the legal concept of naskh. Technically, fiqh literature allows four types of abrogations: 1) a Qur’anic ruling abrogates another Qur’anic ruling; 2) a Qur’anic ruling abrogates a ÈadÊth; 3) a ÈadÊth of the Prophetical tradition abrogates a Qur’anic ruling; and 4) a ÈadÊth abrogates another ÈadÊth. As for types 2 and 3, MS would maintain that a Qur’anic ruling always abrogates a ÈadÊth of the Prophetical tradition (if it contradicts the Qur’anic ruling) but that a ÈadÊth can never abrogate a Qur’anic ruling (see MuÈammad Zayd, al-Naskh fi’l-qur”§n (Cairo, n.p., 1963), 1–6; 82–84; Sha#b§n MuÈammad Ism§#Êl, Naíariyy§t fi’l-shar§“i# al-sa m§wÊya (Cairo, n.p., 1977), 99–171). As for type 1, the fiqh rule is that a later revealed Qur’anic ruling abrogates an earlier revealed ruling. The criterion is, hence, the time of their revelation between 610 and 632. This is not the criteria which MS applies. It is, rather, the type of messengerhood for which historically a ruling was revealed (i.e., for Moses, Jesus, or MuÈammad). A historically later-revealed ruling abrogates historically earlier-revealed rulings. It is not the chronology of revelation between 622 and 632 that counts but the chronology of messengerhoods between several centuries BD and the seventh century AD., i.e., between the prophet Noah and the Prophet MuÈammad. MS is not concerned with the fourth type. See, for an equally critical view of the classical concept of naskh, AÈmad \ij§zÊ al-Saqq§, L§ naskh fi’l-qur”§n (Cairo: D§r al-fikr al-#arabÊ, 1978).

[116] ‘So fear God as much as you can; listen and obey and spend in charity for the benefit of your own soul and those saved from the covetousness of their own souls…’ (Al-Tagh§bun 64:16).

[117] MS added to this the following comment: ‘It has been a big mistake in our intellectual past, intended or not, to denounce universal ethical guidelines as ideological reflections of a specific cultural tradition. Some Arab Marxist intellectuals thought, for example, that ethics belongs to a kind of ideological superstructure in a society that reflects primarily its economic, material substructure. According to this view, the ethics of the Bible and the Qur’an, and this includes the ten commandments, express a specific kind of morality derived from the primitive economic conditions that existed in the ancient Near East. Marxist thinkers argued that because these economic conditions do not exist any longer, the ethics that accompanied them must also disappear. However, such a position, where implemented, led to utter frustration and disappointment because it cut people off from morality and divine guidance, which were not replaced by something better. The practice of discarding moral guidance under the pretext of a Neo-Marxist deconstruction of history has given rise to an attitude of moral licentiousness whereby murder, disrespect for parents, fraud, false testimony, and adultery are perceived as perfectly normal. We know the abandonment of ethical rules has led Arab-Muslim societies into a deep moral crisis and will, if it is not rectified, eventually trigger their total destruction. We need to understand that divine commandments express a moral culture that is universal and applicable to all humans of any historical, religious, or economic background. These commandments can never be replaced or redefined.”

[118] The number of major sins or al-kab§“ir given in the ÈadÊths differ considerably. A popular ÈadÊth, reported by a l-Bukh§rÊ, states seven major sins (MuÈammad Abå #Abd All§h al-Bukh§rÊ, al-J§mi# al-‘aÈÊÈ li’l-Bukh§rÊ (Beirut: D§r Ibn KathÊr, 1987), vol. 3, 1017) but Muslim fiqh scholars differed in classifying some of these sins as major sins, while others were included in this list of major sins (see #Abd al-RaÈm§n al-JazÊrÊ, al-Fiqh #al§ madh§hib al-arba#a (Cairo: Wiz§rat al-Awq§f, 1950), vol. 5, 223). It seems that MS refers to the popular work by a l-DhahabÊ which classified the kab§“ir into seventy categories (see MuÈammad b. #Uthm§n al-DhahabÊ, al-Kab§“ir (Beirut: Nashr D§r al-Nadwat al-JadÊda, n.d.)).

[119] Many verses refer to these two types of faith: ‘O you who believe! Believe in God and His Apostle, and the scripture which He has sent to His apostle and the scripture which He sent to those before (him)….’ (A l-Nis§” 4:136); ‘O you that believe! Fear God, and believe in His apostle, and He will bestow on you a double portion of His mercy…’ (A l-\adÊd 57:28); ‘But those who believe and work deeds of righteousness, and believe in the (revelation) sent down to Muhammad…’ (MuÈammad 47:2); ‘It is He who sent down tranquillity into the hearts of the believers, that they may add faith to their faith…’ (Al-FatÈ 48:4); ‘…Yea, those who believe, their faith is increased and they do rejoice. But those in whose hearts is a disease, it will add doubt to their doubt, and they will die in a state of unbelief’ (A l-Tawba 9:124–25).

[120] See also Al-M§“ida 5:23; Al-\ujur§t 49:15.

[121] See also Al-Baqara 2:43; Al-Nis§” 4:162.

[122] MS defines any struggle for freedom, justice, and equality as a fundamental pillar of a ‘jih§d in God’s way’ (a l-jih§d fÊ sabÊl All§h), but if this cannot be achieved by peaceful means it turns into a violent fight, or al-qit§l. Any fight that is fought for a different cause, that is, not for freedom, justice, and equality cannot be defined as a ‘fight in God’s way’ (al-qit§l fÊ sabÊl All§h). The reference to 2:216 implies that MS here refers to al-qit§l as the violent form of al-jih§d. The difference between al-jih§d and al-qit§l is explained in detail in chapter 6.

[123] MS believes that the now antiquated terms for ‘Muslims’, for example in French (Mahométans), German (Mohammedaner), and English (Muhammedans), do in fact reflect more adequately the fact that ‘Muslim-Believers’ are the followers of MuÈammad. The pejorative sense of these words, insofar as they seem to suggest that ‘Muhammedans’ worship MuÈammad or think of him—analogous to how ‘Christians’ believe in ‘Christ”—as God, needs of course to be omitted. Once it has been clarified that MuÈammad is human and a prophet, the term ‘Muhammedans’ might be used again to designate Muslim-Believers.

[124] MS comments in a footnote: ‘Note that human beings are worshippers of God (al-#ubb§d), not His slaves (al-#abÊd). Worshippers of God enjoy freedom of choice, on a personal as well as political level, whereas slaves of God do not enjoy such freedom. Worshippers of God are capable of implementing justice in society, whereas slaves do not have such power. What Allah demands from every human being is worship (al-#ib§da), not slavery. So we are His worshippers (al-#ubb§d) in this world (but we are free to choose between obedience and disobedience), while in the Afterlife we will become His slaves (al-#abÊd), since no choice will then be left to humans. That is why we read in verse 56 of Sårat a l-Dh§riyy§t: ‘I have only created Jinns and men, that they may serve Me.’ This should be read as: ‘human beings are worshippers of Me who obey Me so that their will is fulfilled, and they disobey Me through the freedom of their choice.’ However, this verse does not refer to the rituals of al-Êm§n, i.e., fasting, alms tax, or pilgrimage, etc.’. The topic of freedom is discussed again in chapter 6.

[125] This phrase completes verse 2:113.

[126] The term ÈanÊf in the Qur’an usually connotes the meaning ‘monotheist other than Jewish or Christian’ (Ambros, Dictionary, 79) and is in Islamic fiqh positively denoted as referring to someone who is a sincere or straight believer (see MuÈammad b. #AlÊ al-Shawk§nÊ, Nayl al-awt§r min aÈ§dÊth Sayyid al-Akhy§r: SharÈ munãaqa ’l-akhb§r (Cairo: Id§rat al-•ib§#a al-MunÊriyya, n.d.), vol. 2, 208). According to al-•abarÊ, the term ÈanÊf also stands for the È§jj, i.e., the pilgrim who travels to Mecca, because the pilgrimage is mythologically linked to Abraham’s tradition, which is usually referred to as a l-ÈanÊfiyya (Abå Ja#far a l-•abarÊ, J§mi# a l-bay§n fÊ ta”wÊl al-qur”§n (Beirut: Mu”assasat al-Ris§la, 2000), vol. 3, 104). However, the term is differently defined by MS (see chapter 4). Although he keeps the direct meaning of ‘monotheist’ and ‘sincere’ (believer) he adds his indirect (interpreted) meaning, which is ÈanÊf, the human inclination to move (in curves) between the straight limits that God has set down. Whereas ÈanÊfiyya embodies the essence of humanness, straightness embodies the essence of the divine (and hence nonhuman) self.

[127] YA: ‘way of Abraham’; MP: ‘the tradition of Abraham’; AhA; AA: ‘the creed of Abraham’; MF: ‘the true religion of Abraham’; AH: ‘the religion of Abraham’; AB: ‘the religion of Ibrahim’; ‘religion’ seems to mean ‘creed’ with all translators, but Ambros (Ambros, Dictionary, 259) defines milla also as religious community (in the social, historical sense of religious tradition). MS wants to draw on this social, collective meaning of milla.

[128] This theory is fully explained in chapter 4. It basically contains MS’s fundamental position that the Qur’an should not be regarded as a book of codified law that stipulates exact punishment for specific crimes but, instead, only indicates the outer boundaries (the upper and lower limits of moral and social tolerance) in God’s law. Human legislation, thus, should not take place with these outer boundaries but in between them.

[129] MS refers exclusively to the root n-b-# and hence nabba”a ‘to make s.th. known, to announce s.th.’ (as in 66:3), even though the conventional reference would be to n-b-y and nabÊy ‘prophet’, from Syriac nbÊy§ or from another Aramaic dialect (Ambros, Dictionary, 262). MS uses the semantic association between nubåwa (prophecy) and nubå”a (prognosis, prophecy), the latter linked to inb§” (notification, information), to establish his interpretation that the role of prophets is ‘to notify’ or ‘to inform’.

[130] Based on his assumption of two fundamentally different categories of divine revelation, MS defines verses according to their metaphysical status as either eternal, absolute, and objectively valid or as temporal, relative, and subjectively conditioned. Since MuÈammad enjoyed the status of the Prophet and the Messenger of Allah, MS argues, the Qur’an must reflect these two positions (which are conventionally not perceived as separated) in the form of two different categories of verses: verses of prophethood and verses of messengerhood. Chapter 3 provides a detailed explanation of this distinction.

[131] YA translates anb§” as ‘tales’, similarly MF: ‘their tales’; AhA: ‘whose accounts’; AH: ‘the stories of those towns’, but MS wants to convey the meaning of ‘news’ or ‘tidings’, as this was captured by other translators, e.g., AB: ‘we have given you news of them’; MP: ‘We relate some tidings of them to you’; AA: ‘We relate to thee tidings of’. In strictly legal terms, the fiqh scholars do not distinguish between al-khabar and al-naba”, but Arab linguists, who oppose the existence of synonymity in the Arabic language, usually define naba” as ‘extremely important information that the listener (i.e., the person who is informed) could not have known’, while khabar is defined as ‘normal information which the listener may or may not already know’ (see Abå Hil§l al-#AskarÊ, al-Furuq al-lughawiyya (Beirut: D§r al-Kutub al-#Ilmiyya, 2000), vol. 1, 528–30). It seems that MS keeps this distinction as his khabar news are, for the first time, discernable to human knowledge, while naba” news might be known or not known, i.e., they have already become ‘yesterday’s news’, not ‘breaking news’ like the khabar news.

[132] RåÈ al-qudus is usually rendered as ‘the Holy Spirit’, see YA, AA, AH, MF, including MP who glosses ‘a term for the angel Gabriel’; different but not better AB: ‘the Purest Ruh’ and AhA: ‘divine grace’; Ambros (Ambros, Dictionary, 221) says: qudus is from Syriac qudà§, in 2:87 means ‘holiness’. Still, it does not provide the intended sense of ‘life-creating’. The best phrase to capture MS’s intention is to render it as ‘the spirit of life’ or, perhaps Pneuma Kyriou, ‘Spirit of the Lord’ (as in NT) that provides the way to (eternal) life.

[133] In a footnote, MS explains that regulations against the irresponsible use of natural resources should come through the implementation of the ethical rules as discussed in chapter 1. Since God’s religion, al-isl§m, can be broadly defined as ethics and moral principles, the implementation of a l-isl§m would secure a balance between humans and nature, and a responsible use of human and natural resources.

[134] Notice that the text uses the term a l-dhikr, and not a l-kit§b, a l-qur”§n, or a l-furq§n; on the nonsynonymous use of all these terms against conventional tafsÊr, see chapter 3.

[135] Most translators render al-dhikr literally as: ‘the Reminder’ (MF, AB, MP) or ‘the Remembrance”(AA); AhA says: ‘this exposition’; only AH thinks it is synonymous to: ‘the Qur’an’. MS believes that al-dhikr refers only to the actual textual format or, if recited aloud, its audible expression whose meaning is not (yet) discerned.

[136] If this term refers to a specific saying of MuÈammad it is written with a small initial letter (i.e., ÈadÊth). If, however, it refers to the entire textual corpus of prophetic sayings and the scholarly (Muslim) study of it, it is written with a capital, \adÊth.

[137] M§lik ibn Anas Al-AßbaÈÊ, Muwaãã§ al-im§m M§lik (Abå DhabÊ: Mu”assasat Z§yid ibn Sulã§n $l Nahy§n, 2004), vol. 5, 1323 (ÈadÊth no. 3338).

[138] Abå al-Sa#§d§t Ibn al-“AthÊr, J§mi# al-ußål (n.p., n.d.), vol. 1, 68 (Kit§b al-i#tiß§m bi’l-kit§b wa’l-sunna; B§b al-istims§k bihim§).

[139] MS adds in a footnote the following explanation: ‘A short clarification is in order here in order to tackle the fateful legacy of synonymicist philology that holds the minds of our #ulam§” in a firm grip. Against that we hold the non-synonymous definitions of philological terms, such as utterance (nuãq), word (qawl), lexeme (lafí), and speech act (kal§m), that we derived from modern linguistics and classical, nonsynonymicist philology. We start with a quote from Qaãr al-nad§ wa-ball al-ßad§ by Jam§l al-DÊn b. Hish§m al-Anß§rÊ (d. 708 AH): [Begin of quote] ‘A word (kalima) is an utterance that can be found either alone or in a compound; a word (qawl) consists of a lexeme (lafí) that carries meaning, but not all lexemes are words; lexemes involve vocal sounds that are based on the letters of the alphabet—they may mean s omething or not. Thus, a word consists of a lexeme, denoting a specific meaning, that might be derived from one single sentence, such as: ‘Nay, this is a word he is speaking’. A word, given that it consists of a lexeme that carries meaning, can occur singly, such as Zayd, servant, bed etc., but it might form a compound if it consists of more than just one lexeme, such as the young boy Zayd, see verse 3 of Sårat MuÈammad: ‘Thus Allah coins their similitudes for mankind.” [End of quote]

An utterance (nuãq) is a vocal articulation that involves an intelligent connection of different lexemes (alf§í), to the extent that they are logically and meaningfully linked to each other. We might also call this the area of syntax. An utterance (nuãq) is also used to produce meaningful articulations through which logically and meaningfully words (kalim§t) are interconnected in different ways. We might call this the area of grammar. The lexeme (lafí) of an utterance is a sound which the tongue, lips, and vocal cords produce in order to be heard. This can be found with humans as well as animals when dogs bark, wolves howl, or birds sing. A word (qawl), in contrast, could hold only one, singular segment or unit of this sequence of vocal articulation. A word (qawl) contains the meaning that is transported from the speaker to the listener in order to be understood.'

[The difference is here made between the words q§la All§h and naãaqa al-nabÊ, which are for MS not just two words for 'saying' but denote different meanings. Whereas q§la All§h denotes the real speaker and communicator of a meaningful sentence, naãaqa al-nabÊ denotes MuÈamm ad's utterances, i.e., a meaningful and coherent transmission of Allah's words. The former (q§la) relates to 'saying' whereas the later (naãaqa) refers to the pronouncement of what has been said. That the Book does not employ q§la when it refers to MuÈammad's sayings is, for MS, significant; it points to the impossibility of MuÈammad 'saying' revelations—contrary to what the verse of Al-Najm might suggest—because he can only 'pronounce' them.]

MS continues: 'Suppose we accept synonymity, it would mean that the verb naãaqa, i.e. to pronounce, has the same meaning as q§la, i.e. to speak. In this case, the sayings of God's messenger (naãaqa al-rasål) would enjoy the status of divine revelation (as in q§la All§h). This would imply that the prophetic ÈadÊths enjoy divine protection, that they are free of ambiguity and obscure meaning, that they need to be preserved literally (bi'l-lafí) and not just in terms of their meaning, and that no distinction can be made between the utterances of MuÈammad as Prophet and his utterances as Messenger of Allah. Against all of this we raise the following objection: the only book that legitimately contains the phrases q§la All§h and naãaqa rasål All§h is the Book. The phrase q§la MuÈammad in the books of ÈadÊths, must not be understood as equal to q§la All§h in the Book, even if these ÈadÊths were transmitted by uninterrupted chains of transmitters that go back to the Prophet.’

[140] The terms Qur’an and Sunna (i.e., not in italics and with an initial capital letter) are used here in order to remain as close as possible to common usage in this context. Strictly adhering to MS’s terminology, however, Qur’an should be rendered as the Book or al-tanzÊl al-ÈakÊm. See chapter 3.

[141] This is a phrase taken from Sårat al-An#§m 6:100.

[142] All translators understood bayyan§hu as ‘to make s.th. clear’, which does not necessarily exclude the possibility that they saw this as synonymous with ‘to display’ and ‘to uncover’ as MS intends it—MF: ‘after making them clear’; AH: ‘made them clear’; MP: ‘made it clear’; AhA: ‘have made clear’; AB: ‘make things clear’; AA: ‘after we have shown them clearly’.

[143] Most translators follow MS here, e.g., MF: ‘you shall reveal it to mankind’; AH: ‘make it known’; AhA: ‘to make (its truth) known’; synonymous use in AB: ‘make it clear’; AA: ‘make it clear unto the people’; only MP equates tubayyanunnahu with ‘to explain it’.

[144] Similar to a previous footnote, MF: ‘to show you’; AH: ‘to make clear’; AhA: ‘announcing many things’; AB, AA: ‘making clear to you’; again with the exception of MP: ‘explaining to you’ who regards yubayyinu more in the sense of ‘to elucidate’ rather than MS: ‘to uncover’ or ‘to open out’. Lane (Book 1), distinguishes between circumstantial evidence and verbal evidence, the latter being ‘to make something apparent, manifest or perspicuous, either spoken or written’, and MS seems to follow this meaning of tubayyinu as ‘verbal evidence’.

[145] On this point, MS has added a footnote stating that Allah has taught human beings how to use their language in order to communicate to other people, and he remarks how, through such intercommunicative skills, they establish groups and communities, that is, social cohesion in their daily life. The traditional scholars' insistence on the need of the sunna of the Prophet for the bay§n of the Book, seems really absurd in this respect, because [if bay§n means 'to show' and 'to display', and not the narrow notion of 'to explain"] why should communities in Tokyo, Cairo, Washington, or the Himalayas ever need the sunna of MuÈammad (ß) in order to hear God's speech? Surely, the disclosure or pronouncement of the Book in all these locations does not need the sunna of MuÈammad.

[146] For 16:89 and 75:19 it is my gloss because all translators render tiby§n and bay§n as 'to explain' and not as 'to make known' as MS intends it.

[147] This fiqh principle is based on the general linguistic distinction between the use of a word in its absolute, unqualified (muãlaq) meaning in contrast to its specific, qualified (muqayyad) meaning. The process of qualifying the general meaning of a word is called al-taqyÊd, while the reverse process is called al-iãl§q. In ußål al-fiqh and ußål al-qur"§n, al-taqyÊd refers to the effort of scholars to qualify an absolute, general rule and apply it to specific, particular legal cases, while a l-iãl§q refers to the effort to generalize a rule that has been stated only for a very specific, particular situation. Further distinctions are made between al-taqyÊd, al-takhßÊß, al-naskh, al-ta#lÊq and al-istithn§", see RafÊq al-#Ajm, Mawså#at mußãalaÈ§t ußål al-fiqh #inda 'l-muslimÊn (Beirut: Maktabat Lubn§n N§shirån, 1998), vol. 1, 486–87.

[148] MS adds in a footnote here: 'Through these rituals we are connected to an uninterrupted transmission of knowledge from the time of MuÈammad until today, a history of interconnection in which \adÊth scholars and the fuqah§" have played a very minor role. Indeed, their contributions to this are almost zero. With their excessive casuistry concerning the insignificant technical details of these rituals they have made it even harder for people to practice them and participate in this tradition of transmitting knowledge from MuÈammad.

[149] #Abd al-RaÈm§n Al-SuyåãÊ, al-J§mi# al-saghÊr (Beirut: D§r a l-Fikr, n.d.), vol. 1, 52 (ÈadÊth no. 313).

[150] Reported by a l-Bukh§rÊ, quoted in Ibn a l-“AthÊr, J§mi# al-Ußål, vol. 1, 3866 (ÈadÊth no. 3820).

[151] Reported by Muslim, quoted in Muslim Abå’l-\usayn A l-NÊs§bårÊ, ‘aÈÊÈ Muslim (Beirut: D§r al-JÊl, n.d.), vol. 4, 79 (ÈadÊth no. 3197).

[152] In verse 59 of Sårat A l-Nis§” we hear that believers are asked not only to obey God and His Messenger but also ‘those charged with authority among you’. This requires a detailed analysis that is given in chapter 6.

[153] MS adds in a footnote: ‘That is, when MuÈammad forbade the worship of tombs he legislated against the worship, not the tombs as such. The same applies to the worship of stars, trees, rocks, and statues! It is not the dancing, singing, and sculpturing that people should not do—rather, what instigated MuÈammad’s legislation was the un-Islamic intention behind these things. It would imply mindless iconoclasm if the legislation was meant to rule out these things as such.’

[154] Al-Kahf 18:39 [FM].

[155] Abå D§wåd Al-Sajist§nÊ, Sunan Abå D§wåd (Beirut: D§r al-Kit§b al-#ArabÊ, n.d). vol. 4, 328 (ÈadÊth no. 4606).

[156] Al-Suyåã Ê, al-J§mi# al-ßaghÊr, vol. 1, 48 (ÈadÊth no. 288).

[157] In \anafÊ and M§likÊ law it is indeed encouraged, with specific reference to the Prophet's later permission, that men and women do visit the graves of their relatives. And—as MS rightly claims—for \anafÊ scholars such as the Syrian Wahba al-ZuÈaylÊ, the existence of such abrogating decisions by the Prophet in the \adÊth does indeed prove the existence of abrogating verses in the Qur'an itself (see Wahba al-ZuÈaylÊ, al-Fiqh al-isl§mÊ wa-#adillatuhu (Damascus: D§r a l-Fikr, n.d.), vol. 2, 679–10).

[158] This is a novel distinction proposed by MS, but in traditional fiqh there is a recognition of the fact that not all of the sunna of the Prophet is legislative (tashrÊ#Ê). There is, for example, the category of ghayr tashrÊ#a (nonlegal) or al-af #§l al-jibilliyya, that is, habitual activities (lit. acts of natural temperament) that consist of the P rophet's personal likes and dislikes and his everyday manners that do not have binding force. See Kamali, Hashim. Principles of Islamic Jurisprudence, Cambridge: Islamic Text Society, 1991, 50–57). The latter category might be covered by MS's class 5, 'personal statements', whereas the former category (of legislative Sunna) might be covered by his class 3, 'statements about legal injunctions', and yet neither of the two is seen to serve as a normative model for current legislation which is a decisive departure from traditional fiqh.

[159] Quoted from MuÈammad IdrÊs al-Sh§fi#Ê, Kit§b al-ris§la, in Fakhr a l-DÊn Mu Èam mad al-R§zÊ, Maf§tÊÈ al-ghayb (n.p., n.d.), vol. 25, 181 (tafsÊr of 33:34).

[160] Reported by Ibn M§jah, quoted in A l-QazwÊnÊ, Sunan Ibn M§jah (Beirut: D§r IÈy§" Kutub al-#Arabiyya, 1952), vol. 2, 784 (ÈadÊth no. 2341).

[161] Reported by Abå ‘^s§ al-TirmidhÊ, Sunan al-TirmidhÊ (Cairo: Sharikat Mußãaf§ al-B§bÊ, 1975), vol. 4, 668 (ÈadÊth no. 2518).

[162] Al-SuyåãÊ, al-J§mi# al-ßaghÊr, vol. 1, 11 (ÈadÊth no. 46).

[163] Reported by MuÈammad Abå #Abd All§h a l-Bukh§rÊ, a l-J§mi# a l-ßaÈÊÈ (Beirut: D§r ibn KathÊr, 1987), vol. 5, 2272 (ÈadÊth no. 5784).

[164] Al-Bukh§rÊ, ‘aÈÊÈ, vol. 1, 14 (ÈadÊth no. 13).

[165] Al-Bukh§rÊ, ‘aÈÊÈ, vol. 1, 12 (ÈadÊth no. 10).

[166] Al-TirmidhÊ, Sunan, vol. 5, 51 (ÈadÊth no. 2687).

[167] Al-TirmidhÊ, Sunan, vol. 5, 41 (ÈadÊth no. 2611).

[168] A ÈadÊth qudsÊ is, according to the #ulåm a l-qur”§n scholars, defined as a saying of God that was spoken through the medium of the Prophet. It is also called waÈy ghayr matlå, nonrecited revelation, in order to distinguish it from waÈy matlå, recited revelation, which is the Qur’an. While the Qur’an is the actual word of Allah (verbatim), a ÈadÊth qudsÊ contains God’s message expressed in the words of the Prophet. The Qur’an enjoys, at least theoretically, superior status due to several theological and ÈadÊth-specific considerations, for example, due to the fact that the Qur’an was narrated through taw§tur (multilateral) chains of transmission, while the aÈ§dÊth qudsiyya were narrated only by a khabar w§Èid (solitary) chain of transmission (see Mann§# KhalÊl al-Qaãã§n, Mab§Èith fÊ #ulåm al-qur”§n (Riyadh: Maktabat a l-Ma#§rif li’l-Nashr wa’l-TawzÊ#, 2000), 22). The fact that the Islamic tradition acknowledges the existence of divine revelation outside the covers of the Qur’an is unacceptable to MS as it opens up the possibility of divine inspirations that are expressed in human words— a possibility too close to the claims of sanctity of Islamic fiqh that MS wants to combat.

[169] See also Fußßilat 41:6.

[170] The fiqh rule of naßß regulations implies that no ijtih§d is allowed in a matter of explicit Qur'anic injunctions (e.g. the Èudåd punishments). MS wants, in contrast, to exercise ijtih§d on exactly these naßß injunctions. An interpretation outside the realm of naßß verses he calls al-ta"wÊl, not ijtih§d.

[171] MS argues against the Islamist tendency to define a l-isl§m as law and to impose the most draconian legislation by a literal understanding of the aÈk§m injunctions. Against that, he defines al-isl§m as ethics and introduces the theory of limits that allows mitigations and a less punitive approach to law. A restrictive, literal, and even punitive approach is only allowed in the sphere of ethics, not in (formal) law.

[172] The notion of synonymity is explicit in AH: 'sent down the Qur'an Ourself', MF: 'revealed the Reminder' (which is explained in a footnote as 'the Qur'an'); YA: 'sent down the message', and AhA: 'sent down this exposition'; closer to the actual word meaning of al-dhikr are: AB: 'sent down the Reminder'; MP: 'reveal the Reminder'.

[173] MS intends to describe an antonymic term to 'ambiguous' (mutash§bih), that is, inconclusive, enigmatic, or indefinite, because its meanings are kept in a state of eternal indeterminateness until the Last Hour, hence the opposite term 'definite' (muÈkam), connoting explicitness, clearness, and exactness. It does not convey the meaning of perfection, as in MP: 'revelations of which are perfected; AH: 'whose verses are perfected'; AB: 'whose ayats are perfectly construed', nor of great length or detail, as in MF: 'Verses which are elaborately formulated';

or of strong appeal, AhA: ‘whose verses are indeclinable’, more in a sense of clarity, AA: ‘whose verses are set clear’.

[174] The translation of YA clearly does not capture MS’s intended meaning of mutash§bih§t as ambiguous; neither do AH: ‘a Scripture that is consistent’; MF: ‘a Book, both insistent and corroboratory…’; AB ‘a Book consistent in its frequent repetitions’; AhA: ‘the [sic] Book conformable in its juxtapositions’; MP: ‘A Scripture consistent’, or AA: ‘a Book, consimilar in its oft-repeated’.

[175] YA’s translation does not consider the conjunction wa-, but translates the second clause as a È§l-accusative, whereas MS takes it literally as referring to two different things. YA also does not translate a l-kit§b as book but as ‘revelation’ which makes it difficult to get across MS’s point of the juxtaposition of al-kit§b and al-qur”§n. A similar translation that ignores the wa- is: AH: ‘These are the verses of the Scripture, a Qur’an that makes things clear’. Other translators acknowledge the existence [176] YA like most translators reads the negated third person singular l§ yamass[u] prescriptively because of the inserted ‘shall’. Similar are MF: ‘that only the purified shall touch’; AB: ‘No one may touch it except the purified’; AA: ‘none but the purified shall touch’; AH: ‘that only the purified can touch’; while MP understands it like MS as a description: ‘which no-one touches except the purified’. This discrepancy is reflected in the tafsÊr literature, where the statement is interpreted either as a proscriptive requirement of ritual purity for those who touch earthly copies of the Qur’an or as a description of the heavenly exemplar of the Qur’an touched only by the angels. See Encyclopaedia of the Qur’an, s.v. “Cleanliness and Ablution.” (M.H. Katz), 343. AhA gives the verse a novel (modernist) touch, ‘Only they can reach it who are clean (of mind)’, in which the legal notion of purity is rendered in spiritual/moral terms.

<right>

[177] YA understands the partitive preposition min as pertaining to all parts of the </right>

Book, similar to MF, AB, AhA, AA: ‘of the Book’; MP: ‘of the Scripture’, while AH: ‘the Scripture We have revealed to you [Prophet] is the Truth’ does not even acknowledge its existence but expresses what the others intended by ‘of the Book’ (i.e., all of it). But MS regards it as strictly partitive, i.e., (a) part of, some of it (not all).

[178] YA’s translation again avoids dealing with ‘books’ and renders kutub[un] as ‘laws’, likewise AhA: ‘containing firm degrees’; AB: ‘containing upright precepts’; AH: ‘containing true scriptures’; MP: ‘containing correct scriptures’, but MF: ‘wherein are valuable books’ follows MS in taking it literally as books, while the use of a capital in AA: ‘therein true Books’ may indicate an understanding of Scriptures other than the Qur’an (sent to the ahl al-kit§b and idolaters, see 98:1–2).

[179] Again, YA’s translation avoids rendering kit§b[an] as a ‘book’, so does AH: ‘We have recorded everything in a Record’ and AB: ‘We have recorded all things in writing’; but not MF: ‘Everything We have enumerated fully in a Book’; and AA: ‘everything We have numbered in a Book’; MP: ‘Everything We have recorded in a Book’; AhA: ‘We have kept account of every thing in a book’ (notice the small letter for book which reflects MS’s understanding that such a book is not the Book).

[180] Lit. ‘Mother of the Book’; this is how it will be translated forthwith.

[181] YA contrasts ‘verses basic or fundamental (of established meaning)’ with ‘other verses that are allegorical’, which is not what MS intends; similar AhA: ‘and others allegorical’ (in contrast to ‘categorical’) and MP: ‘and others (which are) allegorical’ (in contrast to ‘clear revelations’). The other translators regard the verse as indicating hermeneutically two different categories of verses, AB: ‘and others which are open to interpretation’ (in contrast to ‘clear judgements’); MF: ‘and others which are ambiguous’ (in contrast to ‘precise in meaning’); AH: ‘and others are ambiguous’ (in contrast to ‘definite in meaning’); AA: ‘and others ambiguous’ (in contrast to ‘verses clear’). All translations, however, do not acknowledge a semantic difference between wa-ukhar[u] mutash§bih§t[un] (some others, i.e., other than these that are ambiguous) and al-§khir mutash§bih§t (the others are ambiguous) and render the former expression (of 3:7) as containing the meaning of the latter (which is not in 3:7). MS, in contrast, sees here a reference to another type of verse other than ambiguous and definite. It means that MS does not use 3:7 as a reference to the ‘ambiguous verses’ (he uses 39:23) but to the verses of tafßÊl al-kit§b.

[182] See the explanations given in the preceding footnote.

[183] ‘O you Prophet! Tell your wives and daughters, and the believing women, that they should cast their outer garments over their persons (when abroad): that is most convenient, that they should be known (as such) and not molested. And God is oftforgiving, most merciful’ (Al-AÈz§b 33:59).

[184] ‘O you who believe! Enter not the prophet’s houses—until leave is given you— for a meal, (and then) not (so early as) to wait for its preparation; but when you are invited, enter; and when you have taken your meal, disperse, without seeking familiar talk. Such (behaviour) annoys the prophet. He is ashamed to dismiss you, but God is not ashamed (to tell you) the truth. And when you ask (his ladies) for anything you want, ask them from before a screen: that makes for greater purity for your hearts and for theirs. Nor is it right for you that you should annoy God’s apostle, or that you should marry his widows after him at any time. Truly such a thing is in God’s sight an enormity’ (Al-AÈz§b 33:53).

[185] Abå’l-\usayn AÈmad Ibn F§ris al-QazwÊnÊ, (d. 395/1004). Mujmal al-lugha (Beirut: Mu”assasa al-Ris§la, n.d.), vol. 3, 722.

[186] YA’s rendering of al-dhikr as ‘message’ does not fully convey MS’s interpretation of it, unless one qualifies this message by saying that it is a message in human language so that human beings can remember it. Consistent with their previous renderings of a l-dhikr are AA: ‘wherein is your Remembrance’ and AB: ‘containing your Reminder’ but not AhA: ‘which has a reminder for you’ and MP: ‘in which is your Reminder’, which both here render it as ‘reminder’, and MF: ‘in which there is admonition for you’, who dropped his rendering as ‘reminder’ elsewhere. Again, AH: ‘a Scripture to remind you’ regards the genitive construct (38:1) or the adverbial clause (kit§ban fÊhi dhikrukum) in 21:10 as attributive clauses stated in order to describe the function of the Book/Scripture, not its set up as MS intends it. Lane (Book I), gives the meaning of dhikr also as Remembrance and adds ‘the presence of a thing in the mind’, also termed dhikr bi’l-qalb to distinguish it from dhikr in the sense of telling, saying, mentioning, i.e. dhikr bi’l-lis§n. It seems that MS tends—albeit not in their mystical interpretations within the Sufi-tradition—towards the former and intends to convey a ‘presence of the Qur’an in people’s minds’ (as an Arabic text) in his interpretation of al-dhikr.

[187] The idea of such a subjective genitive of possession is supported by several translations, e.g., AB: ‘By the Qur’an holding the Remembrance’; AA: ‘By the Koran, containing the Remembrance’; MF: ‘By the Qur’an which contains the Reminder’; to a lesser degree by AH: ‘By the Qur’an with its reminding’, but understood in an entirely different way by MP: ‘By the renowned Qur’an’, also AhA: ‘I call to witness the admonishing Qur’an’—al-dhikr is usually rendered as either a) reminder or b) admonisher, sometimes interchangeably because the Qur’an has been traditionally understood as a means of warning humankind against the consequences of overlooking (i.e., forgetting) God, see Encyclopaedia of the Qur’an, s.v. “Remembrance.” (A. Brodersen), 422.

[188] ‘He is more eloquent in speech [afßaÈ] than I…’ (Al-Qaßaß 28:34).

[189] When Allah sent Moses to Pharaoh he said: ‘But speak to him mildly [fa-qål§ lahu qawl[an] layyin[an]]...’ (•§-H§” 20:44).

[190] As in: ‘and speak [qul] to them a word [qawl[an]] to reach their very souls

[b§ligh[an]]’ (Al-Nis§” 4:63).

[191] ‘His word is the truth…’ (Al-An#§m 6:73).

[192] ‘And God by His words does prove and establish His truth…’ (Yånus 10:82).

[193] ‘That is because God—He is the reality; and those besides Him whom they invoke—they are but vain falsehood…’ (Al-\ajj 22:62).

[194] ‘We created not the heavens and the earth and all between them but for just ends [bi’l-Èaqq]...’ (Al-AÈq§f 46:3).

[195] ‘Verily, when He intends a thing, His command is, “be”, and it is!’ (Y§-SÊn 36:82); ‘When He has decreed a plan, He but says to it, “be”, and it is!’ ($l #Imr§n 3:47); see also Sårat al-Kahf 18:35.

[196] YA’s translation of kit§b mubÊn as ‘record clear’ is unfortunate as it confuses it with MS’s rendering of im§m mubÊn as ‘a record clear’; AH: ‘a clear Record’; MP: ‘a clear record’; MF, AB: ‘a Clear Book’; the best rendering is with AA: ‘a Book Manifest’, but the closest, even if a bit wordy, translation of what MS intends is AhA: ‘recorded in the open book (of nature). This expresses exactly the notion of God’s signs manifested in the open (!) book of nature.

[197] Al-TirmidhÊ, Sunan, vol. 4, 448 (ÈadÊth no. 2139).

[198] Most translators follow this and render al-im§m al-mubÊn as ‘a record or register clear’, e.g., AB, AA: ‘a clear register’; AhA: ‘a lucid register’; MP: ‘a clear Register’; AH: ‘a clear Record’. And yet, MF: ‘a clear Master Register’ (fn: umm al-kit§b or lawÈ al-maÈfåí) shows that this is associated with the primordial register of al-lawÈ al-maÈfåí, an association that MS categorically rejects. Since the im§m mubÊn registers human events like a historiographer chronicles historical events, one could also understand it—according to Ambros—as ‘some kind of written document, prob. “ledger”’ (Ambros, Dictionary, 29).

[199] The term appears with the definite article, al-kit§b al-mubÊn, in: 12:1, 26:2, and 28:2, and indefinite, kit§b mubÊn, in: 5:15; 6:59; 10:61; 11:6; 27:1; 27:75; 34:3.

[200] Literally, the word ta”wÊl (derived from the root a-w-l) means ‘to return’, implying a return to the original meaning of a word in order to establish its real meanings and its unadultered semantic connotations. In the uß˚l al-tafsÊr literature it means three things: a) to understand a word on the basis of a connotation that is not its literal or primary connotation (this includes a symbolic or allegorical interpretation), b) to interpret a word or a phrase (i.e., by using your own rational judgement), and c) to explain the nature of a historical event (see Jal§l al-DÊn al-Suyåã Ê, al-Itq§n fÊ #ulåm al-qur”§n (Cairo, n.d.), 460–62). In \anafÊ uß˚l al-fiqh, the term ta”wÊl is used to refer to the process of choosing or preferring one specific meaning over others if a word or phrase has more than one connotation (al-mushtarak). The preferred connotation is referred to as al-mu”awwal (see Zayn al-DÊn b. Ibr§hÊm Ibn Nujaym, al-Ashb§h wa’l-naí§“ir (Damascus: D§r al-Fikr, 1986)). For MS, al-ta”wÊl is the search for the most adequate contemporary connotation that a Qur’anic word has acquired even if the resulting (indirect or secondary) interpretation is different from its literal (direct or primary) interpretation. His point is that language, like everything else in society and history, changes, and that words develop new connotations which reflect adequately the current state of affairs in science and society. Even if the primary connotation of a word does not change (it stays fixed with the text's shape) its secondary connotations always do (the text's content), and it is the task of ta”wÊl to follow up on these constantly newly emerging meanings that the divine text allows.

[201] 'For every prophecy is a limit of time, and soon shall you know it' (A l-An#§m 6:67). 'Nay, they charge with falsehood that whose knowledge cannot compass, even before the interpretation thereof has reached them… (Yånus 10:39).

[202] Abå al-•ayyib AÈmad b. \ussayn al-MutanabbÊ (915–965), Arab poet, considered one of the greatest authors of the classical Arabic qaßÊda poetry. He was killed while on a trip near Baghdad.

[203] MuÈammad b. al-\asan b. al-Haytham (ca. 965–1039), Arab physicist, mathematician, and philosopher, became known in Europe under the name of Alhazen. He has influenced philosophers such as Roger Bacon (1214–1294) and the physicist Johannes Kepler (1571–1630).

[204] It would be natural to translate ta”wÊl as 'interpretation' as it has been conventionally defined as allegorical or symbolic interpretation (of 'åfis, Ism§#ÊlÊs, Mu#tazilites) in contrast to tafsÊr, which is a more literal reading or rather outward and circumstantial commentary (i.e. not strictly interpretation) of the Qur'an. And yet, it appears that 'apprehension', in the sense of 'to comprehend', 'to realize', and 'to absorb' is the more appropriate term since MS's process of ta”wÊl is not only a hermeneutical exercise of textual exegesis but a far wider (philosophical, scientific, epistemological, and textual) act of realizing the laws and entities of objective reality or, in using a term from Whitehead, pertains to a kind of 'concrescence' by which the individual entities of this existence acquire complete complex unity (see A. N. Whitehead, Adventures of Ideas (Cambridge: CUP, 1933), 303–4).

[205] Lit. ‘when its ta”wÊl comes’, i.e., in MS’s sense: ‘when its [full] interpretation is realized”—this is, of course, not quite captured in YA’s translation, nor in MF, AB: ‘its fulfilment’; MP: ‘the fulfilment of it’; closer is AH: ‘the fulfilment of its [final prophecy]’, but even more so AhA: ‘the day that (Reality) is unravelled’ and—one should add in the spirit of MS—it is fully and adequately perceived by the human senses or, as AA translates, when ‘its interpretation comes’. Whereas the translators are undecided whether ta”wÊl refers to the final unravelling of prophecy/reality or the interpretation of it, MS combines the two strings as one and renders it as the perception/interpretation of the fully unravelled (objective) reality. Ambros thinks that ta”wÊl, meaning either interpretation or ultimate outcome, consequences, could mean both in 7:53 (Ambros, Dictionary, 31).

[206] All the translations that were consulted keep the spatial connotation of ‘coming down’ [from heaven] which is, as it will become clear, not connotated in MS’s use of the word. The best translation of the term inz§l would be: ‘transformation of revelation so that it enters human consciousness’ and of tanzÊl: ‘delivery of revelation so that it penetrates the human mind’.

[207] Since the two terms are treated as synonyms, translators do not indicate a semantic difference. Therefore, one needs constantly to reread these verses in light of the new definitions provided by MS and pay attention to whether the verse mentions the verb nazzala or anzala.

[208] YA and—as it was to be expected—all the other translators render 2nd form ballagha and 4th form ablagha synonymously in the sense of ‘transport’, a move from one place to another, AA: ‘deliver (2nd)/ delivered’ (4th); AB: ‘transmit / transmit’; MP: ‘convey / deliver’; AhA: ‘convey or deliver / convey’; AH: ‘deliver or proclaim / deliver’; deliver or proclaim / deliver.

[209] Almost identical: ‘So Shu#ayb left them, saying: “O my people! I did indeed convey to you [ablaghtukum) the messages for which I was sent by my Lord: I gave you good counsel…”’ (Al-A#r§f 7:93).

[210] YA, MF, AH, AhA, AA: ‘delivered’; MP: ‘conveyed’; AB: ‘transmitted’.

[211] Al-inz§l without a l-tanzÊl: this is, MS maintains, why for example when it states that ‘manna and quails were sent down’, the text employs either nazzala (20:80) or anzala (2:57). In both verses the children of Israel are addressed and asked to ‘eat from the good things’, but while in the first instance (nazzaln§) in 20:80 the verse ends with the statement that ‘manna and quails were sent down’, in the second instance (anzaln§) in 2:57 the verse continues to say ‘eat of the good things We have provided for you’ which indicates that ‘manna and quails’ have become perceptible to human beings and are registered as food to be eaten, whereas in 20:80 this last step of perception through inz§l is not indicated.

[212] ‘When the anger of Moses was appeased, he took up the tablets; in the writing thereon was guidance and mercy for such as fear their Lord’ (Al-A#r§f 7:154).

[213] YA translates maknån as ‘well-guarded’, which does not fit MS’s rendering. AH is not much closer: ‘a protected record’, nor AB: ‘a well protected Book’; but AA: ‘a hidden Book’; MP: ‘a Book kept hidden’; AhA: ‘the well-kept Book’, and MF: ‘a hidden Book’ exactly render the phrase as MS sees it.

[214] See Sårat #Abasa 80:11–16.

[215] AH translates: ‘God erases or confirms whatever He will, and the source of scripture is with Him.’ Even if it does not render MS’s definition of umm al-kit§b, it acknowledges a theological distinction between the book and its (heavenly) ‘source’.

[216] YA does not allow a literal reading of throne here, therefore he puts in parenthesis: (of dignity), implying that Joseph did not really raise his parents on the throne (of Egypt). AH, however, allows this possibility by translating: ‘and took them up to [his] throne’, the insertion excludes the figurative understanding that the parents were made the rulers of Egypt.

[217] See also verse 72 of Sårat ‘§d.

[218] ‘Praise belongs to God, Lord of the Worlds’ (Al-F§tiÈa 1:2, AH).

[219] ‘I will create a vicegerent on earth’ (Al-Baqara 2:30).

[220] MS adds here that historically, the stories of the qur”§n tell us how people have interacted with objective reality (the realm of sovereignty) by studying the prophethoods and how they coped with the rules of divinity by following the rules of messengerhoods. These stories are invaluable historical material and need to be studied in much detail.

[221] Al-Bukh§rÊ, ‘aÈÊÈ, vol. 2, 959 (ÈadÊth no. 2550).

[222] AÈmad b. Shu#ayb Al-Nasa”Ê, Sunan al-kubr§ li”-l-Nasa”Ê (Beirut: D§r al-Kutub al-#Ilmiyya, 1991), vol. 1, 550 (ÈadÊth no. 1786).

[223] It is not quite clear from where this second meaning is derived; #aíama means ‘majesty’, ‘exaltedness’, and since it is an attribute of God it is not used to describe a human being. Lane (Book I) gives as a second meaning ‘the thick part of the forearm; the half next to the elbow, of the forearm, in which is the [main] muscle’. It seems that MS concurs with this ‘second meaning’ when he defines #aíama as strength.

[224] AH: ‘who take good care’; AA: ‘who are the managers of the affairs’; MP: ‘who are in charge’; AhA: ‘who are the support’; AB: ‘who have charge of’; MS defines the qaww§mån as ‘those in charge’ or ‘those with power and competence’. Likewise, Lane (Suppl.) describes qaww§m (a l-amr) as someone who manages and orders a thing or an affair, whereby it subsists; also as someone who has the power to withstand s. th.; but MS does not support the conventional understanding—and that of all translators—that al-rij§l means ‘men’ and al-nis§” means ‘women’. See chapter 5 for a detailed explanation.

[225] See also: ‘And further (thus): “set your face towards religion with true piety [li’l-dÊn ÈanÊf [an]], and never in any wise be of the unbelievers”’ (Yånus 10:105); ‘Abraham was indeed a model, devoutly obedient to God, (and) true in faith [ÈanÊf [an]], and he joined not gods with God’ (A l-NaÈl 16:120); ‘So We have taught you the inspired (message), “Follow the ways of Abraham the true in faith [ÈanÊf [an]], and he joined not gods with God”’ (Al-NaÈl 16:123); ‘Abraham was not a Jew nor yet a Christian; but he was true in faith [ÈanÊf [an]], and bowed his will to God’s (which is Islam), and he joined not gods with God’ ($l #Imr§n 3:67); ‘Say: “God speaks the truth: follow the religion of Abraham, the sane in faith [ÈanÊf [an]]; he was not of the pagans”’ ($l #Imr§n 3:95).

[226] MP’s translation of ÈanÊf as ‘upright’ does not reflect MS’s intended ‘non-linear’, nor do AB: ‘a pure natural believer’; AhA: ‘I have chosen one way’; AA: ‘a man of pure faith’; AH: ‘a true believer’; YA ‘never [shall I give partners to God]’. Lane (Book I) defines ÈanÊf as ‘inclining to a right state or tendency’, also ‘inclining, from any false religion, to the true religion’, but in a more general sense

‘inclining, from one religion, to another’. It seems that MS intends to capture this moment of fluctuation, shift (from one end to another), and inconsistency that lies in such ‘inclining from one to another’ when he defines ÈanÊf.

[227] Alternative rendering: ‘I have turned my face as a true believer towards Him who created the heavens and the earth. I am not one of the polytheists’ [AH adds: ‘hanÊf [an], here, refers to I (Ibrahim) not the created heavens and earth”].

[228] The term ‘liminal’ only seems diametrically opposite to the anthropological concept of ‘liminal’ as Arnold van Gennep and Victor Turner defined it. While it is true that for Turner liminality is a transitional state between two phases (during rites of passage) in which individuals were ‘betwixt and between’, i.e., neither staying any longer in the society that they previously belonged to nor yet entering into the society they will be part of in the future, and while this transitional state is characterised by an inversion of normative patterns of social hierarchy, the state of liminality in MS’s concept is a state of legislative effort by which the normative patterns of society are constantly sought after and, if necessary, reinforced. And yet, MS’s concept of liminality also acknowledges a form of legal ambiguity, openness, and indeterminacy (a l-tash§buh!) by which a certain degree of deviation (ÈanÊfiyya!) from the straight path set down by God is actually quintessential and only human. Moreover, as it is for Turner that during the state of liminality as sense of the ideal state of social existence is formed or anticipated (communitas), so is MS’s human society a permanently liminal experience that eventually leads to an ever-deeper realization (or apprehension) of divine knowledge, i.e., the totality of objective reality, which is as utopian as Turner’s notion of communitas. Because of this latter resemblance the term lex liminalis was chosen as it seems to us most appropriate to describe MS’s law of limits.

[229] The term ‘legal limits’ has been created to highlight MS’s significant departure from the traditional, legal understanding of Èadd / Èudåd which he interprets more in the literal sense of (geometrical) ‘limits’. As a legal terminus technicus, Èudåd refers to the canonical punishments that are fixed (or limited) by a clear and decisive text in the Qur’an and/or the Sunna, with regard to which a judge does not possess any discretion. The \anafÊ school describes the Èudåd punishments as ‘the right of Allah’, while the other schools see them as ‘the right of human beings’ as well. Whereas the \anafÊ school restricts the Èudåd to five crimes (illicit sexual intercourse, theft, banditry, consumption of alcohol, false accusation of illicit sexual intercourse), the M§likÊ and Sh§fi#Ê schools also include homicide, apostasy, rebellion, and sodomy. Since the punishments for these crimes are already fixed, it has been the main concern of the fuqah§” to establish what exactly constitutes theft, adultery, robbery, etc. Like MS, they regard the Èudåd punishments as the upper limit, the maximum punishment that must not be exceeded, and for which it is possible to negotiate mitigating circumstances (see al-ZuÈaylÊ, al-Fiqh al-isl§mÊ, vol. 5, 5–12; R. Peters, Crime and Punishment in Islamic Law (Cambridge: CUP, 2005), 19–30; 53–68). MS, however, differs from fiqh a) by denying that fixing the Èudåd is beyond the intellect of the human mind and because of which he therefore allows human reason to exercise ijtih§d on them, and b) by expanding the field of Èudåd legislation to include the entire field of Islamic law and not just adultery, theft, robbery, etc., i.e., the area of penal law for which the term was solely used in classical fiqh theories. MS’s much wider understanding of Èudåd as ‘God’s boundaries’ in all aspects of social, public, and private life is indeed much closer to the Qur’anic text than its conceptualization in Islamic jurisprudence. (See Encyclopaedia of the Qur’an, s.v. “Boundaries and Precepts.” (R. Kimber), 252– 53).

[230] This includes, says MS, legislation all over the world that is based on the existence of limits even if legislators are not aware that they notionally fulfil the guidelines set out in the Book. A good example is the prohibition of the death penalty in many countries of the world. Another example is the common practice of many banks not to charge interest of more than 100 percent of the given loan money (guidelines for this will be explained below in this chapter). Finally, there is the practice of many orphanages not to accept new admissions beyond the age of two. In all of these cases the practice is entirely Islamic even if it is not called or known by this attribute.

[231] ‘And remember Moses said to his people: “God commands that you sacrifice a heifer.” They said: “Are you making a laughing-stock of us?” He said: “God save me from being an ignorant (fool)!” They said: “Beseech on our behalf your Lord to make plain to us what (heifer) it is!” He said; “He says: The heifer should be neither too old nor too young, but of middling age. Now do what you are commanded!” They said: “Beseech on our behalf your Lord to make plain to us her colour.” He said: “He says: A fawn-coloured heifer, pure and rich in tone, the admiration of beholders!” They said: “Beseech on our behalf your Lord to make plain to us what she is; to us are all heifers alike. We wish indeed for guidance, if God wills.” He said: “He says: A heifer not trained to till the soil or water the fields; sound and without blemish.” They said: “Now have you brought the truth.” Then they offered her in sacrifice, but not with good-will’ (Al-Baqara 2:67–71).

[232] This goes back to a story narrated by al-QurãubÊ according to which #Umar pardoned a servant who had stolen ‘from the property of his master and from the property of someone of the bayt al-m§l’. The reason #Umar gave was that the servant had (even if only nominally) a share in the master’s property (lahu fÊhÊ naßÊb[un]). No dissension, according to the sources, was reported from his companions (see Abå #Abdall§h MuÈammad b. AÈmad al-Anß§rÊ al-QurãubÊ, al-J§mi# li-aÈk§m al-qur”§n (Cairo, n.p., 1952), 2nd ed., vol. 6, 169).

[233] In traditional \anafÊ law the following conditions have to be fulfilled before a punishment for theft can be carried out: a) the thief at the time of the crime is mentally sound; b) he/she has reached the age of puberty; c) he/she has stolen something not less than the worth of a niß§b that is one dÊn§r or ten dirhams (i.e., the equivalent of ca. 4.373 grams of gold); d) he/she has stolen something securely held; e) he/she did not steal under coercion; f) he/she did not steal as a result of (mental) confusion; g) the stolen item was wholly owned by someone else; h) there exists a confession of theft or the testimony of two witnesses. If these conditions are fulfilled, the thief’s right hand is to be amputated. If a convicted thief stole for a second time, his/her left foot is to be amputated; and if a third time, he/she is to be imprisoned until he/she repents (see #Abd al-GhanÊ al-Mayd§nÊ, Lub§b fÊ sharÈ al-kit§b (Beirut: D§r al-Kit§b al-#ArabÊ, n.d.), vol. 1, 336–41). In contrast to this, MS allows more mitigating circumstances and he allows, in addition, the introduction of a completely different set of punishments (even if all eight conditions have been met in the case of theft), whereby the amputation of the hand or foot is avoided at all costs.

[234] \anafÊ law provides a very similar ruling but supplies a much more complex lists of lawful and unlawful food that MS wants to avoid by referring to an exhaustively clear lower limit of food taboos. \anafÊ jurists distinguish between meat from animals that live in the sea and those that live on land, and then between a) bloodless animals, b) animals that bleed if slaughtered, and c) animals that do not bleed; and finally with regards to category b) between domestic and wild animals. Everything from the sea except fish is unlawful, so are bloodless, blood-static (except locusts), and wild animals. Consumption of animals that live from impure substances are also unlawful unless they were fed with lawful substances before they were slaughtered. These categories and distinctions are not all Qur'anic and hence have for MS no legal significance (see #Al§" al-DÊn al-K§s§nÊ, al-Bad§"i# al-ßan§"i# fi'l-tartÊb al-shar§"i#, vol. 5, 35–62).

[235] According to \anafÊ law there are several regulations that govern the handling of debts and loans in Muslim societies. The most significant regulations are as follows: a) the transaction (of a loan) must be contracted in writing; b) it is compulsory to have the testimony of two men or, in the absence of two men, the testimony of one man and two women; c) the time of the repayment and its potential deferral must be specified; d) the repayment must not be delayed (if possible); e) the repayment should not be made earlier than the specified date. This seems to follow quite closely the injunctions of 2:282–83 and is—according to MS—the lower limit in such financial transactions. However, MS interprets 2:282 as referring to verbally finalized contracts which is against the fuqah§"s understanding of a reference to written contracts. According to MS, if the contract is written down, the minimum requirement is the testimony of one man and one woman, not one man and two women.

[236] For a detailed analysis of 24:31, see chapter 5. The rendering of 24:31 has been done by myself [AC] in the light of MS's interpretations thereof. MS deviates considerably from the conventional renderings of this verse so that no available translation can be used.

[237] Like YA, all translators render fa-aqta#å aidiyahum§ as 'cut off the hands' (AH; AA; MP, MF; AB), except AhA who writes 'cut his hand' and adds a similar argument as MS: 'in 12:31 […] [it] means they wounded their hands or stopped peeling fruit, not cut off their hands. Hence here, in v. 38, it could mean to stop their [i.e., the thieves'] hands from stealing by adopting a deterrent' (fn. 2, 113).

[238] All translators without exception (i.e., including AhA) render la-uqaããi#ann[a] as 'to cut off' and do not seem to see a problem in the (technically) impossible sequence of punishment from amputation to crucifixion.

[239] Only on this last point does MS differ from classical Islamic jurisprudence which does not accept imprisonment as a form of punishment. If someone is killed accidentally (khaãa") or semi-intentionally (shibh #amd) the killer is liable to pay an increased blood price (diya mughallaía) and retaliation is thus avoided. But MS upholds the notion of qiß§ß or retaliation in the case of intentional killing, and yet he does not specify whether the state authorities or the family of the victim perform the act of retaliation. According to Islamic fiqh, qiß§ß is carried out by the nearest kin of the victim after the conviction has been officially confirmed. The schools differ as to who among the relatives has the right to demand qiß§ß, but they agree that if the victim has no known relatives the state will take over the task of qiß§ß. The M§likÊ, Sh§fi#Ê, and \anbalÊ schools state that the murderer is to be killed in the same way as he murdered his victim, while the \anafÊ school allows in principal only execution by the sword—but for other types of punishment they acknowledge the possibility of ta#zÊr, i.e., discretionary considerations by the executive officials and judges. See al-ZuÈaylÊ, al-Fiqh al-isl§mÊ, vol. 7, 494–532; Peters, Crime and Punishment, 38–53.

[240] #Alms [ßadaq§t] are for the […] [financially enslaved] [fi ’l-riq§b] […]. (Thus is it) ordained by God, and God is full of knowledge and wisdom’ (A l-Tawba 9:60). Translators maintain ‘slaves’ in their rendering of riq§b, but MP widens its meaning to: ‘to free the captives’ (but not for 2:177 where he keeps ‘slaves’), also AhA: ‘redeeming slaves (and captives).

[241] ‘It is not righteousness that you turn your faces towards East or West. But it is righteousness to believe in God and the Last Day, and the angels, and the Book, and the messengers; to spend of your substance [“at§ a l-m§l], out of love for Him, for […] the ransom of [the financially enslaved] [fi ’l-riq§b]; to be steadfast in prayer, and practice regular charity [zak§h]; to fulfil the contracts which you have made; and to be firm and patient, in pain (or suffering) and adversity, and throughout all periods of panic. Such are the people of truth, the God-fearing’ (Al-Baqara 2:177).

[242] MS understands the Arabic word al-f§Èisha in this context not as ‘lewdness’ in the sense of any illicit heterosexual relations (adultery or fornication) but as an illicit public homosexual intercourse between either two women (4:15) or two men (4:16). This allows him to see no contradiction with the other verses (and what they contain of punishments) that deal with ‘abomination’ in a heterosexual context.

[243] The harshness of MS’s verdict on repeated public homosexual activity reflects the severity by which homosexuality is treated in Islamic fiqh. In the M§likÊ, Sh§fi#Ê, and \anbalÊ schools homosexual intercourse is equated to illicit sexual intercourse (al-zin§) and is, therefore, punished by death through stoning (M§likÊ) or the sword (Sh§fi#Ê and \anbalÊ). According to the \anafÊ school, punishment is determined by ta#zÊr or discretionary (corrective) chastisement because the treatment of the punishment for homosexuality lacks, unlike zin§, a clear naßß. The most frequently prescribed punishment by \anafÊ jurists is flogging or imprisonment, but they acknowledge the possibility of the death penalty if the ‘offence’ is repeated (see al-JazÊrÊ, al-Fiqh #al§ ’l-madh§hib al-arba#a, vol. 5, 63; Peters, Crime and Punishment, 61–62). MS demands punishments ‘short of death’ which means that he follows the position of the \anafÊ school in the case of nonrepentance and the continuation of homosexual practices. As for female homosexuality, it is a great offence according to all four schools. There is however, a consensus among the fuqah§” that the rule of Èadd is not applied to lesbianism, so that the punishment is given according to ta#zÊr, because full sexual intercourse (with penetration) does not take place between two women (see a l-JazÊrÊ, a l-Fiqh, vol. 5, 63). MS follows this logic of ‘lighter punishment’ and proposes corrective ta#zÊr measures of chastising lesbian ‘offenders’. MS stays more or less within the remits of classical fiqh but restricts punishments for homosexuality to acts of sexual intercourse in public. His more liberal interpretation allows homosexual couples a loving relationship without feeling guilty as long as they do not act it out in public. In this respect, public homosexual intercourse is not better or worse than public heterosexual intercourse which is equally illicit. What matters is not the sexual orientation of people but the undermining of the public order through sexual obscenities. This queer-friendly interpretation offers a possibility to homosexual Muslims to reconcile their sexuality to their faith.

[244] According to \anafÊ law, both man and woman must be held accountable for the offence of zin§ if they meet the following criteria: a) that they had illicit sexual intercourse (with penetration), outside a marital relationship, and b) that they either confessed this act four times on four different occasions, or four witnesses testified against them by providing specific details about the intercourse. As for its punishment, if the offender is a muÈßan/a, i.e., if he or she is a free adult who has previously enjoyed legitimate sexual relations in matrimony, he/she would be punished by death (stoning). If he/she is not a muÈßan/a the punishment is one hundred lashes applied to the whole body except for the face and the private parts (see Ibn Mawdåd al-MåßilÊ, al-Ikhtiy§r li-ta#lÊl al-mukht§r, vol. 2, 311–16). It is obvious that MS does not accept the death penalty since it cannot be supported by any textual evidence from the Qur’an (it is based on a ÈadÊth that changed flogging into stoning, even though the ÈadÊth only mentions the stoning of the married female adulterer. See Peters, Crime and Punishment, 60).

[245] Ambros summarises the use of rib§ as follows: ‘lit. “increase”, is used in eight places, with reference to the practice of lending money (or possibly other goods) with an increased charge, in at least three different ways: 1. “the practice in question itself” (2:275, 2nd & 3rd occ.s), 2. “(unlawful) gain from this practice” (2:275, 1st occ., 2:276, 3:130, 4:161), 3. “money that is lent” (30:39), while in the last place (2:278) the word appears to mean “contract stipulating the payment of interest” or possibly “outstanding payment of interest” (note the spelling in 30:39 r-b-” indet., in the other places articled: “lrbw”’(Ambros, Dictionary, 107–8).

[246] In the \anafÊ fiqh literature rib§ is commonly described as of two kinds: a) rib§ al-nasÊ”a, also defined as credit, and b) rib§ al-fa·l or surplus rib§. The first kind, rib§ al-nasÊ”a, refers to a transaction of goods by which one party receives a higher amount in return for accepting the delay of payment by the other party. The second kind, rib§ al-fa·l, refers to an exchange of similar goods between two parties in which one party receives an unfair gain in the six forbidden commodities: gold, silver, barley, salt, wheat, and dates. For both kinds of rib§ the legal ruling is Èurma, impermissibility, which rendered the transaction as f§sid, corrupt or incomplete. However, the example is often quoted of the ßaÈ§ba who believed that only the second type is impermissible as it was explicitly forbidden by the Qur’an, while the first type was only mentioned in the Sunna. Al-ZuÈaylÊ believes that this opinion has been challenged by the majority of fuqah§” and that a consensus has been established according to which all types of rib§ are forbidden (see a l-ZuÈaylÊ, al-Fiqh al-isl§mÊ, vol. 5, 353–71). MS aims at bypassing this uncompromising disapproval of financial gain through rib§ and proposes a more flexible position whereby financial gains are controlled, reassessed, and, if necessary, capped by state regulations (more in line with the existing banking system).

[247] MS’s definitions of the Arabic terms are not given by any of the consulted translations. A typical rendering [by YA] would be: “It is not righteousness that you turn your faces towards East or West; but it is righteousness to believe in God and the Last Day, and the angels, and the Book, and the messengers; to spend of your substance, out of love for Him, for your kin, for orphans, for the needy, for the wayfarer, for those who ask, and for the ransom of slaves; to be steadfast in prayer, and practice regular charity; to fulfil the contracts which you have made; and to be firm and patient, in pain (or suffering) and adversity, and throughout all periods of panic. Such are the people of truth, the God-fearing’ (Al-Baqara 2:177).

[248] Same as previous footnote; YA renders this verse as follows: #Alms are for the poor and the needy, and those employed to administer the (funds); for those whose hearts have been (recently) reconciled (to truth); for those in bondage and in debt; in the cause of God; and for the wayfarer: (thus is it) ordained by God, and God is full of knowledge and wisdom’ (Al-Tawba 9:60).

[249] In brief, qiy§s in Islamic fiqh means judicial analogy and is a juristic tool that legal scholars use when they are dealing with issues for which there is no specific provision in the Qur’an or the Sunna. It is technically defined as the extension of an original legal precedent to a subsidiary case by virtue of an effective ‘illa, or cause common to both. Not all judicial analogies today take their original legal precedent from the early period of Islam, but it is the case—as MS says—that the fuqah§” aim to legitimize their legal rulings by at least one supportive statement (that resembles in cause or reason their current ruling) from the Sunna or other early authoritative texts of their legal school. For MS, such reassurance by rulings of the past is an obstacle to the formulation of a system of law that is firmly rooted in the contemporary, modern, period.

[250] MS alludes here to Newton’s groundbreaking solutions to inherently difficult problems in analytical geometry by drawing tangents to curves (differentiation) and by having defined areas bounded by curves (integration), which are both elementary for MS’s approach to solving the problems of Islamic inheritance law. The specific mathematical reference here is to Newton’s method of approximation that is iterative and that employs a differential expression which is the derivative f″(x) of the function, a kind of a fluxion that is based on a theory of limits. See P. Kitcher, “Fluxions, Limits, and Infinite Littleness: A Study of Newton’s Presentation of the Calculus,” Isis 64, no. 221 (1973), 33–49, and N. Kollerstrom, “Newton’s Method of Approximation: An Enduring Myth,” British Journal for History of Science 25 (1992), 347–54.

[251] The slave trade in Islam was banned for the first time in 1847 for the region of the Persian Gulf, and in 1887 the authorities of the Ottoman Empire signed with Great Britain a convention against it. The last Muslim countries to outlaw slavery were Qatar (1952), Saudi Arabia (1962), and Mauritania (1980). Even though slavery is now not practiced any longer in the Arab and Muslim world, Islamic fiqh ‘only’ strongly discourages the practice of slavery but does not, because it cannot formally abolish an explicitly condoned practice in the Qur’an, declare it as obsolete. Hence, the notion of slavery still exists in principle (see al-ZuÈaylÊ, al-Fiqh al-isl§mÊ, vol. 3, 359–61; vol. 8, 67–69. See also William Clarence-Smith, Islam and the Abolition of Slavery (New York: OUP, 2006)).

[252] A female companion of the Prophet who died in the year 655. She came from the famous tribe of the Banå Asad and was known for her elegant poetry and her skills in warfare. She was among the Muslim women who were taken as prisoners of war during the Battle of Yarmåk where she led a campaign to fight for their freedom. She also impressed the caliph #Umar b. al-Khaãã§b and the Muslim commander Kh§lid b. WalÊd with her bravery when she came to Syria to free her brother 4ir§r who was held captive by the Byzantine army (see Abå #Abd All§h al-W§qidÊ, FutåÈ al-Sh§m (Beirut: D§r al-Kutub al-#Ilmiyya, 1997), 42–48; 208).

[253] Sumayya bint a l-Khayy§ã, a female Abyssinian slave of Abå \uzayfa b. al-MughÊra who had converted to Islam in the early period of MuÈammad’s mission. She died as a result of brutal torture by Abå Jahl and was subsequently considered the first female martyr in Islam, although strictly speaking in a (traditional) Sunni Islamic context, martyrs are primarily those who fight unbelievers for the advancement of Islam in a military confrontation and who sacrifice their lives for this. As a consequence, Muslim exegetes count those fighters who fell at UÈud (625) as the first martyrs (see Encyclopaedia of the Qur’an, s.v. “Martyrs.” (W. Raven), 281–87). MS vehemently contests this definition of martyrdom (see chapter 6), that is why he considers Sumayya as the true first martyr of Islam.

[254] Like YA other translators render the Arabic al-n§s and al-nis§” as referring to men (al-n§s) and women (al-nis§”), even though al-n§s is gender neutral and includes men and women, AH: ‘the love of desirable things is made alluring for men—women, children…’; AA: ‘Decked out fair to men is the love of lusts—women, children…’. Other translators render al-n§s in a more generic sense as ‘mankind’ (although still gendered—it should be humankind!) or ‘people’, but still translate al-nis§” as ‘women’; AB: ‘To mankind the love of worldly appetites is painted in glowing colours: women and children’; MF: ‘attractive to mankind is made the pleasures of women’; AhA: ‘Enamoured are the people of the lust of (earthly) pleasures, of women and of children’; MP: ‘Beautified for mankind is love of the joys (that come) from women and offspring’. This rendition of [gender biased] mankind (loves) women is for MS still not satisfactory since it: a) allows us to regard women as a commodity, not more than ‘heaped-up hoards of gold and silver, and b) it is theologically inconsistent since mankind’s (at least generically comprising both men and women) love of women sanctions women’s love of women and this is not explicitly sanctioned by the Book.

[255] Like YA, AH renders al-nis§” straightforwardly as ‘wives’, implying that the verse addresses the (sexual) relationship of a (heterosexual) marriage, ‘your wives are your fields’. The others keep al-nis§” generically as ‘women’, MF, AA: ‘your women are a tillage for you’; AhA: ‘women are like fields for you’; MP: ‘your women are a tilth for you’; AB: ‘your women are fertile fields for you’, but both renderings are for MS still inherently misogynist in the way they project women as objects or commodities for sating men’s lust.

[256] The translators of the Qur’an are no exception to this, as we can see in the examples given in the two previous footnotes.

[257] ‘Mankind’ is, unlike the nongendered Arabic term al-n§s, a gendered term. That is why ‘humankind’ much better translates the gender neutrality of the Arabic original.

[258] MS says ‘sons and daughters of Adam’, in contrast to YA’s rendering of baniya adam as only ‘sons of Adam’; also AB ‘the sons of Adam’, but others have kept it, as MS, more gender neutral, MF, AhA, MP, AA, AH: ‘the Children of Adam’.

[259] These are the bounds set by God, so do not go near them [la taqrabåh§]… (Al-Baqara 2:187, AH).

[260] MS adds in a footnote: ‘Testimony has been prescribed in several verses of the Book, and in verse 180 of Sårat a l-Baqara it is enforced in a similar authoritative manner as the command to pray and to fast. “It is prescribed, when death approaches any of you, if he leave any goods that he make a bequest to parents and next of kin, according to reasonable usage—this is due from the God-fearing.” In contrast, verses of inheritance are only three, as in Sårat a l-Nis§” 11–13. Moreover, in four different passages, Allah clearly prioritizes the attention to bequests over the payment of inheritance; one of them reads as follows: “[In all cases, the distribution comes] after the payment of any bequests or debts…” (A l-Nis§” 4:11). This quotation needs no further explanation!”

[261] This rendering of YA is shared by AH: ‘daughters, two or more’, but the Arabic term is nis§” (women), not ban§t (daughters), and also the other translators accept that fawq ithnatain means ‘more than or above two’, AB: ‘if there are more than two daughters’, and that al-nis§” does not specifically connote only ‘daughters’, AA: ‘if they be women above two’; MP: ‘women more than two’; AhA: ‘women only, and of them more than two’; MF: ‘if there be more than two females’.

[262] How does the verse indicate this by employing walad—child? That is, how does this imply the existence of the nonbiological mother Mary (umm)? MS adds that the verses about Jesus and Mary show that, when the boy Jesus was about to be conceived by Mary, his mother is referred to in the text as w§lida (because she was then under the impression that she would be the biological mother of Jesus), but when Jesus was an adult and all the details of his perception were made clear to Mary, the verses refer to Jesus as Ibn Maryam, implying that she was his umm, not his w§lida.

[263] MS added a comment that a caregiver-mother is the main type of a nonbiological mother; other types are, for example, a surrogate mother or a wet nurse; caregiver-mothers are foster mothers who have either adopted their children or cared for them during their childhood (without formally adopting them). In this role she will inherit from her children, not the child's biological mother.

[264] See chapter 4: MS defines mas§kÊn not as poor but as handicapped people, i.e., those whose bodily functions are paralyzed or 'still' (sakana).

[265] 'From what is left by parents and those nearest related there is a share for men and a share for women, whether the property be small or large—a determinate share' (Al-Nis§" 4:7).

[266] The best translation in MS's sense would be: 'If there are more than two females (in the family), their share is…', as observed by MF: 'If there be more than two females, then they should receive…' and AA: 'And if they be women above two, then for them…'.

[267] Some translators ignore the exact syntactic sequence of the Arabic verse 'if there are women, more than two' and condense it to: 'if there are more than two women/daughters/females', e.g., AB: 'if there are more than two daughters'; MF: 'if there be more than two females', more precise are AA: 'if they be women above two'; MP: 'women more than two'; AhA: 'women only, and of them more than two'.

[268] The technical term is Èajb (prevention). Syria changed the old rules of inheritance in 1952. According to the new law, grandchildren and grandparents are now entitled to receive their shares even if the parents or children of a deceased are no longer alive. Previously, grandparents/grandchildren were excluded from the inheritance even though those who excluded them when they were alive (i.e., parents or children of the deceased) had already died. The inheritance was then simply distributed elsewhere, while grandparents/grandchildren received nothing at all. Now, the inheritance is distributed as if they were alive but no longer exclude the more distant in line. However, only male inheritors are considered, while women are still excluded from inheriting anything at all. MS wants to change this as well and proposes that both sexes benefit from this change of law.

[269] In this reversal of priorities MS deliberately departs from traditional Islamic fiqh. Even though the importance of a bequest is acknowledged by all schools of law, there is also a consensus that the deceased's will cannot overrule the laws of inheritance. A will is seen as significant only if the deceased was in debt so that his leftover wealth can be used to repay the debts or similar liabilities. According to \anafÊ law it is not permitted to write a bequest for someone's legal inheritors (who will be allotted their fixed share). It is also the rule that, after paying off the deceased's debts, a bequest can only amount to a third of the person's wealth (see a l-JazÊrÊ, al-Fiqh #al§'l-madh§hib a l-arba#a, vol. 3, 134–40). The rules of inheritance law say that the full wealth of the deceased, or of what remains in case debts had to be repaid or onethird had to be bequeathed, is distributed among the inheritors. \anafÊ law distinguishes between two primary groups: a) aßÈ§b al-furå·, or those who possess the obligatory (shares), i.e., father, mother, grandfather, grandmother, husband, wife, full sister, consanguine sister, uterine brother and uterine sister, and b) al-#aßabah, or the residuary heirs, who consist of three groups, 1) the agnatic heirs, i.e., brother, son, paternal uncle, and nephew, 2) the parallel residuary, i.e., daughter, the son's daughter, sister, and consanguine sister, and 3) the uterine heirs, i.e., those who have kinship with the deceased (see al-Mayd§nÊ, al-Lub§b fÊ sharÈ al-kit§b, vol. 1, 419–27). It is obvious that MS not only restored the supremacy of bequest over inheritance laws, he also reformed the inheritance laws to a considerable extent in his effort to make them less complicated, much leaner, and entirely focused on the relatives of the first and second degree. In return, he widened the scope of bequests so that those relatives who are, in this new model, no longer considered as legal inheritors have a greater chance to become beneficiaries of a will.

[270] The term polygyny is defined as the practice of having more than one female partner (either wife or sexual partner) at the same time. Since the Arabic term ta#addud a l-zaw§j has only been discussed as a concept that pertains to the marriage of more than one wife, the more general term polygamy (marriage of more than one male or female partner) has not been used.

[271] And give the women (on marriage) their dower as a free gift; but if they, of their own good pleasure, remit any part of it to you, take it and enjoy it with right good cheer. * To those weak of understanding, make not over your property, which God has made a means of support for you, but feed and clothe them therewith, and speak to them words of kindness and justice (Al-Nis§” 4:4–5).

[272] AA’s translation comes closest to MS’s intention. YA’s rendering ‘marry women of your choice’ seems to yield an element of arbitrariness (on the side of the marrying men) that MS would not tolerate. Similarly, MF: ‘marry such of the women as appeal to you’; MP: ‘women who seem good to you’; AH: ‘marry whichever [other] women seem good to you’, while AB: ‘marry other permissible women’ and AhA: ‘marry women who are lawful for you’ [fn. i.e., those who are not al-maÈ§rim] understand m§ ã§ba lakum as a legal phrase indicating ‘lawful’ or ‘legitimate’.

[273] AH: ‘orphan girls’ [in your charge]; MF: ‘orphan women’; AA: ‘orphan women’; MP: ‘female orphans’; AhA: ‘orphaned women (in your charge)’; AB: ‘orphan girls’; clearly, for once, YA, unlike the other translators, captures MS’s intention to see here an objective genitive, by saying: ‘orphan of women’.

[274] According to all four legal schools, it is permissible for a man in normal circumstances to have up to a maximum of four wives at a time, provided that equality, such as the provision of food and maintenance as well as parity in overnight stays, can be guaranteed among all wives. The four schools only differ in explaining what exactly constitutes the required equal treatment of all wives, and it is correct to say that Islamic fiqh does not discuss the virginal, family, or economic status of the future wives, i.e., the fuqah§” do not suggest what MS calls a qualitative examination of the wife in spe, but only an assessment of the situation of the existing, current wife of the polygynous husband or of the situation after he has already married a new wife (see al-JazÊrÊ, al-Fiqh #al§’l-madh§hib al-arba#a, vol. 4, 85; 115–20).

[275] Other translators render al-nis§” not as YA by the old formal, legal term ‘consort’ but straightforwardly as ‘wife’; AH, AB, AA: ‘Wives of the Prophet’; MF, AhA: ‘O wives of the Prophet’; MP: ‘O you wives of the Prophet’. The SÊra and \adÊth scholars disagree about the exact number of his wives, some count nine as the minimum, others twelve as the maximum. The \anafÊ school lists eleven wives: 1) KhadÊja bint Khuwaylid, 2) Sawda bint Zam”a, 3) #$“isha bint Abå Bakr, 4) \afßa bint #Umar, 5) Zaynab bint Khuzayma, 6) Umm Salima bint Abå Umayya, 7) Zaynab bint JaÈsh, 8) Juwayriyya bint \§rith, 9) Umm \abÊba bint Abå Sufy§n, 10) ‘afiyya bint \uyaÊ, and 11) Maymåna bint a l-\§rith. M§riya a l-Qibãiyya (12) was a slave woman gifted to the Prophet by the king of Egypt. According to the \ anafÊ position she remained a slave (and cannot be counted as a wife), while others argued that the Prophet freed her and formally married her afterwards.

[276] MS proposes here a purely historical approach to the Prophet’s personal and marital practices, which is, inevitably, turning the traditional fiqh position on its head. The legal scholars have generally maintained that there were only very few specific rulings that only applied to the Prophet, one of which is that he was allowed to perform ßawm a l-wiß§l (a continuous fast that ignores the normal break after sunset during Ramadan), and another was the permission to marry more than four wives at a time (see above).

[277] MF, AA, AhA: ‘aversion’; AH: #alienation’; AB: ‘cruelty or aversion’; MP: ‘illtreatment’.

[278] MF, MP, AB: ‘to be in charge’; AH: ‘to take good care’; YA: ‘to guard and protect’; AhA: ‘to support’; AA: ‘to manage the affairs’. In particular AA’s rendering corresponds with MS’s interpretation of al-qaww§mån.

[279] Here, MS’s interpretation of al-rij§l is unique; no translator renders ar-rij§l different from either ‘men’ (AA, MP, AhA, AB, MF) or ‘husband’ (AH). Lane gives the same derivatives as MS and lists as the only possibility whereby al-rajul can connote both sexes as al-rajul§n, i.e., the dual of sing. rajul, ‘sometimes means a man and his wife’ [my emphasis] but adds that ‘predominance being thus attributed to the former’; or a l-rajula, ‘a woman who is, or affects to be, or makes herself, like a man in some of her qualities, or states, or predicaments’ adding that #$“isha was called rajulat al-ra”y, ‘meaning she was like a man in judgement’. It seems that the term is predominately masculinised and that MS relies here on the gender-neutral meanings of all the other derivatives of r-j-l in order to render al-rij§l as unisex.

[280] Al-NÊs§bårÊ, ‘aÈÊÈ Muslim, vol. 8, 8 (ÈadÊth no. 8867).

[281] All translators consulted think otherwise and translate al-nis§”, like YA, as ‘women’. Ambros lists, as do all other dictionaries, al-nis§” under the radical root of n-s-w (Ambros, Dictionary: 267), whereas MS links al-nis§” to the root of n-s-”, hence his interpretation of nis§” in the sense of nasÊ”, lit. ‘postponed’. However, the link is not as far-fetched as it seems. Lane lists under n-s-” terms such as nas” [un], nus” [un] and nis” [un]: ‘a woman who is supposed to be pregnant’, also nasu” [un] or nusu” [un]: ‘in whom pregnancy has appeared’; in the sense of nasi” [un]: ‘a woman whose menstrual discharge is later than its usual time, and who is therefore hoped to be pregnant’. In the last example, the semantic connection between n-s-” and n-s-w is clearly evident, and it seems that MS bases his interpretation of al-nis§” on this.

[282] Some translators render a l-n§s as ‘men’, but MF and others follow MS and say ‘attractive to mankind’ (i.e., men and women) and yet still translate al-nis§” as ‘women’, leaving it unexplained why the text states that all mankind (including women) lust after women, implying a natural disposition (lesbian-homosexual love) that is theologically very difficult to uphold.

[283] AA, MF, MP: ‘or their women’; AH: ‘their womenfolk’; some translators feel uncomfortable translating ‘women in front of their women’ and insert a qualifying attribute, e.g., AB: ‘or other women’, or AhA: ‘or their women attendants or captives’, the latter linking nis§“ihinna together with the following m§ malakat aim§nuhunna (captive slaves) which both combined results in ‘women attendants or captives’, i.e., women of inferior class.

[284] This breaks entirely with the unambiguously gendered definition of qiw§ma in Islamic fiqh. According to the \anafÊ school of law, qiw§ma means that the husband is liable to pay the mahr (dower) to his wife and that he (and only he!) is responsible for the financial support and maintenance of his wife and his family throughout their marriage (see al-MåßilÊ, al-Ikhtiy§r li’l-ta#lÊl al-mukht§r, vol. 4, 229).

[285] Most translators, though, render this phrase exactly like this, e.g., MP: ‘good women are the obedient’; MF: ‘righteous women are obedient’; AA: ‘righteous women are therefore obedient’; YA: ‘righteous women are devoutly obedient’; AB: ‘Right-acting women are obedient’, and only AH, YA, and AB see the verse as referring to a marital context. AhA expressly wants to avoid the potential (ideological and legal) abuse of such a rendering and qualifies obedience as nonmarital: ‘women who are virtuous are obedient to God’ [fn. only to God]. MS, in addition, wants to exclude the possibility of understanding ‘righteousness’ as obedience (to God) which is expressed purely in outward forms of ritual devotion and as (purely quantitatively) increased piety.

[286] The suffix pronoun of nushåzahunna refers back to al-ß§liÈ§t[un] q§nit§t[un], so if translators have rendered the latter as referring to a marital context, as did AH, YA, and AB, they must then understand the latter as referring to the nushåz of wives, even though the verse explicitly neither states ‘husband’ nor ‘wife’ (this is why MF, MP, AhA, AA regard, similar to MS, nushåzahunna as a reference to women in general, wives or not).

[287] Abå D§wåd a l-Sajist§nÊ, Sunan AbÊ D§wåd (Beirut: D§r a l-Fikr, n.d.), vol. 3, 248 (ÈadÊth no. 2146).

<right>

[288] MF, AB, AA: ‘and beat them’; AH: ‘then hit them (fn. with a single blow)’; YA:

</right>

‘beat them (lightly)’; MP, with a reference to physical violence, says: ‘chastise them’;

AhA suggests instead a sympathetic act of reconciliation: ‘and go to bed with them (when they are willing)’. In a footnote, he refers to al-RaghÊb (al-Mufrid§t fÊ gharÊb a l-qur”§n) who said that ·araba metaphorically means to have intercourse, and quotes as proof the phrase ·araba a l-faÈl a l-n§qa, ‘the stud camel covered the she-camel', and concludes that ·araba cannot be taken here to mean 'to strike them (women)', (78–79). MS's rendering of wa-"·ribåhunna as a civilized conveyance of discontent and rebuke is perhaps closest to AhA's nonviolent understanding of the phrase.

[289] 'Nushåz relative to women has been commonly referred in English as denoting "disobedience, disloyalty, and rebellion" (relative to a husband) as in 4:34, but when used in relation to men (relative to a wife or wives) it has been translated into English as "cruelty or desertion" as seen in 4:128. The male translators of the standard English versions of the Qur'an have conducted an exegetical act in the very process of translating'. See Encyclopaedia of the Qur'an, s.v. "Gender." (M. Badran), 292—this is a valid point in spite of AB's 'cruelty', see above.

[290] Only YA and AH translate imra"at[un] directly as 'wife', while MF, MP, AB, AA, AhA say: 'woman' which is only indirectly qualified as wife through '…her husband' (ba#lih§). MS's point is that neither imra"a nor ba#l refer to the conjugal relationship between a husband (zawj) and his wife (zawja), implying that their relationship must be differently defined, i.e., in nonsexual marital and nonmarital terms. This rendering of ba#l is unique; Lane and Ambros treat it as synonymous with zawj.

[291] ZÊna will be explained below as the beauty of a woman that has two dimensions: a) a visible beauty (nose, eyes, mouth, ears, etc.) and a hidden beauty (her private parts called juyåb and furåj). This description differs from the traditional understanding insofar as zÊna connotes beauty that primarily consists of ornaments and adornments and only secondarily of the natural beauty of the female body. See #AlÊ b. AbÊ Bakr b. #Abd al-JalÊl al-Rashd§nÊ al-MarghÊn§nÊ, al-Hid§ya (Cairo: Maãba#at Mußãaf§ al-B§bÊ, n.d.), vol. 4, 458.

[292] MS refers here to the so-called deferred dowry, al-mu"akhkhar, which is held back by the husband until a divorce arises.

After a divorce has taken place the husband would (at least theoretically) pay the amount of dowry that was agreed upon at the time of the marriage contract. If the marriage has not been consummated, the wife would still be entitled to half of the agreed mahr. If the mahr was not stipulated at the time of the contract, the wife would be entitled to mahr mithlÊ, i.e., a dowry typically given for a woman of the same status and class if the marriage was consummated, if not, she would be entitled to mut#as or gifts (see a l-MåßilÊ, a l-Ikhtiy§r li'l-ta#lÊl al-mukht§r, vol. 3, 127–30). According to MS, these regulations reveal the structural problem of the current fiqh law of divorce, because the financial compensation for women is fixed solely on the payment of the dowry which is—given the actual wealth (money and property) that husband and wife shared during their marriage—a rather pitiful share.

[293] According to \anafÊ law, the right of divorce has been granted to men only. If a woman wants a divorce but her husband refuses to initiate the legal steps, she can opt for khul# by which her husband agrees to release her in return for financial compensation from his wife's family. This arrangement is called ãal§q b§"in or irrevocable divorce (see a l-MåßilÊ, al-Ikhtiy§r li'l-ta#lÊl al-mukht§r, vol. 3, 127–32). If, however, it turns out that it was the husband's faults that led his wife to opt for khul#, then the husband would not be allowed to ask for any financial compensation in return (see Abå Bakr b. Mas#åd al-K§s§nÊ, Bad§"i# al-ßan§"i# fÊ tartÊb al-shar§"i# (Cairo: Maãba#at al-Jam§liyya, n.d.), vol. 3, 149–50). A different way for a woman to seek divorce is through faskh, i.e. an official annulment of marriage by a court on the grounds that her husband is either impotent or insane, or that he has neglected his duty to maintain her and his family. If these conditions have been stipulated in the marriage contract, their breach will be considered as sufficient reason for a divorce. The woman would then be entitled to get the dowry that was fixed at the time of the contract, if the marriage has been consummated (see MuÈammad b. MuÈammad AmÊn Ibn #$bidÊn, \§shiyyat radd al-Mukht§r (Beirut: D§r a l-IÈy§" a l-Tur§th a l-#ArabÊ, n.d.), vol. 13, 130–34). Again, MS criticises the fiqh rules as highly inadequate since it is seen as the norm that the husband initiates a divorce, while

khul# and faskh are regarded as exceptions that are—even if theoretically acknowledged in fiqh—socially disapproved.

[294] It is interesting to note that Èij§b has been discussed in fiqh literature both as a social category (seclusion) as well as in its sense of a piece of cloth (veil), whereby one might regard the latter as the material marker of the former. In the tradition of the \anafÊ school, three levels of Èij§b have been discussed: 1) a woman must stay indoors except in cases of necessity; 2) if she leaves the house and goes to public places or other houses of non-maÈ§rim relatives, she must dress herself with a long, loose outer garment that, at least, covers her head and is drawn to her bosom; and 3) a woman must observe the rulings of #awra (explained below in fn. 74, p. 326–27), (see ShafÊ# #Uthm§nÊ, Ma#§rif al-qur”§n (Karachi: Id§rat al-Ma#§rif, 2005), vol. 7, 214–20). From this it is clear that Èij§b has been traditionally understood as both seclusion and veil, the latter being the visual sign of maintaining a form of seclusion whose enforcement is required both in the private and public spheres (the veil replacing the walls of the house).

[295] For Hinduism, see Arvind Sharma, ed., Goddesses and women in the Indic religious tradition (Leiden: Brill, 2005); Mildreth W. Pinkham, The status of women in Hinduism as reflected in the Pur§nas, Mah§bh§rata, and the R§m§yana (New York: Columbia University Press, 1941); and Lynn E. Gatwood, Devi and the spouse goddess: Women, sexuality, and marriages in India (Riverdale: Riverdale Co., 1985), ch. 5 (‘Women and Caste Level’, 75–107). For Buddhism, see Diana Y. Paul (with Frances Wilson), Women in Buddhism: Images of the feminine in Mah§y§na tradition (Berkeley; London: University of California Press, 1985), ch. 1 (‘“Temptress,” Daughter of Evil’, 3–59); and Rita M. Gross, Buddhism after patriarchy: A feminist history, analysis, and reconstruction of Buddhism (Albany: State University of New York Press, 1993), ch. 2, section 5 (‘Do innate female traits and characteristics exists? Roles and images of women in Indian Mahayana Buddhism’, 55–77); I. B. Horner, Women under primitive Buddhism: Laywomen and almswomen (London: Routledge, 1930), ch. 2 (‘The daughter’, 19–34), ch. 3 (‘The wife’, 35–71).

[296] See Lynne Schreiber, ed., Hide and seek: Jewish women and hair covering (Jerusalem: Urim Publications, 2003); Carol L. Meyers, Discovering Eve: Ancient Israelite women in context (Oxford: OUP, 1991), ch. 7 (‘Household Functions and Female Roles’), 139–64; Beverly Bow and George W. E. Nickelsburg, “Patriarchy with a twist: Men and women in Tobit,” in “Women like this”: New perspectives on Jewish women in the GrecoRoman world, ed. Amy-Jill Levine, 127–43 (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1991).

[297] The term #awra is explained below. On the prohibition of a woman speaking in church, see Richard Farnworth, Woman forbidden to speak in the church: The grounds examined, the mystery opened, the truth cleared, and the ignorance both of priests and people discovered (London: Giles Calvert, 1655).

[298] See Jorunn Økland, Women in their place: Paul and the Corinthian discourse of gender and sanctuary space (London: T&T Clark, 2004); Claudia L. Thompson, “Hairstyles, head-coverings, and St. Paul: Portraits from the Roman Church,” BA 5 (June 1988): 99–115; Karen Armstrong, The Gospel according to a woman: Christianity’s creation of the sex war in the West (London: Elm Tree, 1986)—‘The result: Eve’, 52–87; ‘The four faces of Eve’, 250–58; for both Judaism and Christianity see Naomi R. Goldenberg, Changing the gods: Feminism and the end of traditional religions (Boston: Beacon Press, 1979) —‘Rebels of the Bible’, 72–84.

[299] Al-TirmidhÊ, Sunan, vol. 3, 456 (ÈadÊth no. 1159).

[300] Al-TirmidhÊ, Sunan, vol. 2, 59 (ÈadÊth no. 1165); a l-Nasa”Ê, al-Sunan al-kubr§, vol. 1, 271 (ÈadÊth no. 826).

[301] Abå Ya#lÊ Al-MåßillÊ, Musnad AbÊ Ya#lÊ (Beirut: D§r al-Ma#rifa, n.d.), (ÈadÊth no. 2455); Abå Bakr al-BayhaqÊ, Sunan a l-

BayhaqÊ a l-kubr§ (Mecca: D§r a l-B§z, 1994), vol. 7, 292 (ÈadÊth no. 14490).

[302] This is the fuqah§”’s legal interpretation of the Qur’anic term ‘temptation’ (as in 2:102; 8:28) or ‘mental confusion’ (6:23). Because of this fear of temptation or unlawful attraction it is regarded as unlawful for men to look at women’s #awra except in cases of necessity. For women, it is unlawful to dress improperly as this can cause fitna among men (a desire to have unlawful, extramarital sexual relations). \anafÊ scholars stress that this interdiction has been made regardless of the factor of temptation and that every woman has to observe the rules of #awra due to the explicit rulings (see al-ZuÈaylÊ, al-Fiqh al-isl§mÊ, vol. 4, 200–204).

[303] This is my rendering, based on YA, and in the light of MS’s interpretation of the verse. It differs considerably from the conventional understanding of this verse, perhaps best illustrated by the complete quotation from YA’s translation:

‘And say to the believing women that they should lower their gaze and guard their modesty; that they should not display their beauty and ornaments except what (must ordinarily) appear thereof; that they should draw their veils over their bosoms and not display their beauty except to their husbands, their fathers, their husband’s fathers, their sons, their husbands’ sons, their brothers or their brothers’ sons, or their sisters’ sons, or their women, or the slaves whom their right hands possess, or male servants free of physical needs, or small children who have no sense of the shame of sex; and that they should not strike their feet in order to draw attention to their hidden ornaments. And O you believers! Turn you all together towards God, that you may attain bliss’.

[304] YA: ‘and guard their modesty’; MP: ‘and be modest’.

[305] ZÊna, not to be confused with zin§ (adultery) as discussed in chapter 4.

[306] YA: ‘ornaments’; MF, AhA: ‘finery’; AA, MP, AB: ‘adornment(s)’; AH: ‘charms’.

[307] As do YA, MF, AhA, AA: ‘their bosoms’; AB: ‘their breasts’; MP: ‘their chests’; still narrower than MS in its definition is AH: ‘they should let their headscarves fall to cover their neckline’, who seem to locate juyåbihinna above a woman’s breasts. Lane defines jayb as ‘the ãawq or opening at the neck and bosom of a shirt and the like, for instance, of a coat of mail; or the opening of a shirt at the uppermost part of the breast; or the opening in a garment for the head to be put through: or such an opening as a sleeve and a ãawq’ (see line jayb). It seems that MS follows this definition as well but also transfers such openings of clothes, i.e., shirts and the like (see also 27:12; 28:32) to the ‘openings’ of the female body.

[308] ‘[The believers are] those who guard their private parts [li-furåjihim] except from their wives [#al§ azw§jihim] and what their right hands possess. [For these] they are not blameworthy’ (Al-Mu”minån 23:5–6, MF].

[309] This is because of the fact that sexual complications are not to be feared from these people.

[310] MS uses here Èar§m in the sense of a transgression against something that is ‘off-limit’ or ‘sacrosanct’, not in the sense of an absolute taboo, i.e., something that is categorically ‘forbidden’ (as he defined Èar§m in ch. 2).

[311] Abå Bakr a l-BayhaqÊ, Sunan a l-kubr§ (Mecca: Maktabat D§r a l-B§z, 1994), vol. 2, 227 (ÈadÊth no. 3038).

[312] Misy§r marriages are ‘marriages without commitment’. In such marriages, the woman relinquishes the marital rights that are granted to her in a normal marriage, such as the right to a home and to financial support from her husband, and, if he has other wives, the right to an equal part of his time and attention. The \anafÊ school distinguishes between misy§r marriages (which are considered legal) and the so-called pleasure marriages (mut#a in Arabic or sigheh in Persian) that are practiced in ShÊ#a Islam (and which are illegal) because the latter contains a deliberate attempt to seek pure pleasure and to limit the marriage for a specific period of time, while the former does not have this intention (at least not explicitly), see a l-JazÊrÊ, al-Fiqh #al§ ’l-madh§hib al-arba#a, vol. 4, 52.

[313] The author refers here to common practice in countries of the Arab Middle East.

[314] #Abd al-Malik b. MuÈammad a l-Tha#§libÊ, Kit§b fiqh al-lugha wa-asr§r a l-#arabiyya (Beirut: Manshår§t D§r Maktabat al-\ay§h, n.d.), vol. 1, 22.

[315] Al-BayhaqÊ, Sunan al-ßaghÊr, vol. 7, 326 (ÈadÊth no. 2759).

[316] Traditional fiqh interprets this line simply as permission to define a child’s #awra differently from that of an adult. According to the \anafÊ school, children up to the age of four do not have to be covered at all, but over the age of four, their genitals and buttocks must be covered. At the age of ten they are considered as grown-ups and have to follow the rulings with regards to an adult person’s #awra; see a l-JazÊrÊ, al-Fiqh #al§’l-madh§hib al-arba#a, vol. 1, 198.

[317] ‘When abroad’ as Ali glosses (in parentheses), is far-fetched and not supported by any other translator. MP puts into brackets (when they go out) for ‘to draw their cloaks close around them’; the others do not specify the occasion: MF: ‘to draw their outer garments closer’; AH: ‘to make their outer garments hang low over them’; AA: ‘that they draw their veils close to them’; AhA: ‘to draw their wraps a little over them’; AB: ‘to draw their outer garments closely round themselves’.

[318] This phrase should be understood in the sense of ‘it should be known to them’.

[319] Most translators render fa in the sense of wa (and), linking yu”rafn[a][] and yu”dhain[a] together syntactically and grammatically as one unit, AH: ‘so as to be recognized and not insulted’; FM: ‘That is more conducive to their being known, and not being injured’; AA: ‘so it is likelier they will be known, and not hurt’; MP: ‘so that they may be recognised and not annoyed’; AB: ‘that they will be recognised and not be harmed’, except AhA who separates the two syntactically: ‘They will thus be recognised and no harm will come to them’.

[320] Abå MuÈammad #Abd al-JalÊl b. Mås§ b. #Abd al-JalÊl al-QaßrÊ, Shu#ab al-Êm§n (Cairo: D§r al-\adÊth, 1996), B§b al-\ayy§” (ÈadÊth, no. 7796); Ibn #Abd al-Barr al-NumayrÊ, Al-Istidhk§r (Beirut: D§r al-Kutub al-#Ilmiyya, 2000), vol. 2, 201; al-BayhaqÊ, Sunan al-kubr§, vol. 7, 85 (Kit§b al-nik§È; B§b takhßÊß al-wajh wa’l-kaffayn).

[321] Al-Bukh§rÊ, ‘aÈÊÈ, vol. 1, 35 (ÈadÊth no. 63).

[322] MS refers to the popular belief of naghmat al-mar”a #awra, that ‘the melody of a woman is #awra’ or—as Ibn #$bidÊn put it—‘Do not follow (a woman) in public, because her voice is #awra’ (see Ibn #$bidÊn, \§shiyyat radd a l-mukht§r, vol. 6, 406; and Encyclopaedia of the Qur’an, s.v. “Modesty.” (Angel Hsu, Shiu-Sian), 403–405).

[323] In Islamic fiqh, this is traditionally understood as the area of a woman’s (or men’s) #awra, i.e., ‘the zone of modesty’. It is categorised as, 1) #awra mughallaía (thick #awra), which consists of the furåj private parts (vagina/men’s genitals, buttocks and anus), and 2) #awra mukhaffafa (thin #awra) which are other parts of the body that must be covered. The \anafÊ school makes a distinction between #awra that exists, a) during the ritual of prayer (the whole body except the face, hands, and feet), and b) outside the ritual of prayer. As for the latter category, the extent of the #awra depends on the following circumstances: 1) in seclusion, it is obligatory for a woman (and a man) to cover the area ‘from the navel to the knee’, except when there is a need to uncover it; 2) in the presence of the husband, a woman does not need to cover any part of her body; however, it is discouraged to remain naked if it is not necessary; 3) in front of other Muslim women, it is obligatory, to cover the area ‘from the navel to the knee’; 4) in front of the maÈ§rim relatives, i.e., unmarriageable kin (see above), the #awra consists of the area ‘from the navel to the knee’ as well as the stomach and her back; 5) in front of non-maÈ§rim relatives, i.e., marriageable kin (and any other male person), the #awra consists of the whole body except the face, hands, and feet; 6) in front of non-Muslim women, the #awra is the same as for a non-maÈram male (see Ibn #$bidÊn, \ §shiyyat radd a l-Mukht§r, vol. 1, 140; 405–10; vol. 2, 464; vol. 5, 261; vol. 6, 371; and a l-MarghÊn§nÊ, al-Hid§ya, vol. 4, 458–61). This definition makes it clear that in the \anafÊ school, the face, hands, and feet are not considered as #awra. And yet, one point is constantly mentioned in all fiqh manuals which is that, because of the fear of fitna, it is necessary to cover the face of all women who are not considered ‘old’ (see ShafÊ# #Uthm§nÊ, Ma#§rif a l-qur”§n, vol. 7, 214–20). MS’s decisive break with traditional fiqh lies with situations 3, 5, and 6; 3) has become an extension of 4 since al-nis§” are not ‘women’ but ‘those who come next in the family line’; 5) and 6) have become readjusted, in that women are now allowed to show their entire bodies in front of non-maÈ§rim strangers/relatives (men or women), including their heads(!), except for their lower and upper private parts. In other words, a woman who in public is dressed in shorts and a T-shirt observes the lower legal limit of the Islamic dress code, unless the cultural norms demand something different (e.g., a business suit at work).

[324] Shahrur, TajfÊf man§bi# al-irh§b, 2008.

[325] #Al§ al-DÊn al-MuttaqÊ, Kanz al-#umm§l fÊ sunan al-aqw§l wa'l-af #§l (Beirut: Mu"assasat #Ulåm al-Qur"§n, n.d.), vol. 12, 661 (Kit§b al-fa·§"il min qism al-af #§l; B§b fa·§"il al-F§råq).

[326] Jean-Jacques Rousseau (1712–1778), French philosopher and political theorist, argued in his Du Contrat Social ou Principes du Droit Politique (1762) that a state, based on a genuine social contract with its citizens, could give them real freedom in exchange for their obedience to a self-imposed (i.e., self-legislated) law. It seems that Rousseau's idea of a civil society that is united by a general will and that promotes the common interest of people while occasionally clashing with personal interest is shared by MS (see his thoughts on 'freedom' in this chapter).

[327] J§r All§h Abå Q§sim MaÈmåd b. #Umar al-ZamakhsharÊ, As§s al-bal§gha (Cairo: Maãba#at D§r al-Kutub, 1972–73), vol. 1, 332–33.

[328] Fakhr al-DÊn MuÈammad al-R§zÊ, Maf§tÊÈ al-ghayb (n.p., n.d.), 323–25 (tafsÊr of 2:217).

[329] This is a summarised version of Abå'l-Q§sim MaÈmåd al-ZamakhsharÊ, TafsÊr al-kashsh§f (Cairo: Sharikat Mußãaf§ al-B§bÊ al-\alabÊ, 1966), 620–21 (tafsÊr of 4:54).

[330] Quoted from Ibn #Abd al-Barr Abå #Umar al-NumayrÊ, J§mi# bay§n al-#ilm wa-fa·lih (Dammam: D§r Ibn al-JawzÊ, 1994), vol. 2, 898 (ÈadÊth no. 1684).

[331] Abå '^s§ MuÈammad al-TirmidhÊ, Sunan al-TirmidhÊ (Cairo: Mußãaf§ al-B§bÊ, 1937), vol. 4, 59 (ÈadÊth no. 1458).

[332] M§lik b. Anas al-AßbaÈÊ, Muwaãã§ al-Im§m M§lik (Abu Dhabi: Mu”assasat Z§yid

b. Sulã§n $l Nahy§n, 2004), vol. 4, 1065, (ÈadÊth no. 2727).

[333] I.e., unreliable, because the link between the successors of the Prophet and the Prophet himself is missing in the chain of narrators; a ÈadÊth mursal usually begins with ‘The Prophet said…’.

[334] Al-Bukh§rÊ, ‘aÈÊÈ, vol. 2, 507 (ÈadÊth no. 6935).

[335] Al-Sijist§nÊ, Sunan, vol. 13, 45 (ÈadÊth no. 4238).

[336] AÈmad b. a l-\usayn Al-BayhaqÊ, Sunan al-SaghÊr (Al-Manßårah: D§r al-Waf§, 1989), vol. 2, 78 (ÈadÊth no. 1279).

[337] Fakhr al-DÊn MuÈammad al-R§zÊ, Maf§tÊÈ al-ghayb (n.p., n.d.), vol. 12, 18.

[338] This is a summarised version of MuÈammad b. JarÊr al-•abarÊ, Ta”rÊkh al-•abarÊ (Beirut: D§r al-Kutub al-#Ilmiyya, n.d.), vol. 2, 248 (B§b dhikr baqqiyyat al-khabar #an ghiãf§n).

<right>

[339] Al-•abarÊ, Ta”rÊkh al-•abarÊ, vol. 2, 248 (B§b dhikr baqqiyyat al-khabar #an ghiãf§n).

</right>

[340] Quoted from Abå Ja#far al-•abarÊ, Ta”rÊkh al-•abarÊ (Beirut: D§r al-Fikr, n.d.), vol. 2, 149; the first four lines of the poem are often cited from Abå'l-Faraj al-Isfah§nÊ, al-Agh§nÊ (Beirut: D§r al-Fikr, n.d.), vol. 2, 149.

[341] Among which are: al-Ash#ath b. Qays, al-Zaburq§n b. Badr, Jirwal b. Aws (al-\aãÊ"a), #Awf b. Sin§n, #Ilqima b. #All§tha, #Uyayna b. \iß n, and Zumayl b. Qaãaba al-QÊnÊ.

[342] This is a summarised version of AÈmad B. \ajar al-#Asqal§nÊ, al-Iß§ba fÊ tamyÊz al-ßaÈ§ba (Cairo: Maktabat al-Kulliyyat al-Azhariyyah, n.d.), vol. 1, 79.

[343] This is also a summarised version from the same source, a l-#Asqal§nÊ, al-Iß§ba fÊ tamyÊz al-ßaÈ§ba, vol. 7, 195–96.

[344] Abå #Uthm§n #Amr Al-J§Èií, al-Bay§n wa'l-tabyÊn li'l-J§Èií (Beirut: D§r al-Kutub al-#Ilmiyya, 1998), vol. 1, 128.

[345] Kh§lid b. al-WalÊd (d. 21/642), one of the most successful military commanders in the history of the Islamic conquests who defeated with his troops within only ten years after MuÈammad's death the Byzantine armies in Iraq, Syria, and Jordan. And yet, during the so-called apostasy wars under the caliph Abå Bakr he was accused of having used unnecessary force and cruelty against M§lik b. Nuwayra and his clan of the Banå Yarbå", and this because of his selfish desire to marry Ibn Nuwayra's wife, Layla bint al-Minhal. Faced with these accusations and under pressure from fierce criticism by #Umar and Abå Qaã§·a, al-WalÊd claimed that his orders had been misunderstood by his guards (thus, indirectly conceding that his killings were wrong); a feeble excuse that was nevertheless accepted by Abå Bakr ('I will not sheathe a sword that Allah has drawn for His service'), see a l-•abarÊ, Ta"rÊkh, vol. 2, 'Prophets and patriarchs', translated and annotated by William M. Brinner (Albany: State University of New York Press, 1984), 496–502.

[346] #Abd al-Malik b. Marw§n (25–86/646–705) was the fifth caliph of the Umayyad rule and responsible for its consolidation as a dynastic autocracy that he mercilessly enforced against all attempts of sectarian rebellion (Banå al-Azraq; Banå al-Ash#ath) or claims of rival caliphates (Ibn Zubayr); Abå Ja#far #Abdall§h b. MuÈammad a l-Manßår (93–158/712–775) was the second ‘Abbasid caliph who consolidated the new dynasty in the new capital city (Baghdad) with equally brutal force against rebellion (Abå Muslim in Khur§s§n; Kharijites in Transoxania; #Alids in Persia) and secessionist movements (Berbers in North Africa) while at the same time establishing the claim of a divinely sanctioned absolute sovereignty of the ruler after the theocratic model of ancient Byzantine monarchs. See Abå’l-\asan al-Mas#ådÊ, The meadows of gold: the Abbasids, translated and edited by Paul Lunde and Caroline Stone (London: Kegan Paul, 1989).

[347] The al-Anß§r belonged mostly to the two Medinan tribes of the Aws and Khazraj and are believed to have initially supported #AlÊ and not Abå Bakr in the succession to the Prophet but (either by pressure, intimidation or change of heart) eventually gave their allegiance to Abå Bakr. For an alalysis of the rivalry between the Anß§r and the Muh§jirån, see Maya Yazigi, “AlÊ, MuÈammad, and the Anß§r: The Issue of Succession,” Journal of Semitic Studies 53, no. 2 (2008): 279–303.

[348] Al-\ajj§j b. Yåsuf, military commander under the caliph #Abd a l-Malik b. Marw§n, defeated the troops of #Abd All§h Sa#Êd b. a l-Zubayr during the siege of Mecca in 692 by which al-Zubayr’s sedition from the government in Damascus and his reign as a counter-caliph ended, see al-•abarÊ, Ta”rÊkh al-rusul wa’l-mulåk, vol. 22 ‘The Marw§nid restoration’, translated and annotated by Everett K. Rowson (Albany: State University of New York Press, 1989).

[349] Translation by AC, because most translators render millatahum as dÊnahum, i.e., ‘their religion’; AH and AhA say ‘their way’, MP: ‘their creed’, which still does not capture MS’s meaning of milla as the socioreligious, institutionalised form of dÊn, religion. Ambros gives all three meanings: ‘creed, religion, religious community’ (Ambros, Dictionary, 259), and the EQ confirms that milla denotes ‘religion’ or ‘sect’ used for the Muslim communities as well as for communities of non-Muslims, including those prior to MuÈammad, see Encyclopaedia of the Qur’an, s.v. “Religious Pluralism.” 401. The EI states that in the Ottoman period milla became the technical term for ‘religious group’, denoting the internally autonomous religious groups within the Ottoman Empire, such as the Jews, Armenians, Greek Orthodox, etc. This implied a semantic shift away from ‘religion’ in the sense of religio-moral belief, and it seems that MS uses the term in exclusively this religio-communal sense of ‘institutionalised religion’, see Encyclopaedia of Islam, s.v. “Milla”, vol. 7, 61.

[350] Abå Dharr a l-Ghif§rÊ (d. 32/653), a companion of the Prophet, a muh§jir and one of the earliest converts to Islam; famous for his ascetic lifestyle and purist worldviews he criticised #Uthm§n’s free use of public money from the treasury and, after his forced emigration to Damascus, the luxurious life and free spending of Mu#§wiya I, at this time (around 647) the governor of Syria. For this he was exiled to a l-Rab§tha, an oasis near Medina where he died, see Wilferd Madelung, Succession to Muhammad: A Study of the Early Caliphate (Cambridge: CUP, 1996), 84; W. M. Watt, Muhammad at Medina (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1956), 81.

[351] MuÈammad Sa#Êd al-#Ashm§wÊ, al-Isl§m al-siy§sÊ (Cairo 1987).

[352] See chapters 2 and 3 where these terms are separately defined. According to MS, Èal§l and Èar§m refer to a category of divine commands that enjoy absolute validity and which are not subject to change, while sam§È, Èasan, man#, and qabÊÈ are descriptions for rules that are subject to change in human legislation. This distinction is not unknown in Islamic fiqh but the novelty lies in the fact that for MS there are only thirteen muÈarram§t (absolute taboos) in total and that they belong exclusively to the area of socio-ethical behaviour, while the entire field of what normally constitutes the furå# al-fiqh (including family law, dress codes, penal law, etc.) belongs to the changeable parts, and their rules should not be classified by the terms Èar§m or

Èal§l.

[353] AB: ‘enjoin the right and forbid the wrong’; MF: ‘bidding the right and forbidding the wrong’; AA: ‘bidding to honour, and forbidding dishonour’; MP: ‘enjoin

[354] ‘We said: “O Adam! Dwell you and your wife in the garden; and eat of the bountiful things therein as (where and when) you will; but approach not this tree…”’ (Al-Baqara 2:35).

[355] ‘We said [quln§] to the angels, “Bow down to Adam”: They bowed down except Iblis. He was one of the Jinns, and he broke the command of his Lord [amr[in] rabihi]…’ (Al-Kahf 18:50).

[356] ‘That they took usury, though they were forbidden [nuhå] …’ (Al-Nis§” 4:161).

[357] ‘God has permitted trade and forbidden [Èarrama] usury…’ (A l-Baqara 2:275).

[358] Translation by MC, because all translators state ‘forbidden’ which does not reflect the subtle difference between Èar§m and manhÊy that MS wants to make; typical is YA: ‘If you (but) eschew the most heinous of the things which you are forbidden to do, We shall expel out of you all the evil in you, and admit you to a gate of great honour’ (Al-Nis§” 4:31).

[359] ‘And know that among you is God’s apostle: were he, in many matters, to follow your (wishes), you would certainly fall into misfortune: But God has endeared the faith to you, and has made it beautiful in your hearts, and He has made hateful to you unbelief, wickedness, and rebellion: such indeed are those who walk in righteousness’ (Al-\ujur§t 49:7).

[360] ‘(Nor) those who are niggardly or enjoin niggardliness on others, or hide the bounties which God has bestowed on them; for We have prepared, for those who resist faith, a punishment that steeps them in contempt’ (Al-Nis§” 4:37).

[361] Fakhr al-DÊn MuÈammad al-R§zÊ, Maf§tÊÈ al-ghayb (n.p., n.d.), vol. 10, 62.

[362] Because of his very realistic view on humans, MuÈammad (ß) had already anticipated that his new message would not overnight change people’s behaviour: ‘When they attain knowledge, people are like treasure-troves; those who, among them, were better [in that] in the J§hiliyya period are also better [in that] in Islam.’ MuÈammad Abå #Abdall§h al-Bukh§rÊ, al-J§mi# al-ßaÈÊÈ (Beirut: D§r Ibn KathÊr, 1987), vol. 3, 1238, 1288 (ÈadÊth nos. 3203, 3303); Muslim Abå’l-\usayn al-NÊs§bårÊ, ‘aÈÊÈ (Beirut: D§r al-JÊl, n.d.), vol. 7, 181 (ÈadÊth no. 2526).

[363] The Torah demands: ‘You shall follow the Lord, your God’ (Deuteronomy 13:4) and the Book states: ‘Verily, this is My way, leading straight [ßir§ãÊ mustaqÊm[an]]: follow it. Follow not (other) paths—they will scatter you about from His (great) path; thus does He command you, that you may be righteous’ (Al-An#§m 6:153). See also chapter 1.

[364] Better: ‘not guilty of sin’, similar to MF: ‘will commit no sin’; MP: ‘it is no sin for him’; AB: ‘commits no crime’; AhA: ‘not guilty of sin’; AH: ‘he commits no sin’; AA: ‘no sin shall be on him’.

[365] Al-ZamakhsharÊ, al-Bal§gha, 27.

[366] Abå Bakr a l-BayhaqÊ, Sunan al-BayhaqÊ al-kubr§ (Mecca: D§r al-B§z, 1994), vol. 5, 265 (ÈadÊth no. 10180).

[367] '…and saying things about God of which you have no knowledge' (Al-A#r§f 7:33).

[368] '…when there comes to them that which they (should) have recognised [m§ #arafå], they refuse to believe in it but the curse of God is on those without faith' (Al-Baqara 2:89).

[369] 'You will recognise [ta#rif] in their faces the beaming brightness of bliss' (Al-MuãaffifÊn 83:24).

[370] MF: 'according to what is just'; AB: 'to be honoured with fairness'; but closer to MS is AH: 'according to what is recognized to be fair', and AhA: 'Women also have recognised rights as men have'; whereas MP: 'of kindness'; AA: 'as obligations' have nothing in common with MS's rendering of ma#råf.

[371] Similar are MF: 'doing an honourable deed'; AhA: 'be kind'; MP: 'do kindness'; AA: 'act honourably'; AB: 'act correctly'; a bit over the top is AH: 'bestow gifts on your protégés'.

[372] Similar are MP: 'kindly'; MF, AhA: 'honourably'; AA: 'company honourable'; AB: 'correctly and courteously', while AH: 'according to what is right' translates it in the former sense and close to the phrase al-amr bi'l-ma#råf.

[373] All consulted translators do not read #arrafah§ lahum as #arfuh§ lahum (i.e., the Garden's fragrance for them), as MS does but, i.e., MF, AA, AB, MP: 'which He has made known to them', AH: 'the Garden He has already made known to them'; AhA: 'which he has acquainted them', all similar to YA: 'which He has announced for them' (as above).

[374] This is a reference to the chief minister of Pharaoh, H§m§n, who is mentioned six times in the Qur'an (28:6, 28:8, 28:38, 29:39, 40:24, 40:36) and who has become the embodied symbol of an unjust, oppressive ruler's ruthless and willing henchman. He finds his end 'in the waters' where he drowned with Pharaoh (29:40). See Encyclopaedia of the Qur'an, s.v. "H§m§n." (A. H. John), 399–400.

[375] 'Let there arise out of you a band of people inviting to all that is good, enjoining what is right [yanhaun #an a l-munkar], and forbidding what is wrong: They are the ones to attain felicity' ($l #Imr§n 3:104).

[376] 'But indeed men before them rejected (My warning): then how (terrible) was My rejection (of them) [nakÊr]?' (Al-Mulk 67:18).

[377] '…but give them preference over themselves, even though poverty was their (own lot). And those saved from the covetousness of their own souls, they are the ones that achieve prosperity' (Al-\ashr 59:9).

[378] 'Fighting is prescribed for you, and you dislike it [wa huwa kurh[un] lakum]. But it is possible that you dislike a thing which is good for you, and that you love a thing which is bad for you…' (Al-Baqara 2:216).

[379] 'It is He Who has sent His Apostle with guidance and the religion of truth, that he may proclaim it over all religion, even though the pagans may detest (it) [kariha]' (Al-'aff 61:9).

[380] E.g., ‘Let there be no compulsion [ikr§h] in religion. Truth stands out clear from error…’ (Al-Baqara 2:256); and ‘If it had been your Lord’s will, they would all have believed—all who are on earth! Will you then compel mankind, against their will, to believe!’ (Yånus 10:99).

[381] ‘All§h has taken away from my nation [the sins of] mistake, forgetfulness and those [things] they were forced to do.’ MuÈammad Al-QazwÊnÊ, Sunan b. M§jah (Beirut: D§r IÈy§” al-Kutub al-#Arabiyya, 1952), vol. 1, 659 (ÈadÊth no. 2045). MS adds in a footnote that ‘this ÈadÊth is clearly in harmony with the spirit of the Book (see, for example, 2:256). Why \adÊth scholars such as Bukh§rÊ and Muslim did not authenticate this ÈadÊth, there are certainly many obvious reasons, but space prevents us from going into details here’.

[382] YaÈy§ b. al-Sharaf al-NawawÊ, al-Tiby§n fÊ §d§b Èamalat al-qur”§n (Cairo: al-Maktabat al-TawfÊqiyya, 1976), 29.

[383] Abå D§wåd a l-Sijist§nÊ, Sunan AbÊ D§wåd (Beirut: D§r a l-Fikr, n.d.), vol. 1, 296 (ÈadÊth no. 1140).

[384] ‘Hold to forgiveness, command what is right, but turn away from the ignorant’ (Al-A#r§f 7:199).

[385] See MS’s interpretation of this verse in chapter 5 where he makes it clear that he does not support the common rendering of wa”·ribåhunna as ‘and beat them’. In his understanding any form of physical force, even of a very small degree, is forbidden in the act of reprimanding women.

[386] #Al§ al-DÊn al-MuttaqÊ, Kanz al-#umm§l fÊ sunan al-aqw§ wa'l-af #§l (Beirut: Mu"assasat al-Ris§la, 1981), vol. 4, 430 (ÈadÊth no. 11260).

[387] This term must be understood according to MS's wider understanding of the term al-isl§m (see chapter 1). The phrase 'to Muslims (li'l-muslimÊn)' refers thus to those who assent to God and that includes all generations of Muslim-Assenters who lived long before the time of MuÈammad.

[388] Sårat al-An#§m 6:151–53. Note that the Ten Commandment revealed to Moses and the commands given to MuÈammad are both forms of 'particular ethics', or al-furq§n al-kh§ßß, and that the Ten Commandments (in capital initial letters) of Moses are not identical with the ten commandments (in small initial letters) of 'general ethics' or a l-furq§n a l-#§mm for all humankind even if some of the individual commandments are indeed overlapping. See also chapter 1.

[389] The Holy Bible, New International Version (Dunton Green: Hodder and Stough ton, 17th printing, 1991).

[390] Ibid.

[391] For example, paragraph 196: 'If a citizen has destroyed the eye of one citizen status, they shall destroy his eye'; paragraph 197: 'If he has broken the bone of a citizen, his bone shall they break'; paragraph 200: 'If a citizen has knocked out the tooth of one of equal status, they shall knock out his tooth'; taken from D. Winton Thomas, ed., Documents from Old Testament Times (New York: Harper Torchbooks, 1961), 33–34.

[392] For example, paragraph 199: 'If he [i.e. a citizen] has destroyed the eye of a slave of a citizen, or has broken the bone of a serf, he shall pay half of his marketvalue'; or paragraph 201: 'If he [i.e., a citizen] has knocked out the tooth of a vassal, he shall pay a third of a mina of silver’ (Thomas, Documents, 34).

[393] Khabar news and naba” news are for MS two categories of MuÈammad’s propheth ood that do not contain legal rules or stories on the basis of which jurists should formulate legal rules, e.g., about human warfare. Khabar news refer to events that are or become perceptible to the eyes of those who are present at the time, that is, contemporaries to those involved in such events, while naba” news refer to events that can only be indirectly witnessed. In either case they are only ‘news’, not legal commands. See chapter 2.

[394] And behold! God will say: “O Jesus the son of Mary! Did you say unto men, worship me and my mother as gods in derogation of God”?” He will say: “Glory to you! Never could I say what I had no right (to say). Had I said such a thing, you would indeed have known it. You know what is in my heart, though I know not what is in yours. For you know in full all that is hidden.” (Al-M§“ida 5:116)

[395] Muslim Abå’l-\usayn al-NÊs§bårÊ, ‘aÈÊÈ (Beirut: D§r al-JÊl, n.d.), vol. 6, 51 (ÈadÊth no. 5050).

[396] Abå D§wåd a l-Sijist§nÊ, Sunan AbÊ D§wåd (Beirut: D§r a l-Kit§b a l-#ArabÊ, n.d.), vol. 4, 391 (ÈadÊth no. 4774).

[397] Abå #Abd al-RaÈm§n al-Nas§“Ê, Sunan al-Nas§“Ê (Beirut: D§r al-Kutub al-#Ilmiyyah, 1991), vol. 6, 344 (ÈadÊth no. 4371).

[398] Al-Sijist§nÊ, al-Sunan, vol. 2, 317 (ÈadÊth no. 2501).

[399] Abå #Abd al-RaÈm§n al-Nas§“Ê, al-Sunan al-kubr§ (Beirut: D§r al-Kutub al-#Ilmiyya, 1991), vol. 2, 310.

[400] ‘O prophet! Truly We have sent you as a witness [sh§hid[an]], a bearer of glad tidings, and warner’ (Al-AÈz§b 33:45).

[401] Al-An#§m 6:100.

[402] ‘We have decreed death to be your common lot…’ (Al-W§qi#a 56:60).

[403] Al-NÊs§bårÊ, ‘aÈÊÈ Muslim, vol. 8, 98 (ÈadÊth no. 7158).

[404] Most translators render sabÊl interchangeably either as (the more literal) ‘way’ or as ‘cause’ (in the sense of ‘on behalf of God’), except AA and AhA who consistently write: ‘in the way of God’; AH also renders fÊ sabÊl All§h as ‘for the sake of God’. ‘In God’s way’ is closest to MS’s intention to render fÊ sabÊl All§h as ‘according to God’s way’, which is not captured by ‘in God’s cause’ nor by ‘for the sake of God’.

[405] According to one sabab al-nuzul a mixture of the two meanings is possible: ‘A Muslim killed someone in battle who had given him the Muslim greeting, thinking that the man was trying to save himself, but the Prophet condemned this’ [AH].

[406] MS’s views on this are similar to those of al-ZamakhsharÊ whom al-R§zÊ quotes as having said that the variant of a qir§“a is mu”amman, with fatÈa above the mÊm, meaning ‘his security’ (§mnuhu) and interprets the phrase as ‘do not say “we cannot give you safety”’, Fakhr al-DÊn MuÈammad al-R§zÊ, Maf§tÊÈ al-ghayb (tafsÊr of 4:94), and al-ZamakhsharÊ, TafsÊr al-kashsh§f (tafsÊr of 4:94).

[407] Most translators give their rendering a slightly derogative touch, YA thinks that #ara· al-Èay§t al-duny§ are ‘perishable goods of this life’; MF: ‘the fleeting goods’; MP: ‘the chance profits of this life’; AA: ‘the chance goods of the present life’, but MS renders them as goods and things of this life that one may fully enjoy, e.g., cars, mobile phones etc.—which are perishable but not entirely negative and condemnable; perhaps more neutrally in the sense of AB: ‘the goods of this world’ or even, if a bit far-fetched, AhA: ‘the gain of earthly life’.

[408] The reason for MS’s specific mentioning of the battle of Tabåk (630) under the rubric of defensive warfare is that the Prophet’s expedition of a 30,000-strong army from Mecca to the far northwestern town of Tabåk was, in effect, a precautionary move to approach the Byzantine troops that were rumoured to have amassed near the Arab borders in the north. Even though the attack failed to materialize and in spite of the fact that MuÈammad used his advance in order to secure alliances with local tribes that agreed to pay him protection tribute (al-jizya), the expedition to Tabåk went down in Islamic historiography as a preemptive strike in the face of an imminent attack by the Byzantine army or pro-Byzantine Ghassanid tribes.

[409] ‘That God may forgive you your faults of the past and those to follow—fulfil His favour to you—and guide you on the straight way. * And that God may help you with powerful help’ (Al-FatÈ 48:2–3).

[410] MP, AB, AA, MF: ‘victory’; AhA: ‘success’; AH: ‘triumph’.

[411] ‘…and I was a witness over them while I dwelt amongst them; when you did take me up you were the watcher over them, and you are a witness to all things’ (Al-M§“ida 5:117).

[412] ‘Fight [q§tilå] in the cause of God those who fight you, but do not transgress limits; for God loves not transgressors’ (Al-Baqara 2:190).

[413] ‘He knows that there may be (some) among you in ill-health; others travel through the land, seeking of God’s bounty; yet others fighting [yuq§tilån] in God’s cause…’ (Al-Muzzammil 73:20).

[414] In both instances the verse uses variants of the first verb form (qatala), not q§tala.

[415] ‘Fasting is prescribed to you [kutiba #alaykum]…’ (Al-Baqara 2:183).

[416] ‘The law of equality is prescribed to you [kutiba #alaykum] in cases of murder…’ (Al-Baqara 2:178).

[417] ‘And he entered the city at a time when its people were not watching: and he found there two men fighting [yaqtatil§n]—one of his own religion, and the other, of his foes’ (Al-Qaßaß 28:15).

[418] See for example AbÊ #Abd All§h MuÈammad b. IdrÊs al-Sh§fi#Ê, Kit§b al-umm (Cairo: D§r al-•ib§#a al-MunÊra bi-Bål§q, n.d.), vol. 4, 168; or MuÈammad b. #AlÊ al-Shawk§nÊ, Kit§b a l-sayl wa’l-jarr§r (Beirut: D§r al-Kutub al-#Ilmiyya, 1985), vol. 4, 518–19.

[419] The reference here is to the school of the Mu#tazilites (or better: ahl al-tawÈÊd wa’l-#adl—people of divine unity and justice) who with their inquisitional zeal for religious and intellectual orthodoxy (especially under the caliphs al-Ma”mån [197–218/813–833] and al-Mu#taßim [218–227/833–842]) had brought their views of divine justice, human reason, free will, and moral responsibility into disrepute in the ninth century but which were revitalized in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries and ‘benefited’ the advocates of a modern religious discourse, in particular Mu Èam mad #Abduh (1265–1323/1849–1905), the famous reformer, Azharite scholar, and moral philosopher (author of the Ris§lat al-tawÈÊd).

[420] MuÈammad Abå #Abdall§h al-Bukh§rÊ, al-J§mi# al-‘aÈÊÈ (Riyadh: D§r al-Sal§m, 1999), Kit§b al-Èay· (ÈadÊth no. 294).

[421] ‘O you who believe! You are forbidden to inherit women against their will [karh[an]]. Nor should you treat them with harshness, that you may take away part of the dower you have given them, except where they have been guilty of open lewdness. On the contrary, live with them on a footing of kindness and equity. If you take a dislike to them [karihtumåhunna] it may be that you dislike [takrahå] a thing, and God brings about through it a great deal of good’ (Al-Nis§” 4:19).

[422] ‘They ask you what they should spend (in charity). Say: Whatever you spend that is good—is for parents and kindred and orphans and those in want and for wayfarers. And whatever you do that is good—God knows it well’ (Al-Baqara 2:215).

[423] ‘That God may forgive you your faults of the past and those to follow. Fulfil His favour to you and guide you on the straight way; * and that God may help you with powerful help’ (Al-FatÈ 48:2–3).

[424] ‘O humankind! We created you from a single (pair) of a male and a female, and made you into nations and tribes, that you may know each other (not that you may despise (each other)). Verily the most honoured of you in the sight of God is (he who is) the most righteous of you. And God has full knowledge and is well acquainted (with all things)’ (Al-\ujur§t 49:13).

[425] ‘If one amongst the pagans asks you for asylum, grant it to him, so that he may hear the word of God [kal§m All§h]…’ (Al-Tawba 9:6)

[426] ‘The word of your Lord does find its fulfilment in truth and in justice. None can change His words [li-kalim§tihi]; for He is the one who hears and knows all’ (Al-An#§m 6:115).

[427] ‘Behold! The angels said: “O Mary! God gives thee glad tidings of a word from Him [bi-kalimat[in]]: his name will be Christ Jesus, the son of Mary…”’ ($l #Imr§n 3:45).

[428] ‘Thus is the word [kalimat[un]] of your Lord proved true against those who rebel: verily they will not believe’ (Yånus 10:33).

<right>

[429] ‘And when you judge between man and man, that you judge with justice…’

</right>

(Al-Nis§” 4:58).

[430] AA: ‘in the idols’ way’; MP: ‘for the cause of idols’; AhA: ‘for the powers of evil’; MF: ‘on behalf of the Devil’; AB: ‘in the way of false gods’; closest to MS’s interpretation of al-ã§ghåt is AH: ‘for an unjust cause’.

[431] See also ‘Verily in this (Qur’an) is a message for people who would (truly) worship God [#§bidÊn]’ (Al-Anbiy§” 21:106).

[432] The translators’ renderings are all expressing MS’s notion of a mutual competition provided that phrases like ‘to check on others’, ‘to drive some back’, ‘to repel others’, ‘to deter one another’, etc., are not understood in a physical or military way; AH: ‘If God did not drive some back by means of others’; MF: ‘Had Allah not caused some people to repel others’; AA: ‘Had God not driven back the people, some by the means of others’; AhA: ‘If God did not make men deter one another’; MP: ‘if Allah had not repelled some men by others’; AB: ‘If it were not for Allah’s driving some people back by means of others’.

[433] Fighting is prescribed for you, and you dislike it. But it is possible that you dislike a thing which is good for you, and that you love a thing which is bad for you. But God knows, and you know not (Al-Baqara 2:216).

[434] ‘…Did not God check one set of people by means of another, there would surely have been pulled down monasteries, churches, synagogues, and mosques, in which the name of God is commemorated in abundant measure…’ (Al-\ajj 22:40).

[435] See p. 457 and fn. 128 for MS’s different rendering of this verse.

[436] ‘And the places of worship [al-mas§jid] are for God (alone): So invoke not any one along with God’ (Al-Jinn 72:18); ‘Do you not see that to God bow down in worship [yasjud] all things that are in the heavens and on earth…’ (Al-\ajj 22:18).

[437] To those against whom war is made [sic], permission is given (to fight), because they are wronged [íulimå]; and verily, God is most powerful for their aid (Al-\ajj 22:39).

[438] 2:190, ‘Fight in the cause of God those who fight you, but do not transgress limits; for God loves not transgressors.”

2:191, ‘And slay them wherever you catch them, and turn them out from where they have turned you out; for tumult and oppression are worse than slaughter; but fight them not at the sacred mosque, unless they (first) fight you there; but if they fight you, slay them. Such is the reward of those who suppress faith.”

2:192, ‘But if they cease, God is oft-forgiving, most merciful.”

2:193, ‘And fight them on until there is no more tumult or oppression, and there prevail justice and faith in God; but if they cease, let there be no hostility except to those who practise oppression.”

[439] MaÈmåd Shaltåt, al-Qur”§n wa’l-qit§l (Cairo, 1951).

[440] Sayyid Quãb, Ma#§lim fi’l-ãarÊq (1964), translated into English as: Milestones (Beirut: The Holy Koran Publishing House, 1980).

[441] MS refers here to the time (1976–82) when the radical wings of the Syrian Muslim Brotherhood turned to violence in their fight against the Ba”th state and the #AlawÊ-dominated regime of H§fií al-Asad. The attacks culminated in a massacre on mostly #AlawÊ cadets at a military camp near Aleppo which caused the regime to respond with an equally brutal crackdown on the Muslim Brotherhood, ending with the bloodshed at \am§ in 1982.

[442] MaÈmåd al-FihmÊ al-Nakr§shÊ P§sh§, Prime Minister of Egypt, assassinated by Islamist militants on December 28, 1948 (1368 A.H.).

[443] Muslim, ‘aÈÊÈ Muslim, Kit§b al-zuhd wa’l-raq§“iq (ÈadÊth no. 1695).

[444] Most translators render al-k§firån in its direct, specific meaning, AA, MF, AhA: ‘the unbelievers’; AH: ‘disbelievers’; MP: ‘those who disbelieve’; but AB: ‘those who are kafir’ leaves the term untranslated and thus for the reader to understand (potentially) in MS’s indirect, nonspecific meaning of ‘aggressor’.

[445] ‘Therefore, when you meet the unbelievers (in fight), smite at their necks, at length; when you have thoroughly subdued them, bind a bond firmly (on them). Thereafter (is the time for) either generosity or ransom: until the war lays down its burdens…’ (MuÈammad 47:4).

[446] ‘It is not you who slew them; it was God. When you threw (a handful of dust), it was not your act, but God’s. In order that He might test the believers by a gracious trial from Himself, for God is He who hears and knows (all things)’ (Al-Anf§l 8:17).

[447] ‘O you who believe! When you meet a force, be firm; and call God in remembrance much (and often), that you may prosper’ (Al-Anf§l 8:45).

[448] ‘Truly Pharaoh elated himself in the land and broke up its people into sections…’ (Al-Qaßaß 28:4).

[449] ‘Recite to them the truth of the story of the two sons of Adam. Behold! They each presented a sacrifice (to God): It was accepted from one, but not from the other. Said the latter: “Be sure I will slay you.” “Surely,” said the former, “God does accept of the sacrifice of those who are righteous. * “If you do stretch your hand against me, to slay me, it is not for me to stretch my hand against you to slay you: for I do fear God, the cherisher of the worlds. * “For me, I intend to let you draw on yourself my sin as well as yours, for you will be among the companions of the fire, and that is the reward of those who do wrong.” * The (selfish) soul of the other led him to the murder of his brother: he murdered him, and became (himself) one of the lost ones. * Then God sent a raven, who scratched the ground, to show him how to hide the shame of his brother. “Woe is me!” said he; “Was I not even able to be as this raven, and to hide the shame of my brother?” Then he became full of regrets’ (Al-M§“ida 5:27–31).

[450] Address to the Nation on October 7, 2001. See for an intriguing analysis of the similarity between the rhetoric of G. W. Bush and #Us§ma b.

L§din, Bruce Lincoln, Holy terrors: Thinking about Religion after September 11 (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2002).

[451] Like YA, the following two translators render the phrase with a passive voice, AH: ‘Those who have been attacked are permitted to take up arms because they have been wronged’; AB: ‘Permission is given to those who are fought against because they have been wronged’. However, the other translators render yuq§talån as yuq§tilån, in the active voice, AhA: ‘Permission is granted those (to take up arms) who fight because they were oppressed’; FM: ‘Permission is given to those who fight because they are wronged’; MP: ‘Sanction is given to those who fight because they have been wronged’; AA: ‘Leave is given to those who fight because they were wronged’. Fight in the face of oppression or wrongdoing (not because of an attack)—this is exactly how MS understands the verse.

[452] ‘We ordained therein for them: “Life for life, eye for eye, nose for nose, ear for ear, tooth for tooth, and wounds equal for equal…’ (Al-M§“ida 5:45).

[453] See also concerning the battle of Badr: ‘There has already been for you a sign in the two armies that met (in combat): One was fighting in the cause of God, the other resisting God; these saw with their own eyes twice their number. But God does support with His aid whom He pleases. In this is a warning for such as have eyes to see’ ($l #Imr§n 3:13).

[454] ‘But you turned back [tawallaytum] thereafter: Had it not been for the grace and mercy of God to you, you had surely been among the lost’ (Al-Baqara 2:64).

[455] ‘Do you see if he denies (truth) and turns away [wa-tawall§]?’ (Al-#Alaq 96:13).

[456] ‘O [humankind]! We created you from a single (pair) of a male and a female, and made you into nations and tribes, that you may know each other (not that you may despise (each other). Verily the most honoured of you in the sight of God is (he who is) the most righteous of you. And God has full knowledge and is well acquainted (with all things)’ (Al-\ujur§t 49:13).

[457] ‘[Believers], you are the best community [khayr [a] ummat [in]] singled out for people: you order what is right, forbid what is wrong, and believe in God…’ ($l #Imr§n 3:110, AH); AhA: ‘Of all the communities raised among men you are the best’ and MP: ‘You are the best community that has been raised up for mankind’ translate umma as MS does, but YA: ‘You are the best of peoples’; MF, AB, AA: ‘the best nation”— show that the term is understood interchangeably as nation, peoples, community, or even ‘a group of people within a community’ (Ambros, Dictionary, 28, on 7:164) etc.; MS, as always, denies such semantic imprecision in rendering the term and insists that the Book uses different terms for nation, peoples et al., but not umma.

[458] ‘And when he arrived at the watering (place) in Madyan, he found there a group of men [ummat [an] min al-n§s] watering (their flocks)…’ (Al-Qaßaß 28:23).

[459] ‘And remember that Abraham was tried by his Lord with certain commands, which he fulfilled: He said: “I will make you an Imam to the nations”…’ (A l-Baqara 2:124).

[460] ‘No! They say: “We found our fathers upon this course [ummat [in]], and we are actually following in their footsteps”’ (Al-Zukhruf 43:22).

[461] MF, AhA: ‘Your only friends’; AH: ‘Your true allies’; AB: ‘Your only friend’; YA: ‘Your (real) friends’; AA: ‘Your friend is only God’ are all not capturing MS’s understanding of walÊ as signalling a position of authority (of a guide/teacher vis-àvis a pupil/novice), while ‘friend’ or #ally’ indicate a relationship of equality (even if theologically that is not what the translators wanted to state).

[462] ‘…The guilty person will wish he could save himself from the suffering of that day by sacrificing his sons, * his spouse, his brother, * the kinsfolk who gave him shelter’ (Al-Ma#§rij 70:11–13, AH).

[463] The translations closest to MS’s interpretation of tabarra”a and the concept of bar§” (to show difference or otherness in opinion and behaviour, implying a personal and intellectual disassociation from someone) are AhA: ‘he broke away from him’ or AA: ‘he declared himself quit of him’; too harsh are AB: ‘he renounced him’ or AH: ‘he washed his hands of him’, and (socially) unacceptable is FM, MP: ‘he disowned him’.

[464] ‘O [humankind]! We created you from a single (pair) of a male and a female, and made you into nations and tribes, that you may know each other (not that you may despise (each other)). Verily the most honoured of you in the sight of God is (he who is) the most righteous of you. And God has full knowledge and is well acquainted (with all things)’ (Al-\ujur§t 49:13).

[465] Hamza #Abd al-Muããalib (3/625), uncle of the Prophet, who is reported to have converted to his nephew’s new religion after he heard that Abå Jahl had verbally abused MuÈammad during his absence in Mecca, which he also avenged by an open confrontation with the offender during an assembly of the Ahl al-Quraysh.

[466] #Abdall§h b. ArÊqaã was one of the party of four (Prophet MuÈammad, Abå Bakr, Ibn Fuhayra) that fled from Mecca to Yathrib in 622. Ibn ArÊqaã rode the camel that also carried the Prophet, while Abå Bakr and his servant Ibn Fuhayra rode on the second camel. Ibn ArÊqaã’s status as a non-Muslim is particularly interesting because it meant that the Prophet completely trusted the service of a nonfollower; in Islamic fiqh this became a prophetical precedence for the permission for Muslims to do trade and commerce with non-Muslims.

[467] According to the SÊra literature, al-Kh§ãib b. AbÊ Balta#a betrayed the Prophet as a favour to his old tribe by sending a letter to the Quraysh in Mecca in which he warned them that MuÈammad was about to invade their city in 630. The letter was caught and Balta#a summoned to the Prophet (ß) who, however, forgave Balta#a the latter’s betrayal of trust.

[468] This is also exemplified in the verse: ‘When a sura comes down, enjoining them to believe in God and to strive and fight along with His Apostle, those with wealth and influence among them ask you for exemption, and say: “Leave us (behind): we would be with those who sit (at home)”’ (Al-Tawba 9:86).

[469] MS refers here to the events of the so-called first fitna (temptation) and the fight of the Ahl a l-Quraish against the newly formed Muslim community after the P rophet’s Hijra from Mecca in the year 622. These were the battles of Badr (624), UÈud (625), Khandaq, or the battle of the ditch (627), the seizure of Mecca (630). Also included is one of the first military expeditions to regions outside the areas of the Ahl a l-Quraish, to Tabåk (630), while the other two most important expeditions, to Mu”ta (629) and \unayn (630), are not mentioned.

[470] ‘There have been examples before you; so travel in the land and behold the fate of those who disbelieved’ ($l #Imr§n 3:137).

[471] ‘Say: “Travel in the land and see how Allah originated the creation; then Allah produces the other generation. Allah truly has power over everything’ (Al-#Ankabåt 29:20).

[472] ‘Messenger, proclaim everything that has been sent down to you from you Lord—if you do not, then you will not have communicated His message—and God will protect you from people. God does not guide those who defy Him’ (A l-M§“ida 5:67, AH).

[473] $l #Imr§n 3:187; Al-M§“ida 5:15; Al-Baqara 2:187.

[474] Publications on MS by D. F. Eickelman are listed in the Bibliography.

[475] Dale Eickelman wrote: ‘Travel to Damascus to interview MuÈammad ShaÈrår and others associated with religious book publishing in Damascus (March 14–24, 1996) was funded by the Humanities Program of the Rockefeller Foundation, New York, under a grant awarded to Dartmouth College for the project “Print, Islam, and Civic Pluralism: New Religious Writings and their Public.” The author also wishes to thank Colin S. O. Grey, a Presidential Scholar at Dartmouth College, and Christine Eickelman for transcribing the English sections of the interview’. (Transcript of the original interview, p. 1.) The footnotes were provided by Dale Eickelman and left unchanged (except where some updates seemed necessary) as they are in the original manuscript.

[476] MuÈyÊ al-DÊn Ibn #ArabÊ (1165–1240), the influential Sufi mystic and scholar who lived in Damascus from 1230 until his death.

[477] Abroad, a weekly news magazine intended for a general readership covering events outside the former Soviet Union.

[478] Leader of Syria’s National Progressive Front (al-Jabha al-waãaniyya al-taqad dumiyya), one of the constituent parties of the Socialist Union Party (al-Èizb a l-waÈdawiyÊn a l-ishtir§kiyÊn), which encompasses all of Syria’s recognized political parties.

[479] This point is further developed in Shahrur, al-Kit§b wa’l-qur”§n, 59–60, and in chapter 3 of this book.

[480] A prominent Syrian linguist who has worked in Algeria and the Sultanate of Oman, DÊk al-B§b first met Shahrur when they were students together in Moscow. His Asr§r a l-lis§n a l-#arabÊ (Secrets of the Arabic Language) is included as an appendix to Shahrur's al-Kit§b.

[481] As '§diq J. Sulaim§n explains, rattil also means to place in a logical sequence, although this is a somewhat rare use of the term. Yusuf #Ali, one of the translators of the Qur'an, uses the term only in the sense of measured recitation. It also can refer to military formations, and Shahrur is building on this more physical and logical sense of the term.

[482] This is a common pattern for religious lesson circles. See Dale F. Eickelman, Knowledge and Power in Morocco: The Education of a Twentieth-Century Notable (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1985), 91–104. Participants in Shahrur's discussion groups with prior experience of religious studies or participation in religious orders placed particular emphasis on the 'traditional' structure of their meetings.

[483] Shahrur, Kit§b, 443–67.

[484] There is also an authorized Beirut edition, although Shahrur indicates that the actual print run is considerably higher than the reported figures (Interview, Damascus, March 23, 1996). Sales figures for the pirated Egyptian edition are unavailable. The book is also now available in a CD-ROM version (Interview with Muhammad Shahrur, New York, May 22, 1997).

[485] Among the other recipients of the book were members of the Council of Ministers. In distributing the book to his ministers, the sultan indicated only that ministers might find the book interesting. He makes no statement for or against its argument (Interview with a member of the Council of Ministers, Muscat, June 26, 1996).

[486] Ernest Gellner, Conditions of Liberty: Civil Society and Its Rivals (London: Hamish Hamilton, 1994), 22, 29.

[487] See Muhammad Shahrour, “Islam and the 1995 Beijing World Conference on Women,” translated by Dale F. Eickelman and Sadek J. Sulaiman, in Liberal Islam: A Sourcebook, ed., Charles Kurzman, 139–42 (New York: Oxford University Press, 1998).

[488] Formerly a faculty member in the Department of Arabic at Cairo University, Abå Zayd argued in successive publications that the text of the Qur’an was subject to historical interpretation. Following pressure from Islamists in 1992, he was denied promotion to full professor and subsequently attacked from the pulpit at various mosques and accused of apostasy for using nontraditional methods for interpreting the meaning of the Qur’an. A mosque preacher, aided by a volunteer group of Islamist lawyers, brought a suit in the Family Court, petitioning that Abå Zayd’s marriage was invalid because he was an apostate. In January 1994, a Family Court judge ruled the case inadmissible, but an appeals court confirmed Abå Zayd’s apostasy and officially annulled his marriage. A further and final appeal to the Court of Cassation resulted only in a stay of execution of the sentence. Professor Abå Zayd and his wife were eventually forced to flee Egypt. He now lives and works in Holland. (Interview, Leiden, March 25, 1996), and Nasr Abu Zaid, “The Case of Abu Zaid,” Index on Censorship 4 (1996), 30–39.

#title Theodicy and Justice in Modern Islamic Thought

#subtitle The Case of Said Nursi

#author Ibrahim M. Abu-Rabi

#authors Ibrahim M. Abu-Rabi, Dale F. Eickelman, Gareth Jones, Ian Kaplow, Bilal Kuşpinar, David R. Law, Leo D. Lefebure, Ian Markham, Thomas Michel, S.J., Lucinda Mosher, Eric Ormsby, W. Mark Richardson, Barbara Freyer Stowasser, Leonid R. Sykiainen, Cüneyt M. Şimsek, Şükran Vahide

#date 2010

#source <[[https://doi.org/10.4324/9781315236421][doi.org/10.4324/9781315236421]]>

#lang en

#pubdate 2023-09-16T02:34:12

#topics

#cover i-m-ibrahim-m-abu-rabi-theodicy-and-justice-in-mod-1.jpg

#DELETED temporarily

 Front Matter

 Synopsis

This book explores the theology and philosophy of the distinguished modern Muslim scholar and theologian Bediuzzaman Said Nursi [d.1960]. Nursi wrote in both Ottoman Turkish and Arabic and his life and thought reflected the transition of modern Turkey from an empire to a secular republic. The contributors to this volume shed new light on two major dimensions of Nursi’s thought: theodicy and justice. classical Muslim theologians debated these two important issues; however, we must consider the modern debate of these issues in the context of the radical political and social transformations of modern Turkey. Nursi explored these matters as they related to the development of state and society and the crisis of Islam in the modern secular nation-state.

Nursi is the founder of a ‘faith movement’ in contemporary Turkey with millions of followers worldwide. in this book, distinguished scholars in islamic, Middle eastern, and Turkish studies explore Nursi’s thought on theodicy and justice in comparison with a number of western philosophers, theologians, and men of letters, such as dante, Merton, Kant, and Moltman. This book presents an invaluable resource for studies in comparative religion, philosophy, and islamic and Middle eastern studies.

 Title Page

Theodicy and Justice in Modern islamic Thought

The case of Said Nursi edited by

Ibrahim M. Abu-Rabi

University of Alberta, Edmonton, Canada

 Publisher Details

First published 2010 by Ashgate Publishing

Published 2016 by Routledge

2 Park Square, Milton Park, Abingdon, Oxon OX14 4RN 711 Third Avenue, New York, NY 10017, USA

Routledge is an imprint of the Taylor & Francis Group, an informa business

Copyright © ibrahim M. abu-rabi‘ and the contributors 2010

ibrahim M. abu-rabi‘ has asserted his right under the copyright, designs and Patents act, 1988, to be identified as the editor of this work.

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be reprinted or reproduced or utilised in any form or by any electronic, mechanical, or other means, now known or hereafter invented, including photocopying and recording, or in any information storage or retrieval system, without permission in writing from the publishers.

Notice.

Product or corporate names may be trademarks or registered trademarks, and are used only for identification and explanation without intent to infringe.

British Library Cataloguing in Publication Data

Theodicy and justice in modern islamic thought : the case of Said Nursi.

1. Nursi, said, 1873–1960. 2. Theodicy. 3. islam and justice. 4. islam and civil society— Turkey.

i. abu-rabi‘, ibrahim M. 297.2’118—dc22

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Theodicy and justice in modern islamic thought : the case of Bediuzzaman Said Nursi / edited and with an introduction by ibrahim M. abu-rabi‘.

p. cm. includes index. isBn 978-1-4094-0618-1 (hardcover : alk. paper)—isBn 978-1-4094-0617-4 (pbk. : alk.

paper) 1 Nursi, said, 1873–1960. 2. Nursi, . said, 1873–1960—Political and social views. 3. nurculuk. i. abu- rabi‘, ibrahim M. BP253.Z8n8775 2010

297.2’118092—dc22

<right>

2010008291

</right>

isBn 9781409406181 (hbk) isBn 9781409406174 (pbk)

 list of contributors

Ibrahim M. Abu-Rabi‘ is the edmonton council of Muslim communities chair at the university of alberta in edmonton, alberta, canada. he has authored and edited 19 books in islamic studies and modern islamic thought. he is writing a new book on the islamic movement in the arab world after 9/11.

Dale F. Eickelman is ralph and richard lazarus Professor of anthropology and human relations at dartmouth college. he has written extensively on religion and society in the modern arab world.

Gareth Jones is Professor of christian Theology and head of the department of religious studies at canterbury christ church university college.

Ian Kaplow is associated with Katholische hochschule für sozialwesen Presse und Öffentlichkeitsarbeit in Berlin, germany.

Bilal Kuşpinar is currently lecturing at the institute of islamic studies at Mcgill university. he has published several books on islamic philosophy and theology.

David R. Law is reader in christian Thought, university of Manchester, uK.

Leo D. Lefebure is Professor of Theology at georgetown university in Washington, dc. he has written on Revelation, the Religions, and Violence. Maryknoll, ny: orbis Books, 2000. Translated into indonesian: Penyataan Allah, Agama, dan Kekerasan. Trans. Bambang subandrijo. Jakarta, indonesia: PT BPK gunung Mulia, 2003. recipient of the Pax christi usa 2001 Book award for The Buddha and the Christ: Explorations in Buddhist-Christian Dialogue.

Ian Markham is dean and President of Virginia Theological seminary in alexandria, Virginia, usa. he has written several books on christian theology and ethics.

Thomas Michel, S.J. is a Jesuit priest who currently resides in ankara, Turkey. he has written on christian-Muslim relations and Said Nursi.

Lucinda Mosher is the Interfaith Education Officer for the Episcopal Church. She has written extensively on christian-Muslim relations.

Eric Ormsby was the director of university libraries and subsequently a professor of islamic thought at the institute of islamic studies, Mcgill university. Presently, he lives and writes in london, england, where he is Professor and chief librarian at the institute of ismaili studies.

W. Mark Richardson is Professor of Theology at the general Theological seminary in new york and a priest in the episcopal church. he co-edited Religion and Science: History, Method and Dialogue, which won a 1996 Templeton Prize for outstanding Books in science and religion, and human and divine agency. richardson conceived and directed the original science and spiritual Quest i project, which culminated in the internationally acclaimed ssQ i conference at the university of california, Berkeley in 1998. since 1999, the rev. dr. richardson has served as co-investigator of the science and the spiritual Quest ii program at the center for Theology and the natural sciences and co-edited the ssQ volumes Faith in Science: Scientists Search for Truth and Science and the Spiritual Quest: New Essays by Leading Scientists.

Barbara Freyer Stowasser, formerly with the center of contemporary arab studies at georgetown university. she has written extensively on islam and women, and on the modern islamic movement.

Leonid R. Sykiainen is professor of islamic law and comparative legal studies at the state university higher school of economics in Moscow.

Cüneyt M. Şimsek teaches islamic theology at the divinity school of Bursa university in Bursa, Turkey.

Şükran Vahide, a resident of istanbul, is the principal translator of the collected works of Bediuzzaman Said Nursi.

 Editor’s introduction

Bediuzzaman Said Nursi (henceforward referred to as Nursi) is one of the most significant Muslim theologians in the modern world. In fact, it is possible to compare him to other well-known modern Muslim theologians and thinkers such as Jamal al-din al-afghani, Muhammad ‘abduh, rashid rida, Mustafa abdul razeq, Muhammad iqbal, and several others. Nursi, however, is very unique in that his life and theology reflect the deep transformations of Ottoman/Turkish society from the end of the nineteenth century until his death in 1960.

in addition to understanding Nursi’s life in the context of the complex political and social changes in modern Turkey, one must also understand his theological work as a reflection by a modern Muslim thinker on the challenges of modernity and the impact of the West on the Muslim world. Nursi used the tenets of the islamic tradition to shed light on the challenges of modernity in Turkey and the larger Muslim world. in this sense, he was heir to a long tradition of theological and philosphical debate in classical and modern islam that concerns itself with numerous theological and “secular” issues and questions. one such issue Nursi highlighted in his writings is that of the renaissance of islamic tradition and the Muslim ummah in general. Nursi understood, as have many other modern Muslim reformers, that the West looms large in this renaissance.

It is with this perspective that we are best able to reflect on Nursi’s magnum opus, the Risale-i Nur (henceforward referred to as the Risale).[1] The Risale is not a simple work of Qur’anic exegesis, but a commentary on the transformation of the Muslim world in the modern era. in addition to reading it in the context of islamic theology and exegesis, one must read it historically and personally, as well. in this complex text, Nursi reflects on his life, the life of the Turkish nation and the Muslim ummah in general. ultimately, he reaches the conclusion that the best way to salvage islam and the Muslim world would be by placing ultimate faith in divine destiny and justice. That is to say, Nursi gave up on politics as a means to save the Muslim world or rebuild the ideal Muslim state. in this, Nursi diverges fundamentally from the worldview of modern islamists such as hassan Banna and allama Mawdudi, who advocated the restoration of islam in the modern world by building an islamic state. however, Nursi never abandoned Shari‘ah during his lifetime, or even the Muslim ummah. on the contrary, Nursi’s ordeal in the modern secular Turkish state stemmed from his deep commitment to Shari‘ah and ways to revive the Muslim community.

The chapters included herein treat two major theological themes that preocuppied Nursi in his “new said” phase: Post World War i and the defeat of the ottoman army in this war, and theodicy and justice. Nursi’s deep immersion in the rich tradition of islamic spirituality is perhaps the most single important factor shaping his theological perspective on the above issues. Nursi grew up in a Sufi environment in eastern anatolia and his Risale is replete with references to key figures of Islamic mysticism such as Abu Hamid al-Ghazali, Abu al-Hassan alshadhili, shaykh ahmad sirhindi, and others.[2] in addition to offering an esoteric path to knowledge of the divine (al-ma‘rifah al-ilahiyyah), the Risale elaborates on the need in the age of materialism to reflect on death and the Afterlife. In other words, in his “new said” phase, Nursi was inclined to give up on Western philosophical or even scientific methods of understanding the mystery of the world. he immersed himself deeply in the study and interpretation of the Qur’an as a divine text in order to reflect on the multiple challenges facing him and the larger Muslim ummah. As a young man, Nursi had every confidence in Western philosophy as an aid to understanding the complexity of social and political life. however, in the “new said” phase, Nursi abandons those methods and places his trust completely in the Qur’an as a divine source.

in the Risale, Nursi argues that the Qur’an is “the spring from which all emanations gush forward” (manba‘ al-fuyud), and that whatever beautiful truths are contained in his books all originate from the Qur’anic emanations. Nursi establishes an important connection between the Qur’an, as a sacred text, and his own text, as a human text. he argues in a manner reminiscent of the great Muslim saints that the Risale does not constitute an autonomous theological quantity, but is a reflection of the Qur’anic text. However, we must caution here that Nursi was simply an exegete of the Qur’an who tried to live the life of the Qur’an in the modern era.

In addition to reflecting on classical Islamic theological arguments on theodicy and justice, Nursi’s life in modern and secular Turkey was characterized by a deep alienation from this world and the desire to meet death without hesitation. A number of articles in this book affirm this idea. It is very clear that Nursi’s problems with the secular Kemalist regime after the foundation of the Turkish republic in the 1920s and his subsequent exile by the authorities to distant places in the country gave him ample opportunity to reflect on alienation, death, and the afterlife. one may argue that there are two different meanings of exile in Nursi’s life: one is concrete and the second is abstract. on the concrete level, Nursi faced exile and alienation; however, on the abstract level, he channeled the feelings that arose within him during exile into an immense spiritual and moral force which he used to write the main parts of the Risale.

It is with his deep reflections on exile and this world, so to speak, that he was able to spiritually grasp the Qur’anic verses on death and the afterlife. Nursi never saw death as a limitation but rather as an emancipation from this life’s problems and a prelude to a life of full of happiness and glory. yvonne haddad aptly observes that Nursi’s life “provides an example of how it is possible to conquer the profound sense of loneliness and alienation experienced by the immigrant in an alien and hostile environment. it sets a paradigm for survival, for seeking solace and affirmation from God by attempting to dwell in His presence. in the process, the experience of ghurba, estrangement, is transformed into uns, companionship.”[3] did Nursi consider exile to be a manifestation of evil? no one can be sure. however, one thing is clear: it is impossible for us to understand the profundity of the Risale without considering Nursi’s long period of exile. in a sense, he was able to develop if not perfect his text in the context of exile from this “world” and immersion in the “wider possibilities of the afterlife.”

Furthermore, Nursi understood the significance of exile in the Islamic theological and spritual contexts. a famous hadith states that, “islam began in exile (ghariban) and it will be exiled again as in the beginning. happy are the expatriates of the community of Muhammad, for they live in solitude, alone with their religion.”[4] another hadith stipulates, “Be in this world as if you were a stranger or an ‘abir sabil or passer-by.” Nursi’s suffering forces contemporary readers to focus on the problem of evil in life. Theodicy is simply defined as a theological answer to the prevalence of evil in human life, although god is endowed with absolute goodness and justice. one may raise the following questions in Nursi’s case: if god is characterized by absolute goodness and justice, then why does he allow this evil (alienation) to befall him for the better part of his life? Why was the Muslim ummah in a state of collapse, especially following the disintegration of the ottoman empire after World War i? if secularism is “evil,” why has god allowed it to form the basis of the state, constitution and structure in modern Turkey? in the Risale, Nursi takes the issue of evil for granted. only people of deep faith and not the people of this life (ahl al-dunya) can overcome the problems emanating from evil.

a good number of articles in this volume discuss the Qur’anic verses dealing with theodicy at length and Nursi’s intricate theological arguments with respect thereto. In the first chapter, Barbara Freyer Stowasser of Georgetown University sheds important light on the biblical and Qur’anic discussions of evil. in addition to discussing what the Qur’an has to say, she delves into classcial islamic philosophy and theology, especially that of the Mu‘tazilites and asha‘arites, and their different formulations of the issue. she argues that:

so then why did adam rebel and what caused him to do so? in other words, how did evil originate in a world created by a Just and all-Powerful god? This, of course, is the key issue in the theological problematic of theodicy. Nursi addresses the problem by way of contrasting divine determining (to save the human soul from pride) with the gift of choice (to make the human soul admit to its responsibility). god creates both good and evil, but it is man’s soul that “acquires” (kasb) good or evil acts by its own free will.

in chapter 2, ian Markham discusses the problem of evil from the angle of suffering and destruction. he argues that for Nursi, the evil of the world is impossible to understand unless there is an afterlife. although Markham's discussion is less theological than stowasser's, it complements it in that it sheds important light on the evils of the modern world and the immense destruction brought about by World War i and World War ii. Markham's article draws our attention not just to the way Nursi pondered evil, but also to the suffering of the ottoman and Turkish people in the modern era. in chapter 3, Thomas Michel skillfully links the issue of evil with ressurection. he argues that "god's own just nature demands a resurrection. The one who so wisely ordered this universe could not fail, in his mercy, to provide justice for those who have remained upright and faithful. god's generosity and compassion demands justice towards the oppressed. But that justice is not found on this earth, so it must be found elsewhere." hence, the Risale is full of passages that discuss resurrection and the lessons that the people of this world must learn from the afterlife.

In Chapter 4, Şükran Vahide, who has translated Nursi's work into English, elaborates on the issue of ressurection and Nursi's preoccupation with it. she argues that Nursi highlighted the Qur'anic proofs for the hereafter while at the same time emphasizing "the indivisibility of this world and the next." in this sense, Vahide affirms the arguments of the preceding authors by focusing primarily on what Nursi had to say about theodicy, this life and the afterlife.

in chapter 5, Bilal Kuşpinar discusses the connection between death and theodicy. he reaches the conclusion that death is part of the all-encompassing mercy and all-embracing goodness of god, "This all-inclusive mercy and beauty, in fact, necessitates the existence of both life and death. despite its scary face in appearance, death yields ultimately good results as it paves the way for an everlasting life." death is one of the few divine signs that human beings have to ponder.

in chapter 6, lucinda Mosher discusses a short piece Nursi wrote entitled Lā Siyyamā and published in his major book, al-Mathnawi al-'Arabi al-Nuri. This book, written originally in arabic, is perhaps the most sophisticated philosophical and theological text he ever wrote. in it, Nursi is not a simple preacher or man of faith but a classical Muslim mutakkalim or philosopher using all the philosophical tools available to him to prove the essential truths of the Qur’an, especially with regard to the issues of the resurrection and afterlife.

other contributors to this volume, such as W. Mark richardson, leo d. lefebure, eric ormsby, gareth Jones, and ian Kaplow, analyze Nursi’s ideas in a comparative context, in relation to a Western theologian or philosopher. The data and arguments included in this volume shed important light on a multiplicity of theological and philosophical voices, both classical and modern.

Finally, i would like to thank all the contributors to this volume for their scholarly contributions and, in particular, i would like to thank dr. Faris Kaya of the istanbul science and culture Foundation for his tremendous support and dedication to the work of Bediuzzaman Said Nursi.

 1. Theodicy and the Many Meanings of adam and eve

Barbara Freyer Stowasser

among the several meanings of the term theodicy, i am choosing the broad conceptual meaning of: vindication of the justice of god, especially in ordaining and permitting moral evil.[5] in this chapter, i pursue the issue by way of two foundational texts, the Bible and the Qur’an, both of which deal with god’s creation of humanity (in the form of adam and adam’s wife) and the manner in which humanity (again in the form of adam and his wife) rebelled against the creator. The two scripturalist narratives share a great many features, most important among them the concept that sin – evil – entered god’s creation through acts of disobedience and rebellion by satan and primordial humanity, all of them god’s creatures whom god had endowed with the power of choice. at the same time, the two narratives diverge on the fundamental question of the nature of mankind, indeed the nature of the world, after god had punished their disobedience with banishment. The Biblical account ends with the affirmation of Adam’s mortality “you are dust, and to dust you shall return”. christian theology later developed the notion that adam’s disobedience was the very reason for all sin and death, so that adam’s fall required christ’s redemption. The Qur’anic narrative, on the other hand, ends with the humans’ repentance, god’s forgiveness, and god’s promise of guidance for all.

This chapter begins with a synopsis of the Qur’anic revelations on god’s creation of humanity and the origin of evil. in its foundational narratives on the origin of man and the beginning of evil, the holy Qur’an presents adam and iblis/ satan as coevals, since it was iblis’ rebellion against god’s primordial command to acknowledge the human’s higher rank and nature that led to iblis’ being cursed as satan and banished from the sight of god. The drama therefore has four protagonists: god the omnipotent creator and Judge, his creature iblis (created as angel or as jinn), and His creatures the first human couple, Adam and Adam’s wife (whose name is not mentioned). out of the webs of iblis’/satan’s pride and arrogance and the humans’ weakness and gullibility, emerges the Qur’anic definition of the principle of evil as disbelief in God whose main manifestations are rebellion and disobedience against his commands; these acts of rebellion and disobedience are undertaken by free choice/free will on the part of the perpetrators.

Their punishment is expulsion from god’s presence to a life of toil. at the same time the Qur’anic narrative concludes with the affirmation of God’s mercy and forgiveness for those who repent and believe.

Briefly presented in the second part of this chapter are the Biblical narratives of the creation of mankind, and the manner and consequences of man’s disobedience to god’s premundane command, which especially christian theology – in decisive contrast to the Qur’anic doctrine – defined as a fall from grace (Augustine’s concept of “original sin”).

among the many deep-going doctrinal differences between Qur’an and Bible on these issues is also the woman’s creational status in relation to the man (in the Bible, created after him and “of him,” a doctrine that is missing in the Qur’an), as well as the role of the woman in humanity’s primordial act of rebellion against the creator (in the Qur’an, the woman is a partner in disobedience with the male, while the text in the Bible suggests – or at least permits – the reading that she is the first target of verbal communication and so presumably the first willing victim of the snake of temptation). having disobeyed god’s command, the man and the woman are expelled and condemned to a life of suffering, passed on to their descendants, in which the man’s lot is to toil as a farmer in fields of thorns and thistles and the woman’s, to suffer pain in childbearing for all time to come. in the Bible, the story ends there: the couple’s banishment is not mitigated by their repentance and god’s forgiveness of their disobedience; nevertheless, Jewish and especially christian theology soon developed the notion of adam’s repentance and divine forgiveness, that very many centuries later even came to include a vindication of the woman’s role in the primordial drama.

The third part of this chapter presents a brief survey of three major pre-modern Muslim Sunni Tafsir works on the Qur’anic texts here under consideration. This survey reveals the extent to which medieval Islamic theology was laboring to find scholastic answers to the theodicycal problem of the origin of evil in a world created by a good and Just creator. it also reveals that Bible-derived traditions (isra’iliyyat) on the issue of gender (the woman’s guilt) continued to play some role in the medieval arabic islamic scripturalist interpretations, a trend that largely came to an end in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries.

in its fourth part, this chapter looks at some of Nursi’s teachings on these issues. read in the light of the Qur’anic texts and against the canonical arabic interpretations of the premodern period, Bediuzzaman Said Nursi’s teaching about humanity and satan, godliness and sin, human freedom of choice and the necessity of a last judgment reflects Qur’anic doctrine in a clear scripture-focused hermeneutics that ranges from Nursi’s theological discourse to his kerygmatic sermons employing metaphors of everyday life.

 God’s Creation of Humanity and the Origin of Evil in the Qur’an[6]

The Qur’anic accounts of the events involving the creation of adam and the rebellion of iblis indicate that god created adam from clay, or from sounding clay, from mud molded into shape (15:26; 38:71); god fashioned adam with his hands (38:75) in due proportion and breathed into him of his spirit (ruh) (15:29; 38:72). Thus, while created from matter, adam’s nature included a divine breath, a spark, which god granted to the human beyond all other creatures. This higher nature conferred dignity and also obligation. The Qur’an states this by saying that god’s purpose in adam’s creation was to make him god’s vicegerent (khalifa) on earth (2:30). he endowed adam with creative knowledge about the natures of things by teaching him “the names, all of them” (2:31), so that adam’s knowledge was above that of the angels (2:32–3); and god commanded the angels to prostate themselves before adam. only iblis[7] refused to acknowledge the human’s superiority and instead asserted his own. he rebelled against god’s command, was arrogant, and became satan (20:116; 15:30–33; 38:73–6; 7:11–12; 2:34). For this disobedience, god cursed and banished iblis but gave him respite until the day of Judgment, until which time iblis vowed to tempt and assault all humankind except for those strong enough to withstand him, that is, god’s devoted servants (15:34–3; 38:77–85; 7:13–18, 26–7). These accounts center on man and satan, telling both their histories and defining their innate natures. Satan is shown to have started his career together with adam, as adam’s coeval; thus his role is essentially linked to man, his nature is brought out by antagonism to man, he is an “anti-man” force. satan’s very rebellion against god needed man to express itself, and it is perpetuated throughout history in satan’s labors to seduce and tempt man away from morality to sin.

it is only in the second half of the Qur’anic story, which tells of human disobedience to god and man’s banishment from the garden, that the woman appears. Adam’s wife is first mentioned as Adam’s partner in God’s injunction to “dwell in the garden and eat freely of its bountiful fruit,” but “not to approach this Tree” (7:19; 2:35). sura 20 relates that it was adam to whom god addressed the warning that iblis was his and his wife’s enemy; if he let iblis get the two of them ejected from the garden, he (adam) would be landed in misery (or, come to toil) (20:117). it was also to adam that satan then whispered his temptation concerning “the Tree of eternal life, and everlasting kingdom” (20:120), and it was adam who “disobeyed his lord and went astray” (20:121). By contrast, sura 7 mentions the woman’s participation in the acts of disobedience and repentance: “satan whispered to them twain, in order to reveal to them their private parts, and said: ‘your lord only forbade you this Tree lest you be angels, or of eternal life.’ and he swore to them: ‘i am indeed your sincere adviser.’ and he caused their fall with deception” (7:20–22). When adam and his wife ate of the Tree, they perceived their private parts or, “shame,” [saw’at] and began to sew together leaves from the garden to cover themselves (20:121; 7:22). Thus did iblis cause their expulsion from the garden (2:36), so they would live on earth for a time in mutual enmity (20:123; 7:24; 2:36). according to sura 20, god “chose” adam and forgave him and guided him (20:122), and whoever follows god’s guidance will not lose his way nor fall into misery, or, toil (20:123). according to sura 7, both man and woman asked for god’s forgiveness and mercy, saying that they had wronged themselves, or, committed an outrage against their own natures (7:23), and god bestowed (on mankind) the garment of righteousness (7:26). sura 2 here adds that adam received from his lord “words” (of inspiration) and god forgave him (2:37) and promised freedom from fear and grief to all humans who heed his guidance (2:38).

since each of these Qur’anic narratives varies from the others as to focus, sequencing of events, and the involvement of the woman, a brief analysis of each account in chronological order may be useful. as indicated above, the main textual body of the accounts if found in suras 2:30–39, 7:11–27, 15:26–43, 20:115–24, and 38:71–85. studies on the Qur’an’s internal chronological sequencing[8] place the suras in the following chronological order: suras 20, 15, and 38 revealed in the Middle Meccan period, sura 7 in the late Meccan period, and sura 2 in (early) Medina. in sura 20 (the earliest account), god’s warning, satan’s temptation, and god’s forgiveness are all directed at adam, even though both man and woman eat of the Forbidden Tree and are expelled from the garden. suras 15 and 38 (both Middle Meccan) speak of adam’s creation and iblis’ rebellion, banishment, and curse. Man’s disobedience toward god is not part of the narrative, and the woman is not mentioned. in sura 7 (the latest of these narratives revealed in Mecca), both male and female are tempted and tricked by iblis, both succumb, repent, and are banished. The final version of the story in Sura 2, revealed in Medina, emphasizes that the purpose of adam’s creation was as god’s “vicegerent” on earth and tells of adam’s god-given higher knowledge. god’s ordinance to stay way from the Tree is here addressed to both adam and his wife; there is, however, no seduction or temptation scene, merely the statement that it was satan who caused the couple's "slip" and expulsion. The narrative then makes mention of the "words" adam received from his lord and of god's forgiveness for adam, both expressed in a single verse that is inserted between two divine commands of expulsion. The account ends with god's promise of guidance for all and his pledge that "whoever follows My guidance shall have no fear, nor shall they grieve" (2:38).

The dynamics of the narrative procede from a focus on adam (sura 20) to one involving both Adam and his wife (Sura 7); the final version of the story, however, transcends both by way of introducing the additional notions of man's vicegerency on earth, higher knowledge, god-given inspiration (words) and the promise of (spiritual) well-being of all humans who heed god's guidance. Thus, as the drama is related in various, dynamically evolving plots, the woman gradually appears as participant in the events of rebellion, repentance, and banishment; but the gender question remains a mere detail that bears no importance for the drama, and in the end the main theme has shifted away from it altogether to the issue of mankind's purpose on earth and the ways of god's guidance. The latter theme, central to the Qur'anic message, is expanded upon in 33:72–3, a later Medinan revelation that speaks of a primeval covenant between god and the human in terms of "the Trust" (al-amana) which god offered "to the heaven and the earth and the mountains, but they refused the burden and were afraid of it. But the human undertook to bear it. he was indeed wanton (or, unfair to himself), and foolhardy. so that god punish the male and female hypocrites, and the male and female unbelievers, but forgive the male and female believers" (33:72–3). The Qur'an, then, declares that humans, male and female, are free and equal agents called upon to wage the battle of righteousness against satan. adam's and his wife's "slip" (or "error," zalla) did not result in a lasting defect of human primordial nature. cast out to live on earth for a time (7:24; 2:36), the banishment did not include the burden of the curse of original sin. Man and woman may be weak and lagging, proud and ungrateful, but the Qur'an judges neither as lost to forgiveness as long as they continue to believe in god. evil action is a willful act of disobedience. doing evil does not result from ignorance that god exists, or ignorance of his commands. This was true not only of the first couple but is equally true of all later generations, since God revealed his laws to humankind through a continuing series of prophets, a sequence of scripturalist events that culminated in the revelation of the Qur'an to the seal of the Prophets, Muhammad. Therefore, “because knowledge of god and of doing good is self-evident and periodically re-revealed, doing evil is a conscious decision to disobey god’s commands.”[9]

 God’s Creation of Humanity and the Origin of Evil in the Bible[10]

The narrative of god’s creation of the world that culminates in his creation of the human is found at the beginning of the Book of genesis in the hebrew Bible. The story is related twice, in genesis 1.26–30 and genesis 2.7–25. genesis 1 speaks of the ideal equality of male and female creation, while genesis 2 places the man above the woman, and in genesis 3 the man blames the woman for her role in his expulsion from the garden. historians of the Biblical text opine that “the development of the book of genesis was a long process extending over centuries.”[11] Genesis 1 (identified as P*, abbreviation for the Priestly source in the Pentateuch) is generally regarded as younger, that is of later provenance, than Genesis Chapters 2 and 3 (identified as parts of J*, the Yahwist source in the Pentateuch);[12] the date given for P is around 550 bc, that for J is around 950 bc.

According to the first (and younger) narrative recorded in Genesis 1.26–30, “god created humankind in his image, in the image of god he created them, male and female he created them,” and then god blessed them and gave them dominion over “everything that has the breath of life.” By contrast, the second (and older) narrative of genesis 2 and 3 relates adam’s creation in genesis 2.7–20, the creation of eve from adam in 2.21–5, their temptation, facilitated by the woman, in 3.1–7, their shared guilt and anxiety in 3.8–13, and god’s curse of the snake and condemnation of the woman and of the man in 3.14–19. god perceives the world as “very good” (genesis 1.31) even though it also includes not only the Tree of life but also the Tree of the Knowledge of good and evil (genesis 2.8–9), along with a subtle snake who encourages the consumption of its fruit (genesis 3.1). The second narrative is thus profoundly different from the first.

according to this second narrative in genesis 2.7–20, god “formed man from the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and the man became a living being, ... and he put him in the garden of eden to till it and keep it, and god commanded the man: you may freely eat of every tree of the garden but of the Tree of Knowledge of good and evil you shall not eat, for in the day that you eat of it you shall die.” adam was thus not created in the garden but was placed there after his creation. god then brought all living creatures to the man to see what he would call them, ... (and how he would bond with them?) ... “but for the man there was not found a helper (among them) as his partner.” genesis 2.21– 5: so god caused a deep sleep to fall upon the man. then he took one of his ribs and closed up its place with flesh. “And the rib that the Lord God had taken from the man he made into a woman and brought her to the man. Then the man said: This at last is bone of my bones and flesh of my flesh; this one shall be called Woman, for out of Man this one was taken.” it was thus the woman who was created in the garden. genesis 3.1–7 then tells the temptation story whose main protagonists are the snake (3.1: “the serpent was more crafty than any other wild animal that the lord god had made”) and the woman. The snake casts suspicion on god’s motive in forbidding the humans to eat from the Tree, saying to the woman “you will not die; for god knows that when you eat of it your eyes will be opened, and you will be like god, knowing good and evil.” and so the woman “took of its fruit and ate and also gave some to her husband, who was with her, and he ate. Then the eyes of both were opened and they knew that they were naked, and they sewed fig leaves together and made loincloths for themselves.” According to Genesis 3.8–13, when questioned by god the man then blamed the woman for his failing, and the woman blamed the snake, “the serpent tricked me, and i ate”. in genesis 3.14–16, god curses the snake, condemning it to crawl upon its belly, eat dust, and live in constant enmity with the woman, and then god condemns the woman to suffer pain in childbearing, sexual desire for her husband, and subordination to him, “he shall rule over you”. in genesis 3.17–19, god then condemns the man to a life of toil on ground now cursed because he had listened to his wife’s voice and had disobeyed god. only thorns and thistles would grow for him. “By the sweat of your face you shall eat bread until you return to the ground, for out of it you were taken; you are dust, and to dust you shall return.” in genesis 3.22–4, the man then named his wife eve, “because she was the mother of all living”; then god cast him out, to keep him away from the Tree of life (that was also in the garden) and banished him “to till the ground from which he was taken.” since the snake, like the human, was one of god’s creations, this Biblical story of the first couple’s temptation does not offer an explanation of the origin of evil as a primordial, negative force. on the contrary, god is the omnipotent and omniscient, Just and compassionate lord over good as well as evil, and he employs both to accomplish his ends. god has no equal and the cosmic order that he wills must inevitably be established. in genesis 3.1–7 the snake speaks but is not satan: “the devil does not yet exist.”[13] The concept of the created satan as the personification of evil evolved slowly during Biblical times and only underwent some sort of standardization at the hands of early christian authorities.[14] But the scripture understood that the one place where evil exasperates god is the human heart; “there remains a mystery that is not further explored, namely the freedom that human beings have to direct their own hearts for good or evil.”[15] When the primordial human will was turned against god and thus incurred guilt, their punishment was expulsion from god’s presence and separation from the Tree of life (genesis 3.22), even though mortality – death – was already a decreed part of the human condition (genesis 3.19).[16] christian theology later developed the notion that it was adam’s and eve’s disobedience that occasioned the Fall of Man by which mankind was thrust into the vale of tears, death and sin that marks all human existence until its redemption by christ the redeemer. adam’s fall was a religious and a cosmic catastrophe. in the new Testament, the apostle Paul elaborated the view that sin, like death, originated with adam (romans 8.2); sin’s power emerged simultaneously with the giving of the Law. Christ’s death was the expiatory sacrifice (Romans 8.3) that liberated humanity from their enslavement to the power of sin (romans 6.23). While Adam (the man of flesh) had brought sin and death to the world, Christ (the second adam and the man of spirit) had brought life (1 corinthians 15.20–22 and 47). rooted in divine mystery, the suffering of christ manifests the divine response to evil.

Paul’s views led the early church father augustine (354–430), Bishop of hippo, to develop the doctrine of original sin to describe the stain inherited from adam by way of propagation that affected all of humanity, since to be conceived without grace is to begin life in the state of sin. This belief was not accepted by Judaism and was resisted by early christian thinkers, but augustine’s interpretation of the Fall became the accepted doctrine of catholic christianity.[17] augustine had been a Manichean before becoming a christian. in his doctrine of original sin, however, he did not adhere to an innate tendency in the human toward evil (such as propounded in gnostic dualism) but focused on the force of evil as hatred of the truth that (like in Paul’s definition) derived from the anterior bondage discovered in every free choice.[18] apparently there was already in the first human beings “an element of pride, self-love, that issued in disobedience.” adam and eve chose to put their own wills ahead of god's and lost paradise for all humanity. original sin and concupiscence are inherited from adam and handed down from generation to generation by way of propagation, whence it is both a physiological and psychological blemish. But since evil was the result of a wrong act of will by a rational creature (satan, humankind), its cause did not lie in a god wholly good and therefore incapable of evil.[19] in the end, "augustine retains the essential obscurity of the origin of evil. he cannot explain evil initiative whether in the angels and adam or adam's descendants."[20] augustine could understand that free will is fallible, but he could not understand how it actually does choose evil. "Trying to understand this is not simply like looking for something in the dark (that would be in search for an evil nature – dualism's project) but like trying to see the dark itself, or like trying to hear silence."[21] With adam's fall began time. The redemption through christ is salvation out of all time. But even adam and eve did not remain rebellious but repented and were saved. Indeed, when the crucified christ descended into hell before his resurrection, he did so to release adam (and eve followed along). all church fathers, including augustine, declared it as heresy to claim that adam and eve were damned forever. on the contrary, they became saints in the liturgical calendar of the catholic church; their saints' day was the 24 december, and they became patron saints of the tailors.[22]

Judaism and especially Christianity have traditionally emphasized the first woman's guilt in humankind's primordial act of rebellion. in addition, the new Testament (following Jewish tradition) offers a very negative view of eve as representative of the alleged weaknesses of all women. early christian theologians contrasted eve's sinfulness with the perfect sinlessness of the "new eve," Mary the mother of Jesus, who was herself immaculately conceived, so that she was ever without sin and possessed the gift of sanctifying grace. By contrast, in one of his Pastoral letters, the apostle Paul expressed fear that the corinthian christians would be led astray from christ as eve was deceived by the serpent (2 corinthians 11.3). Wives should be subject to their husbands, "for the husband is the head of the wife just as christ is the head of the church, the body of which he is the savior" (ephesians 5.22–4). in the Pastoral letters Timothy and Titus (that were most probably not written by Paul), eve's creation after the man, and her deception by the serpent are given as reasons why women must keep silent in church, neither teaching nor having authority over a man. "For Adam was formed first, then eve; and adam was not deceived, but the woman was deceived and became a transgressor. yet she will be saved through childbearing, provided they continue in faith and love and holiness, with modesty” (1 Timothy 2.11–15). (cf. 1 corinthians 14.34–5). Titus assumed that only men would be bishops (Titus 1.7–9). regarding the origin of evil as rooted in humanity’s wrong act of will, these teachings and the traditions on which they are based introduce an element of gender into the debate. The problem is not, however, whether sin is “gendered,” but whether there is not in women a tendency toward sin that is greater or more pronounced than in men. Modern exegesis, on the other hand, has maintained that, although it is a possible interpretation of the Genesis narrative to argue that the first woman had a tendency toward sin, this reading is not inherent in the narrative’s literal wording; and even then, the woman’s role in the fall is not that of a temptress, since no such action is described in Genesis 3.6, but is that of the first human transgressor of a covenant of law (genesis 2.17).

 God’s Creation of Humanity and the Origin of Evil in the Arabic Tafsir Literature classical (pre-modern) Muslim interpretation of the Qur’anic narrative of the rebellion of adam and his wife against their lord departs from the scripturalist referent in numerous ways. extraneous detail transmitted in hadith form and frequently originating in Bible-related sources not only fleshes out the story but drastically changes it, especially with regard to the woman’s role. on the whole, the pre-modern interpretations of woman’s origin and nature largely denied female rationality and female moral responsibility, as the consensus of the learned doctors of islamic law and theology accepted and propagated some ancient hadith materials on women’s inferior nature, until eighteenth-century pre-modern reformists began to question these traditions’ authoritative status. since the nineteenth century, islamic modernists have denied the authenticity and doctrinal validity of what they viewed as medieval extraneous interpretative lore, while re-emphasizing the Qur’anic notions of the female’s full personhood and gender-equal moral responsibility. The latter is also the position embraced by Bediuzzaman Said Nursi, whose books make no reference to these extra-Qur’anic medieval texts.

When abu Ja’far Muhammad ibn Jarir al-Tabari (d. 923) wrote his great hadith-based Qur’an commentary[23] in the late ninth and early tenth centuries, many traditions on the story of human creation were in circulation, which the Muslim scholars – as Tabari repeatedly acknowledges “had learned from the people of the Torah.” While he quotes large numbers of these traditions, Tabari remains cautious as to their reliability; frequently he indicates mental reservations with the phrase “god knows best,” or by expressing the hope that his sources “god willing” are right, or by opining that their accounts represent interpretations “within the realm of possibility.”[24] But then there also follows, in Tabari, a whole array of Bible-derived traditions that relate such extra-Qur’anic lore as that adam’s wife was created from a rib in his body and therefore he named her hawwa’, “because she was created from a living thing”,[25] and that iblis entered into the garden in the belly (or mouth, fangs, or jaw) of a snake.[26] Many of the traditions quoted by Tabari also blame the woman for succumbing to iblis’/satan’s temptation, as it was also the majority opinion of theological experts by Tabari’s time that it was only through the woman’s weakness and guile that satan could bring about adam’s’ downfall. after hawwa’ succumbed to iblis’s insinuations, she went to adam and addressed him with iblis’ very words, and he ate,[27] or she commanded her husband to eat,[28] or she used sexual desire or intoxication as her means to overcome his rational powers of resistance.[29] god then cursed the earth from which adam was created so that its fruits would turn to thorns, and he banished him to a life of want and work.[30] Then god condemned the woman in terms that involved her constitution and mental abilities, indeed her very personhood and that of her daughters for all time to come: because hawwa’ had tempted god’s servant and had made the tree bleed when she picked its fruit, she was condemned to bleed once month, to carry and deliver her children against her will, and to be often close to death at delivery.[31] god also made the woman stupid and foolish, while he had created her wise and intelligent. “Were it not for the calamity that afflicted Hawwa’, the women of this world would not menstruate, would be wise, and would bear their children with ease.”[32] The snake in whose belly iblis had entered the garden was cursed to slither (naked) on its belly, to eat dust, and to be the eternal enemy of man,[33] wherefore the Prophet commanded the Muslims to “kill the snake wherever you find it.”[34] on the question of the humans’ repentance after their disobedience, many traditions quoted by Tabari indicate that both the man and the woman acknowledged their sin and asked god’s forgiveness and mercy, but an even larger number of reports specify that the prayer for forgiveness and god’s acceptance of it involved adam alone.[35] The medieval exegetes largely continued to blame the woman for mankind’s individual and communal sin by opining that the Qur’anic notion of “sound nature” (fitra) was largely reserved for the male, while the female was viewed as an occasion of “social anarchy” (fitna) in need of control.

over time, however, the theme of the woman’s role in humanity’s primeval error ceased to be the focus of the debate as other theological issues gained prominence. Two great exegetic works written during the twelfth century reveal the extent to which medieval Islamic theology was laboring to find scholastic answers to the theodicycal problem of the nature of evil in a world created by a good and Just creator. in this great debate, the islamic “Free Will Party” was represented by Mahmud ibn umar al-Zamakhshari (d. 1144) who was a Mu’tazili. Mu’tazilite rationalist theology argued ethical and metaphysical principles, especially the principles of god’s unity and Justice, and their implications, with the strictest logic. Mu’tazilite theology was speculative, intellectualist, and strictly Qur’anic; thus, the Mu’tazilites were neither philosophers nor freethinkers or liberals, but theologians in the strictest sense of the word. Their doctrine of god’s Justice gave widest berth to man’s free will but also argued that god – by his essential nature – was Bound to be Just.[36] Being a Mu’tazilite, al-Zamakhshari regarded adam’s and hawwa’s sin as “minor” since it involved disobedience, not apostacy, and thus “god had to forgive it.” Consequently Zamakhshari attributed the first couple’s repentance to their “exaggerated righteousness,” saying that they acted “in the manner of saints and the righteous who regard minor sins as major, but enormous good deeds as minor.”[37] The purpose of this reading, of course, was to support the Mu’tazilite definition of “sin,” not to exonerate Hawwa’. Indeed, to Zamakhshari Hawwa remained as guilty as she first appeared to the early traditionalists. He establishes this by quoting a tradition (already quoted by Tabari) according to which the angels did not permit hawwa’ to approach her husband adam on his deathbed, while he was calling out to her to leave the lord’s angels alone, since what had happened to him had only happened because of her.[38]

Mainstream (orthodox) opposition to Mu’tazilite theology was thereafter formulated by al-ash’ari (d. 935) and his school that came to dominate sunni theology until modern times. ash arism teaches that since god’s will is absolute and eternal, He is the efficient cause of all motion, including man’s actions. To explain human responsibility in a universe of predestination, the ash’arites developed the doctrine of “acquisition” (kasb, iktisab), where god creates the power (to act) in man, and man “acquires” that power, since the act and the power to act occur simultaneously.[39] (Bediuzzaman Said Nursi’s theological argumentation was in part profoundly influenced by al-Ash’ari, as is outlined in what follows). Ash’arism’s greatest representative among the medieval Qur’anic exegetes was abu abdallah Muhammad ibn umar ibn al-husayn al-razi, known as Fakhr al-din al-razi (d. 1209). in his enormous commentary on the Qur’an, al-Tafsir al-kabir (also known as Mafatih al-ghayb), he brilliantly fused the principles of (Qur’an-based) ash’arism with those of falsafa, the islamic heir to greek philosophy.

as a scholastic theologian (mutakallim) whose main frame of reference was the Qur’anic text, razi at times questioned the consensus of the doctors of law and theology, re-thought the hadith in terms of inner-Qur’anic logic and rationalist dogma, and measured traditional lore against the categories of islamic law. For razi, the real issue in the narrative of iblis, rebellion and the humans’ disobedience was the problematic of free will as opposed to predestination. To razi, the chain of disobedience leading from iblis to adam had to originate somewhere in god’s intention,[40] but the trouble with iblis, says razi, is that he argues for “predestination” in his own case while explaining or explaining away the seduction of the human “in the manner of the free-will party.”[41] By logic razi also concluded that iblis must have seduced adam directly, without the woman’s interference.[42] With all of its rationalism and Qur’an-centeredness, however, razi’s exegesis also reflects the legal and social realities of his age. Thus, for example, he finds proof of male authority over the woman and woman’s exclusion from activites outside of her home in the Qur’anic accounts of the first couple’s repentance and punishment, when he emphasizes that adam repented “while the woman was his follower.”[43] The punishment of adam’s earthly “toil” (sura 20:117) was not really a punishment, because toil enjoined on a person is a means of atonement as well as a source of recompense for a man.[44] The burden of “toil” was imposed on adam alone because a man must also toil for his wife whose guardian he is; “toil” implies the fatigue of the quest after sustenance, which is incumbent on the man but not the woman.[45] razi also found occasion to quote the widely circulated and still popular woman-as-rib hadith which reflects Hawwa’s origin in Adam and also means to describe female nature. The hadith, found in

Bukhari and other canonical hadith collections, indicates on the authority of the Prophet that “woman was created from a crooked rib. if you set out to straighten her, you will break her, and if you leave her alone while there is crookedness in her, you will enjoy her.”[46] But when razi contended that the traditions blaming adam’s lapse on hawwa’s wine that besotted his senses “are not farfetched,” he only did so “because adam was permitted to partake of all things (in the garden – even wine) except for that Tree.”[47]

God’s Creation of Humanity and the Origin of Evil in the Works of Bediuzzaman Said Nursi

Nursi’s monumental Qur’anic commentary, known as the Risale-i Nur Collection, is not an interlinear exegesis of the holy text in the format favored by the classical authorities, but represents “what is known as a manevi tefsir, or commentary which expounds the truth of the Qur’an, that is, explains and proves the verses containing the Qur’anic teachings about the essential truths of belief.”[48] Prominent among the many topics in this work on the essential truths of belief are the divine names and attributes (god’s existence and unity), god’s creation of the world, god’s determining power and man’s free choice (the mystery of theodicy), the certainty of resurrection, last judgment, and the afterlife in heaven or hell. Nursi’s teachings on the story of adam and his wife coalesce in the Qur’anic notion of theodicy which stipulates that evil action is a willful act of disobedience. doing evil is not the result of ignorance that god exists or ignorance of his command. “Because knowledge of god and of doing good is self-evident and periodically re-revealed, doing evil is a conscious decision to disobey god’s commands.”[49] god “created everything in the best way” (sura 32:7). god created the world to see and enjoy, as well as to show and display his own beauty and perfection. To explain the mystery of creation, Nursi uses the parable of the mighty king (god) who constructed a vast and majestic palace in order to display to the people the majesty of his rule, his glittering wealth, the wonders of his art, and the marvels of his knowledge. later he appointed a supreme commander (the Prophet Muhammad) who informed the people that the king had made and displayed all these riches to make himself known to them and so that they would love him in thanks and praise. some of the people who visited the palace heeded the supreme commander's message and were (eventually) rewarded with permanent bliss. The others misused the pleasures of the palace, disobeyed the king's rules, and were cast into prison. Nursi clarifies that the first group believed in Muhammad's message, listened to the Qur'an and followed its rules, and thanked and praised god. The second group rejected and denied all manifestations of the divine names and thus was cut off from the king's presence.[50] god is Truth, Beauty, and reality. Whatever elements of truth, beauty, and reality are embedded in our terrestrial lives of brute facticities, are mere reflections of god's Perfection. on the relationship of god to the world of his creation, Nursi at times adopts the metaphors that many Sufi authorities had employed before his time. Thus he states that god is to the world just as the sun is to the mirror images that reflect the sun's brightness in the world's many "bubbles and transparent objects," meaning that while the latter reflections are entirely contingent upon the sun, the sun is entirely independent of them. all things testify to the necessary existence and oneness of the necessarily existent one, and with their deaths and disappearance, they testify to his pre-eternity, everlastingness, and unity. "Just as life, which displays a manifestation of divine beauty, is a proof of divine oneness, and a sort of manifestation of divine unity, death too which displays the manifestation of divine glory, is a proof of divine unity."[51] god "created everything in the best way" (sura 32:7), meaning that everything in creation is put together according to its innate abilities with perfect measure and order.[52] it is god "who creates death and life" (sura 67:2). death is not a punishment wrought on humankind because of their primordial act of rebellion against their creator (as taught by the apostle Paul), but death is a proof of god's dominicality, as much as life is a proof of it.[53]

god "created man in the best of forms" (sura 95:4) and then: "he taught adam the names, all of them" (sura 2:31). Nursi sees man as the (defective) mirror to the divine names in three aspects: his weakness, poverty, and faults show up god's power, riches, and mercy; his partial knowledge and sovereignty show up god's absolute knowledge and complete sovereignty; and he is "the greatest impress" among the many impresses of the divine names.[54] To Nursi, the meaning of "teaching adam the names" was linked to adam's ability to be god's vicegerent (khalifa) on earth and thus symbolized man’s domination over most of the other physical beings in the universe.[55] god willed that man, a single species, would perform functions unfettered by the natural restrictions that limit all other animals.[56] But man’s lofty nature was also linked to his foolishness, as specified in sura 33:72: god offered “the Trust (al-amana) to the heavens and the earth and the mountains; but they refused to undertake it, being afraid thereof. But man assumed it; indeed, he is most unjust, most foolish. “To Nursi this verse signifies the morally devastating potential of man’s selfishness. Just as man can rise to great heights of morality, he can also surrender himself to great wrongdoing.[57] so then why did adam rebel and what caused him to do so? in other words, how did evil originate in a world created by a Just and all-Powerful god? This, of course, is the key issue in the theological problematic of theodicy. Nursi addresses the problem by way of contrasting divine determining (to save the human soul from pride) with the gift of choice (to make the human soul admit to its responsibility). god creates both good and evil, but it is man’s soul that “acquires” (kasb) good or evil acts by its own free will. Therefore, the acquisition (kasb) of evil is evil, because it signifies desire for evil; evil and ugliness pertain to human desire and derive from man’s capacity to act on that desire. But divine determining is based on truth and justice, and thus the creation of evil (as a potential choice?) is not evil. Nursi avers that, ultimately, this question is a mystery; “our not knowing how the power of choice is compatible with divine determining does not prove that it is not so, “just as the Qur’an says: (sura 4:79) “whatever good happens to you is from god, but whatever evil befalls you is from yourself.”[58] god’s wisdom even turns evil and ugliness into goodness and beauty. adam’s expulsion from paradise, says Nursi, served but as a means to unfold his potentialities. if he had remained in the garden, his rank would have been like that of the angels; since divine wisdom required a realm of accountability appropriate to the potentialities of man, his expulsion from paradise was a divine act of pure wisdom and pure mercy.[59] There are numerous universal good purposes (even) in the existence of satan, because human striving occurs only through the challenges that are posed to the human by the existence of evil spirits and harmful things.[60] in his theology of divine determining and human free will, Nursi thus argued from within the orthodox position first formulated by al-Ash’ari (mentioned above) which Nursi himself acknowledges as “the sunni school” and its members as “we people of truth,” while speaking of the Jabriyya (Predestinationists) and the Mu’tazila (Free Will Party who taught that “god could not create evil”) as “heretics.”[61]

 Conclusion

The abrahamic scriptures that were the focus of this chapter on the origin of evil share numerous concepts. Most important among them are, first, that evil originated not with god but with an act of rebellion against god on the part of satan and/or primordial humanity; and, second, that this act of disobedience was not pre-ordained but followed from the fact that god had endowed his creatures with free will.

The many differences in how the various religious traditions developed and interpreted this shared blueprint can likewise be ascertained by investigating the paradigmatic roles attributed to adam and his wife. early christian thought developed both the christian concept of adam’s Fall from grace and also eve’s instrumentality in this Fall. it was not the former but the latter notion (eve’s culpability) that found resonance in the medieval islamic Tafsir. By contrast, the Qur’anic narrative weaves together the themes of human disobedience and god’s punishment with the themes of human repentance and god’s forgiveness, as it progresses from its gender-equal doctrine of human rebellion and banishment to the affirmation of God’s mercy and forgiveness for those who repent and believe. Nursi’s exposition of humanity’s creation narrative is strictly Qur’anic, and is free of any of the hadith materials that were so abundant in the premodern exegeses. adam stands for all of humanity, male as well as female; god created adam to be his vicegerent on earth, god charged adam with the Trust, adam’s nature was lofty but he was also foolish. adam was given the freedom of moral choice and adam used it to covet what was forbidden. Nursi pays no attention to the old gendered hadiths that diminish the woman’s creational rank and augment her role in mankind’s primeval act of disobedience against god. in his Risale-i-Nur

Collection, Bediuzzaman Said Nursi thus dealt with the theological problematic of theodicy by focusing his arguments strictly and exclusively on the Qur’an’s interplay between god’s omnipotence and human capability to sin, human repentance and god’s forgiveness; by asserting that through the grace of god even human sin can result in good; and by maintaining that even human suffering can refine human life.[62]

 2. living life in the light of death: a conversation with Bediuzzaman Said Nursi

Ian Markham

in the West, belief in life after death has gone out of fashion. For some, it has become fashionable to offer an account of faith that does not include life after death.[63] For others, life after death, along with the rest of the religious edifice, is just implausible. Nursi would have recognized both of these challenges. living at a time in Turkey when some saw islam as a problem which needs to be overcome if Turkey is to be a progressive nation state, he was deeply concerned about the gap between faith and the modern, rational mindset. Therefore it is interesting to see how Nursi responds to the challenge of skepticism about life after death.

in this chapter i propose to put Betrand russell in conversation with Bediuzzaman Said Nursi. In the first section, we shall explore Russell's worldview (as it pertains to life after death). in the second section, we shall give sustained attention to the Tenth Word and its five addendums. We shall seek to get inside the arguments of Bediuzzaman Said Nursi. in the third section, we shall see how Nursi's fundamental "orientation" is the key difference with russell. an orientation that, as a Christian, I find compelling and persuasive.

 Bertrand Russell (187–1970)

There is no doubt that Russell is a major influence on the shape of British philosophy in the twentieth century. he is best know for his work in the philosophy of mathematics: he was responsible for “logicism” (the view that maths can be reduced to certain basic logically axioms) and, with others, is credited with the emergence of “analytical philosophy.” along with these achievements in philosophy, he became a leading advocate of social causes: he was a strong supporter of voting rights for women and a leading opponent of war.

our interest in russell is around his work in philosophy of religion. in a famous essay, russell explains why he is not a christian. he has several problems with Christianity. For a start he does not find the arguments for belief persuasive. This is his summary and criticisms of the design argument, which is worth quoting at length:

The next step in the process brings us to the argument from design. you all know the argument from design: everything in the world is made just so that we can manage to live in the world, and if the world was ever so little different we could not manage to live in it. That is the argument from design. it sometimes takes a rather curious form; for instance, it is argued that rabbits have white tails in order to be easy to shoot. i do not know how rabbits would view that application. it is an easy argument to parody. you all know Voltaire’s remark, that obviously the nose was designed to be such as to fit spectacles. That sort of parody has turned out to be not nearly so wide of the mark as it might have seemed in the eighteenth century, because since the time of darwin we understand much better why living creatures are adapted to their environment. it is not that their environment was made to be suitable to them, but that they grew to be suitable to it, and that is the basis of adaptation. There is no evidence of design about it.

When you come to look into this argument from design, it is a most astonishing thing that people can believe that this world, with all the things that are in it, with all its defects, should be the best that omnipotence and omniscience have been able to produce in millions of years. i really cannot believe it. do you think that, if you were granted omnipotence and omniscience and millions of years in which to perfect your world, you could produce nothing better than the Ku Klux Klan, the Fascists, and Mr. Winston churchill? really i am not much impressed with the people who say: “look at me: i am such a splendid product that there must have been design in the universe.” i am not very much impressed by the splendor of those people. Moreover, if you accept the ordinary laws of science, you have to suppose that human life and life in general on this planet will die out in due course: it is merely a flash in the pan; it is a stage in the decay of the solar system; at a certain stage of decay you get the sort of conditions and temperature and so forth which are suitable to protoplasm, and there is life for a short time in the life of the whole solar system. you see in the moon the sort of thing to which the earth is tending – something dead, cold, and lifeless.

i am told that that sort of view is depressing, and people will sometimes tell you that if they believed that they would not be able to go on living. do not believe it; it is all nonsense. nobody really worries much about what is going to happen millions of years hence. even if they think they are worrying much about that, they are really deceiving themselves. They are worried about something much more mundane, or it may merely be a bad digestion; but nobody is really seriously rendered unhappy by the thought of something that is going to happen in this world millions and millions of years hence. Therefore, although it is of course a gloomy view to suppose that life will die out – at least i suppose we may say so, although sometimes when i contemplate the things that people do with their lives i think it is almost a consolation – it is not such as to render life miserable. it merely makes you turn your attention to other things.[64] in amongst russell’s humorous presentation and critique of the argument, there are three major arguments. First, he makes much of darwinian evolution as a naturalistic explanation of order. The theme that science has explained the complexity of the world more effectively than theism reoccurs throughout his essay “Why i am not a christian.” For russell, christianity has been a frequent opponent of scientific insight. Where Christians presumed that the world was at the center of the universe, science proved them wrong. so in like manner, where christians presumed that god had put the universe together, science demonstrated that the apparent order is due to the elegant hypothesis of evolution.

The second argument is that there is so much evil, suffering, and wickedness in this world that it is very unlikely that an all-loving and all-powerful being would have created it. elsewhere in russell’s writings, the problem of evil and suffering, for russell, is a decisive argument for skepticism. he thinks it is just impossible for the fact of evil to be reconciled with the traditional attributes of god.

The third argument is that the scientific worldview, which includes the ultimate extinction of all life on earth in the death of our star, is one that we must learn to live with. And in fact, psychologically, this is not a difficult thing to do.

This last point is important for our purposes. in an article entitled: “a Free Man’s Worship,” Russell outlines his credo. Having first outlined the increasingly implausibility of religion, he writes:

such, in outline, but even more purposeless, more void of meaning is the world which science presents for our belief. amid such a world, if anywhere, our ideals henceforward must find a home. That Man is the produce of causes which had no prevision of the end they were achieving; that his origin, his growth, his hopes and fears, his loves and his beliefs, are but the outcomes of accidental collocations of atoms; that no fire, no heroism, no intensity of thought and feeling, can preserve an individual life beyond the grace; that all the labours of the ages, all the devotion, all the inspiration, all the noonday brightness of human genius, are destined to extinction in the vast death of the solar system, and that the whole temple of Man’s achievement must inevitably be buried beneath the debris of a universe in ruins – all these things, if not quite beyond dispute, are yet so nearly certain, that no philosophy which rejects them can hope to stand. only within the scaffolding of these truths, only on the firm foundation of unyielding despair, can the soul’s habitation henceforth be safely built.[65]

For russell, there is no life after death. We are, ultimately, simply remarkable complex bundles of atoms that face extinction when we die. although, for russell, this might require “character” to admit this, it is truth that we cannot ultimately evade and to imagine otherwise is a self-delusion. We turn now to the first volume of the Risale-i Nur – The Words – in which Bediuzzaman Said Nursi sets out the arguments for resurrection.

 Bediuzzaman Said Nursi (1877–190)

although the worldview of russell never really persuaded the Turks, Nursi's robust defense of life after death came in a setting where anti-religious voices were being heard. as Kemal atatürk moved in with his modernizing project, islam became association with everything backward and misguided. Said Nursi's project was to push back. he explained that his goal in writing on resurrection and the hereafter was to show "how rational, appropriate, well-founded and coherent are the truths of islam."[66] he wanted to illustrate that placing this life into a cosmic context, which assumes that this life was a stage prior to judgment and accountability, was a rational, well-grounded belief.

To understand Nursi's account of resurrection, we need to identify five aspects. The first is that the argument does not take the traditional deductive form. We search in vain for a straightforward syllogism. instead, as with much of the Risalei Nur, we are invited through story and allegory to see how "incomplete" this life is when we deny the existence of the hereafter. Nursi wants us to stand back from the details of living and appreciate the setting and context. in much the same way a book is unintelligible without an author, so this world is unintelligible without a god and correspondingly life after death. in the conclusion to the tenth word, Nursi writes: "The preceding Twelve Truths confirm, supplement and support each other. coming together in union, they demonstrate the required result."[67] Nursi is here explaining the cumulative character of the argument. Perhaps Nursi would concede that a skeptic could challenge one strand of the argument, but "coming together in union, they demonstrate the required result."[68]

The second aspect to his argument is that the universe is clearly intended. This is the point of Nursi's delightful story of two men strolling through the world. one man recognizes the order in the world as clear evidence that there is a creator who oversees everything; the other decides to live and do as he pleases hoping that he will not be held accountable. at this point Nursi is appealing to that basic sense of awe, which is the fundamental impulse of religion. in much the same way as an elaborate, beautiful house needs an architect, so Nursi explains:

The cosmos also requires an infinitely wise, all-knowing and all-powerful maker. For the magnificent cosmos is a palace that has the sun and the moon as its lamps and the stars as its candles; time is like a rope or ribbon hung within it, on to which the glorious creator each year threads a new world.[69]

For Nursi, the problem with atheism is that it is not marveling sufficiently at the world. The order in the world – documented so well by modern science – all points to a creator. We live in a world which is intended. When we ask "why are things the way they are?," only one answer makes sense "things are because god intended them to be." The force of Nursi's point does not dissipate if one believes in evolution. With evolution, we still have a process which requires explanation: "Why does evolution occur?" is still a proper question. and the theist will answer that "the process occurs because god intended the process to occur." Nursi repeatedly comes back to this point: this world requires an explanation. one is morally culpable if one cannot see this.

in addition to the atheist (who questions the existence of god), Nursi has another target in this section of The Words. he is deeply concerned about the "theist" who believes in god but makes no explicit acknowledgement of god in terms of behavior. recognizing that the world is intended and points to god is only stage one. stage two is linked: therefore we should expect to be held accountable for our behavior. We should expect our actions to be judged. on the positive level, we should be living our lives open to the divine. on the negative level, we should resist evil, hatred, and selfishness. Nursi sees this world as an arena of testing and growth. it is – to quote Keats – a vale of soul-making. We should live life aware that we will be held accountable for our behavior.

along with this general argument that the order is evidence for god and therefore we have good reason to believe that we will be held accountable for our behavior, Nursi has an additional argument derived from nature, which is worth mentioning. Nursi writes:

[i]n the majority of beings, there exists different aspects and qualities that are like curtains opening to the right and the left: one aspect bears witness to the Maker, and the other aspect indicates resurrection. For example, the beauty of man's being, fashioned as he is in the fairest of forms, demonstrates the existence of the Maker, while at the same time the fact that together with his comprehensive abilities, lodged in that fairest of forms, he soon declines and dies, demonstrates the existence of the resurrection. [70]

There is a power in this argument, which is worth dwelling on. The extraordinary beauty of the human person is evidence for the Maker, yet this beauty is encased in a mortal body that rapidly deteriorates. The argument here could be called the "Beauty imperative." it is inconceivable that the beauty could just cease to be because the very intrinsic nature of the beauty requires that it be reformed in some way. In much the same way as one is entitled to be confident that a report of a wicked action by a very good person cannot be true because you know about the nature of that good person, so one can be confident that the beauty of the human form will be resurrected because of the nature of beauty. This argument is a further development of that basic awe impulse, which is the heart of the religious disposition.

The third aspect is that for Nursi the hereafter is an essential part of his theodicy. The problem of evil is a major conundrum. Why does a good, all-powerful, god permit suffering? since the inception of faith, this has always been a problem. But for the modern mind, this is an acute problem. This is partly because the twentieth century birthed such imaginative and horrendous evils (from the holocaust to Pol Pot) that it became difficult to believe in humanity (understood as an entity that had sufficient intellect and discernment to know that certain forms of behavior are wrong), let along god. But also this was partly due to the decline in belief in the hereafter. The suffering of a child (as documented by dostoyevsky in The Brothers Karamazov) or the evil of the stalin gulags become unintelligible and impossible to reconcile with faith unless this world is part of a bigger context. Nursi puts it bluntly when he writes:

There must in addition be a realm of punishment appropriate to god’s glory and dignity. For generally the oppressor leaves the world while still in possession of his might, and the oppressed while still subjected to humiliation. These matters are therefore deferred for the attention of a supreme tribunal; it is not that they are neglected.[71]

Nursi is exactly right here. The evil of the world is impossible to understand unless there is an afterlife. left with all the evil in its naked awfulness makes theism a complete nonsense. We are, of course, still left with the puzzle why god’s action to rectify evil does not occur during this lifetime, yet that is a lesser problem than no rectification at all.

an obvious objection is that this is open to the Marxist objection that the “hope” of the hereafter is the tool of the oppressor to prevent the poor complaining about injustice. For Nursi, he wants to turn this around. one of the reasons that he is willing to stress the inevitability of judgment, rather than just stressing rewards for the oppressed, is that he wants to motivate the potential oppressor to live morally. unlike the propensity of much liberal christian theology that wants to stress the way everything is reconciled into the life of god, Nursi wants the oppressor to fear life after death. Fear might trigger better behavior.

The fourth aspect is the most interesting. For Nursi, a major reason why we can be sure that there is a hereafter is that it is revealed. Nursi summarizes thus:

From the previous truths it has become apparent that resurrection is so firmly rooted a truth that not even a power capable of lifting up the globe, breaking it and casting it aside, could shake it. For God Almighty Himself affirms this truth in accordance with the meaning of all his names and attributes; his Most Noble Messenger confirms it with all of his miracles and the cosmos itself bears witness to it with creational signs it contains and all the wise processes that take place within it.[72]

For Nursi, where creation points, revelation confirms. In this respect, Nursi is a straight-forward uncomplicated, traditional Muslim. elsewhere in his writings he talks of the “proofs” that the Qur’an is the definitive revelation of God and the Prophet Muhammad is the “messenger of god.” Nursi wants Muslims to revisit the Qur’an and be reminded afresh of its coherency, power, and beauty. The Qur’an is the very word of god: and the Qur’an teaches that there is a hereafter.

For Jews and christians, i am sure Nursi would also point out the hereafter is also taught in the Torah and gospel. Jesus talked about “life beyond the grave” as a setting for accountability and rectification. Indeed all the major religions of the world challenge the secular assumptions that this empirical world is all there is. it does look as if god has been repeatedly telling humanity that this life is a stage leading to a life to come.

The last aspect is much more pragmatic. again Nursi’s context is important here. Throughout the Risale-i Nur, Nursi is sensitive to the accusation that observant Muslims do not make good citizens. again atatürk’s passionate advocacy of a modern european nation ran parallel with a conviction that the observant Muslim can be a problem. so Nursi takes this opportunity to explain how moral behavior is enhanced at every stage of life with belief in the hereafter. it is worth quoting at length:

We will indicate, by way of being a measure, four out of the innumerable proofs of this fact, that belief in the hereafter is the very basis and foundation of all the social and individual life of man, and the fundamental of all bliss and accomplishment.

The FirsT ProoF: children, who comprise one fourth of the human race, can endure the death and decrease that appear to them so awesome and tragic only by means of the idea of Paradise... .

The second ProoF: old people, who make up another fourth of humanity, can support the proximity of the grave only by means of the afterlife. only by this means can they find some consolation for the approaching extinction of the worldly life to which they are so bound and the closing off to them of this fair world... .

The Third ProoF: it is only thought of hell that enables young men ... to restrain their turbulent feelings and tempestuous souls and passions from committing transgression, oppression and destruction, and to make them serve instead the purposes of social life. Were there not the fear of hell, those intoxicated youths would follow the principle, “might is right,” and running after their passions would turn the world into a hell for the weak and feeble... . The FourTh ProoF: The most comprehensive center of the human race in its worldly life, its most fundamental resource, its paradise, refuge and stronghold of worldly happiness, is the life of the family. everyone’s home is like a small world for him. The vitality and happiness of his home and his family depend upon earnest, sincere and devoted respect, upon true caring and selfsacrificing compassion. This in turn depends on eternal friendship, an everlasting companionship, an immortal bond, and the belief in the existence of paternal, filial, fraternal and friendly relations that are to exist for an infinite period and in a life everlasting.[73]

There is considerable wisdom in this text. For the young who have to cope with sudden loss or tragedy, the hope beyond the grave is essential. For the elderly, there own mortality make them think about the life hereafter. For those tempted by the pleasures of youth, the hereafter provides a salutary warning that one will be held accountable. and for those who are married, the hereafter provides a framework for the relationship that can help to cope with changes in appearance.

 Russell and Nursi Compared in one area there is agreement between russell and Nursi. Both agree that belief in life after death is deeply connected with belief in god. For russell, there is insufficient evidence that God exists; therefore life after death is implausible. For Nursi, the evidence for god is incontrovertible; therefore life after death is a necessary corollary.

What is at stake here is a fundamental orientation. russell cannot see any evidence for god anywhere, while Nursi cannot see a place where god is not. The fundamental orientation is shaped by Nursi by that basic sense of awe. For Nursi, the fundamental question “why things are?” requires an explanation. For Russell, it is simply a fluke – the cosmos is a big accident. For Russell, if he is going to believe in god, he needs further evidence – beyond the existence of this remarkable world. and Nursi considers this unreasonable. indeed he would go further, it is needlessly stubborn. in an echo of William Paley’s (1743–1805) design argument, Nursi draws a parallel between a human artifact and the world of nature. in much the same way, an author can be deduced from an experience with a book (even if you didn’t see the book being composed or physically encounter the author), so one can deduce the existence of a creator from our experience with the world.

now for russell, there are two possible explanations for the order in the world: it could be either an accident or design. russell’s problem is that he needs decisive evidence to persuade him of the design hypothesis. For Nursi, the “accident” hypothesis for anything which is so orderly and manifestly intended is so implausible that one can disregard it at the outset. Nursi does not consider the two hypotheses – accident or intended – as equivalents. it would be a little like suggesting that there are two possible explanations for a car accident; it is either reckless driving or an alien intervention from the skies. although it is logically conceivable that aliens exist and might be causing traffic accidents, the alien hypothesis is so remote a possibility that it can be rejected at the outset. To use the language of the logicians, the prior probability of the “accident” hypothesis for the order can be disregarded at the outset.

Nursi does not explicitly discuss the darwinian hypothesis of natural selection as an explanation of order in the world. however, both Paley[74] and more recently swinburne, both argue that the processes of natural selection still require explanation. swinburne talks about the processes of nature as a “machine-making machine,”[75] which is still remarkable and best explained as an intended process.

Nursi, however, does challenge russell on the problem of evil. For Nursi, it is not surprising that the problem of evil becomes overwhelming if this life is all there is. as noted in my description of Nursi’s argument, he does concede that are many instances of sustained injustices in this world. For theists to cope with evil and suffering, it is essential that there is life beyond the grave. For atheists not to misunderstand theism, it is important that they recognize this wider canvas on which god is working – a canvas that includes both this life and the life to come.

To these arguments for life after death grounded in nature, Nursi supplements them with an appeal to the revelation of god through the prophets (for Nursi, this includes the Torah, Jesus, and supremely Muhammad). all of the prophets teach that god exists and that god will hold us accountable for our life on earth. Presumably, russell would take issue with the credibility of these witnesses. he would argue that the supposed revelations are self-contradictory and often unedifying. however, russell’s problem is that on this issue of life after death, there is a universal witness. every religious tradition rejects the view that we are simply complex bundles of atoms that face extinction when we die.

and so we come back to that basic difference – that basic orientation. For Nursi, the total narrative of faith provides a location and perspective that makes sense of the complexity of the world and our sense that there is more to come. it will not surprise you to know that this christian, in this exchange with Bertrand Russell, stands firmly with Bediuzzaman Said Nursi.

 3. The resurrection of the dead and Final Judgment in the Thought of Said Nursi

Thomas Michel, S.J.

one of the questions that most clearly distinguishes the followers of those religions that trace their origins back to their common ancestor abraham from those who do not accept any divine religion is their belief in the resurrection of the dead. in both christianity and islam, the resurrection of the dead, together with the Final Judgment, and the eternal reward or punishment granted on the basis of the individual's faith and deeds, is an essential element, a "pillar" of that faith. The two religions might differ on details concerning the eschatological fate that awaits all humans, but on the key issues of the reality of resurrection, god's judgment of all humankind on the last day, and reward and punishment, there is broad agreement in the theology of islamic and christian faiths.

however, for a person thinking and operating in a positivistic frame of mind, the concept of resurrection is a religious myth that can be neither proven nor disproved, but must remain always a hypothesis whose validity depends on blind faith. some of those who reject religious faith go farther to advance arguments that would attempt to disprove the possibility of resurrection, while for others the concept is simply an absurdity, "pie in the sky," evidence of the fairy-tale wishful thinking of religious people.

This is not a new experience for believers in the divine religions. in the christian tradition, when st. Paul spoke at the areopagus in athens, the assembled scholars were interested until Paul began speaking about the resurrection, at which point they sneered and turned away (acts of the apostles 17.32). For Paul, god's raising Jesus from the dead is evidence of god's promise to raise all those who believe, and thus the resurrection becomes a key element in christian faith. as Paul says, "if there is no resurrection of the dead, then not even christ has been raised, and if christ has not been raised, our preaching is useless and so is your faith” (1 corinthians 15.13–14).

Many centuries later, the experience of Muhammad with Quraysh was similar. When Muhammad spoke to the pagan arabs about god who causes death and resurrection, they answered, “What, will we and our fathers be raised up, once we have turned into dust? We have been promised this, we and our forefathers, but these are merely legends of earlier peoples” (Qur’an 27:67–8; cf. also 23:82–3). The earlier peoples whom the Quraysh accused of perpetuating fanciful myths were evidently the Jews and christians conveying the teaching of Moses and Jesus.

Just as the pagan Quraysh rejected the teaching of the earlier prophets about the resurrection, so also they were rejecting Muhammad bringing the same message.

For Said Nursi, the resurrection and Final Judgment are central to the Qur’anic message. he goes so far as to say that a third of the Qur’an focuses on these eschatological elements with the intention of proving and demonstrating them to unbelievers. “all the miracles, truths, and proofs proving foremost the veracity of the Qur’an of miraculous exposition testify to and prove the realization and occurrence of resurrection. almost a third of the Qur’an is about resurrection, and at the beginning of most of its short suras are powerful verses about it. it expresses the same truth explicitly and implicitly, and in thousands of its verses it proves and demonstrates it.”[76]

 The Resurrection and the Demands of Justice

similarly, one could say that almost one-third of the content of The Words, the first part of the Risale-i Nur, focuses on questions of the resurrection, intent on demonstrating the reality of these elements of faith for modern unbelievers. in the Tenth Word Nursi strives to give systematic order to his argumentation in favor of the resurrection, and hence this portion of the Risale-i Nur can serve as a suitable starting place for our analysis of his view of this pillar of islamic faith.

Nursi introduces the topic with a long allegory of two men journeying through an earthly utopia. it is a well-ordered and prosperous place where no one locks their homes or shops, as there is no need to guard one's possessions. one of the travelers heedlessly wants to take and steal as much as he can carry, but his companion undertakes to show him, in twelve reasoned arguments, that in such a place, there must be a supreme tribunal where everyone will be judged according to their deeds.[77]

The underlying concept in these twelve arguments is that of justice. The manifest injustice of life on earth requires another world where wrongs will be corrected, victims will be avenged, and upright behavior will be rewarded. it is also in god's character to be just, and therefore any conception of the universe which would lead to the denial of god's justice and mercy is an attack on god's very nature. his twelve arguments may be summarized as follows:

1. even in the best-ordered earthly realm, there must be a mechanism for justice: for punishing misdeeds, defending the oppressed, and rewarding faithful service. obviously, in the world in which we live, there is no manifest justice. The wrongdoers prosper, the innocent suffer, loyalty and honesty are not rewarded. The demands of cosmic justice require a resurrection, for there is no reward and punishment here. There must be a resurrection to a next life where judgment, reward and punishment will correct earthly wrongs.

2. god's own just nature demands a resurrection. The one who so wisely ordered this universe could not fail, in his mercy, to provide justice for those who have remained upright and faithful. god's generosity and compassion demands justice towards oppressed. But that justice is not found on this earth, so it must be found elsewhere.

3. god would not be compassionate and merciful if he did not hear and respond to the cries of the oppressed. But those who are victims of wrongdoing do not find satisfaction on this earth, and the unjust operate freely and successfully in this world. Therefore, if one believes that god is compassionate and merciful, there must be a resurrection to judgment where the oppressed can finally obtain the redress they deserve.

4. god’s abundant gifts show god to be generous and loving. But if these gifts are all perishable, and all that awaits people is death, separation, and extinction, then these apparent gifts would be nothing but a cruel joke. Moreover, god grants these gifts in order to be known and loved. But if there is no resurrection, those appreciating these gifts on earth would be only temporary admirers, and their appreciation would turn to resentment upon learning that the gifts were only fleeting hand-outs destined to be definitively snatched away in death.

5. all that god has granted humankind in this world is only meant to whet people’s appetite for the more permanent, exalted gifts that god has yet in store for them. god would be a cruel charlatan to give and promise so much and then abandon people to eternal extinction without fulfilling his promises. Thus, god’s integrity demands a resurrection and reward for faithful obedience.

6. This world is a constantly changing exhibition of god’s gifts, both the everchanging gifts of nature as well as man-made technological achievements. However, the very transient, fleeting nature of this worldly display requires that there be some eternal, stable world where the reality that shows itself here in an ephemeral way will permanently reside. otherwise, god would be reduced to acting like a stage magician who creates illusions with mirrors.

7. god’s omniscience demands resurrection. if god is truly cognizant of all that occurs on earth, then it follows that god knows, notes, and remembers every human deed, whether good or evil, and that the record of these deeds will be the basis for divine judgment. god would be a negligent caretaker and it would consequently be contrary to god’s dignity if misdeeds never went unpunished.

8. in all the revealed scriptures god has consistently promised to reward the good and punish evil. if god is truthful and the scriptures can be believed, there must be a resurrection. Can it be imagined that God will not fulfill God’s promises?

9. All the prophets and holy men have testified to God’s promises and assure us that those promises will be fulfilled. Yet the prophets are unanimous in affirming the resurrection and final judgment. Are we ready to disregard such unanimous testimony on the part of those sent by god?

10.The setting of this argument is anatolian spring. all the varied and constantly burgeoning life that can be seen in springtime points to a wise order in the universe and indicates that this ordered universe cannot be an end in itself. if it all ends in total extinction, the world is absurd and without rhyme or reason. if there is truly a wise purpose in the universe, it must point to something real and permanent in another world. Nursi will return repeatedly to this argument, with different emphases, again and again in the Risale-i Nur.

11.denying the resurrection and judgment would mean not only denying the wise order of the universe, but it would mean denying god’s compassion, mercy, and justice. Nursi is saying that denying the resurrection is tantamount to denying the existence of god, as this god is known from the scriptures. “We would also have to regard the one from whom all these wise measures proceed, all these generous acts, all these merciful gifts, as a vile gambler or treacherous tyrant (god forbid!). This would be to turn truth on its head.”[78] Moreover, denying the resurrection would mean not only denying god as god is known from scriptural tradition, but it would also mean denying the evidence of our own senses.

12.since the rewards for faithful service as well as punishments for evildoing are both deferred to the next life, denying the resurrection amounts to denying both reward and punishment. good and evil become equivalent and have the same end. Thus, denying the resurrection reduces all religions, scriptures, and claims to ultimate purpose to a relative value and condemns people to life in a pointless, superficial, ephemeral universe.

In his final argument, Nursi takes up what is most deeply at stake in the question of the resurrection and judgment. if this is the only world and life that exists, if there is no “Day of Reckoning” when accounts will be definitively settled, then religion and morality become human creations which point to no permanent reality. People are condemned to a shallow existence of validating their lives through a constant search for new and exciting pleasures and the acquisition of an unending stream of perishable consumer goods.

Nursi does not pretend that the twelve arguments which he produced for demonstrating the resurrection are exhaustive, or that no other proofs could be adduced.[79] in fact, the Risale-i Nur is replete with arguments in favor of the necessity of belief in the resurrection and Final Judgment. Nursi sees belief in god and the resurrection as a kind of double talisman which will protect and guide a person through the dangers of life.

in another allegory, he describes the situation of a wounded soldier on a battlefield, surrounded by dangers on all sides. In his hopeless plight, a stranger, “shining with light like Khidr,”[80] comes to teach him the twin talismans of “i believe in god and the last day,” which will heal his wounds and protect him from the physical and spiritual dangers that surround him. in explaining the allegory, Nursi holds that the life of people in this world is like that soldier. The challenges and problems that beset us are greater than our strength or wisdom to bear. however, belief in god and the resurrection will enable a person to confront life’s challenges with courage and to persevere with patience in the face of adversity.

 The Miracle of Springtime skeptics reacted to Nursi’s teaching about the resurrection with the objection that it is scientifically impossible for dead bodies to come to life again. Irreversible processes of corruption, molecular changes, interruption of brain waves, and the permanent malfunctioning of organs commence immediately after death. after some time in the grave, the human corpse itself reverts by inexorable biochemical processes to the substances from which it was composed. not even god could reverse these changes. Perhaps one could speak, as did some of the philosophers, of the resurrection of the soul, while the body lies decomposed for eternity in the grave. on the last day, if there should be a last day, there would be nothing left for god to raise, all the body's elements and compounds, bones and tissues, having been dispersed and recycled elsewhere in nature.

This objection, posed repeatedly in modern times, is in fact not a new one. The pagan Quraysh objected to Muhammad's preaching about the resurrection on the same grounds of impossibility. not even god can bring life out of death. in response to this objection, the Qur'an appeals to the sense experience of the Quraysh and says that just as god has the power to bring the earth to new life at the beginning of each spring, so god has the power to revive the dead.

Behold the marks of allah's mercy, how he revives the earth after it was dead. he indeed is the one who revives the dead and he has power over everything (Qur'an 30:50).

one could say that Said Nursi's defense of god's ability to raise the dead is simply an elaboration or commentary on this Qur'anic verse. This is not a peripheral idea to his thought, as he uses the image of new life in the spring over fifty times in the Risale-i Nur as an illustration of god's power to resurrect the dead. For god, the one is as easy as the other. There is no doubt that Nursi must have personally found spiritual enrichment in the miracle of anatolian springtime, with its "more than 300,000 species of plant and animal life"[81] appearing almost miraculously, but predictably at its appointed time every year at the end of the long, cold, grey winter.

i cannot hope to give all the references in the Risale-i Nur to this image, but a few citations must suffice to show Nursi's use of the figure of spring as likeness of the resurrection:

in exactly the same way, [god] creates the universe as easily as a city, and raises to life the springtime as easily as a garden, and raises to life all the dead at the resurrection as easily as creating the leaves, flowers, and fruits of the garden’s trees in the spring.[82]

The one who cannot create a spring cannot create a single apple either, for the apple is made at the same workbench. But the one who makes an apple can make the spring. each apple is an example in miniature of a tree, even of a garden or a cosmos. The apple seed that carries within itself the life story of the huge tree is, from the point of view of artistry, such a miracle that the one who creates it is incapable of nothing. so too, the one that creates today is able also to create the day of resurrection, and it is only the one capable of creating the spring that is able to create resurrection.[83] in spring, the dead trees, roots and animals come to life again exactly as they were, thus providing hundreds of thousands of examples, specimens and proofs of the supreme resurrection. in the place of others, plants and animals resembling them exactly are brought into being and life, thus publishing the pages of the beings of the preceding spring, together with their deeds and functions.[84]

The raising to life of all animate beings at the resurrection of the dead can be no more difficult for Divine Power than restoring to life a fly in the spring, heavy with the death-stained sleep of winter.[85] o you who deny resurrection! look at the trees! one Who raises to life and makes green in spring numberless skeleton-like trees which have been dead throughout winter, and in every tree even demonstrates three examples of resurrection through the leaves, blossoms, and fruit – the power of such a one cannot be challenged through denial or by considering resurrection improbable.[86]

The raising to life of all animate beings at the resurrection of the dead can be no more difficult for Divine Power than restoring to life a fly in the spring, heavy with the death-stained sleep of winter. For eternal Power is essential. it does not change; impotence cannot penetrate it; obstacles cannot intervene in it; there can be no degrees in it; everything is the same in relation to it.[87] now come back in the spring, the arena of the annual resurrection, and look! Note carefully the time in the spring when the Israfil-like angel of thunder calls out to the rain as though sounding his trumpet, giving the good news of the breath of life being breathed into the seeds buried beneath the ground. you will see that under the manifestation of the divine name of Preserver, those seeds that resemble each other and are all mixed up and confused, conform perfectly and without error to the creative commands proceeding from the all-

Wise creator.[88]

The administration and sustaining of the whole universe in relation to the power from all eternity of that all-glorious one is as easy as that of the spring, indeed, of a tree. and the creation of the resurrection of the dead, the realm of the hereafter, and Paradise and hell, is as easy as the resurrection in spring of a tree which had died the previous autumn.[89]

Nursi’s point in this oft-repeated image is that it is no more difficult for God to raise the dead than it is for god to bring new life to the dead earth or to bring about a single tree or flower from a dry, frozen bush. In other words, the resurrection of the dead is a part of god’s creative power and energy. if god is able to create life once from nothingness or from dead matter, god is able to do that over and over.[90]

One must not think that Nursi is living in a pre-scientific world in which he thinks that vegetable and animal life actually dies in the winter. he is well aware of the botanical dormant period that plants undergo, of the hidden life pulsating in a winter landscape of forests and fields. This scientific awareness, however, makes the springtime miracle of regeneration – the formation of blossoms, leaves, and fruits – no less amazing, no less remarkable as the sign of an all-powerful creator. he states:

With what miraculous and elevated style [the Qur’an] describes the resurrection of the dead and the great gathering and points to the following convincing proof: one can observe that the seeds concealed as though dead in the darkness of the earth and drops of water hidden and dispersed, seemingly non-existent in the atmosphere are raised to life swiftly and with perfect order every spring, and they emerge into the field of trial and examination as perpetual examples of resurrection. at the supreme resurrection, beings will emerge with same ease. since you observe the one here, you cannot deny the other.[91] in fact, it is not only the miracle of spring that demonstrates the resurrection. an individual's own sense perception gives evidence of resurrection over and over. Waking from sleep can be seen as a type of resurrection, as does the physical process of replacing all the molecules in the body. Nursi states:

There are many varieties of resurrection that a person experiences during his lifetime. Just as one sees the signs of the resurrection in a sort of dying every night and rebirth every morning, so it is agreed that he undergoes what resembles a resurrection every five or six years by changing all the particles in his body, and even undergoes a gradual resurrection twice a year.[92]

The phenomenon of springtime is not only a sign and symbol of the resurrection in demonstrating god's power to bring new life out of the seemingly dead, but it is also a demonstration, for those who are able to perceive it, of the transitory nature of life in this world. The wildflowers and blossoms that flourish in all their glory for a week or ten days and then vanish for another year are reminders that this world and all that pertains to it are not permanent. in world-weariness reminiscent of the great Sufi masters, Nursi expresses the sorrow he experienced at witnessing the transient nature of springtime beauty:

one time when observing the season of spring, i saw that the successive caravans of beings, and especially living creatures and the small young ones, which followed on one after the other and in a flowing torrent displaying hundreds of thousands of samples of the resurrection of the dead and great gathering on the face of the earth, appeared only briefly then disappeared. The tableaux of death and transience amid that constant, awesome activity seemed to me excessively sad. i felt such pity it made me weep. The more i observed the deaths of those lovely small creatures, the more my heart ached. i cried at the pity of it and within me felt a deep spiritual turmoil. life which met with such an end seemed to me to be torment worse than death. [93]

Clearly, the transient splendor of nature that flourishes today and tomorrow is dry stubble reminds people of the passing away in human life of youth, beauty and vitality. Today’s beauty queen or olympic athlete is tomorrow’s toothless wheelchair patient. For those who believe in no other life than this, this awareness can produce misery and despair, but for those who see the power of god at work in the fragile and transitory nature of created things, the cycle of youth, aging, and death is always followed by rebirth. This is the promise Nursi holds out for those who are able to proceed from a contemplation of the patterns of nature to an awareness of god the resurrector (al-Qâ’im).

 The Great Gathering

Nursi’s usual term for god’s calling together all humankind from every stage of history in order to enact the final judgment according to their deeds is the Great Gathering. No doubt the figure is taken from the Qur’anic verse “(And remember) the day when he will gather you on the day of gathering. That will be the day of mutual loss and gain. and whosoever believes in god and performs righteous good deeds, he will remit from him his sins, and will admit him to gardens under which rivers flow to dwell therein forever” (64:9). This imagery of calling all humankind together for judgment is common to both islam and christianity. in the christian Bible, for example, the epistle to the hebrews sees “The universal gathering” as equivalent to “Mount Zion, the new Jerusalem” (hebrews 12:23; cf. also 2 Thessalonians 2:1), an appointment to which all are called.

The image depicts generations of dead arising from their graves all over the earth and brought together for the final Day of Judgment. Can God actually bring together every individual in the history of the human race to be judged each according to one’s deeds? surely this must be some fanciful imagery that is not meant to be taken literally? Nursi responds by citing again God’s creative power in nature to affirm that such is well within god’s abilities. Nursi addresses the creator as follows: “Through your activity in the atmosphere, your power, which continuously displays examples of the resurrection of the dead and great gathering and transforms the summer into winter and winter into summer and similar acts, gives the sign that it will transform this world into the hereafter and there display its everlasting acts."[94]

The Great Gathering may be seen as the final act and the wise climax of god's creation.[95] Nursi's point is that god accomplishes much greater things in the continuous exercise of his creative activity. The difficulty of producing the gathering pales by comparison with the intricacy of the creative act and yet the ease of its execution. "That he will bring about a resurrection and gathering is far easier for him than the thousands of miraculous gatherings that occur every spring, each more wondrous than the supreme gathering."[96] Nursi explains:

The One Who performs these matters with infinitely fine art and perfect order and changes with infinite wisdom, bounty, and perfection of power and art the traveling worlds which follow on one after the other and are attached to the string of time, is certainly all-Powerful and all-Wise … in relation to his power the resurrection and great gathering are most easy and free of trouble. since his creational command comprises power and will, and all things are entirely subjugated and obedient to His command, and He creates with no difficulty or hindrance.[97]

one might object that the gathering staggers the mind. it seems preposterous to suppose the whole human race, from adam onward, all summoned to the same place at the same moment. Moreover, how can one imagine god keeping track of every good action and misdeed over the course of millennia? Nursi agrees that the gathering is not something that can ordinarily be known by human reason:

Just as a man of the night who has never seen the sun and has only seen its shadow in the mirror of the Moon, cannot squeeze into his mind the resplendent light and awesome gravity particular to the sun, but submits to those who have seen it and imitates them; similarly, one who cannot attain to the maximum degrees of names like all-Powerful and giver of life through the legacy of Muhammad (PBuh), must accept the resurrection of the dead and great gathering imitatively, and declare that it is not a matter which can be known by reason.[98]

Nursi is not claiming that the gathering is irrational or even that it is beyond reason in all cases. he does state, however, that for most people, the gathering is beyond their powers of reasoning. They must accept the gathering “imitatively,” that is, they should accept the word of those who have been given to know about this, that is, the prophets and the message they bear from god.

This, however, is not an invitation to blind fideism, for even if the concept of the gathering is too hard for most people to imagine, nevertheless there are many arguments in scripture and indications in the natural world that point to the gathering as a coming reality. “The day of Judgment (Yawm al-Din) alludes to a vast and powerful proof of the resurrection of the dead … for various parts of the Risale-i Nur have proved with hundreds of powerful arguments that the morning and spring of the resurrection of the dead and great gathering will occur as certainly as day follows night and spring follows winter.”[99] one need not be a genius or philosopher in order to recognize and acknowledge these signs. They are evident to any sincere seeker of ordinary abilities, and the person who denies the evidence of his own common sense is either willfully blinded or deranged:

you can, moreover, behold with your own eyes, the numerous designs made by god as signs, similes and indications of resurrection, designs placed by him in every age and epoch of the world, in the alternation of day and night, even in the appearance and disappearance of clouds in the sky. if you imagine yourself to have been living a thousand years ago and then compare with each other the two wings of time that are the past and the future, you will behold similes of the gathering and indications of resurrection as numerous as the centuries and days. if, then, after witnessing so many similes and indications, you still regard corporeal resurrection as improbable and rationally unacceptable, know your behavior to be pure lunacy.[100]

What will the command be like? Nursi prudently refrains from engaging in fanciful descriptive speculation, and instead relies on what can be known from sound Qur'anic revelation. The Qur'an teaches that the gathering will be instantaneous, a concept very difficult to grasp. Thus, people are permitted to indulge in the imagery of the graves being opened, the corpses rising up and being transported immediately to the site of the Judgment. as Nursi states: "'The command of the hour will be like the glance of the eye' (Qur'an 16:77) shows that the resurrection of the dead and the Great Gathering will occur instantaneously, in a flash. But man's narrow reason requires some tangible example so that it can conceive of this wondrous, extraordinary and unparalleled event and accept it."[101] in other words, people should focus on the essence of this teaching, that is, the reality of god's judgment, and the actuality of human responsibility for one's deeds on earth, rather than getting distracted by the images that are intended to help human reason to approach conceptually and visualize what is meant by the gathering.

 The Final Judgment and God's Wise Purpose in Creation

It is not only the possibility of the resurrection and Gathering that is difficult to understand, but also the Judgment that follows. at the resurrection, all the deeds of everyone will be produced, written on pages. Being very strange on its own, the mind cannot grasp this matter. But as the sura indicates, the same way as in the resurrection of the spring, the things similar to this laying open of the pages are quite clear. For all fruit-bearing trees or flowering plants perform deeds, acts, and duties, and in whatever way they display the divine names and glorify god, they perform worship. all these deeds are written in their seeds together with their life histories, and emerge in another spring in another place. Just as they mention most eloquently the deeds of their mothers and stock through the tongues of the shapes and forms they display, so they publish the pages of their deeds through their branches, leaves, flowers, and fruits.[102] as he does on other occasions, Nursi looks to the natural world for his argument. Just as plant life bears within itself the hidden seeds of its own resurrection, so also humans bear within themselves the hidden seeds of their own eternal destiny, either the good deeds and faith that will bring them eternal reward, or the evil actions and faithlessness that will earn them eternal punishment. even though in this world these seeds of destiny are hidden from view, like the latent promise of life secretly present within seeds, nevertheless to the same God who brings new life in fields and orchards, men and women are already determining their eternal fate by their good or evil deeds. Judgment day will simply reveal what humans have already prepared for themselves.

Nursi insists so strongly on the resurrection of the dead and the day of Judgment because for him these are neither marginal elements of islamic faith nor mythological representations of eschatological hope. They are expressions of divine wisdom which validate the whole intention of god's creation. For if god has not created the world "in jest" or "purposelessly," as the Qur'an states (Qur'an 38:27; 23:115), but with a serious purpose in mind, then divine wisdom must guide the whole of human history towards a climatic moment when god's justice, power and mercy, reward and punishment, promise and judgment will all become manifest.

The wisdom that is seen in the created world parallels that which guides human destiny. For Nursi, if creation were not governed, in matters small and great, by god's wisdom, human existence would be futile and absurd. The guarantee of this sovereign wisdom of god, who orders all things wisely, is the resurrection of the dead and the Great Gathering for the Final Judgment. I leave the final words to Nursi himself:

in just the same way, the all-Wise Maker attaches hundreds of instances of wisdom to each of the beings in the palace of the universe and equips them to perform hundreds of duties. To all trees he bestows instances of wisdom to the number of its fruits and gives duties to the number of its flowers. For Him not to bring about the resurrection of the dead and the great gathering, and for all those incalculable numbers of purposes and instances of wisdom and infinite duties to be meaningless, futile, pointless, and without purpose or benefit, would impute impotence to that absolutely Powerful one’s perfect power, just as it would impute futility and purposelessness to that absolutely Wise one’s perfect wisdom, and utter ugliness to the beauty of that absolutely compassionate one’s mercy, and boundless tyranny to that absolutely Just one’s perfect justice. it would be quite simply to deny the wisdom, mercy, and justice in the universe.[103]

 4. Proof of the resurrection of the dead: Said Nursi’s approach

Şükran Vahide

Said Nursi was unique among contemporary islamic scholars in that he claimed to have proved the resurrection of the dead “to ordinary people and even children,”[104] although, as he pointed out, a genius like ibn sina had maintained that it could not be established by rational criteria.[105] This chapter will investigate the basis of Nursi’s claim; in other words, it will attempt to pinpoint and set out those aspects of the method he developed with the Risale-i Nur that provide such clear proofs of this, one of the great mysteries of religion.

Nursi’s aim with the Risale-i Nur was to offer proofs and explanations of the main truths and tenets of belief taught by the Qur’an, in order to strengthen and reinvigorate the faith of believers, which after the founding of the Turkish republic in 1923 he feared would be undermined and shaken by the rapid implementation of Westernizing and secularizing reforms. in the previous era, as the old said, he had devoted considerable effort to the updating of teaching methods and curricula, and was concerned particularly with the combining of the modern and religious sciences, and with developing new methods of Qur’anic interpretation. The Risalei Nur, which he began to write in 1926 having been sent into exile in western anatolia, was the product of the new said and his single-minded attachment to the Qur’an and its method, but it was also the fruit of his lifetime of study and teaching experience and his search for a way of conveying the truths of religion relevantly to current circumstances.

Two main features of the Risale-i Nur may be mentioned here: the first is that, according to Nursi, its method is “taken from the Qur’an”[106] and contains many elements inspired by it. The chief of these is reflective thought on the natural world, and consists of close observation of it from the Qur’anic viewpoint; that is, viewing beings as (âyât) or signs signifying their Maker, and as letters and words describing him and alluding to such truths as the resurrection of the dead. a secondary, and to a large extent tacit, function of this observational method is to reply to and refute positivism and other materialist philosophies, which were based on empirical science and were being actively propagated at the time.

a second characteristic of the Risale-i Nur is its containing in part some of the traditional islamic sciences and its performing their essential functions, in addition to including modern scientific knowledge. It was Nursi’s intention to produce a method that effectively answered the needs of the times by marshalling all these disciplines and employing elements of them in his proofs of the truths of belief.

a further advantage of this approach, indeed its main objective, is that it addresses both the human faculty of reason, and such “inner” faculties as the heart, conscience, and soul, and seeks to induce complete certainty concerning the truth of the matters proposed. it was Nursi’s insights into the many human powers and abilities and their functions, as well as the unusual extent of his knowledge of the eloquence and profundities of the Qur’an that made him one of the great Muslim teachers and scholars of recent times.

 The Resurrection of the Dead

Nursi insists that it is the Qur’an that “solves” the question of resurrection, just as it solves the riddle of creation and discloses the purposes of the universe.[107] in proving this, he seeks to show that the evidences for the resurrection that the Qur’an cites and those indicated by the principal truths of faith that it teaches are all mutually supporting. For just as god almighty and his names and attributes, the prophets and scriptures, the Prophet Muhammad (PBuh), and the angels, together with the cosmos and its “creational signs” all indicate and prove each other, so they all furnish evidences for the resurrection of the dead, proving it either directly or indirectly.[108] That is to say, Nursi was at pains to demonstrate the indivisible nature of the truths of faith and the fact that they form a coherent whole. The majority of his proofs for the hereafter are set out within the framework of these truths. similarly, he emphasized the indivisibility of this world and the next, and included many lucid explanations of the two worlds and the continuum they form. since this is one of the most persuasive elements of his overall method, brief mention will be made of it before outlining his other main proofs of the resurrection of the dead.

 Nursi’s Cosmic Scheme

Following the Qur’an, the fundamental distinction Nursi makes between the worlds of existence is that between the Manifest World (Âlem-i Şehâdet) and the Worlds of the unseen (Gayb).[109] According to Nursi’s classification, the Unseen consists of myriad worlds, including those of the hereafter. These are furnished with the products of this world or are constructed out of them; they are the result of this world. he said: “The life of the hereafter is the outcome of all this world.”[110] Nursi uses many metaphors to describe this world, such as its being “an arable field” for growing vast quantities of crops and provisions suitable for the endless worlds of the hereafter. Beings “flow” through this world “in floods,” pouring into the unseen worlds. Nursi stresses this world’s transience, but explains the constant motion, change, decline, and death on its apparent face as being the means of fulfilling the divine purposes, of displaying infinite manifestations of the divine names and the performance of endless glorifications of God in finite time and limited space.[111] god causes the motion of the cosmos, which is its “speech;” he causes “it to silently recite his verses, his signs, and to inscribe them.”[112] all the glorifications beings perform, that is, all their actions and states throughout their worldly existences are recorded and preserved in the various worlds of the unseen. Their transient existences are the seeds of numerous perpetual existences.

The point here, and this is typical of Nursi's approach, is that rather than focussing on human actions good and bad and their consequences, he delineates the whole cosmic scheme and seeks to instil a total conception of existence that relates all beings, including man, to their Maker and is conscious of "the meanings" they express and their "results" in other existential realms. Nursi's offering almost pictorial images of the relations between this Manifest World and the unseen greatly facilitates understanding of the resurrection and life of the hereafter and acceptance of his many arguments and proofs of their reality.

To come to the evidences and proofs of resurrection, in an earlier work Nursi cites Fakhr al-din al-razi's (d. 606/1209) categorization of rational (aklî) evidences and textual (taken from the Qur'an and hadith – naklî) evidences. resurrection may be proved by both rational and textual evidences.[113] Traditionally, however, religious scholars had relied on textual evidences and did not attempt to prove it rationally. Nursi, however, since his aim was to provide a means of revitalizing belief in an age of science and scepticism, "when belief by imitation is past and meek acceptance has disappeared,"[114] the great majority of arguments and proofs he puts forward in the Risale-i Nur may be classified as "rational." He mentions only briefly the "textual" evidences, such as those supplied by the previous prophets and scriptures, and their concurrence with the evidences offered by what he asserts are the four main sources of (rational) proof: the Qur'an, the divine names and attributes, the universe and its creational signs, and the Prophet Muhammad (PBuh). But just as he presents the institution of prophethood in terms of reasonable necessity; [115] so too, as shall be shown, even for matters such as the form and sequence of the resurrection and last judgement, which previously were held to be acceptable only "on faith," he offers a series of allegorical comparisons and explanations that presents them as easily and reasonably acceptable. We shall now investigate how Nursi tackled the four main sources of proof, which as mentioned are mutually supportive and overlapping.

1. The Qur'an

Nursi states that the Qur’an contains “thousands of certain rational proofs” (berahîn-i akliyye-i kat’iyye) of resurrection, which “it lays before the eyes” and “repeatedly enjoins” that they are reflected upon.[116] The verses he most frequently cites in this connection are: “seeing that he has created you in successive stages,” (71:14) and: “Say: He will give them life who created them in the first instance” (36:79). These he describes as being “figurative analogies” or “allegorical comparisons,” comparisons (temsilat and derivatives of the same root) being a device frequently used in the Qur’an.[117] To expound them he himself employs an attractive style that combines metaphor, allegory, and modern scientific knowledge, with which he describes the regular stages of human growth and development and the distribution of nutriments to the cells. Arguing that the specific laws and determined order necessitate purpose and will, he refutes the ideas of chance, nature, and causes. his aim is to demonstrate that “the second creation” would present no problem for the one who the above-mentioned processes prove “has absolute disposal over all beings.”[118] according to Nursi, belief in the hereafter is “the most important thing the Qur’an teaches us.”[119] In the Twenty-fifth Word, which is about the Qur’an’s miraculousness, in a section about various points of the Qur’an’s eloquence, he explains further ways in which it “proves” (isbat) the resurrection. here, he says that “in order to impel the heart to accept” the divine works of the hereafter “and make the mind affirm them,” it sometimes mentions the divine works in this world, as above; or it induces firm conviction about those future works by drawing attention to similar things that we observe here. To illustrate this, Nursi elaborates on the last seven verses of sura yasin. he gives two other verses as examples. one is: “When the pages are laid open,” (81:10) which refers to the publishing of the deeds of all mankind at the resurrection. This he says, is difficult to grasp on its own, so just as the Qur’an makes allusion to “the resurrection of the springtime” to make other points, it makes this laying open of the pages similarly clear. he then describes how the deeds of trees and plants, and their glorifications of God and worship, are written in their seeds, to emerge in subsequent springs.[120] another method of the Qur’an Nursi notes is its contrasting the divine works in this world with those of the resurrection and hereafter to arouse the desired emotions. For instance, the mountains with which god almighty stabilizes the earth in this world will be scattered at the resurrection, an idea that excites feelings of dreadful awe, and for the gardens he makes verdant here look to the gardens of Paradise, descriptions of which fill a person with delight and hopeful longing. [121] in many discussions in the Risale-i Nur,[122] Nursi points out the ways in which the springtime displays innumerable samples, similes, and indications of the supreme resurrection. clearly these are also lessons in how to regard beings as signs and symbols, for the meanings they denote. The verse he cites most often in this connection is: “so look to the signs of god’s mercy; how he gives life to the earth after its death. indeed, it is he who gives to the dead, for he is powerful over all things” (30:50). For example:

… The forms of countless members of hundreds of thousands of species emerge, in the utmost precision, from a simple material and are then nurtured in most merciful fashion … countless tasty and delicious forms of food, in the most merciful and tender fashion, are brought forth from dry clay, and from roots, seeds and drops of liquid that differ little among each other. every spring, innumerable kinds of food and equipment are loaded on it from an unseen treasury, as if onto a railway waggon, and are despatched in utmost orderliness to animate beings … This living page of the spring displays innumerable examples and samples of the supreme gathering, and is a tangible demonstration of the verse, “So look to the signs of God’s mercy …”[123]

he also cites the verse together with others as an example of “the category of proof” among the various categories in the Qur’an’s manner of exposition. [124]

Further matters, which traditionally were accepted due to their sacred source (naqlî), are those related to the manner and sequence of the resurrection, yet, for these too, Nursi endeavors to offer rationally acceptable explanations. For instance, he says the verses “it will be naught but a single cry,” (36:29) and “The command of the hour will be like the glance of the eye, or briefer” (16:77) show the resurrection to be instantaneous, but it is difficult to conceive of such an unparalleled event. he therefore explains it in three stages: the return of spirits to their bodies; the revivification of the bodies, and the remaking of the bodies, clarifying each with a short comparison.[125] similarly, at the end of the Twenty-ninth Word, he includes a section that offers explanations of the possibility of the world's death, its actual death, the possibility of the world's resurrection and reconstruction, and its actual resurrection and reconstruction. his various explanations expound verses denoting those events. he concludes, however, that his expositions are merely "to prepare the heart for acceptance, the soul for surrender, and to convince the reason;" it is to the Word of the universe's creator that we should listen.[126] Nursi's expositions of divine power form an important part of his proofs of the resurrection. They are dealt with in the next section, but since he points out that the Qur'an indicates the traces and works of divine power in connection with resurrection on many levels, mention should be made of it here too.[127]

2. The Divine Names and Attributes

With the Risale-i Nur, Nursi sets out to prove that the very nature of the world necessitates the truths of faith that the Qur'an teaches, and primarily the existence of a single creator; that is, the universe requires a necessarily existent with particular attributes and names. Thus, the recognition and "reading" of the divine names and attributes and their manifestations in beings forms an important part of Nursi's method of proving the pillars of faith, and is the basis of the reflective thought (tefekkür) that is one of its four main principles. as far as the resurrection of the dead is concerned, this method shows that "most of [the divine] names and proofs of [the] necessarily existent require the hereafter and testify to it."[128] This is the line of reasoning followed by Nursi in the Tenth Word, about resurrection, which, being written in 1926, was the first major treatise of the Risale-i Nur in which he used the divine names to prove the principal truths of faith. Nursi himself explained it as follows:

each [of the twelve Truths of which the main part of the work is composed] proves three things at the same time. each proves both the existence of the necessarily existent one, and his names and attributes, and then it constructs the resurrection of the dead on these and proves it. everyone from the most obdurate unbeliever to the most sincere believer can take his share from the Truths, because in each, the gaze is turned towards beings, works. it says: “There are well-ordered acts in these, and a well-ordered act cannot be without an author, in which case the act has an author. and since it has been carried out with order and balance, its author must be wise and just. since he is wise, he does nothing in vain. and since he acts with justice, he does not permit rights to be violated. There will therefore be a great gathering, a supreme tribunal.” The Truths have been tackled in this way. They are succinct, and thus prove the three things at once.[129] of those Truths, it will be useful here to mention the third one by way of illustration and to note some of the arguments Nursi puts forward, since he describes manifestations in the universe of the same names given above, that is, Wise and Just, and shows how they necessitate the hereafter. having established the existence of this world’s Lord and Sustainer in the first section of the treatise, which takes the form of an allegorical comparison or parable designed to prepare the mind for the truths set out in the main part and is followed by a lengthy introduction, Nursi commences with a general statement about “the wisdom and order, the justice and equilibrium that pervade all things.” he asks if the one holds the whole cosmos in this state of purposeful balance would not favor those who believe in him and whose actions are in accordance with his wisdom and justice (ubûdiyet). similarly would he not chastise the discourteous who disbelieve? in this transient world, not even a thousandth part of that wisdom and justice is exercised in respect to man, he says, so there must be a supreme tribunal and ultimate bliss.

Nursi strengthens his numerous arguments with constant use of the rhetorical question: “is it at all possible?” With this he intends to draw attention to: “the true impossibility, absurdity, and irrationality” of what he calls misguidance on the one hand, by which he means materialist philosophy, and the “true possibility, facility, and rationality” that characterize faith and islam on the other. Because, he says, “lack of belief generally springs from the habit of imagining things to be impossible and far removed from the realm of reason, and of therefore denying them.”[130] Nursi continues the Third Truth by providing a proof (burhan) that the Being who controls the world, does so with infinite wisdom. This is the following of interest and benefit in all things. In his usual persuasive style he points out that “numerous wise benefits” are intended in all the parts of the human body, even in its cells and particles, in trees and their fruits, and especially in seeds. The fine artistry and craftsmanship in all things proves the existence of an infinitely Wise Maker. on the non-material plane as well as the material, included in the human being are “an index of the cosmos, the keys to all the treasuries of mercy, and of the mirrors of all the divine names,” demonstrating the “wisdom within that infinitely fine artistry.” This proof is an example of how Nursi takes the classic proofs of kalām and philosophy – here it is the proof of divine providence (ar. dalīl ‘ināyatī; T. inâyet delîli),[131] – and without naming them, includes the gist of them in accordance with his own style and method, making them easily comprehensible to the ordinary reader.

next Nursi lists some proofs “that all things are done with justice and balance.” These include everything being given precisely measured and balanced bodies and forms; their being given their needs and the necessities of life; the fact that answer is given to requests made with the tongue of disposition, and so on. so is it at all possible, Nursi asks, “that the justice and wisdom which hasten to relieve the pettiest need of the smallest of creation should fail to provide immortality, the greatest need of man, the greatest of creatures?” shouldn’t this wisdom and justice preserve the dignity of god’s lordship and rule by preserving the rights of his servants? in this transient world, man does not receive his just deserts, so matters must be postponed for a supreme tribunal. For true justice requires that man should be rewarded and punished not in accordance with his apparent insignificance but in accordance with the greatness of his function and importance of his nature. The transience of this world disallows the full manifestation of justice and wisdom. of necessity therefore there will be an eternal hell and everlasting Paradise of that Just and glorious Possessor of Beauty, that Wise and Beauteous one of glory.[132]

Nursi’s proofs and explanations of absolute divine power form a significant part of his proofs of the resurrection of the dead and hereafter. The main series of arguments is in the Twentieth Letter, where in five sections and employing allegorical comparisons for every point he makes, he demonstrates “the infinite ease, utmost speed, extreme swiftness of actions, and boundless facility apparent in the creation of things," and primarily that everything is equal in relation to divine power.[133] These arguments, he offers in explanation of the verses: "The creation of you all and the resurrection of you all is but like that of a single soul," (31:28) which he interprets as meaning "the resurrection of all humankind is as easy as causing one person to die and raising him to life again," and "nothing will there have been but one single blast, and lo! Before us will all of them be arraigned," (36:53) meaning: "to raise to life all human beings at the resurrection is as easy as calling together with the sound of a bugle an army that has dispersed to rest."[134] in the Twenty-ninth Word, in conjunction with proofs of related matters, he reiterates some of the arguments in the Twentieth letter to prove the verse: "The creation of you all and the resurrection of you all is but like that of a single soul" specifically.[135] since among the divine names, considerable emphasis in placed in the Risale-

i Nur on the names of Merciful and compassionate and their manifestations in beings, brief mention should be made here of how they are shown to require the hereafter. The argument Nursi most frequently advances in this respect is that the self-evident unlimited bestowals, bounties, gifts and favors indicate the existence of one Merciful and compassionate. But "mercy can only be mercy, and bounty be bounty when resurrection comes about. otherwise, on thinking of eternal separation, intelligence, which is one of the greatest bounties, would be a calamity for mankind, and affection and compassion, the most refined kinds of mercy, would be transformed into severe pain."[136] only eternal life in an eternal realm saves the bestowal from mockery, the bounties from deception, the gifts from treachery, and will make the bounties bounty and the bestowal bestowal.

it is within the context of the divine names that Nursi offers arguments for bodily resurrection. For corporeality, that is, the physical universe, is the most comprehensive mirror of the divine names; it is the center of the divine aims in creation; the greatest variety of divine bounties is found in the physical realm, and is thus the most important means of man's supplications and thanks. corporeality is the scene of awesome divine activity whereby the earth becomes the arable field of the hereafter. countless artistic foods and precious bounties being prepared in corporeality, with all the different tastes and pleasures they yield, indicates the existence of physical pleasures in the eternal realm. Would it be possible, he asks, that the Munificent Merciful Almighty would accept the prayer of the common stomach, gratifying it in this way, and not grant the universal prayer of humanity for corporeal pleasures in an eternal realm?[137] having provided all the instruments and members to experience and know the manifestations of the divine names in corporeality, it would be contrary to the wisdom, justice, and mercy of the allWise and compassionate Maker not to bestow a wage and reward on each member in eternity, as recompense for its duties of worship.[138] it is within this approach of deciphering and beholding the manifestations of the divine names that, according to Nursi, the way is opened up to gaining a rational understanding of resurrection. For since the resurrection will be through the manifestation of the greatest name, it is “only through beholding … the great deeds evident in the maximum manifestation of the greatest name as well as the other names, that it is possible to prove it as certain and unshakeably believe that resurrection is as simple as the spring.” he goes on to say that it was thanks to the effulgence of the Qur’an that he had discovered this much, for intellect on its own would have been powerless and condemned to believe in resurrection by way of imitation.[139]

3. The Universe and Its Creational Signs

according to Nursi, “the universe together with all its creational signs points to [the resurrection of the dead].”[140] The term “creational (or cosmic) signs (âyât-ı tekviniye)” is derived from the Qur’an,[141] and is often used in the Risale-i Nur in association with the idea of the universe as a book, with its beings and events as its signs or verses. These have a mutually interpretative and affirmative relationship with the Qur’an and its verses. Thus, just as “the book of the universe teaches the creational signs about the divine existence and unity,”[142] so in innumerable ways it alludes to the resurrection of the dead, thus confirming corresponding verses of the written Qur’an. although technically all beings are signs or verses, in the Risale-i Nur certain attributes or characteristics of the universe are cited specifically as being creational signs. For instance: “Through such creational signs as order, balance, regularity, adornment, differentiation, and the giving of form, the verses (the signs) of the mighty Qur’an inscribed by divine power and called the universe confirm these statements of the Qur’an.”[143] a series of ten proofs that was originally included in his early works is based on some of the above creational signs.[144] in a number of these proofs, which he tells us, in the manner of the old said address the reason only, he cites the findings of science as supporting the premise of his argument. Having argued that the “perfect, intentional order [which] embraces the whole universe,” and the purposive wisdom, mentioned earlier, necessitate eternal happiness, he asserts that the absence of waste and futility in creation, indicate eternal happiness. For if it were not to come about, everything would be a waste and go for nothing. in which case, Nursi argues, man’s deep-rooted desire for perfection, points to a perfection, and his desire for happiness, indicates that he is destined for eternal happiness. otherwise, all his non-physical faculties and potentialities, his elevated hopes and desires, would all be futile and wither up and die. in fact he frequently cites man’s intense desire for immortality as offering decisive proof of an eternal realm.[145]

Moreover, there are the innumerable allusions to the day of resurrection of all the different sorts of resurrection that occur continuously in the alternation of night and day, and winter and spring, in the skies, in sleep, in humankind, and so on.

Time itself, with the succession of hours, days, weeks, years, and eras, intimates that after death, the morning of resurrection will break.[146] another form of creational sign that indicates the hereafter are what in the Risale-i Nur are called “dominical laws (kavânîn-i rubûbiyet).” These are the laws that raise and administer all things and are in force from minute particles to the totality of the world. They are first and foremost proofs of divine unity, and of divine knowledge and will, but they also indicate the resurrection of the dead. For example:

Through whichever law that All-Powerful Maker raises a fly to life, through the same law he restores to life the plane-tree before your window every spring; and through that law, he raises the globe of the earth to life in the spring; and through the same law will raise creatures to life at the resurrection. The life, and particularly the life of man, the highest living being, forms a decisive proof of the hereafter.[148] indeed, “life is the greatest of all bounties and the clearest of all proofs of the first creation and the resurrection of the dead.” To illustrate this Nursi describes the progressive expansion of life in the stages of human development in accordance with specific laws. The person who observes these carefully will grasp with his mind the purpose and intention behind these processes, and “the second life will appear to him far easier, simpler, and more possible [than the first], and he will feel convinced in his heart.”[149] 4. The Prophet Muhammad (PBUH) among the evidences for resurrection that Nursi ascribes to the Prophet Muhammad (PBuh), whom he cites as the fourth source of evidences, here two may be mentioned. The first consists of the mutual and joint evidences of the Prophet (PBuh) and the Qur’an. For just as the Prophet, supported by the miracles he performed as confirmation of the Creator, proved the Qur’an to be true and god’s Word; so with its miraculousness and inimitability, and as a miracle of the Prophet, the Qur’an proved that he was truly god’s messenger. and just as he proclaimed the resurrection throughout his life, confirmed by all the previous prophets and the saints, so the Qur’an proclaims it with thousands of verses, confirmed by all the previous scriptures. According to Nursi, this constitutes a proof as certain as daylight.[150]

Qur’an alludes to this with the verse: “your creation and your resurrection is but as a single soul.” (31:28)[147]

The second is interesting in that Nursi presents the Prophet’s (PBuh) plea for eternal happiness as the reason for its creation. in a moving section in the Tenth Word, he describes the sublime worship of the Prophet within a vast congregation consisting not only of humankind, but of the inhabitants of the heavens and the whole of creation, all participating in his supplication for bliss and eternity. is it possible, Nursi asks, that the compassionate one who responds to the least creature and provides it needs, should reject such a prayer? Thus, “Just as the Prophet’s messengerhood was the reason for the foundation of this realm of trial; so too the worship he performed was the cause for the foundation of the abode of bliss.”[151]

 Conclusion

The purpose of this chapter has been to outline the method of proving the resurrection of the dead that Said Nursi used in the Risale-i Nur, rather than offering a comprehensive survey of all the proofs he employed. For the fact is that he mentions hundreds of proofs and evidences, many of which spring from his wish to demonstrate the mutually affirmative character of the chief pillars of faith. he believed that with this method he had presented a watertight case for the resurrection, so that anyone fair-minded would be compelled to affirm it and concur that “the existence of the hereafter is as certain as the existence of this world.”[152]

 5. death in Nursi’s Thought

Bilal Kuşpinar

Death (al-mawt) is generally defined, in the famous classical dictionaries of Islam, as: “an existential attribute created by god for a living being as the opposite of life” (hayāt).[153] This is of course the definition of natural death and is originally derived from the verses of the Qur’an, some of which will be reviewed later in this article.[154] The same dictionaries also record other types of deaths and afford for each one a separate definition. Among them the mystical notion of death appears to take up the most considerable space right after the natural death, though the accounts that have been suggested there for the understanding of the former are, relatively speaking, more profound and subtle than those that have been supplied for the understanding of the latter. This has to do with the distinct position of the Sufis who have approached death from a moral perspective and conceived it as something spiritual and not simply as a natural phenomenon. in their somewhat allegorical discourse on this subject two types of opinions have been persistently stated for their understanding of death: firstly, death is viewed by the Sufis as a cause or a veil that hinders “the illuminations of [god’s] disclosures and unveilings.”[155] secondly, it is regarded as a means or a way of “curbing or suppressing the lustful desires of the carnal soul,” in which case one who accomplishes this difficult task would attain to the spiritual reality of death and become truly alive.[156]

Most of these theological and mystical conceptions of death that consist in the classical technical dictionaries, find their various expressions in Nursi’s writings as well. This is not to suggest at all that Nursi’s account of death is a verbatim duplication or reproduction of the opinions of his predecessors. such a slavish attitude is in the first place against the principles of the traditional Islamic scholarship, let alone the high standards of a revivalist genius thinker like Nursi himself. as we shall see in this chapter, his treatment of this subject appears to be a fresh articulation of the hitherto widely-accepted notion of death among the Muslim intellectuals, but with substantial elaborations and further novel additions based on his own examination and self-experience of death.

 On Natural Death

it must be noted at the very outset that Nursi’s approach to death is holistic, treating all the possible dimensions of it in a distinct form but not in a systematic manner. one of our tasks here, therefore, is to bring together all the relevant points about death and put them in order and thus show to the reader how consistent and profound he is indeed in his own of conception of death. One may find him, for instance, in one place talking about the natural death strictly within the framework of islamic theology, in another place making some comments on the Sufis’ understanding and contemplation of allegorical death, and still in another place offering his personal reflections on his own experience of death. In the end, however, all appear to underscore and serve for Nursi one important goal, among many others, that is: “death is inevitable to any living being as part of the law and wisdom of god, and if understood well, it is not to be scared of at all.” on natural death, to begin with, Nursi proposes a pragmatic distinction between the appearance of death and the reality of death.

such a differentiation is important not only for understanding of the real meaning of death but its raison d’être, as well. death appears, for instance, to the people without belief as nothing else than a bitter and eternal separation from all the loved ones. it is a kind of eviction from the illusory-paradise of this world and a lonely entry into the gloomy prison of the grave. But for the people of faith, says Nursi, it is in fact an indispensable means of joining among the old friends and the dearly loved ones who have already left for the next world. it is also the means for them the entry into their real homeland and the dwelling of their everlasting happiness. again, it is an invitation extended from the gloomy prison of this world to the flowery gardens of the next world. It is the time due for collecting the wage that is to be paid off generously in the hereafter by the all-Merciful and Most compassionate god in return for the services rendered to Him in the present world. In this sense, it is not only a discharge from the difficult tasks and heavy duties of this life but a termination of the trial and examination concerning the requirements of servitude and worship.[157] in order to illustrate and substantiate the real meaning of the natural death Nursi draws our attention to the philosophers’ well-known triple divisions of the world as the world of creation, which is sensory, transient and mortal, the world of images (ālem-i misāl), and the world of meaning (ālem-i manā), which is eternal. He further indicates that all the beings in this transient world find their true meanings in the everlasting world. although the root-substance of all beings, proclaims Nursi, lies beneath the soil of this world, they always turn their faces towards the world of meaning, that is the hereafter, and find their real purposes therein, while they attain their growth and maturity in the world of images. Man, on the other hand, can become truly man, he stresses, only when he perceives these aspects of beings, aspects that are related to the hereafter. For, in doing so, he finds a way leading him from the temporal existence of these transient beings to the permanent abode of their everlasting fruits. Then it is necessary for man to find out the real aim of all these beings before death.[158]

Then when looked at from the spiritual and other-worldly window, which is open only to the people of guidance and revelation, the natural death, as well as its appointed time serve as a pathway leading man first to the intermediate world (barzakh), the grave, and then letting him join and meet their beloved ones who have already migrated to the world of eternity. in this case, death is, in the true sense of the term, a change of location,[159] a time of real meeting with the loved ones and the prelude to the everlasting life and the eternal happiness,[160] rather than an eternal separation as presumed by the people of misguidance.[161]

For Nursi the very existence of this world of creation entails and necessitates the existence of the hereafter. on the other hand, the true nature and real understanding of the former depends mainly on the meaning of the latter. if we discover correctly and observe such subtle yet profound connection between the two, we would be able to comprehend the meanings and purposes of the existing beings on this planet and relate them intelligibly and return them ultimately to their origins. according to Nursi, this kind of observation and comprehension has already been accomplished by such prominent sages of Islam as al-Ghazālī, Ibn al-'Arabī, 'Abd al-Qadīr al-Gilānī, Jalāl al-Dīn Rūmī and Imam Rabbānī, and some others. For them, as for Nursi, this world was brought into existence as the theatre or locus of manifestation of god's names, attributes and acts. among his names two, al-Muhyī [the life-giver] and al-Mumīt [the death-causer or striker], are directly connected with life and death, respectively. The reason for bestowing the earthly life upon human beings, who are the noblest of all beings, is, as the Qur'an puts it: "for test and trial as to which of them are best in conduct."[162] since it is a test, it demands that they assume certain duties and obligations and that they fulfill and discharge them according to the moral standards laid down by the Provider of the life through his prophets.[163]

As has been noticed, Nursi differentiates between the life of this world and the world itself. The life in this world, as the Qur'an depicts, is "a play and an amusement,"[164] whereas the world itself is a place of parade or festival adorned with the beautiful embroideries of the names of god and as such it is presented and displayed for the observation and contemplation of its dwellers. Those who cannot perceive all that is displayed there in their real purpose and hence cannot conceive them in their true meaning may be captivated by and drowned into the apparent, corporeal and transient aspects of the parade, while loosing sight of its inward, spiritual and permanent dimensions. These people, because they have not duly contemplated the signs and manifestations of god's names in the world, have failed to develop an appropriate state of mind for death. To acquire such a state of mind, Nursi offers a few practical and quite illustrative examples, but for the sake of brevity we shall skip them for the time being.[165]

The knowledge of the reality of death, Nursi declares further, is connected directly with the knowledge of god (ma‘rifetullāh) and his names and attributes. one who carefully perceives, with the help of this particular knowledge, the realities of all things and beings of this life, whether they are material or immaterial, essential or accidental, including human beings, as well as their life and death, will be able to see them as the rays of the Truth from one or more of god’s names and their manifestations. Without these names they are merely empty forms bereft of meaning and reality.[166] after all, the forms and meanings of all things and beings are subordinate to the realities of the divine names. everything in this world ought to be seen and conceived in connection with its own reality pertaining to one or more of the divine names.

This being the case then, death, like life, is wisdom of god and as such it has a meaning and reality appropriate to itself. The meaning and reality of death, as mentioned earlier, rests first and foremost on the meaning and reality of the Divine name al-Mumīt, the death-striker, just as the meaning and reality of the life in this world depends on that of the divine name al-Muhyī [the life-giver] and the meaning and reality of the life on the day of resurrection is based on that of the divine name al-Ba‘ith [the raiser of the dead; reviver].

By the study of all of these divine names, according to Nursi, one can not only develop the aforementioned state of mind, or say, mental preparedness for death, but also maintain the much needed equilibrium between the demands of this-worldly life and those of the other-worldly life. in accordance with the famous ash‘arite doctrine of “unending recreation of atoms,” Nursi describes the life of this world as “the present minute or even moment we are in,” as we are in constant change, so much so that our body a while ago is not the same as our body now.[167] Therefore, the physical life we rely on, he declares, is only one minute or even, as some of the truth-examining thinkers stated, “a tenth of a minute,” rather a fleeting instant (ân-ı seyyâle). Because of this mystery, certain saintly people, Nursi goes on to say, have regarded the world as non-existent in itself.[168]

In this case, all the time prior to the present moment, as well as all the things of this world within that time, are simply dead, as far as the present moment is concerned. all the time that will follow the present moment, on the other hand, as well as all the things it may possibly contain, are non-existent in this present moment. how tenable is it, then, poses Nursi rightfully, for man to long for such a momentary life and flee death? Instead of plunging into the games and amusements of this ephemeral life, he urges, one has to rise to a higher level of life pertaining to one's heart and spirit. only then can one transcend beyond time and space and perceive everything of the past and of the future as living.[169]

Once one has attained to that lofty state of life, one would be able to realize how needy one's spirit and heart are for such divine names as the inheritor (alWārith), the raiser of the dead (al-Bā'ith), the everlasting (al-Bāqī), the allgenerous (al-Karīm), and the life-giver (al-Muhyī), and so on. Thus, far from grieving and mourning for all those who die, one would rather feel tranquil at knowing that god, the owner of all these names, has in effect delivered them from the darkness of the non-existence which is this transient earthly life, and secured for them a much finer place than this world.[170] For such people the moment of death becomes a pleasurable moment of meeting with the beloved ones, or what some Sufis, like Jalāl al-Dīn Rūmī, call a blissful moment of unification, rather than a miserable separation.

 Death as the Corollary of Life

In responding to a question posed to him concerning the life of Khidr, Nursi makes mention of five degrees of life. The first level of life belongs to human beings, which is very limited. The second one is the life of Khidr and the Prophet ilyas, which is free to a certain extent. since they can be present in more than one place at the same time, their life is not restricted by the requirements of humanity. Among human beings, saints who have attained to the station of witnessing and unveiling may be granted this degree of life in which case they may receive special instruction from Khidr. Therefore, this station is also called "the station of Khidr." The third level of life belongs to the Prophets Idrīs and Jesus, which, having been detached from the requirements of the human life, has assumed an angelic life in luminous subtlety. Both of them reside in the heavens with their earthly bodies illuminated, though, by the luminosity of the starry-bodies. The fourth level of life is that of the martyrs, which is higher than the life of the other dead in their graves. Because of the sacrifices of their worldly lives, Nursi remarks, God bestows on the martyrs in the intermediate realm (ālem-i barzakh) a life similar to earthy life, but free from pain and hardship. The fifth level of life pertains to the life of the spirits of the dead in their graves. The proof of this life is that the spirits of the saints appear in certain form to the people of unveiling and that the other dead have relations with us while awake or sleeping, occasionally telling us of things corresponding to reality.[171]

Be that as it may, any thing that has a natural life-span, Nursi argues, is subject to the law of the process of perfection through various stages of birth, growth, development, and decline. as such, it is also bound to experience death, as it has already experienced life. The death of a man in this sense is in many ways analogous to the death of the world, as both of them possess the potential for the resurrection too. so, just as man as the microcosm is not free from the claws of death and hence cannot be saved from destruction, the world too as the macrocosm is not immune from the clutches of death and hence cannot be saved from destruction, either.[172] This is, Nursi remarks, due to the law of the process of perfection (kanūn-u tekāmul), which encompasses all things.[173] as we have noted earlier, there is a corollary link between life and death, which Nursi sometimes compares with the necessary connection between “wakefulness and sleep” and between “night and day” and between “winter and spring.”[174] on the nature of this intimate relation between life and death, he furnishes substantial comments especially when he interprets the verse, “it is he Who creates death and life that he may try you, which of you are the best in conduct.”[175] his analysis of this verse, as will be seen, is quite consistent with his above-presented discourse on the knowledge of god and his names and attributes. in the beginning he takes up life and examines it in conjunction with the same discourse and then moves on to elaborate on death in the same fashion.

he considers life as the most luminous and the most beautiful of the miracles of god’s lordly Power, as well as the most forceful and most obvious of the proofs of his unity. it is a self-evident truth for the existence of the divine names and also the most brilliant mirror to reflect on itself the effects and the manifestations of those names. in other words, wherever there is life, various aspects of the divine names and attributes become manifest there. For instance, when life enters a body, it begins to reflect sustenance from the Name of Provider (Razzāq), mercy, from the name of all-Merciful, knowledge, from the name of all-Knowing, wisdom, from the name of all-Wise (al-Hakīm), and so on and so forth.[176]

Moreover, in the above-cited verse, Nursi goes on to expound and teaches that death, like life, is created and that it is also a blessing or gift from god, like life itself. Though death, as compared to life, may appear dissolution, decay, annihilation, and non-existence, it is in reality a change of existence, a change of location, a discharge from the duties of life, an invitation to the everlasting life, and a prelude to an immortal life. considered in all these aspects, Nursi asserts, death is seen as pleasurable, rather than reprehensible. life’s coming into the world is through creation and determining, and departure from the world is also through creation and determining. in other words, just like life, death too is the result of god’s planning and creation. as such, it is not only wisdom but a blessing from him, too. Nursi further explains how death is created by god as a blessing for human beings by four illustrations, each of which in fact touches upon one or more aspects of the phenomenon of death.

Firstly, death, as Nursi declares, is indeed one of the greatest bounties of god, because it is a discharge from the heavy duties and burdensome obligations of the earthly life and also because it serves as a door that lets the person who has experienced death enter into the company of his beloved friends who are already in the intermediate realm.

Secondly, since death relieves man from the hardships of this life and delivers him from the narrow and dark prison of this world, it becomes a source of joy for him, allowing him to enter into the trouble-free immortal life within the mercy of god.

Thirdly, the conditions of this life are fraught with numerous difficulties and immense hardships, such as the complications of old age. Were it not for death, the life would have been unbearable for human beings because of these naturally developing factors. Nursi gives as an example the situation of very elderly parents who cause their children much distress due to their increasingly ailing conditions. one would better appreciate the value of death if one looks at these and other similar situations. in this case, concludes Nursi, death, like life, is a mercy of god.

Fourthly and lastly, death, like sleep, which is in fact the brother of death, functions as a cure, a comfort, a mercy, and a rest for those struck by disaster and calamities. it then saves them from the unbearable tribulations which may even drive them to suicide. since death overall is a blessing and a mercy from god, it is always welcomed by the people who have faith in god, while it is abhorred by the people of misguidance who see it as a sheer torment and affliction.[177]

In Nursi’s view, then, all things and beings appear to journey on a path of a life-span [passage] between life and death, that is, between creation and recreation, generation and regeneration. From this point of view, the decay of a thing and the death of a living being in fact turn out to be their renewals and replacements with their likes.[178]

 On the Causes of Death

Nursi, having firmly established that death in essence is not destruction or extinction, even if it appears ostensibly so, now draws our attention to possible causes of death. he is of the opinion that death cannot be attributed to causes or nature. despite the existence of certain natural circumstances or events that may appear to cause death, it occurs in any case at the command of god who creates it, just as he creates life. in other words, we should distinguish the real death, which occurs to human beings with the divine permission as an entitlement for their entry into perpetual life, from the apparent death, which seems to be dissolution and annihilation of the earthly life.[179] seed, for instance, Nursi discusses, dies and decays in its appearance, but in reality there is a shoot inside it, which is being kneaded and is coming to life, and as such, “it is passing from the particular life of a seed to the universal life of a shoot.”[180] such an observation undoubtedly proves Nursi’s ingenuity in unfolding mystery-laden phenomenon of death and making it a meaningful stage at the lives of the living beings. so, it is god who gives life and causes life to continue by means of sustenance. again, it is also god who causes death by creating various means and ways. in doing so, he in fact discharges man from the heavy responsibilities and hefty duties of life, changes his abode from this ephemeral world, releases him from the labor of service and takes him to an immortal life. All of these facts are sufficient, argues Nursi, to prove to man that death is not destruction, or nothingness, or extinction. nor is it cessation and eternal separation or yet a haphazard event. on the contrary, like numerous other things, it is one of the well-planned and well-established realities of this life.[181] after all, death is a return to the original homeland and to the everlasting happiness,[182] just as life is a period of preparation for such return.

 Possible Reasons for the Death of Beings Aside Humans in grappling with one of the most crucial questions of islamic theology and philosophy, Nursi discusses the worldly conditions of all beings in relation to life and death. The question that occupies and even agitates many inquisitive minds deals directly with the universal Will of god and his all-inclusive decree, which is summed up in this maxim: “god does whatever he wishes and decrees whatever he wills.”[183] The response he provides for the question and the analysis he makes for the several ramifications of the maxim in the twenty-fourth letter of his Maktūbāt reveal at the same time his islamic theodicy. he begins by posing the hypothetical question, “how can we reconcile the purposeful planning and the compassionate governing of god, Who is possessed of such greatest names as all-Merciful, allWise, and all-loving, with death and non-existence, disappearance and separation, and calamity and hardship?” “how can we explain that on the one hand there is all-compassionate, all-loving god who knows and rules all by his Will and Wisdom and there are, on the other, awesome phenomena and terrible events such as deaths, disasters, hardships, and sufferings?” one can probably afford a somewhat reasonable explanation for the raison d’être of death for man, or at least one can tolerate the occurrence of death to man, since it is expected to lead him hopefully to everlasting happiness. But, what sort of wisdom and compassion can we find in the constantly occurring deaths of all other living beings and creatures, like the species of animals, the species of trees and plants? What wisdom and purpose are there in their natural dying and in their annihilation by calamities and killings? how is such a seemingly strange phenomenon compatible with the love and mercy of god?

In attempting to resolve these difficult questions, Nursi at first examines more closely the purpose of the creation of all the living creatures, apart from human beings. he believes that if one can truly grasp the reason for the creation of the world and of all the existing beings there, one can also figure out or at least estimate a plausible explanation for the reason of their apparent death. By means of an imaginary parable Nursi aims to establish the inherent connection and mutual relation between god the all-glorious Maker and all the beings created by him on the earth. a tailor, for instance, who sews a garment and tries it on a poor man whom he has employed and displays all his skills and arts on it. during this process, he measures the garment and cuts it, either shortens it or lengthens it, by making the man sit down and stand up. Thus he shapes and decorates it in various forms completely on his own accord. one would wonder, asks Nursi, if the poor man has the right to complain to the tailor, “why are you interfering with this garment which makes me beautiful?” “Why are you making me sit down and stand up?” in exactly the same manner, god, in order to display the perfections of his art through the embroideries of his names, takes the essential nature of every living being as a model and then wraps it in the bodily garment, while adorning it with senses and engraving it with the pen of divine decree and determining. in doing so, he puts on view the manifestations of his names. at the same time he grants to every being a perfection, a pleasure, and an illumination appropriate and suitable to it. [184] none of these living beings, nevertheless, have the right to ask god why he is doing as such, for he, as the lord of all worlds, has free disposal over his realms as He wishes. Their right rather, stresses Nursi, is to fulfill their tasks of offering gratitude and praise in accordance with the degree of existence that god has granted them. so, minerals cannot complain by saying why they were not plants. nor can plants complain by asking why they were not animals. nor can animals complain by saying why they were not humans. But every one of them has the right to offer thanks. Minerals offer thanks to their creator for having received mineral existence; plants do so for having received life and existence; animals too for having received spirit in addition to life and existence. humans do all the more so for having received life, existence, spirit and intellect.

As noted, Nursi classifies all the living beings according to the degree of their respective existence. every group of beings, from the lowest to the highest degree, receives from their creator a form of perfection, a sort of pleasure, and an amount of illumination in commensurate with their respective aptitude. every one of them, nonetheless, serves as a model for displaying the perfections of the art of their Maker, as well as a mirror for reflecting the manifestations of His Names.

since the living beings were created for such lofty purposes as seen above, they do not disappear with death. not only they but all the things (ashyā) on the earth, Nursi proclaims, do not go to annihilation or to non-existence. Things other than the living beings rather pass from the sphere of power to the sphere of knowledge; they go from the Visible World to the World of the unseen; they turn from the world of change and transience to the world of light and eternity. again, because they display on themselves the beauty and perfection pertaining to the divine names and because they mirror the manifestations of those names, they do not pass to non-existence and nihility. Moreover, since all the divine names are eternal, their manifestations likewise are perpetual. Therefore, although they are subject to change in their outward appearances, their realities and essences, which are the means of beauty and perfection, endure.

as for the living beings, they consist of three categories: (i) beings with no spirits; (ii) beings possessing spirits, and (iii) beings possessing both spirits and intellects. Beings without spirits display the beauty and fineness pertaining to the divine names; hence they suffer no harm while their determinations change. Beings possessing spirits but with no intellects pass from corporeal existence and thus are saved from the tumultuous duties of life. That is to say, death for them is not annihilation and perishing into nihility, since their immortal spirits persist and attain eventually happiness worthy of them. as to the beings possessing both spirits and intellects, namely human beings, their death, as we have stated earlier, is an introduction or a journeying to everlasting happiness, attaining ultimately perfection. The death they taste is not at all an eternal separation or non-existence.[185] as has been clearly seen, Nursi’s application of death to the living beings has a lot to do with his doctrine of the divine names and attributes. so much so that without referring to the latter the former cannot be explained. and if we closely follow the logical sequence of his arguments, we come to the following conclusion: god is eternal, so are his names and attributes. similarly, all that is manifested from his names and attributes may afford a sort of perpetuity. since all the beings display the manifestations and impresses of those names and attributes, with death then they do not go to extinction in their essence, even though they may appear changing due to the constant renewal of manifestations they display.

 The Importance of Belief for the Understanding of Death as we have stated before, throughout his Risāle, Nursi repeatedly insists that death is not extinction and vanishing at all. although this is an undeniable fact, those who fail to discern the subtle relation (intisāb) that exists between god and the world and the beings therein also fail to comprehend the true nature of death, as they become stuck with the external side of it. Thanks to such relation, which can only be noticed through belief (īmān), all things and all beings become related to, and connected with, one another. if a man, for instance, is aware of his relation with god, he also becomes aware of his connection with other beings. For such a man, then, Nursi emphasizes, there is no separation or death in the sense of annihilation but rather another degree of existence. however, in the absence of belief, which he identifies elsewhere as “some sort of spiritual light” and the genuine affiliation with god, not only death but everything appears as non-existent and dark.[186]

In expounding further on the various implications of belief and its significance for understanding the true meaning of death, Nursi incidentally enters into the discussion of a rather different subject, which he later links with the issue of death. The world, he says, as well as all things, has three faces: the first face looks to the divine names and serves as their mirror. neither death nor separation nor yet non-existence can ever fall on this face, that is the face that looks to the divine names. all of these rather come to it in the form of renewal and replenishment. The second face looks to the Hereafter and fixes its gaze upon the Everlasting World, for which it serves as a land of cultivation. While producing lasting fruits, this face even turns transitory things into permanent. hence, on this face too there is neither death nor disappearance, but the manifestations of life and eternity. as for the third and last face, it looks to transitory beings, namely to us. it is the favorite of transient beings and those who follow their lustful desires, and the market place for the conscious, and the field of test and examination for those who are charged with duties. on the outer side of this face there is death and extinction, as well as pains and wounds. The cure and remedy for them are then manifestations of life and eternity in its inner face.[187] all in all, all beings are mirrors in motion and changing places of manifestation for the renewal of god's lights of creation and existence.

Furthermore, most Qur'anic verses dealing with death, Nursi claims, offer glad-tidings for the person who has faith and comforts his heart by delivering it from the fear of sheer nothingness and of utter extinction. But, again, this can ultimately be accomplished by virtue of faith that connects the heart of the believer with its Beloved.[188] as the Qur'an teaches, "unto god we do belong and to him we shall return,"[189] death is a godly-planned prelude for entry into the Presence of the eternal Master of the universe.

 Death as a Proof for God's Power and Unity

Nursi views death as an uncontestable evidence for god's Permanence and eternity and life as a decisive proof for his oneness and the necessity of his existence. he tries to demonstrate his view by citing concrete examples from the observation of the nature. one can easily conclude, he argues, the oneness of the sun by observing its images reflected, for instance, in a flowing river and in a sea and in many translucent objects. all of these observable images, though numerous in quantity, bear witness to the oneness and the necessity of the sun. Their disappearance at the time of the sun-set and their re-appearance the next day after the sun-rise testify beyond any doubt to the permanence of the sun. likewise, the existence of all the beings is an obvious testimony for the necessity of the existence of the necessary Being, the eternal sun, as their disappearance together with their causes and their re-emerging renewals that follow them bear witness to his oneness, Pre-eternity, and Permanence.[190] in other words, both life and death, in Nursi's view, are irrefutable evidences not only for the oneness of the creator but for the essentiality and indispensability of his existence for the existence of all beings. They are also incontestable proofs for the existence of a permanent life beyond death.

life and death, if we perceive them with our inner eye, as Nursi himself does it and suggests us to do the same, will unveil their true nature to us. only then shall we notice how the former speaks to us as if uttering constantly, "there is no deity but he, the one," and hence you should reject all the apparent causes, as he is the cause of all. We shall also take heed of death and hear him as if declaring, "there is no deity but He, the Peerless," and hence you should reject all the defiant souls and egos, as he is the creator of all.[191]

 Contemplation of Death

contemplation of death (rābita-i mevt) occupies considerable space in Nursi's life, as it does in the lives of many spiritual masters. he says that we can effortlessly infer the proposition "death is a reality," from the transience of the world. even long before the occurrence of the natural death, we can see ourselves dead if we develop the appropriate state of mind for it through the contemplation and recollection of death. as compared to many other creatures whose corpses were long buried in the graveyard of this globe, we, human beings, can envisage and foresee our own deaths and imagine how all our beloveds are turning their backs, abandoning us and leaving us alone. in this sense, therefore, the death of every living creature along with their corpses becomes "a wisdom-displaying passage."[192] seeing the dead body of a person may apparently cause agony and awesome fear; but, when we think of the real meaning of death as a departure and passage to another world of the Infinitely Merciful God, rather than a going to non-existence, we welcome it rather with optimism and hope and consent to it, saying “to god we all belong, and to him is our return.”[193] after all, the principal aim and the most anticipated result of our life in this world, Nursi again underscores, is to manifest the names and attributes of our real owner.[194] Just as the life we have assumed from him as a trust manifests his name al-Muhyī, [the life-giver], so, too the death, which we shall experience at the end of that life, displays his name alMumīt, [the death-causer], which also means “returning the trusted life back to is real owner.” contemplation of death is one of the most effective means, according to Nursi, to attain and preserve sincerity (ikhlās). By reflecting on such verses as, “every soul shall taste death,”[195] and: “surely you will die and surely they will die too,”[196] one could save oneself from the worldly ambitions, as well as from the snares and tricks of the evil-commanding soul. This is why, the Sufis, says Nursi, and those who have trodden their path, regarded the contemplation of death as the necessary means for their spiritual journey. For it is through the contemplation of death that one can not only dispel the fantasy of eternity but also free oneself from the unattainable ambitions and false hopes of this-worldly life.[197] This practice has also been underlined in various Prophetic statements, as Nursi cites one of them: “you should frequently mention death which drives away [from you the worldly] pleasures.” at this juncture, it must be pointed out that Nursi, though he seems to admire the path of the Sufis and deems their way of contemplation of death valuable, proposes rather a direct method or what we may call a “self-experienced method of contemplation,” the theoretical foundation of which rests exclusively on the Qur’an and the teachings of the Prophet Muhammad and the practical performance of it is demonstrated by him. For him the contemplation of death in the Sufi path is performed mostly in an imaginary form, by thinking of the end and thus bringing the future hypothetically to the present. such a way, Nursi criticizes, is not compatible with the way of reality. For an actual contemplation of death, he asserts, there is no need for imagination and supposition. one may instead look directly on one’s own body and thereby see there one’s own death and from there he can even observe the death of this century and the death of this whole world. This temporal life resembles a tree, and our individual corpse is like a single fruit from that tree. so, Nursi’s mode of contemplation, as far as death is concerned, starts in mind from the present and advances to the future, as exactly the opposite of the Sufis' imaginary way contemplation mentioned above, which intends to bring the future to the present in imagination.[198] in any case, the contemplation of death, in the eyes of Nursi and the other spiritual masters, is a mental preparation for man to endure unexpected severe illnesses, trials, and calamities with perseverance, as well as a reminder for him to fulfill his duties and obligations duly and carefully. For such a self-contemplative activity warns and alerts man of the fleeting nature of this world and of his fragile status therein as a transit passenger. in this particular sense it is regarded as the most effective antidote for man in struggling to overcome his heedlessness and keeping himself vigilant and sober in all circumstances. Because of all of these benefits, Nursi indicates, many friends of god and saints who incessantly exercised contemplation of death as part of their spiritual training, have considered and even welcomed such a severe illness as stroke or apoplexy as a blessing from god. For the end-result of this life for them is a blissful union with their Beloved in whom they have faith and place trust and on whom they rely under every possible situation.[199]

 Nursi's Self-Reflection of Death

The very process of the self-contemplation of death, which had always been one of the most effective principles cultivated by the people of the Sufi path and in particular by the followers of the naqshibandiyya order, has also transformed Nursi himself, as he confesses it on several occasions, from the old said into the new said; as a result he has henceforward become a close companion of the new said in his own intellectual endeavor. in his small treatise, "elderly People" as well as in some other places of his writings, he has demonstrated, by virtue of that selfcontemplation, the luminous face of death and its true meaning for the faithful.[200] Nursi's self-experience of death of course draws on his reading of the Qur'an. For instance, the verse, "every living being shall taste death,"[201] has propelled Nursi to make a self-reckoning and re-assessing of his past life. While pondering upon it deeply, the following meaning, as he declares, began to be unveiled to his heart: Mankind is a living being; it shall die in order to be resurrected. The earth is a living being, which will also die in order to enter into an eternal life. and the world, too, is a living being; it will die in order to take on the form of the hereafter.[202]

Furthermore, Nursi’s self-reflection of death has allowed him to see its two faces, one appearing as a terrible event, clothed in a black, dark and ugly veil, the other appearing as a luminous and beautiful moment for which all the faithful yearn.[203]

Nursi, by his study of the Qur’an and his own reflection of death, has been able to unravel the mystery of death and utilize its talisman in his Risāle-i Nūr, for the benefit of his readers and students. His success in this context lies in his efforts at removing the veil from the cruel face of death and bringing its unknown luminous side to open.[204]

 Concluding Remarks

Nursi’s approach to death, as we have tried to demonstrate here, is direct and based on his own reckoning and introspection. Placing himself before the mirror of death, he looks at it not as something that will happen to him in the future or something happening to others, but as an imminent reality he is about to face in his own body. in other words, his comprehension of death is by way of “complete certainty,” leading him to its interiority and letting him witness as it is really occurring to him and not as it appears to him from outside. Because of such certainty, he, as he declares, changed his attitude towards death, from fearing it with awesome worry to welcoming it with great consent.[205]

The positive position Nursi has adopted towards death concurs with the position of the Muslim thinkers of the past. in addition to the examples we have furnished earlier, we can still add one more, that is, his elaboration of alGhazālī’s celebrated doctrine that “the world is the best possible of all that exists.” In discussing the ramifications of this crucial issue of theodicy, Nursi poses a fundamental ethical question: If the universe is filled with, and encompassed by, goodness (husun), beauty (cemāl), and justice (adalet), then how can one explain the occurrence of all sorts of ugliness, calamities, disasters, illnesses, and deaths before our eyes? every instance of ugliness, he answers, conceals in itself either an instance or numerous instances of beauty and also it is through the occurrence and interference of ugliness that the degrees of beauty unfold. For instance, it is through the occurrence of cold that the degrees of heat become manifest or it is through darkness that the degrees of light become apparent. likewise, it is through particular instances of evil, harm, disasters and ugliness that universal instances of good and beauty, and universal benefits and bounties become visible. To put it in more precise terms, the creation of the so-called ugliness, stresses Nursi, is not ugly at all; on the contrary, it is beautiful, because what comes out and results from it in the end is mostly beautiful. Then we have to take into account the overall results and benefits of the creation of ugliness, not ugliness itself. A lazy man, as he exemplifies it, who suffers damage and loss due to the rain, cannot overlook or deny the beneficial results it produces in the name of mercy. The falling of rain is ultimately mercy, not harm.[206]

By the same token, the creation of death is part of the all-encompassing mercy and all-embracing goodness and beauty. This all-inclusive mercy and beauty in fact, Nursi concludes, necessitates the existence of both life and death. despite its scary face in appearance, death yields ultimately good results as it paves the way for an everlasting life. even the creation of satan is also good, merely because he is instrumental cause of man’s striving and competition for achieving spiritual progress.[207]

 6. Lā Siyyamā: Nursi’s Treatise on al-Hashr in Mathnawi al-Nuriye

Lucinda Mosher

in 1955, some dozen arabic rasā’il [epistles; treatises] of Bediuzzaman Said Nursi were collected, edited, and collated as the single-volume compendium alMathnāwī al-‘Arabī al-Nūrī (or, Mathnawi al-Nuriye, as it will be called here).[208] These essays date from 1920–21, a period of self-imposed spiritual retreat from political activism and military service. it was during this period of deep theological reflection and personal transformation that Nursi (now in his 40s) began to call himself the “new said.”[209] Among this set of Arabic essays we find Lā Siyyamā (in Particular): a treatise on the certainty of life beyond earthly existence. in this chapter, I comment on the structure of this treatise, reflect upon its themes, and locate it in the Nursi canon as a whole. i do this as a christian moral theologian in the anglican tradition who has long enjoyed the close reading of classical islamic writings on the doctrine of resurrection.

 Structure

The thirteen treatises of the Mathnawi al-Nuriye are a diverse lot: some are quite long, with many divisions, subdivisions, and appendices—akin to short chapterbooks; others are concise and through-composed; still others read more like litanies than lessons. at 20 pages, the edition examined here (17.5 pages of actual arabic text), Lā Siyyamā ranks among Mathnawi’s shorter items.[210] structurally, Lā Siyyamā has five discernable sections: three discreet sections of discussion bookended by devotional material. Most of Mathnawi al-Nuriye’s epistles open with supplication, praise, and extended testimony, and Lā Siyyamā is no exception. its introductory supplication praises god as self-revealing author of all creation:

Praise be to god, the perception of whose necessary existence and unity the atoms and elements of all creation speak with the tongue of their helplessness and their poverty.

Blessing and peace be upon his Prophet, who is the discoverer of the talisman of the living creatures and the key to its signs; and upon his brothers among the prophets and the transmitters, and upon the archangels, and upon the virtuous servants of god among the inhabitants of the heavens and the earths.[211]

Lā Siyyamā’s second section, which i am calling the Preamble, begins with four assertions prefatory to its main argument, each introduced with the imperative Know. The section’s exposition consists primarily of a series of analogies, and closes with profession of the uniqueness of the Prophet Muhammad.[212] Nursi signals that we have entered a new phase of the discussion by saying, in effect: “now to the matter at hand!” This third section, which i am labeling the evidentiary Phase, comprises the bulk of the treatise (some eleven pages). here Nursi attempts to demonstrate that belief in a hereafter is logical, introducing each of his argument’s twenty-one steps with the idiom lā siyyamā [in particular]. Thus he develops and sustains a rhetorical rhythm, albeit suspending it eventually for extended theological reflection and supplication.

With the vocative phrase: “o whoever is our friend, anyone whose understanding of the matter has made it to this point …,” Nursi heralds a shift in tone and style of discourse. The evidentiary Phase of the treatise has closed. We have entered the treatise’s fourth section—its denouement (my label). The treatise concludes as it began, with supplication (the fifth section):

o god: include us among Ahli’l-Sa‘ādah [the People of happiness], gather us into the Zumrati’l-Sa‘ādah [the Body of happiness], and enter us into the garden with the Pious [al-Abrār] through the intercession of your Prophet. So, blessings be upon him and upon his family, as befits Your Compassion and and his compassion, and preserve and keep us safe, bring peace upon our religion. amen. all praise be to god, the lord of the Worlds.[213]

 Stylistic Considerations

given Nursi’s reputation as a Qur’an commentator, it is striking that Lā Siyyamā includes only five Qur’an quotations: two in the Preamble, and three in the evidentiary Phase.[214] rhetorically, this treatise is hortatorical more so than it is didactic: its style is florid and emphatic, designed to convict rather than merely to inform the reader; illustration is provided by means of multiple colorful analogies; energy is built through ample use of repetition and assonance best appreciated when read aloud.

as a literary work, Lā Siyyamā reads as a composition written by someone very well read in the arabic language, but not entirely comfortable writing in it. on virtually every page we encounter sentences which are as awkward as they are complex. Occasionally, we find unusual plurals, odd spellings, obscure idioms, or Turkish words interspersed.

i have written elsewhere about Nursi's propensity in his arabic writings to play with assonance, to pair terms for their mutual resonance, to employ obscure terms (or even to coin them) for their rhythmic value. a style of preaching in which rhythm, alliteration, and other auditory effects take precedence over clarity of meaning is sometimes termed "the mystification of language."[215] With this in mind, it is interesting to hear Nursi, in a note to the Tenth Word, defend his discursive method. To those who wonder why he has punctuated that argument with some forty-five iterations of a particular question, he responds that he does so "because it expresses a most significant mystery."[216] even in this comparatively early authorial stage (of which the essays of 1920–21 are the fruit), Nursi is aware of the criticism his rhetoric provokes. in the preface to Habbah, another of his arabic treatises now included in the Mathnawi, he states: "Know that it has been reported to me that people are saying 'we cannot comprehend much of his writings, and so they [get printed in vain]';" in Nūrun min Anwāri (also now part of the Mathnawi), he acknowledges: "it is often said [about my writing]: 'your kalām can not be clearly understood!' agreed, but what to do?! This is the way insights come into the heart!"[217] he has not made his treatises opaque on purpose, he insists: "it is only that these writings are unexpected words addressed to myself during a bewildering period of my life."[218] in spite of its occasional opacity, the rhetoric of the Lā Siyyamā is that of persuasion, furthered effectively by artful use of repetition. it is to Nursi's delight in repetition as a rhetorical device that we now turn.

When we look at Mathnawi al-Nuriye as a whole, we may be struck by the preponderance of dense paragraphs, and the frequency with which Nursi initiates them with the imperative ‘Ilam! [Know!] We encounter this imperative in Lā Siyyamā, but only in the Preamble, and only four times. The distinctive rhythm and sound of this treatise is produced by long sequences of other parallelisms.

For example, in the Preamble, following the third ‘Ilam!—imperative, we find six statements beginning with ka-dhā inna nahāyah [thus, verily, the degree of], interrupted by one declaration begun simply ka-dhā inna. a series of analogies follows the final ‘Ilam!—imperative, each is initiated with lā yumkin [there is no …]. Nursi uses this construct 17 times in the treatise as a whole: 13 iterations here in the Preamble, and another five times in the Evidentiary Phase.[219]

The idiom lā siyyamā [in particular], which provides the treatise its title, occurs 23 times in the text—twice in the Preamble, where it is used merely in passing. By contrast, in the evidentiary Phase, this idiom functions as a vocative, calling our attention to each move in the mounting of evidence that belief in a hereafter is rational. The first 11 of these come in quick, almost breathless succession; following the 11th through 21st assertions, on the other hand, Nursi allows time for extended explanation—or, as following his 15th evidentiary point, for supplication:

o god, blessings and peace be upon that Beloved [Muhammad] who is the Master of the Two realities, the Pride of the Two Worlds, and the life of the Two abodes, stream of the Two Felicities; and the Possessor of Two Wings, the Messenger of al-Thakalān; and upon his progeny and his companions (all of them); and upon his brothers—the prophets, and the messengers. amen.[220]

The treatise’s denouement, which summarizes the preceding evidentiary argument in terms of god’s Beautiful names, stands in contrast to the preceding section by its lack of repetition of idioms as a rhetorical device.

rather, it makes repeated reference to god as the Wise, noble, compassionate, Just, all-Preserving Maker. in so doing, this section bears more resemblance to dhikr and du‘ā’ than to exhortation.

 Nursi’s Argument

The Qur’an makes it clear that “god can and will raise the dead and that such a resurrection is an indispensable part of his plan for each individual and for all creation.”[221] Jane smith and yvonne haddad have observed that the vocabulary of traditional islamic eschatological thought juxtaposes the temporal and the spatial, the individual and the collective, the already and the not yet. Thus the life of this physical earth and all which relates to it is called al-dunyā [the closer, the lower]. Al-dunyā refers not only to the time an individual spends on earth, but as well “to the total time frame continuing until the coming of the hour of judgment.” Whereas al-dunyā is the realm of measurable duration, al-ākhira [the hereafter—from the last, or the ultimate] is beyond or apart from time. Just as aldunyā has both specific and general meanings, so it is with al-ākhira, which refers not only to eternity (that is, the antithesis of al-dunyā), but also to al-samawat [the heavens]—the specific abodes of the angels and of the saved.[222] an eschatology informed by the Qur’an speaks of two parallel creations: the first creation into this world, and the second creation after death.[223] it is upon these notions which Lā Siyyamā expands. however, the classical writings examined by smith and haddad desire to describe what the resurrection is—what, in detail, will happen; [224] Nursi’s concern is to convince his reader that the resurrection will be.

Lā Siyyamā has been called Nursi’s treatise on the resurrection. [225] in english translations of the Qur’an and arabic literature, resurrection is used to render a number of terms; among the most common are: Yawm al-Akhirah [the hereafter], al-Qiyāmah [the rising], al-Ba‘th [the awakening], al-Hisāb [the reckoning], al-Ma‘ād [the return]. These terms are double referents, variously employed to name either the entirety or a single component of the eschatological event.[226] in Lā Siyyamā, Nursi employs al-Akhirah five times;[227] al-Qiyāmah only once;[228] al-Ba‘th, al-Hisāb, and al-Ma‘ād not at all. in this treatise, his preferred term for the eschaton is al-Hashr [the gathering], which appears ten times.[229] While alHashr may name only one phase of the eschatological process, throughout this treatise Nursi seems to intend it to name the whole of it.

as is easily discerned from any of Nursi’s writings, the existence and absolute oneness of god is self-evident if we but pay attention to the natural order. atheists persist, and he desires to persuade them to theism by appealing to their love of logic. here in Lā Siyyamā, Nursi will preface his main argument with four assertions:

• That true appreciation of scientific knowledge ought to lead even the atheist to admit that the earth and all it contains is too intricate and complex to be the result of mere chance;

• That everything has a material aspect and a non-material aspect, the former determined by “Power,” and the latter determined by “destiny;” that is, all things have “knowledge” of the form to take in the first place, and what forms to take on as they develop over time;

• That “everything bears the imprint and seal of al-Ahad [the one], al-Samad [the eternal; the refuge], and possesses signs testifying that [god] has sovereignty over it, owns it, and has made it;”

• That a relationship inheres between faith in god, faith in prophethood, faith in the hereafter, and belief in the necessary existence of an eternal designer.[230]

Lest the reader not understand how god's "imprint and seal" be discerned—nursi provides evidence from the natural order. similarly, lest the reader not understand the essential connection between faith in god, prophethood, and the hereafter, Nursi makes it overt by means of a series of analogies; for example:

• Just as a book requires an author, and a house requires both an architect and a builder, so too the universe cannot have come into existence without a maker;

• Just as the images of the sun reflected in drops of water cannot be explained without reference to the sun itself, so too can the systematic transformation of the creatures of the universe be explained only by reference to their necessary creator;

• Just as the sun cannot help but diffuse light, and an infinitely beautiful work of art cannot fail to draw attention to itself by means of someone capable of describing and interpreting it, so too would it be inconceivable for god to do other than to make godself known by means of Messengers.[231]

"Now observe the power of the reality of the gathering and the hereafter," Nursi urges; "and it is that there is no power without rewarding those who obey, and punishing those who disobey."[232] That is, power is not viable unless there are consequences for ignoring it. Power is viable, Nursi argues, if the one wielding it, for example:

• "[M]anifests great generosity that necessitates ihsan [the doing of the beautiful], and a great dignity that necessitates concern for others;"

• Is immensely merciful, thus necessitating merit which matches his wide mercy; and also possesses glory necessitating a response to those who undermine his ability and do not respect him;

• Has wisdom to an elevated degree, thus necessitating the protection of his prestige and power by accommodating those who seek refuge under his wing; and also has a pure sense of justice which necessitates the preservation of his prestigious domain by the way he cares for his flock—(that is, all people);

• As the owner of great treasure, is filled with ultimate generosity that necessitates the existence of an ultimate generous guest house, which in turn necessitates the continued existence of those in need of different things—food, clothing, and so on—such that always there will be people coming to this open guest house;

• Demonstrates great merciful and compassionate in the way he rescues the needy and answers the supplicant, responding to needs from the smallest ones expressed by people at the lowest level of society to the greatest request issued by a sultan.[233]

God's "secret Perfections" are perpetual, Nursi asserts; and perpetual perfection cannot but manifest itself perpetually. such perfection will demand that notice be taken of it perpetually: "a perfection loses its value in the view of an observer condemned to eternal extinction."[234] Nursi insists that our observation of the natural order should lead us to conclude that there is an ultimate Power behind it: as he sees it, by all logic there must be. in the longest explanatory passage of the evidentiary Phase section (some two pages), Nursi reinforces his contention that such a Power as has founded and regulates the cosmos will, of course, be able to orchestrate a general day of gathering and an eternal life thereafter. indeed the natural order itself illustrates the reality of resurrection. offering yet another analogy, Nursi suggests that this universe is like a caravanserie: caravanseries fill up quickly and empty quickly every day. Playing with images of luxury and hospitality, he makes his point: "This world has not been created for its own sake … . Rather, it is a realm filled through births and emptied through deaths. its inhabitants are guests only, whom the noble lord invites to the abode of Peace.”[235]

For proof that things are destined for baqā’ [immortality] rather than fanā’ [extinction], “Consider a flower which looks at us for a very short time and then goes away,” Nursi suggests. “you may think of it as a word uttered, which by god’s permission goes to thousands of ears, with its meanings understood by numerous intellects. Then, when the flower dies, it entrusts itself to the memories of those who have seen it, and its forms and meanings to its seeds … .”[236] Nursi urges us to remember that god is all-Preserving: “he misses nothing and whether it be the biggest or the smallest, he records and preserves everything in a manifest book.” consider “the memories of human beings, the fruits of trees, and the seeds of fruits and flowers, so that you may understand the comprehensiveness of the law of recording and preserving.”[237] in particular, he stresses, it is no more difficult for the King of This World with all his attributes of strength to build the other World with all its gardens than it is for him to create the early springtime with all its gardens and the transformations they display. god’s promise, which all the Prophets [al-Anbiyā’] and the Pure ones [al-Asfiyā’] have established, is found in the Qur’an: “he is god: there is no god but him. he will gather you all together on the day of resurrection.”[238]

Furthermore, Nursi continues, “the governor of This universe [Mutasarrif Hadhā’l-Ālam] makes manifest in every moment, every day, every year, and every century in the arena of the earth many examples similar to things which take place in the greater, wider arena [of the cosmos].” consider the annual springtime resurrection [al-Hashr al-Rabī‘ī], he suggests: you’ll be able to see 300,000 examples of gathering and spreading [hashr wa nashr] such as we anticipate at the last day. is not he Who created the universe in a matter of six days responsible for this annual resurrection season? how could it be that god have created the heaven and earth in six days, and orchestrates this annual resurrection, yet not be able to command a general resurrection, by which all human beings are gathered in a flash?[239]

“And in particular,” says Nursi, making his final evidential point, consider how ephemeral are our earthly habitats, yet these ephemeral arenas manifest traces of divine wisdom, favor, justice, and mercy sufficient to convince humanity that there can be no greater wisdom, favor, justice, and mercy than god’s. if there be no permanent habitat with eternal inhabitants, then—since logic has already established that god must be—this display would be but a malicious prank! and, Nursi concludes, to think that god could be such a trickster is to upset all of the logic through which he has just guided us.[240]

Throughout the evidentiary Phase, Nursi has alluded to god by various attributes—among them: al-Jawād [generous], al-Rahmān [the compassionate], Mutasarrif Hadhā’l-Ālam [governor of This universe], Maliku’l- Ālam [King of the universe]—to mention but a few.[241] as he prepares to summarize his lengthy argument in just a half-page of text, Nursi takes a moment to warn us not to think that the attributes of god which point to the absolute certainty of resurrection be limited to those which he (Nursi) has mentioned in this discourse: “[d]o not suppose that the Beautiful names which require that there be a hereafter and a Gathering be confined to al-Hakīm [the Wise] and al-Karīm [the noble] and alRahīm [the Merciful] and al-‘Adil [the Just] and al-Hafīz [the Preserver]. By no means; nay, rather, all of the names manifested in the management of creation require this.”[242] indeed, he insists as he summarizes, “the question of the gathering is a question already agreed upon, by virtue of the truth of god’s glory and his Beauty and his splendor and all the rest of his names”—to which all revealed texts and prophets (especially the Qur’an and Muhammad the Trustworthy), all souls which are luminous, pure, and exalted, and all the signs present in the natural order attest.

everything points both to its creator and to its (telos): each thing has a “tongue” which testifies to Divine Oneness, and a “tongue” which testifies to the Hereafter and the last day. divine Wisdom, Favor, Mercy, Justice, and Preservation establish the order of the cosmos; so to the natural order points to the Wise, noble, compassionate, Just, all-Preserving Maker. “Thus it manifests the truth of the hereafter and the imminence of the hour and the actualization of bliss.”[243]

Thus it is Nursi’s contention that the Beautiful names themselves require that there be such a thing as resurrection.[244] That he would make this connection is not surprising, given his well-documented love of the 100-stanza meditation on the Beautiful names known as the Jawshān al-Kabīr [The great armor]. as i have explained elsewhere, while he may have known of it beforehand, it was during his profoundly transitional sojourn of 1920–21 (the period during which he penned the treatise now known as Lā Siyyamā) that Nursi cultivated his deep and abiding fondness for the Jawshān al-Kabīr—a devotional aid which, Şükran Vahide affirms, Nursi recited regularly from then on, and which served him not only as an aid for contemplation, but also as an inspiration for his writing projects.[245]

 Reflection

i approach Nursi as a christian ethicist, thus in conversation with a range of christian thought.[246] My encounter as a christian ethicist with Nursi’s carefully crafted logic brings to mind the methodological assertion by the theologian John Polkinghorne (who had as well a distinguished career as a particle physicist) that “the aim of the religious quest, like that of the scientific quest, is to seek motivated belief about what is the case.” By “motivated belief,” Polkinghorne means belief which can appeal to evidence. in his own work on the interface of science and religion, he explains, he addresses “evidential questions”—questions which will require rational responses if faith is to be possible.[247] Nursi’s method is similar. he too seeks motivated belief—belief which can appeal to evidence. For me, Nursi’s turning to the natural order for answers to his own “evidential questions” recalls Thomas aquinas’s “Five Ways” by which the human mind may apprehend god. in his Summa Theologiae, Thomas’s style of argument is to pose a question, then detail a number of objections to it (negative answers to it); he then lays out his own position on the matter, and his detailed responses to each objection in turn.

For Thomas, all human knowledge proceeds from experience: even our knowledge of God must start from the world. The finite world cannot explain its own existence, order, and dynamism. Therefore, there must be a First Mover, a First Efficient Cause, a cause that is its own necessity (something that does not have to be caused by anything else), a cause of any and all degree of perfection in anything else, and an intelligent Being which directs each thing toward its particular telos. This Prime Mover, this First Efficient, Necessary, Perfect Cause, this intelligent Being, Thomas insists, is “what everyone calls ‘god’.”[248] in effect, Thomas turns the question of whether god exists on its head: it does not need to be proven. The economy of the universe is self-evident; and that very economy is what the word “god” means! interestingly, however, the supplement to Part Three of Summa Theologiae has Thomas dismissing appeals to the natural order in explaining resurrection by such earlier christian thinkers as John of damascus and gregory the great. our knowledge of resurrection comes from god’s revelation through christ. resurrection will involve the reunion of soul with body, and this will be miraculous, not natural.[249]

We might turn for a moment to anselm of canterbury (1033–1109 ce), known for his ontological argument by which he asserts that god is that “than which nothing greater can be conceived.”[250] anselm, as William Placher points out, “saw few limits to what reason could achieve when guided by faith.”[251] But which comes first: faith, or reason? Anselm “insists that faith must come before rational understanding of the mystery of the self-revealing god.”[252] says anselm, “unless you believe, you will not understand.” Faith is the first move. Yet he insists as well that “faith would be lacking if it did not use human reason to explore the mysteries of revelation.”[253] Thus from Anselm we receive a classical definition of theology as

“faith seeking understanding.” given anselm’s notion of faith’s preceding rational understanding, we might ask whether “proofs from nature” are the best way to name the cosmological arguments made by Thomas aquinas on the one hand, and Said Nursi on the other. Perhaps it is better to describe them as arguments which begin with a particular interpretation of nature by a believing mind, and then demonstrate the reasoning process of that believing mind.[254] regardless, in Lā Siyyamā it is clear that Nursi (not unlike anselm) sees few limits to what reason can achieve when guided by faith. however, when we recall the circumstances under which the essay foundational to it was written—nursi's personally formative spiritual retreat of 1920–21—it is equally clear that it allows us to hear Nursi's own faith seeking understanding.

as he preaches, Nursi chides people who do not see things as he does. in Lā Siyyamā, he accuses the unbeliever of ingratitude,[255] of succumbing to "the intoxication of ignorance,"[256] of (perhaps) being "drunk with error,"[257] or of being "sophists who deny the existence of things".[258] When we contrast his tone here to that of the Tenth Word, in which he calls refusal to "assent to the attributes of perfection of the glorious creator" a "sign of lunacy and misguidance," and declares that, in spite of his detailed argument in its favor, "you regard corporeal resurrection as improbable and rationally unacceptable, know your behavior to be pure lunacy," we find the Nursi of the Mathnawi al-Nuriye comparatively mildmannered.[259] Nursi is far from alone in turning to sarcasm and scolding: Thomas and anselm use ridicule as a rhetorical device as well.

Is anyone ever brought to belief by reprimand? Probably not. however, anselm's discourse is couched in prayer, as is Nursi's. When this is noticed, we become aware that the object of the scolding may be as much the author as the reader, the teacher as much as the student. When it comes to belief in god and god's ways, does logic ever convince? does reason bring individuals to faith? Perhaps—although even a distinguish theologian like alistair Mcgrath, a selfdescribed "former atheist," says the consensus of thought on the matter is: not likely. Be that as it may, it must also be conceded that believers can give a rational account of their faith.[260] What is delightful about each of the exemplars above, Said Nursi included, is the way in which they give this account.

 Conclusion

From the discussion above, we have learned that Lā Siyyamā is a colorful and comparatively concise example of Nursi’s style of argumentation, one item in a handbook which stands in contrast to most of his output because it is arabic, rather than Turkish, discourse. The relationship between the contents of the Mathnawi al-Nuriye and the contents of the multi-volume Risale-i Nur can confuse even those with some experience with the Nursi canon. it is thus helpful to know that the Risale-i Nur includes or mentions several essays which would eventually become part of Mathnawi al-Nuriye. [261] according to a note in the 1999 edition of the Mathnawi, we can surmise that al-Hashr was in fact the title of an arabic essay Nursi penned in 1922–23. It figures twice in the Risale-i Nur: it is the “second station” of the “Twenty-eighth Word;” and, it provides the core for the (vastly longer) “Tenth Word.” The treatise now known as Lā Siyyamā thus is in actuality a revision: Nursi calls it “an expression of the essence of the epistle al-Hashr.”[262]

My effort to sort out the origins as well as the themes and structure of Lā Siyyamā brings me to a final point. Considerable effort is being made to bring the Nursi canon to a wider audience. as an item of literature, Lā Siyyamā demonstrates Nursi’s skill as a preacher. it deserves to be read. it will enjoy more readership if it be provided an arabic edition in which the roughest rhetoric is smoothed out a bit. an english translation which preserves and foregrounds the repetitive devices that give the work its distinctive structure, and which makes clear Nursi’s vocabulary vis-à-vis the Beautiful names of god, will allow the anglophone student of this text to appreciate, not only the ideas it contains, but the method by which they are expressed.

Lā Siyyamā—and that this same material functions both as the basis for and a summary of the Tenth Word. see Bediuzzaman Said Nursi, The Words: On the Nature and Purposes of Man, Life, and All Things, translated from the Turkish Sözler by Şükran Vahide (Istanbul: Sözler Neşriyat, 1992), p. 513. A note on the first page of Lā Siyyamā confirms this: see Mathnawi, p. 81.

 7. resurrection in the Writings of Bediuzzaman Said Nursi: Comparative Reflections with christian Theology

W. Mark Richardson

The opportunity for inter-religious dialogue is something to be welcomed not for the sake of wholesale agreement on all topics, nor finding syntheses which show our traditions at their depths to be really the same thing under different cultural histories. it is, rather, an opportunity for mutual understanding, and the gaining of insight within one’s own tradition by virtue of stepping outside it to reflect on another.

Nursi’s writings provide fertile ground for this kind of task. as spiritual seeker, accomplished scholar and compassionate leader, he brings to his work uncommon strengths for deepening inter-religious dialogue. The topic of “resurrection” proves to be quite rich for this undertaking. it is a theme at the core of these two theistic traditions, and one in which contrasts between the traditions lead to insight.

 Method

i have pursued this study in the mode of comparative theology. as a scholar of christianity, i am interested in how the similarities and differences on a belief, embedded in both traditions, enhance understanding. But, of course, i cannot represent more than a single point in a spectrum of christian thought. We have the advantage of reflecting on Nursi who represents one voice in the spectrum of Islam, but the comparison will necessarily remain broad because of this consideration.

i have concentrated on the topic of “resurrection” and on Nursi’s Tenth and Twenty-ninth Words. My first task is empirical: looking for the form of the argument and the key ideas in making the theological case. My next task is consideration of theological implications one might draw from the language and concepts employed in the respective traditions.

Nursi tells us the topic of resurrection is exceedingly important in islam, so we can expect it to be a very significant point of departure for comparative theology. i will compare his thoughts about resurrection with broadly held views in the christian tradition. i begin by asking: on what grounds could, or would, a monotheist believe in god resurrecting his creatures from the dead? and just what is meant by “resurrection” such that one could not just say, instead, the continuing life of the soul which (some believe) is an entity constituted in god’s creation as immortal? What is special, that is, about the notion of resurrection to distinguish it from immortality of the soul? after some remarks about this distinction, i will consider the implications of the response for the whole of creation and the social dimension of our humanity, the nature of time and transformation, and finally closing remarks on eternal reward and punishment. First, then, the question of the form of argument asserting resurrection.

 The Basis for Making the Claim about “Resurrection”

One significant comparative interest between Nursi’s thought and Christian theology is the basis on which one makes a claim about resurrection. Nursi’s argument is nuanced and varied, but overall it has the form of cumulative cosmological arguments, intending to lead the reader not just to the reasonableness of the resurrection, but its virtual inevitability. The often repeated phrase in forming a rhetorical question to those who would doubt the resurrection – “is it at all possible …” – expresses the tone of certainty and boldness he intends to convey. notable examples of the arguments are:

1.since there are creatures able to appreciate god’s mercy, beauty, goodness as observed in the world, it would discount the very meaning of these virtues if there were no eternal enjoyment of them.[263]

2.The design of this world points to a more permanent rendering of the virtues we find in it.[264]

3.Belief in an eternal reality is the condition for an interpretation of value in the things of this world.[265]

The arguments always comes to a climax by exposing the faith that drives the reasoning: god, who chooses to be known through the Prophet and through creation itself, can be trusted to not delude the creature.

although these rational arguments are stated as irrefutable support for resurrection drawn from this world, an examination of the actual reasoning performed by Nursi leads to a conclusion similar to that reached by david Burrell when examining aquinas’s cosmological arguments. They are not so much proofs as they are the tracing of the path of mind and heart after receiving and responding to revelation.[266] Nursi’s actual starting point is not the world un-interpreted, after all, but faith which leads to a particular interpretation of phenomena in the world. he subtly and effectively blends faith in god as revealed by the Prophet with reasoning not unlike aquinas’s cumulative cosmological argument for the existence of God. Aquinas argues from finite reality to its divine creation or source via causal arguments. Nursi argues still more boldly from finite things to resurrection or eternal goal. He finds the total impression on the believing mind, coming from various angles of consideration, leading to the reasonable trust that god raises the dead.

But the key question here is whether this functions as “proof” in a modern sense of the term, or rather functions as reasonable steps of a believer once the interpretative framework is grounded in belief in god. although aquinas thought that nature as such could lead us to certainty of god’s existence, and resurrection was a matter of revelation, both arguments begin in faith, not in inference from natural knowledge.

 A Christian Context

Nursi defends what christians would name “general resurrection,” to distinguish it from the particular resurrection of Jesus. For the christian, however, the belief that God has raised Jesus from the dead is the ground of Christian faith in a final, eschatological transformation of all things. as J. christiaan Beker claims, in its original Jewish context, Jesus’ resurrection lacks all intelligibility apart from its immediate implication for the completion of history, the general resurrection to which Nursi refers.[267] Jesus’ resurrection is not a coherent event, and in that sense not complete in itself, except as prolepsis of the transformation of all things.

a christian beginning point for faith in the “resurrection” is tied to the outcome of Jesus’ life and career. That God raised him is taken to be affirmation of the message and ministry. This event launches a “new creation” and becomes the ground of expectation for a general resurrection at the end of history. christians do not agree about how to understand what happened to Jesus, nor about its meaning. indeed the range of interpretation of this resurrection varies widely.

The common factor in the stories surrounding Jesus’ return to his followers is that the accounts are in verbal pictures depicting an occurrence which exceeds historical categories.[268] There is no denying the peculiarity of asserting such a thing as resurrection of Jesus amidst the ordinary events of nature and history. scholars in recent years have dedicated much attention to uncovering the core meaning. i think the general bearing of these depictions is something like nancey Murphy’s claim: “none [of the picture language] is adequate in itself to say what Jesus was like after resurrection, but each sets boundaries regarding what we must not say: he is not a resuscitated physical corpse; not merely a [subjective] vision appearance; not a ghost.” it does involve some kind of recognized embodiment which provides for continuity of personal life, its memories, relations, and characteristic actions. But it also involves transformation, and this constitutes discontinuity with whatever had gone before.[269]

To Murphy’s statement, we might add Pheme Perkins’s claim that new Testament accounts of resurrection assume the presence of god in the reception of the appearances of the resurrected one, and found resurrection to be a symbol of social and cosmic solidarity: the expectation of being with god in the consummation of all things.[270]

What we can say comparatively at this point is, first, that Christian belief in a general resurrection is not rooted in rational necessity, but in historical encounter of god's action which comes as a contingent and surprising event. The gospels narrate the surprise through Jesus' followers: the quick turn-around from fear and disappointment to recovery of courage and hope. it occasioned the remembering of Jesus through the filter of this experience. They associated the ethic of Jesus' "kingdom" teaching with the new hope centered in this resurrection. Jewish background gave a language for interpreting the experience of resurrection but not the expectation of it in the case of Jesus. The joyful surprise in faithful followers, and not rational inference, grounded future expectation.[271] second, this starting point in Jesus for the belief in general resurrection introduces a complex temporal schema for the contemporary believer: the vision of final things is formed by looking back to this event of a particular resurrection, then projecting its meaning forward into the future beyond our own present. ultimate meaning centered in a future promise of general resurrection then loops back into the present to inform a personal, social and cosmic ethic. So we find future projection from past event circling back into the present to form the ethic. in fact, this is expressed sometimes as Jesus' resurrection inaugurating a "new creation." This world participates in realities yet to be fulfilled: the "already/not yet" status of history.

in summary, Jesus' resurrection becomes the basis of hope, on the one hand, but also the basis of judgment and critique on all those aspect of life – personal relations and socio-political institutions – which remain opposed to the character of justice and mercy affirmed in the risen Jesus. As an important living theologian, Jurgen Moltmann, once said, hope does not leave one at peace, but anxious, since the content of hope judges all that remains incomplete in this present age.

 Resurrection and Personal Identity – Continuities and Discontinuities

The above pictures, from Nursi and from my general sketch of christian perspective, give us material to explore for implications regarding the meaning of “resurrection of the body” and how it differs from belief in immortal souls and their fate. What is at stake in this distinction? i claim that personal and social imagery, important to each tradition, depends on resurrection of the body, and further, becomes vulnerable when the concept shifts to immortality of soul.

Both Nursi and the broad christian outline i have presented wish to assert continuity of personal identity between this present existence and the hoped for life to come. one question is: what are the conditions constituting personal identity presupposed in traditions which speak of resurrection? What does identity consist of? Here I want to reflect on some contemporary observations about identity, not to settle the question but as a heuristic device for drawing out what we care about on the matter.

We soon discover in the three great monotheisms that embodiment is close to the core of personal identity. The Jewish scholar neil gillman: “… my body is the landmark which connects me with everything else that exists physically, specifically with all of history and society.”[272] indeed, his assumption is both attuned to strains within ancient Jewish anthropology and resonant with perspectives we find today.

Most basically, bodies constitute a spatial and temporal boundary, marking of discrete identities, which makes the concept of relationships and interactions intelligible. But personal identity is much more than this, of course. It is a specific kind of embodiment which supports and realizes the capacities of subjectivity (awareness of one’s own identity), sentience, patterned intentional action, moral relations, and generally a purposive bearing toward life, and long term memory which allows a person to see the long history of such capacities as one’s own, and for others to recognize it as such also.

in the present inter-disciplinary context, in which theology interfaces with natural sciences, it is difficult to argue against growing evidence that our highest mental and spiritual capacities are realized through physical substrates of bodily systems. There is no thought, feeling, urge to action, no mental phenomenon at all which isn't realized through physical processes. We cannot speak of, say, "dis-embodied actions," and this is not just because bodies mark a boundary between discrete objects interacting; it is also because all actions, from thoughts to observable bodily motion, rely on extended, structured systems.

But the bodies we speak of are not identical to particular bundles of physical stuff. This kind of literalism about embodiment quickly reduces to the absurd problem of whose body a particular atom belongs to in the resurrection, a sure sign one is involved in a conceptual misfire. A literal physicalist view of embodiment – that is, a one-to-one correspondence between materials at time (a) with the same materials at time (B) – is a falsehood scientifically, and fails to account for what we find significant in the idea of embodiment. Physical systems are the basis for capacities, but the things we care about most with respect to personal identity are not marked in physical concepts but language depicting the highest capacities that human physical systems yield. under this point of view, "mind" refers to the highest capacities we associate with the complex biological organism named "homo sapiens." and "soul" refers to the personal unity in terms of the characteristic patterns of action broadly conceived. The logical primitive of human beings is "person" not "body with soul."

If the idea of finite persons in relation to God is an expectation after this life, then some minimal sense, at least, of surviving personal identity is included in this expectation. again, Murphy gives us a useful summary of aspects of personal existence that will be transformed and raised up in the post-resurrection existence, if the idea of agents in relationship is intelligible: it involves the "subjectivity of remembered self through this time and in some transformed existence." This involves "continuity of memory, and the patterns of remembered personal action," especially moral pattern in relationships. also critically important is consciousness that these memories are one's own.

as personal identity is acquired over a life time, it must involve the kind of adaptation involved in character making, including the training of emotion, and of desire, and of the perception of the other persons and things. Thus, the forming of character is also possible only in embodied existence. The critical concern in all of this is that these characteristics, which mark our personhood, lean on embodiment as essential to this recognizable identity. so, we may agree with Nursi that transformed embodiment need not be linked strictly with physicalism, but refers instead to patterned and structured action. nevertheless, whatever form it takes, embodiment remains a necessary condition for the imagery we use around resurrection.

so, just how these conditions of embodiment are realized eschatologically is beyond the scope of what we can know. But what can be said is that in our understanding of identity now, its conditions include a capacity for subjectivity, memory, relationship, patterns of purposive or moral action, growth and adaptability to changing circumstances, all of which we infer from embodied identity. and, all these attributes imply transformed embodied existence, about which we have no access. Maybe all we can say is that god will “re-member” us, meaning that our identity, consisting as it does in relationship and patterns of interaction, will be held in divine memory, then somehow transformed and carried forward.

 Nursi on Personal Identity on the one hand Nursi speaks of the soul as an eternal form, suggesting it is immortal and passes through death of the body. Technically speaking, this would mean it needs no “raising” up, but merely the passing over into some other existence: “… how closely tied to eternity is the spirit of man, which possesses an extremely exalted and comprehensive nature, which although clothed in a body, is a conscious and luminous law issuing from the divine command.”[273] The indication is that the essential identity of the human being is found in the soul, and the soul is eternal.

on other hand, he intuitively recognizes the embodiment problem, and has no desire, it would seem, to express paradise apart from embodiment and its environment. If, in this universe, human beings have this kind of identification with the rest of the natural world, and as Nursi himself has indicated, the material world is its instrument, then the medium of our agency is inextricable from the rest of the natural order:[274] “… is it at all possible that so compassionate and powerful a one, so wise, and all knowing a one, should not bring about resurrection; should not gather his creatures together, or be unable to do so; should not restore man to life… ?”[275] here is would seem evident that Nursi’s conceptuality belongs to resurrected life as embodied life. his anthropology is compatible with the hylo-morphism of the aristotelian tradition, rather than the non-reductive physicalism of nancy Murphy. But in each case there is recognition that fully functioning personal identity is embodied, and that this is a condition for social existence. and in each case the logical primitive of the identity is “persons,” not “souls and bodies.”

The reasoning to support embodiment is similar also to what we have said about personal identity thus far. Nursi specifically finds continuity between this life, on the one hand, and the “permanent world,” on the other hand, in memory of patterns of action in this life: “considering that the results of such transient, commonplace, impermanent and insignificant things are preserved, is it at all possible that men’s deeds, that yield important fruits in this world of the unseen, the world of the hereafter.should not be recorded as a matter of importance?”[276] history’s meaning, the relations, the patterns of purposive action which shape our lives now, are linked to the meaning of resurrection.

Nursi moves toward a rather extraordinary image in the Twenty-ninth Word of The World as a whole moving from the density of this kind of embodiment toward refinement, lightness, and transparency. This is also presented in active voice as the power of god which makes this happen: “creative power sprinkling the light of life on dense, lifeless, extinguished, dead objects with an astonishing activity is a sign that it dissolves, burns, and illuminates this dense world with the light of life on account of the subtle world.”[277] it is an instance of daring imagination about an eternal life wherein embodiment is transformed, not eliminated. This Twentyninth Word distinguishes resurrection existence from non-spatial “soul-ish-ness.” one thinks, from a christian perspective, of the language of the christian apostle, Paul, of “spiritual bodies” and the similar effect it has regarding personal identity, social reality and embodiment.

i close this section with the observation that Nursi links this idea of embodiment with a larger cosmic environment. and it appears that he envisions this as creation transformed, not a starting over tabula rasa. it is true that, at times he speaks of a “new” dwelling place, this one having served its purpose. But elsewhere, and i think more powerfully, he imagines a transformed creation as a whole, not a new one. he states: “… time is certain to come when the manifest world, which is the shell and form of the mighty reality of the universe, will break up, with the permission of the all glorious creator. Then it will be renewed into a better form.” Then Nursi quotes from the Qur’an: “That day the earth will be changed into a different earth.”[278]

The difference is morally significant. The idea of future hope consisting in God’s making of an altogether new and different creation, rather than the transformation of the first creation, turns the environment of human life into mere instrument for the soul’s refinement, and ultimately something to be annihilated and thus of only temporary worth. This is not creation made new, but rather creation annihilated for a new one. But a wholly new creation is disconnected with history and memory, and leaves unanswered why the “before” of such a new creation would matter.

on the other hand, if the things of this world are transformed, then nature and history are themselves invested with meaning, not just as instruments but as participants in the world to come. This would involve an ethic which perceived things of this world, and their corporeal form, as a sign of a still more robust life, and therefore a mode of things to be profoundly respected.

If the final expectation or hope does not consist in the annihilation of the old, but rather its transformation, then it has moral significance now. We are, then, not saved from history and this world, but in it. There is, in other words, a considerable difference in moral tone between the options.

 Resurrection and Social Reality

i have maintained so far that the principal imagery surrounding belief in resurrection, both for Nursi and in christian perspective, entails embodiment and that this has implications regarding the environment of embodied existence, even if we must remain agnostic about the nature of this eschatological embodiment and environment. next, i believe we can go a step further to claim that the above extends to include social relations as part of the core of our picture language about ultimate things.

A Christian Perspective

The imagery about “final things” in the Christian tradition is socio-political: the metaphors of “‘kingdom of god,” “body of christ,” “heavenly banquet,” “city of god” are all is suggestive of action and interaction, within a differentiated unity. sometimes the language (especially of st. Paul) expresses the intimacy of individuals within an environment of an organically knit whole. Jesus’ parables of the Kingdom of god and the ethic centered in this social image, make clear that divine-human, and human-human relationships are fundamentally moral. and the morality alluded to in this “kingdom” is not driven by obligation, but internalized. When Jesus is asked to summarize the law he distills it into love of god, and love of neighbor as oneself. Moreover, when he teaches in parable and sermon he often gets to the matter of intentions, the state of the “heart” in moral relations, the grounding of value and desire in love of god.

The final goal of transformation, in St. Paul, is expressed in the mystical imagery of being “in christ:” personal identity inextricably in communion with other persons. individuals will be more transparent to each other as dwelling within a larger organic whole named the “body” of christ. given Paul’s eschatological fusion of christ with god, what is suggested in the above picture is that the transformed creation dwells within god. it is a kind of intimacy and differentiation we do not yet know how to express. The plurality of individual identities within a larger organic whole means that persons are only identifiable by reference to the relation of communion with others in god.

one British theologian at the time of Nursi’s middle years, lionel Thornton, following the Eastern Orthodox vision of deification, spoke of this image of being “in christ” as a new emergent reality continuous with nature and history, yet dependent on the new transformative action of god in order to complete the human longing and human potential. The transformed social reality is likened to an organism, emergent from simpler levels or organization, in which our individuality is intensified even as our relation to the whole becomes more transparent. The human being essentially is a social reality, in this outlook, and this is the key point of the body of christ imagery.[279]

This advanced stage of human realization presumes a movement of persons from self as the center of value, to self realized in relations with others, and this latter is only possible when god is the center of value. Nursi

Nursi, too, is clear about the social allusions to eternal life, or paradise. he speaks of the human community in unity with the Prophet in its prayer of yearning for fulfillment. He speaks of the Prophet’s prayer as causing “… the cosmos to weep and thus to share in his prayer.”[280] and, of course, the end time is depicted as a “great gathering.”[281] Moreover, one motivating aspect is that the happiness to come is tied to the continuation and shared friendship, family relations, and renewal of spousal relations in “immortal beauty.”[282] all of these references emphasize the social reality of personal existence, wherein remembrance of this world and its relationships is tied to the anticipation of perfection of relationships.

The logic of this social aspect of resurrection hope links resurrection reality to a vision of God’s remaking of the old or first creation (creatio ex vetera), so that, somehow, there is a transformation of the social and personal matrix in terms of its pattern of meaning, the memory of relationships, and the general purposive bearing in the forming and continuing of relationships of meaning and love.[283] Nursi intimates this when he states, “… think of how the parts of the universe are bound to one another with an exact, exalted order.”[284] again, we have the implication that if continuity of relationships matters, and this is linked to the environment of relationships, then transformation bearing some continuity with this world, and not utter newness, best characterizes the vision of god’s action. This is suggested in Nursi’s remarks.

 Resurrection and Time

The classic metaphysical idea of perfection as immutability corresponds, of course, to the notion of eternity as transcending time, even the cessation of time. however, the implication of our metaphors and picture-language about ultimate hope, so far discussed, calls this view of perfection into question. if the images we bring into ultimate fulfillment involve renewed relationships and not their absence, and if relationships involve action, and if time is the measure of motion (interaction), then it may be that the implication of our own images is that temporality is transformed into a kind of temporality we cannot imagine, but not into timelessness or immutability. This again is nothing more than reflecting on the implications of images which project our future hope.

Nursi, however, speaks of the permanent world as “unchanging” – a carryover most likely from the classic aristotelian ideal of perfection.[285] This poses a problem: if the “permanent” world is constituted in the perfection of goodness, mercy, wisdom, beauty and justice, as we find in the Tenth Word,[286] and we know these virtues only in relational interactions in the social domain which instantiate them, then how can there be perfection of these virtues without motion, without active relationships which realize, for example, justice? Thus the social imagery of action and interaction is invoked, and time, albeit transformed somehow, is brought into our conception of eternal life.

if, in contrast to the general bearing of the imagery mentioned above, we were to think of the essential self as a disembodied soul – a non-spatial reality of some sort – then there is no environment, there is no interaction, there is thus no relationship, and the nature of identity begins to take a mystical form about which we can say little or nothing at all. it is more likely to resemble the timeless absorption into the one, and not a differentiated unity of social community centered in adoration of god. The soul becomes an island – a solitary reality. relations dissolve, action concepts fall away, and time is no longer an essential category.

This apparent incompatibility between imagery and characterization of “perfection” respecting time, is no less a problem within the christian tradition. a disagreement on this point recently argued by Miroslav Volf, in contrasting his view with Jurgen Moltmann, indicates this problem in contemporary context.[287] But, as the imagery thus far suggests, personal identity is shaped in relationship, instantiated in action, and action is temporal. resurrection represents the possibility of continuity of identity across the discontinuities of transformation. it is compelling, then, to see temporality (the perfection of time) as implicated in utterances about resurrection. indeed this distinction between: 1) resurrection and “everlastingness,” on the one hand, and 2) immortality and “eternity as timelessness,” on the other hand, is part of what gives theological traction to the idea of resurrection.

 Resurrection, Heaven and Hell

Finally I raise the sensitive matter of the vision of God’s final action as the creation of two possible destinies. This is not only the revealed position on which Nursi comments, but also the majority position within christianity.

Nursi

Nursi, as with many monotheists, finds the oneness of this world a sign of God’s oneness.[288] Yet – and herein lies the difficulty – the destiny of all things must refer to two worlds: paradise and hell. if god creates one world from many things, and this indicates god’s own unity (whereas the world’s multiplicity would otherwise intimate polytheism), then the suggestion of a two-world destiny would intimate two gods. now this is clearly not Nursi’s conclusion, so we must, of course, assume he sees this line of thought against the background of many other threads of reasoning which support monotheism and two end-states. But there is a troubling aspect to be dealt with in his introduction to The Words. To give eternal status to a realm of evil it is, in effect or practice, difficult to distinguish from a metaphysic that affirms good and evil principles as ultimate metaphysical poles.

one sees both the impulse toward such a vision, and the dangers in it. about the former, if in this existence i act in such a way that i become a vile character, locked in habituated self-centeredness, prone to consumption and violence, then even if God did forgive this disgracing of His will, it is difficult to imagine what it would mean for me to retain my identity while being transformed and made fit for God’s eternal kingdom. In the context of continuity/discontinuity implied in resurrection, how can it be the same me if one strips away the core of what constituted my transitory self: self-centeredness, violence and consumption? Thus we can imagine the claim that this very hour we are shaping our eternal destinies in decisive ways, in the grand symmetry of divine justice. Nursi does not make this argument with much force, although it is clearly there. rather, what seems at stake for him as the reason for maintaining an ultimate state of eternal punishment is the reverence or obedience we owe to god. he asserts that no matter whether the human being is finite in knowledge and will, and therefore vulnerable to error and misdeeds, he or she nevertheless has the command to honor, praise and worship god through the manner of living. Mercy toward the weak or disobedient person has no significance when juxtaposed against the offense to the infinite majesty of the One against whom the person has sinned. In other words, the finite and vulnerable status of the offender (for which one might expect compassion) matters less than the infinite status of the One offended. This bears resemblance to the calculus of anselm in his defense of satisfaction theory of atonement. The offense against god’s honor, and therefore against divine justice, can only be is resolved by payment greater than finite agents can render.

Nursi also reasons that punishment realizes the great scale of justice and provides for a moral symmetry which cannot be achieved in this life, especially when one considers moral atrocities, the apparently unscathed status of perpetrators, and the unanswered suffering of victims in this world. [289] since these things cannot be a just god’s ultimate will, there must be a way to resolve the moral imbalance beyond this life. a god without judgment would make a lie out of this being a moral universe.

The argument, so far as it goes, is compelling. But it leads to the theological question any monotheist must face: Why would an all powerful god create what god will eventually lose, or be eternally alienated from? in other words, does not the very existence of hell as an ultimate state represent a defeat of god?

To this theological problem we may add a logical one: if the construction of our persons and our relations now is continuous with an eternal existence, and we are inextricably linked as social creatures, then some of these personal identities and the social relations which partly constitute them, will in principle be split into two destinies. Thus, there is the specter of being cut off from, and not transformed along with, part of the environment in which personal identities are constituted.

Finally, we may name a moral problem with the two-destinies view. This takes us back to motivating principles which drive our pursuit of ultimate things. The prospect of Hell might easily lock the finite agent in a cycle of self-concern: fear of punishment, desire for reward, and imaginings of eternal pleasures which make the goal self-reflexive. The danger is that the motivations of fear and need for reward do not, as such, direct the mind and heart toward the good but toward the self. This need not be the case, but it is a danger. another moral danger is to collapse future end-states into the present and to exact punishments now to those one is convinced are deserving of god’s punishment.

 A Christian Perspective

This topic is clearly a problematic one for christians as well. in fact, as stated above, the majority view probably sides with Nursi in asserting two end-states, heaven and hell, as ultimate in some sense.

The apostle Paul, intimates that nothing in god’s creation will be lost, but he is not entirely clear about the matter.[290] and the christian biblical picture as a whole is ambiguous enough to open the door to two options. The synoptic gospels, for example, each contain references to hell as if one would take it for granted that it is the destiny of those who do not believe.[291] Briefly stated, both options have well established roots – the two-destinies position (heaven and hell) and the universalist (the idea that all of god's creation is transformed into creatureliness in communion with god) – so that one's perspective on the topic depends on how one reads the total bearing or force of the tradition's message.

 A Personal View – Siding with Universalism

one can make the reasonable case that if our embodied existence is inextricably linked with the social and natural environment, as suggested above, then it becomes difficult to separate aspects of this world which constitute one ultimate reality, hell, from aspects which constitute another ultimate reality, eternal paradise. each of us, even the most righteous, knows his or her moral dark side – the moral failures and unfinished business. The spiritual point is that each of us embodies a mixture of moral goodness and moral evil or sin. even good intentions in this world may contribute to unjust ends. Moral life and obedience to god is ambiguous, and not as straightforward as it seems because personal morality cannot be separated from flaws social structures which have injustices embedded in them.

Thus, when we anticipate god eventually dividing this existence between heaven and hell, we risk the danger of projecting this division back into history: that is, projecting evil onto the other, goodness onto ourselves, and rationalizing violence in god's name. We risk the illusion of innocence, when in our enlightened moments we recognize a morally and spiritually ambiguous reality, in which we can not separate our good intentions from our involvement in institutions of injustice. Anyone with money in the bank, or who pays taxes, knows this firsthand.

Two twentieth-century christian theologians, whose work spanned some of the same years as Nursi's career, embed their understanding of divine judgment within a final transformation of all things into a single reality.

Moltmann, for example, leans on the message that all things will be united in christ, which is found in the Pauline letters to the ephesians and colossians, as evidence that this universalist stream is evident from the church's origins, at least among some.[292] in universalist perspective god's judgment-forgiveness-transformation are conflated into a single action, such that all persons face their darkness in the light of God's mercy and find it at once painful and healing. This penultimate step of judgment-forgiveness-transformation leads finally to an ultimate life with God as a single pleroma of god's transformed creation in a more transparent communion with god.

In the alternative, two-destinies picture, judgment and final destiny merge into a single action. Judgment renders either eternal punishment or eternal reward. The judgment of one's disobedience, in this view, is ultimate. it cannot cleanse. rather, it realizes and amplifies human freedom to destroy eternally God's own desire for human beings.

Morally speaking, the universalist vision circles back with the following ethical implication: in anticipation of the transformation of all things there is urgency to enter just relations with all things now, because they have been determined to have eternal worth. its weakness is the tendency of moral and spiritual lethargy: if there is no ultimate symmetry on the scale of justice, could it not lead to the cynic's despair?

The two-destinies vision leads to a sense of moral urgency now. god holds in memory our every action. its weakness is twofold. First it tends to center spiritual motivation in self-concern – fear of hell and desire for reward. second, it tends to project divine judgment back into history, determining god's friends and enemies, and engaging in actions of "justified violence" in God's name.

regarding this latter weakness, we have reason to worry about the extremes in each tradition. There is an inclination among some christians in the u.s. to prepare for apocalyptic end times, including spiritually pitched battles of good against evil. and of course, they see themselves as on the side of the good against some faithless enemy. Violence under this banner is rationalized, even divinized, contrary to the peaceable kingdom which is at the heart of Jesus' own message. This outlook is in many respects profoundly dissonant with the moral core of the story of Jesus, which christians receive as revelatory of god's nature.

and, in islam, Nursi would have known in his own day the dangers lurking in the background of false motivation – expectations about the end of history which motivate zealotry – contrary to the theme of mercy in the Qur'an, which Nursi so relentlessly pronounced in his writings.

 In Conclusion

i have found the comparative task, centered on Nursi's Tenth and Twenty-ninth

Words, a wonderful opportunity for reflection on themes dear to both Islam and christianity. My goal has been to draw out implications from the imagery employed in reference to resurrection. one hopes that the essay bears witness to how insights from another tradition can enhance the understanding one has of one's own tradition. as stated from the outset, the goal of such dialogue need not be to agree, but more modestly to discover new things which expand one's understanding of prior convictions, allowing one to enter more richly into one's own path.

 8. The resurrection of the dead: Said Nursi and Jürgen Moltmann

Leo D. Lefebure

The theologies of the resurrection of the dead proposed by Said Nursi and Jürgen Moltmann are grounded in the scriptures of their respective traditions;

they also reflect the experiences and contexts of their lives. Both Nursi and Moltmann lived through oppressive political regimes that persecuted devout believers. Both witnessed the powerful ambiguous effects of modern Western culture, with its objectification of nature, its scientific breakthroughs and its unprecedented destructive power. Both were captured on the battlefield and were held as prisoners of war; both survived disastrous military defeats that led to the dismemberment of the reigning political structures. after realizing that their lives could not continue in their formerly accustomed paths, both went through profound personal crises that eventually led them to a deep faith in god despite the massive violence and suffering of history and the danger of tyrannical regimes. Faith in the resurrection from the dead offered both thinkers a way of affirming belief in God's justice even in historical and political contexts where injustice prevailed. Both have had widespread influence in shaping the attitudes of believers towards concrete social and political issues in this world.

This chapter examines the ways in which Nursi and Moltmann each experienced a profound personal and spiritual transformation. it will note their recognition of the ambiguities of modern Western culture and the role of belief in the resurrection of the dead in responding to these. it will then compare and contrast their understandings of faith in the resurrection of the dead.

 Spiritual Transformations in a World of Death early in his life, Nursi was intimately involved with political issues, including the debates over a constitution for the ottoman empire; and he served as a regimental commander of a militia during World War i, eventually was captured by the russian army and spent time as a prisoner of war. The defeat of the ottoman empire led to its dismemberment and, a few years later, its dissolution. The concrete governmental structures that Nursi had worked to reform were no more. The sultanate and the caliphate would soon be abolished by Mustafa Kemal ataturk, ending the centuries-old claims of the ottomans to lead the islamic community.

The victors saw their conquest as a defeat of islam itself, and Nursi was shaken by the report that the British empire was seeking to destroy islam. The new secular Turkish republic sought to be radically different from the ottoman heritage, and before long it was severely restricting the range of religious activity.

during 1920 and 1921, in the wake of the massive destruction of World War i and with the prospect of the demise of the ottoman empire, Nursi went through a personal crisis centering on “the contemplation of death.”[293] he withdrew from most of his normal activities, pursuing a spiritual quest that eventually led to a deep personal transformation. The world that he had known was being drastically transformed. Nursi later looked back on this period:

at a time this poor said was trying to emerge from the old said, his intellect and heart were floundering among truths in a terrible spiritual storm resulting from lack of a guide and the pride of his evil-commanding soul. ... and when, at the time on that spiritual journeying i saw myself under awesome pressure overwhelmed by truly burdensome loads, i followed the matters of the Practices [of the Prophet (PBuh)] touching on that situation, i experienced a lightness as though all my burdens were being lifted from me. Through submitting to them, i was saved from doubts and scruples, that is, from anxieties like: “is such a course of action right, is it beneficial, I wonder?” Whenever I drew back my hand, I looked and saw that the pressure was intense. ... The load was heavy, and i was utterly powerless. My view was short, and the way, dark. Whenever i adhered to the Practices of the Prophet (PBuh), the way was lit up and seen to be safe.[294]

Nursi went through a particularly frightening awareness of death: “at one time, i saw myself in a strange world resulting from a state of mind produced by contemplating death and affirming the propositions ‘Death is a reality,’ and from the transience and passing of the world, i saw myself as a corpse standing at the head of three huge corpses.”[295] While in distress, he contemplated a verse from the Qur’an: “But if they turn away, say: ‘God suffices me, there is no god but He; in him do i place my trust—he the sustainer of the Throne [of glory] supreme!”[296] The verse served Nursi “like a safe and trusty boat,” and he discovered an allusive meaning in addition to its explicit meaning: “Say: Almighty God suffices me. Since he exists, everything exists. so those who have departed have not gone to nonexistence; they have departed for another of his realms.”[297] In light of this confident assurance of a life hereafter, Nursi commented, “the three awesome corpses which filled me with terror took on another form. They became a wisdom-displaying passage, an instructive excursion, a journeying for the performance of duties, a demobilization and a charging with duties, whereby the universe is shaken up, and comes and goes.”[298]

Şükran Vahide comments: “His contemplation of death set him off on an inner journey or spiritual quest that he depicted as a journey through the earth. The subterranean tunnel down which he traveled, and then the suffocating desert, were metaphors for ‘the way of philosophy.’ he only reached the light and truth through ‘manifestations of the all-Wise Qur’an.”[299] on the other side of this period, he would describe himself as “the new Nursi.” no longer would he take an active role in governmental structures or military campaigns. he served rather as a religious leader, interpreting the Qur’an through the Risale-i Nur, which he described as coming through him rather than as being his own creation. he represented and embodied the Muslim heritage of Turkey, resisting the efforts of ataturk’s secularists to circumscribe and control islam. his followers would circulate his writings for many years at great personal danger of arrest and imprisonment. Nursi himself would be repeatedly arraigned in courts and would spend time in jail for his heroic witness to his faith.

Nursi conceived the project of explaining essential islamic beliefs, including the resurrection of the dead, to the ordinary faithful. at the time, he had recently been exiled to Barla, a remote village in the mountains of southwestern Turkey.[300] Mustafa Kemal ataturk and his followers were rapidly seeking to modernize, secularize, and Westernize Turkey; the removal of Islamic influence from the public sphere was an integral part of their program. Nursi, as one of the most influential Muslim intellectuals of his generation, constituted a significant obstacle to their program.[301] even though he had repeatedly refused to support armed insurrections against the Kemalist government, the ruling party deeply distrusted him and resented his influence. Ironically, exile to a remote, mountainous village, would provide him with eight and a half years in which he could pray, reflect, and dictate writings on the Qur’an to his students. What emerged is the Risale-i Nur.

The context of Nursi’s life during the time of the Risale-i Nur was most difficult, due to repeated persecution by the Turkish governmental authorities. Confidant belief in the resurrection of the dead offered him and his followers a way to maintain their faith despite great adversity. According to Şerif Mardin, the audience of Nursi “seems to have consisted primarily of persons from the provincial periphery who were seeking a means of coming to terms with the disenchantment of the world, and who had a perception of the new world, even though through the prism of their provincial Muslim culture.”[302] Mardin explains: “in Said Nursi’s case, an innovation such as the propagation of a clear understanding of the foundations of islam to the masses was a ‘coming to terms’ with a world-historical process which went beyond the tradition he had inherited.”[303] Nursi’s eloquence and courage inspired countless followers.

 Jürgen Moltmann

Moltmann grew up in a german family that had long since rejected christian faith. his early heroes included Max Planck, albert einstein, goethe and nietzsche. as an adolescent during World War ii, he served in an anti-aircraft unit. during an air raid on hamburg during July, 1943, a companion standing near him was killed instantly, while Moltmann was thrown into the water without being injured.[304] he later recalled that moment: “But in that catastrophic night, for the first time in my life I cried out to God, ‘God where are you?’ That was my question in the face of death.”[305] later, when he was in the regular german army, Moltmann was captured and sent to great Britain as a prisoner of war. during the summer of 1945, the British began to post pictures of the victims of the Holocaust. At first Moltmann and his companions thought it was deceitful British propaganda. gradually, it sank into him what the nazis had done to Jews and other persecuted groups, and he went into a profound personal crisis. all meaning in life vanished. goethe and nietzsche no longer had anything to say to him. Many of the British reached out to the german prisoners, seeking to avoid the mistakes made after World War i, treating the former combatants with a kindness that shamed the german prisoners. The British hoped to establish a basis for future friendly relations with their former enemies through education and training.

Toward the end of 1945, a chaplain gave Moltmann a Bible; and the young prisoner began to read through it, being impressed by the stark anguish expressed in the psalms of lament. one night he came upon the passage in the gospel of Mark where Jesus prays from the cross: “My god, my god, why have you abandoned me?” (Mark 15:34) Moltmann was deeply moved by the image of the son of god knowing what it felt like to be abandoned by god. he came to believe that this meant that god is involved in the worst depths of human suffering. if god knows what it is like to be abandoned by god, then god is present in the suffering of all the oppressed and the seemingly godforsaken throughout history. Moltmann came to the beginning of hope. “i began to understand the christ who was assailed by god and suffered from god, because i felt that he understood me. That gave me new courage to live.”[306]

Moltmann later drew two lessons from this experience:

First, I discovered that in every end a new beginning lies hidden. It will find you if you look for it. don’t lose heart.

second, i found that if one gathers the courage to live again, the chains begin to smart, but the pain is better than the dull resignation in which nothing matters, and one is more dead than alive.[307]

after he was released in 1948, Moltmann studied theology and became a professor at one of germany’s most prestigious universities in Tübingen. he dedicated much of his career to interpreting the mystery of god’s presence in human suffering. While his personal and professional life was much more sheltered and secure than Nursi’s, he always kept in mind the terrible sufferings of the oppressed and the poor and consistently attempted to do theology with their situations in mind. he would become arguably the most influential European theologian for the development of theologies of liberation in latin america and around the world.

 The Ambiguities of Modernity and the Resurrection of the Dead living through horrendously destructive wars, severe military defeats, widespread social dislocation, the destruction of earlier political structures and the creation of new political forms of governance, both Said Nursi and Jürgen Moltmann recognized the profound ambiguities of modern Western culture. Scientific and technological improvements offered enhanced styles of life at least for the wealthy but also vastly more efficient means of destruction. Nursi and Moltmann personally witnessed and participated in massive conflicts that devoured millions upon millions of combatants and civilians alike, including countless innocent victims. The traditional religious heritages of both germany and Turkey were profoundly challenged and shaken by their respective military defeats, by Western secularism, and the question of god's role in a world of overwhelming suffering and death. Many in germany and Turkey would abandon faith in god. Both in the resolutions of their personal crises and in their mature theologies, Moltmann and Nursi would turn more to their respective scriptures than to philosophical modes of argument for guidance. Both sought to present their respective faiths in a way that their contemporaries could appreciate, while remaining profoundly wary of the destructive aspects of modernity.

For both thinkers, belief in resurrection of the dead offered a basis for hope even in a world of overwhelming injustice and pain. Walter Benjamin had posed the famous question: "Will the executioner triumph forever over his victim?" For both Nursi and Moltmann, the eschatological judgment of god assures a negative response.

 The Resurrection of the Dead

Said Nursi based his view of the resurrection on the Qur'an, at times quoting one sura after another in support of his perspective and asserting that about one-third of the Qur'an concerns the resurrection.[308] Nursi saw his entire work in the Risale i-Nur as the Qur'an interpreting itself for the twentieth century, declining to claim it as his personal creation. he frequently proposed original parables to illuminate the significance of the Qur'anic message. In 1954 Nursi recalled receiving an inspiration about how to understand the resurrection of the dead and the life of the world to come:

it was about thirty years ago and just this season. i was walking through these orchards with the almond trees all in blossom when suddenly the verse "so think on the signs of god's mercy, how he gives life to the earth after its death; indeed, he it is who will give life to the dead, and he is powerful over all things" (Qur'an, 30:50) came to mind. its meaning became clear to me that day. i was both walking and repeating it over and over again at the top of my voice. i recited it forty times. In the evening I returned and together with Samli Hafiz Tevlik wrote the Tenth Word. That is, I dictated and Hafiz Tevlik wrote it down.[309]

Nursi sharply rejected the positivist and materialist forms of modern science that he studied early in his life; he frequently looked to order and beauty of the natural world as a sign of god's wisdom and providential care, which would provide the foundation for his presentation of the resurrection of the dead:

similarly, each day and each week of the spring is like a festival for each class of the vegetable kingdom, and each class presents itself to the witnessing gaze of the Pre-eternal Monarch with the jeweled decorations. ... such wise and wellordered arrangement and ornament demonstrates of a certainty, to all who are not blind, that they derive from the command of a monarch infinite in power and unlimited in wisdom.[310]

in sharp contrast to the marvelous beauty and order of the natural world, human experience is consistently disordered and unjust. Nursi resolved this tension through the doctrine of the resurrection, the final judgment and the world to come: "There must in addition be a realm of punishment appropriate to god's glory and dignity. For generally the oppressor leaves this world while still in possession of his might, and the oppressed while still subjected to humiliation. These matters are therefore deferred for the attention of a supreme tribunal."[311]

To illustrate this belief, Nursi proposed a parable of two travelers going through “a land as beautiful as Paradise (by that land, we intend the world).”[312] They marveled that people leave their doors open and their money and property unguarded. one traveler began to steal everything that he could, doubting that any authority would enforce justice. The other person warned him of a just judgment in another world, noting that every day caravans depart and vanish: “soon the whole land will be changed; its inhabitants will depart for another and more lasting realm. There everyone will be either rewarded or punished in accordance with his services.”[313] The thief professed disbelief that this could happen, whereupon his interlocutor retorted: “look at the organization and administration of this kingdom! see how everyone, including the poorest and the weakest, is provided with perfect and ornate sustenance. The best care is taken of the sick.”[314] nonetheless, the speaker continued, all too often justice is lacking and wrongdoers go unpunished: “The oppressor retains his power, and the oppressed, his humiliation as they both depart and migrate from this realm. ... But here in this land, not a thousandth part of the requirements of such wisdom and justice is fulfilled; for example, emptyheaded people such as yourself usually leave this realm unpunished. so again we say, matters are postponed for the consideration of a supreme Tribunal.”[315]

Frequently Nursi expressed his views in rhetorical questions that imply only one response is reasonable: “now is it at all possible that the justice and wisdom that hasten to relieve the pettiest need of the smallest of creation should fail to provide immortality, the greatest need of man, the greatest of creatures? That it should fail to respond to his greatest plea and cry for assistance? or that it should not preserve the dignity of god’s dominicality by preserving the rights of his servants?”[316]

now is it at all possible that an all-Wise and all-Preserving Being, who does not neglect the most banal doings of the lowest of his subjects should not record the most significant deeds of the greatest among his subjects, should not call them to account, should not reward and punish them? after all, it is those foremost among his subjects that perform deeds offensive to his glory, contrary to his pride and unacceptable to his compassion, and those deeds remain unpunished in this world. it must be, therefore, that their judgment is postponed to a supreme court.[317]

From this vantage point, Nursi has harsh words for those who reject the resurrection of the dead:

o denier! do you know how foolish a crime you are committing with your unbelief and denial? Paying heed to your own lying fancy, your delirious intellect, your deceptive soul, you reject as a liar one Who in no way can be compelled to the breaking of his promise, Whose glory and stature can in no way admit the breaking of his word, and Whose truthfulness and veracity are attested by all visible matters and objects! Despite your infinite pettiness, you are committing a crime of infinitely great proportions. Without doubt you deserve great and eternal punishment.[318]

Nursi frequently uses the words “prove” and “proof” regarding this teaching. For example, he claims that events in the life of the prophet Muhammad “prove” the teaching of the resurrection: “all the miracles indicating the Messengership of Muhammad (Peace and blessings be upon him) and the evidences for his prophethood, and all the proofs of his veracity, together testify to the occurrence of the resurrection and prove it. For after the divine unity, everything he claimed throughout his life was centered on the resurrection of the dead.”[319] he also argues that the Qur’an itself proves the resurrection and that earlier scriptures had contained the teaching in a veiled manner:

Moreover, by their definite acceptance of the truth of resurrection, which the Qur’an—prevailing over the future and all times—repeatedly proves in detail and elucidates, all the revealed scriptures and sacred books, each of which dominated a particular period, proved it according to their own times and centuries, but in un-detailed, veiled, and summary manner, confirming with a thousand signatures what the Qur’an teaches.[320]

however, Nursi does not offer the type of philosophical, metaphysical reasoning that is usually designated “proof” in Western philosophy and christian systematic theology.

 Jürgen Moltmann

Moltmann never claimed that the Bible was interpreting itself through his theology, but from his early work, The Theology of Hope, to the present, the Jewish and christian scriptures have provided the basis and all-pervading context for his theology. The early theology of Moltmann, which appeared in the 1960s, reflected the trauma of Europe in the mid-twentieth century. Christian hope in the resurrection does not flow from any goodness experienced in this world but comes in stark contrast to the experience of suffering: “hope’s statements of promise, however, must stand in contradiction to the reality which can at present be experienced. They do not result from experiences, but are the condition for the possibility of new experiences. They do not seek to illuminate the reality which exists, but the reality which is coming.”[321] he quotes Paul’s statement that “We are saved by hope. But hope that is seen is not hope (rom 8.24).”[322] Moltmann concludes that christian hope in the new Testament “brands the visible realm of present experience as a god-forsaken, transient reality that is to be left behind. The contradiction to the existing reality of himself and his world in which man is placed by hope is the very contradiction out of which this hope itself is born—it is the contradiction between the resurrection and the cross.”[323] it is the resurrection of Jesus and his post-resurrection appearances to selected followers and to saul on the road to damascus that open up the christian hope in the resurrection of the dead and eternal life.

in what is arguably the most important difference from Nursi’s perspective, Moltmann sees christian faith in the resurrection as inseparably linked to the crucifixion of Jesus. The mainstream Muslim tradition believes that Jesus was not crucified, in accordance with Qur’an 4:158: “They did not kill him, they did not crucify him, it was made to appear so to them.” For Moltmann, by contrast, faith in the Risen Lord is faith in the Crucified One. As Moltmann argues: “The risen christ is the historical and crucified Jesus, and vice versa.”[324] Moltmann sees the appearances of the risen lord Jesus and the outpouring of the holy spirit as the decisive events that transformed the followers of Jesus from a small, frightened band into a fearless community. he stresses how decisive the resurrection of Jesus was for the early church: “The union of Jesus with god and of god with Jesus was constituted for it [the early church] by that event which it originally and—as we shall see—rightly called ‘the resurrection of Jesus’. The first creeds that we know speak of ‘Jesus the lord’, and of ‘god who has raised him from the dead’ (rom. 10:6; 1 cor. 15:1), in the same breath.”[325] The new Testament does not describe the moment of the resurrection itself but only the discovery of the empty tomb and the later appearances of the risen lord. Moltmann notes that christians never see the resurrection itself but only the crucified and risen one: “As a process and as an event, the resurrection was so to speak a light into which it was impossible to look directly. it was necessary to look at the one whom it illuminated and manifested, and that was none other than Jesus, the crucified.”[326] according to Moltmann, the effects of the resurrection of Jesus reach out to transform the entire world: “his resurrection was not regarded as a fortuitous miracle in an unchangeable world, but as the beginning of the eschatological transformation of the world by its creator… . Therefore his historical crucifixion was understood as the eschatological event of judgment and his resurrection as a hidden anticipation of the eschatological kingdom of glory in which the dead will be raised.”[327] later, in awareness of the ecological crisis, Moltmann charged that the scientific objectification of nature had led to the exploitation of nature; instead, he proposed a vision of creation as the dwelling place of god and as being drawn by god’s spirit toward reconciliation in an eschatological, “eternal sabbath, in which the whole creation will find bliss.”[328]

For Moltmann, the crucifixion and resurrection of Jesus are a profound challenge to received notions of god as unaffected by events in the temporal world. “god represents and reveals himself in the surrender of Jesus and in his passion and death on the cross… . in the death of the son, death comes upon god himself, and the Father suffers the death of his son in his love for forsaken man… . he is acting in himself in this manner of suffering and dying in order to open up in himself life and freedom for sinners.”[329] Moltmann’s Trinitarian interpretation of the death and resurrection of Jesus is another significant difference from Nursi.

another noteworthy divergence concerns the ultimate fate of sinners. Where Nursi presents the resurrection of the dead as leading to reward for the just and eternal punishment for sinners, Moltmann sees resurrection as a process leading to the eventual reconciliation of all human beings and the entire cosmos: “The life we have lived will be absorbed into the eternal livingness and preserved there. But does that lead to the eternalization of all our misdeeds and sufferings? ‘resurrection’ always also means transformation (1 cor. 15.52), the forgiveness of sins and the putting right of what was wrong, the consoling of grief and the wiping away of the tears.”[330] in the early third century c.e., the early church father origen had expressed the confidant hope that in the end-time, all spiritual creatures would be saved, including the devil. augustine and most of the Western christian tradition has rejected this belief, expecting that at the last Judgment some humans would be damned to eternal suffering in hell.[331] Moltmann offers his own perspective by reflecting on the descent of Jesus into hell (1 Peter 3:19–20):

What we call the last Judgment is nothing other than the universal revelation of Jesus christ, and the consummation of his redemptive work… . no punishments of eternal death will be imposed… . The Christian doctrine about the restoration of all things denies neither damnation nor hell. on the contrary: it assumes that in his suffering and dying christ suffered the true and total hell of godforsakenness for the reconciliation of the world and experienced for us the true and total damnation of sin. it is precisely here that the divine reason for the reconciliation of the universe is to be found. it is not the optimistic dream of a purified humanity, it is Christ’s descent into hell that is the ground for the confidence that nothing will be lost.[332]

 Concluding Reflections

After coming through extremely difficult personal and spiritual trials, Nursi and Moltmann both came to a mature faith that could reflect on God’s presence even in a world of massive suffering. Both thinkers sharply reject the positivist objectification of nature proposed by some forms of modern Western culture; both share a similar faith in the goodness and glory of god manifesting itself in creation. They also agree in seeing much of human history as warped and tormented by sin, as a rejection of the goodness of god in creation. For both theologians, belief in the resurrection of the dead offers a response to the charge of modern atheism that an all-powerful, all-good god would be unjust for allowing the suffering of innocent victims. Nursi sees this world as a testing ground, a temporary abode from which caravans are constantly departing to another world, where a supreme Tribunal will deliver just eternal rewards and punishments. Much of the christian tradition has shared the expectation of a last Judgment leading to either eternal happiness or suffering. Moltmann, however, trusts that the love and mercy of god lead god into hell itself. since Jesus has descended into hell, Moltmann believes that god is present even to the god-forsaken, to the perpetrators of severe crimes; they too in the end-time will be forgiven and reconciled with god, with those they wronged in this life, and with the entire created world.

There is also an important difference in rhetorical style. Nursi proposes various “proofs” of the resurrection of the dead, though he never offers the rigorous mode of argumentation that Western philosophy considers logically compelling. There may be a question of the appropriateness of this translation for Western readers. Moltmann believes that one cannot prove the christian hope in the resurrection; it is a matter of faith based on the revelation of god in Jesus christ. The only verification will be eschatological.

 9. The Problem of animal Pain: an introduction to Nursi’s approach

Cüneyt M. Şimsek

“The Problem of animal Pain,” which is studied in the context of “the Problem of evil,” has consistently been one of the issues discussed among the members of major religions such as Judaism, christianity and islam, where the belief in the existence of a god who is omniscient, omnipotent, and wholly good has a central place in the fundamentals of belief. When we look at islamic traditions, we see that the issue has been dealt with in the framework of the concepts of “observing the best,” “compensation” and “retaliation” and in relation to “divine justice.” some of the solutions suggested throughout history for the “problem of evil,” undoubtedly, are valid for “animal pain” as well. however, even though “animal pain” shares in essence certain characteristics with the “problem of evil,” it is partly different from the latter in terms of some of its special features. in this article I will first define the problem, then mention some solutions suggested in the literature of Kalām and finally try to demonstrate some aspects of Nursi’s views on this issue stated in Risale-i Nur Collection, his magnum opus.

 A. Definition of the Problem of “Animal Pain” in this world not only human beings but also animals are exposed to evil situations. There are countless numbers of animals killed mercilessly by people, tortured and used in painful medical experiments, killed in natural disasters, and torn atrociously (in appearance) into pieces by wild animals. The misfortunes befalling man can be tolerated by relating them to acceptable reasons such as worldly examination, reward in the next world, and moral development, but how will the misfortunes happening to animals be explained? When animals are being discussed, the questions coming to the mind will naturally be different from those asked in relation to the human evils. some questions that can be asked are as follows:

do animals feel pain and sorrow during misfortunes and hardships? if they do, is it similar to what man feels or is it different in essence? is there any purpose in animal pain and sorrow as there are with human beings (such as spiritual development, moral improvement and other universal instances of good)? do animals have free will and are they responsible for their actions? Will there be an eternal life for them in the other world where reward or punishment will take place?[333]

The questions mentioned above can be answered from different perspectives. There have been attempts in history both by Muslim and non-Muslim scholars. similarly the author of the Risale-i Nur Collection, Nursi, touches on the above mentioned questions in some of his works and suggests some solutions. it will be appropriate first to give a brief summary of how the problem has been dealt with in the islamic history.

 B. A Summary of the Problem of “Animal Pain” in Islamic Thought

Besides the “problem of evil,” suffering both by small children and animals (īlām) has been discussed by islamic scholars as well. The concepts of “compensation” (‘ivāz) and “retaliation” (qis□ās)[334] are especially worth of attention. as is known, the sunni scholars claim that “observing the best” (as□lah□), creating the best for the interest of the created is not an obligation for God and they find it possible and reasonable that god’s servants, even if they are innocent, suffer in this world without any compensation in the next world.[335] Furthermore, according to sunnis, if god torments his servants without any compensation, this can never be considered as tyranny, because tyranny is in question only in the case of an unfair conduct in relation to somebody else’s property. since all property and the domain of existence belong to god, none of god’s conduct toward his creatures can be specified as tyranny.[336] sunni scholars generally accept that a sort of “retaliation” will be executed in case of animals’ tormenting each other.[337] on the other hand, most of the Mu’tazilites, regarding “not observing the best”[338] as ugly and as a requirement of “justice,”[339] (one of their five basic principles), consider [īlām], giving pain to animals without “compensation,” as unacceptable.[340] While some of the Mu’tazilites state that animals suffering in the world will receive a sort of “compensation,”[341] they do not agree on whether this is a possibility or a necessity for god. on the other hand there are some Mu’tazilites who claim that animals, after receiving their “compensation,” will be used as an instrument of tormenting the people of hell, as well as some who say that animals will be annihilated after resurrection and judgement. some Mu’tazilites claim that “compensation” in the next world will continue forever. Just as there are some Mu’tazilites who argue for the existence of “retaliation” in return for the cruel actions animals afflict on each other, there are those who believe that nothing of this sort will happen.[342]

Al-Taftāzānī (A.D. 1322–89), one of the Sunni scholars who deals with this issue, declares that god may make animals suffer, but this will happen only with a “retaliation.” in relation to “retaliation,” after quoting the hadith: “all the rights will be turned back to their holders and even, retaliation will be made for the hornless sheep on the horned on the resurrection day,”[343] al-Taftāzānī, argues that the “retaliation” in the hereafter does not depend on the imposition of religious obligations (taklīf) and the ability to distinguish between right and wrong[344] (tamyīz), and he deduces that even a small child receives his right from another child or person. however, considering that animals have no “reasoning,” the author does not mention on what the responsibility be based.[345]

When generally evaluating what sunni scholars say concerning the animal pain, we may come up the following points: 1) all property completely belongs to god, and he is free to do whatever he likes with his property. Therefore god can never be qualified with tyranny. 2) God conducts all of his affairs in the best and most useful way, away from absurdity. Therefore animal pain, similar to human evils, serves well-being, health, strength and perfection, or the minor evil is compensated with a payment incomparable with the evil.[346] 3) Finally we understand that some Sunni theologians find too much discussion of the issue by the Mu’tazilites as improper. For instance Ghazālī talks about the Mu’tazilites’ claim that it is a necessity for god to resurrect and reward even insects for what they suffer in the world, apparently in a derisive way.[347]

 C. Nursi’s Approach to the Problem of Animal Pain

i will try to analyze some of the solutions Nursi proposes in his works concerning the problem of “animal pain or evil” under seven headings.

1. “The Purpose of Things” and “The Indicative Meaning”

“The purpose of things”[348] and “indicative meaning”[349] are two important concepts in relation to Nursi’s views in general and animal pain specifically. As Nursi frequently touches on the problem of evil and animal pain in general, he tries to explain the subject in relation to these two concepts. The concept of “indicative meaning” briefly expresses that things have no meaning and value in relation to themselves and that their real meanings and values are in their manifestation of god’s names and in carrying out their duties regarding the divine purposes.[350] on the other hand, the concept of “the purpose of things” explains what these duties are. in this context, Nursi examines the purposes of creatures under three categories:

(i) The purposes regarding god as the manifestations of divine names and demonstrations of divine attributes

(ii) The purposes regarding intelligent beings who contemplate the arts of god inscribed on the created and the divine names seen in these arts and, thus, who recognize and love god, and

(iii) The purposes of beings such as the experience of pleasure, living in comfort, and surviving, which regard themselves.[351]

According to this categorization, ninety-nine percent of the purpose of life, as much as the amount of his limitless ownership, belongs to god. Merely one or a few of these purposes are related to living beings. on the other hand, according to Nursi, the minor purposes belonging to living beings and concerning their survival, interest and perfection are fulfilled over a long time, while the purposes regarding god are achieved instantly.[352] This approach, which relates the greatest purposes in the creation of things to the names and attributes of god, recognizes merely one percent of the purposes as those of “pleasure, comfort, survival,” which fall to the share of animals and living beings in life. Therefore animals, just like all the other creatures, labor not on their own account, but in the name of god who employs them,[353] since, to Nursi, essential rights (necessities) of life belong not to the creatures but to god.[354] Nursi gives an example about this subject: a man working in a big commercial ship has a share in the trade of this ship as much as the payment he will get in return for the job he does personally. But the main profit of the trade belongs to the owner of the ship. similarly each creature’s small interests and purposes in the ship of the earth are individual and insignificant. The essential and great purposes and universal uses pertain to purposes such as manifestations of the names and attributes of god. according to Nursi,[355] who connects the employment of animals and plants in the palace of the universe to the fact of god’s purpose of making himself known and beloved by his creatures, there are purposes and uses that are so exalted in their employment that sometimes even very distinguished scholars cannot comprehend them.[356] Nursi argues that the creation of small living beings, including plants, approaches abundance in their numbers and variety in their species within the framework of divine universal purposes mentioned above. Thus the small living beings, having being created abundantly and differently, become a wide domain for the administration of divine power and manifest most of the names and attributes of god. on the other hand, a purpose in the abundant, continuous creation of minute animals with short life spans is to provide for contemplation, appreciation and admiration on the part of thinking observers consisting of countless angels, jinns and human beings.[357] another purpose is that each creature expresses a different meaning, beauty and use, which is similar to different versions of a book.[358] To Nursi[359] who specifies the purposes of life within the categories mentioned above, the choice that best suits divine providence and eternal wisdom is the numerous creations of animals and plants. Finally, in Nursi's opinion, the creation of minute animals with short life spans abundantly and continuously gains additional significance when considered with respect to the last two points. as he writes, "the most perfect art is the one which places the big in the small with all its decoration."[360] This approach, which locates the idea of divine purposes at the center of the thought of goals, can be said to consider states such as hardships and troubles experienced by living beings as a necessary result of being used in various services for the fulfilment of divine purposes.

2. God has a "Special Mercy" and "Providence" for Everything

Nursi argues that the names of god are manifested in created things in two forms, namely Divine Unity and Divine Oneness. The manifestation of divine unity expresses the administration by god behind the curtain of the chain of cause-andeffect[361] and the universal laws current in the universe, which is a world perceived with senses (Ālem-i Mulk or Ālem-i Şehadet).[362] in this world, being a place where opposites take place, contrasting pairs of states such as beautiful-ugly, big and small, difficult and easy, benefit and harm, perfection and defect, light and darkness, light and fire, belief and unbelief, obedience and rebellion, and fear and love, and good-evil are seen together. In this respect, which is defined in Nursi’s words as “the outer face of life and events,” there are “grievous circumstances.”[363] The manifestation of Divine Oneness (Tawhīd), on the other hand, expresses the divine administrations which do not belong to cause-and-effect relationships and which are out of the monotonously running (regular) laws. Nursi calls this side of things as “the kingdom of Heaven” (Malakūt).[364] god, through this manifestation, treats his creatures[365] crying for help under the pressures of universal laws in this world, with his special providence and favours, outside of the current laws and causes. due to the flexible nature of realizations of laws depending on the will of God, Nursi states that each being has the opportunity of directly taking refuge in and appeal to god for each of its needs.[366] Nursi, who considers these special cases happening outside of the regular and universal laws as exceptions,[367] indicates that what is essentially current is the regular and universal continuation of laws, which make up the order of universe and the manifestations of the knowledge, will and power of god.[368] This approach focuses on the absolute, intentional and conscious manifestation of the names of god in the creation of things. This approach describes the cruel wheel of nature,[369] (which in appearance works with rigid and unchanging rules), the chain of cause-and-effect and the senseless, unconscious and imaginative but logically necessary laws as a flexible and changing painting under the decision, will, and decree of god, who dominates everything. even though, according to Nursi, there is, in front of our eyes, a regularly working order, an activity and a chain of creation based on the chain of cause-and-effect which apparently makes up this order, we cannot talk about an ontological existence of cause-and-effect relationships and current laws (which are the continuation of these relationships), whose nature resembles the laws of a constitution and has no external reality. Therefore, without the existence of angels, who represent and supervise these laws which are in fact “rational expressions” (al-i‘tibārāt al-‘aqlīya), they can not become sources of conscious affairs, divine performances and actions.[370] in conclusion, the laws and apparently effective causes are administered by god and god can change them whenever and however He wants. But Nursi at this point reminds us that flexibility in the laws will never take place in such clarity as to interfere with the worldly examination/trial and to oblige people to believe willingly or unwillingly.[371]

3. Animals have Duties, Reward and Punishment

Bediuzzaman presents a brief summary of how he perceives the whole world of beings in the Twenty-fourth Word. Before describing beings and their duties, he gives a short translation of a verse of the Qur'an which states that all beings worship god (Qur'an 22:18) and concludes that "their worship varies according to their capacities and the divine names that they manifest; it is all different."[372] Nursi who compares the universe we live in to a city or a splendid palace, explains that the owner of the universe employs angels, animals, plants and inanimate beings in building this city or palace and encourages them to worship and that "these four species have been charged with different kinds of worshipping."[373] he asserts that god employs these creatures in the building of the palace of universe not out of his need, since he is the creator of everything, but for "certain instances of wisdom, like the functioning of his might, sublimity, and dominion" and thus Nursi expresses that "in the realm of causality"[374] all creatures have been charged with various duties.[375] let us now look at what Nursi tells us about our subject, animals, putting aside the other three groups of creatures.

To Nursi, animals, "having an appetitive soul,"[376] naturally want a kind of reward for every job they do. Furthermore, Nursi draws a more general theoretical framework for this service-wage relationship and within this framework not only living creatures but also inanimate beings such as minerals, and atoms, in return for their services, receive some sort of "wage," as a requirement of divine mercy and wisdom.[377] Nursi bases his theoretical framework about the servicewage relationship[378] on the verse, "And His Mercy embraces all things." (Al-Isrā' 16:68) according to Nursi, god's responding to all actions and the services of each being he employs in the construction of universe, in the form of reward or punishment express a general law of his mercy dominant in the universe from atoms to the sun. on the other hand, to Nursi, in this world god has placed the reward for work within the work itself.[379] From this point of view, the wages in return for the services of animals, as they conform with complete obedience to the commands that bring them into existence, have been inserted into those services themselves in the form of "special pleasures," which continue as long as their services last.[380] Nursi declares that after the results demanded from the lives of creatures, which he describes as their "ceremonial parade,"[381] are obtained, god mercifully makes them "dislike" life, and makes it easy for them to leave the world by giving them a tendency to rest and an eagerness for migration to another world and thus gets them leave not with much disappointment, but even happily.[382] Moving from the principle that “activity is a sort of pleasure,”[383][] Nursi goes a step forward by claiming that every sort of activity that results in the transformation of the potential abilities of creatures into action is a sort of “pleasure.”[384] in Nursi’s opinion, “pleasure in activity” is a kind of “wage” paid to animate and inanimate creatures in return for their services in this world.[385] Besides this reward in advance inserted into the services by creatures, Nursi indicates another point: god grants a soldier dying during his duty, the rank of “martyrdom;” similarly god gives a sacrificed sheep, an “immortal material body” and rewards it by giving the rank of being “a mount for its owner on the Bridge of sirat.”[386] Nursi deduces from this picture the conclusion that animals and beings with spirits, while performing the dominical duties peculiar to their natures and in obeying the divine commands in this world, sometimes perish and suffer severe distress.[387] Bediuzzaman, by considering the fact that “a wisdom and a sovereignty which does not leave the smallest creature without a wage, recompense, and perfection in its duties,”[388] connects the framework of the wages that will be given to every creature with the divine wisdom. Therefore, he concludes that it is not far from logic that these unfortunate beings will be given a sort of “spiritual reward” and a kind of “wage” in accordance with their capacities from the inexhaustible treasuries of his mercy.[389]

From another point of view, Nursi’s approach to the service-wage relationship is based on the comparison between existence and non-existence. as is known, all people of wisdom unanimously agree that “existence” is absolutely good.[390] if existence ends up with death and annihilation,[391] that is, in the author’s words, “all living creatures, and the species of animals, which are worthy of existence, lovers of life, and desire permanent life”[392] are “torn up like rags and thrown away into the obscurity of nothingness,” then the good will turn into the evil and the blessing of existence into “a torment worse than death.”[393] however, since divine knowledge encompasses everything, for Nursi, absolute non-existence (adem-i mutlaq) is impossible.[394] on the other hand, Nursi, states that the divine names manifested within beings necessitate the availability of an eternal life for them.[395] Moreover, we can deduce that Nursi, who declares that the perfection of existence is through “life” and the perfection of life is through “continuation” and “eternity,”[396] may advocate the following approach: just like the existence of all creatures, the existence of animals too, has been preferred to their non-existence, and their bodies have been equipped with physical and spiritual skills and capacities appropriate to their duties in this world, have been given to them; and through this existence, which is decorated with life, perfection and good have become true. These creatures have received in advance their “wages” in return for their services, which already contain “enjoyment” and “pleasure” for them. in this case, even if their bodies are turned into soil, real goodness and perfection will still be accomplished for them, through the eternity of their souls which manifest perfection and beauty.[397] Thus we can mention three types of perfection for a being:

First: each being’s gaining “absolute perfection” by acquiring an absolute existence (that is passing from the realm of knowledge to this world which is the realm of power). every being, including animals, whose existence has been preferred to non-existence, was made to gain this perfection.

second: The “private perfection” of each being, which is achieved by being given an existence peculiar to each which raises its abilities from the potential to the actual.

Third: each being, no matter whether it exists in the knowledge of god and in the other worlds of existence[398] or is clothed with external existence, has a “real perfection” through possessing a “material or spiritual permanence”[399] and attaining everlasting manifestations of the name of eternal (al-Bākī) and the other divine names in the chambers of existence in the divine Knowledge such as the Preserved Tablet (al-lawh al-mahfūz).[400] as a result, Nursi, who touches on the topic of “material-spiritual wages” in return for the materialspiritual service, expresses that each creature will be given a sort of reward as it is a requirement of the universal manifestation of divine Mercy.[401] in our opinion, Nursi’s greatest contribution to the idea of animals’ wages and their reward in the next world is his discovery that all beings, including animals, in as much as they have innumerable sorts of existence in addition to this material and bodily existence, continue to live at various levels of life. For example, Nursi's idea that "even an insignificant flower, which has no spirit, when it ceases from external existence, manifests a sort of immortality in a thousand ways"[402] can be regarded as an original contribution. according to this idea, all creatures, even plants which are at the lowest level of life, attain many other kinds of existence through manifesting divine names in addition to their material and apparent existences. on the other hand, the effects of misfortunes and troubles befalling creatures are limited to their material and apparent existences but the fruits of and the purposes meant in those misfortunes, especially those regarding god, are permanently left in existence. since beauty and perfection, two attributes manifested through beings, originate from the divine names and these names are already everlasting and permanent, those beings, in Bediuzzaman's phrase, "are renewed in a spiritual permanency."[403] From this point of view, Nursi considers death and decline, which in appearance seems like the greatest misfortune, trouble and evil, as a "journey" in the chambers of the divine names and attributes, and as a transfer from one state to another. Furthermore, he regards diseases, misfortunes and troubles as a requirement of the manifestations of divine names.[404] Therefore Nursi accepts this consideration as a universal law and truth valid not only for mankind but for all creatures. Nursi states that:

if they are Beings with spirits but no intellect, their death and departure is not extinction and vanishing into non-existence, it is rather being saved from physical existence and the turbulent duties of life. Making over to their spirits, which are immortal, the fruits of the duties they have gained, each relying on a divine name, their immortal spirits persist, attaining happiness worthy of them.[405]

Thus Nursi explains that hardships suffered by animals will be compensated, first through immediate rewards inserted into activities as "enjoyment and pleasure," secondly by ways such as "retaliation" in this world or the next world, and finally, by giving their souls "eternity," a "perfection and happiness" they deserve, even if their bodies are turned into soil.

4. Free Will and Ability for Evil in Animals

Whether creatures other than man have will or not, and the nature and limits of that will if they do in fact possess it, is a controversial matter. Al-Jurjānī claims that men and animals are common in moving with free will (irāda) and having feelings (ih□sās).[406] As for Nursi, as we mentioned briefly above, he compares the universe to a palace, and states that god employs four kinds of creatures in the construction of this palace and encourages them to worship and praise himself. according to this description, minerals and elements have only the blessing of existence; plants are blessed with existence and life; animals are blessed with existence, life and soul, self, and partial free will; and man is blessed in addition to these with intelligence, conscience, heart and “a comprehensive nature” able to manifest the divine names. here Nursi compares animals to human beings in having “an appetitive soul” and “a partial will.”[407] We can deduce two results from the existence of a partial will in animals:

First: “Will” is the freedom of making a choice among varying options and this choice, as a requirement of its nature, can move both in the area of good and evil. Nursi declares that all living beings are subject to “the principle of mutual assistance,”[408] which he defines as “the law of magnanimity and generosity,”[409] while “the principle of conflict,” which is considered by some philosophers as a common and generally accepted phenomenon, “springs from the misuse of their inborn dispositions by a number of tyrants, brutish men, and savage beasts.”[410] The phrase, “the misuse of the inborn disposition” can be said to express animals’ use of their free will in the areas prohibited for them. This free will possessed by animals, which we do not know its exact nature, makes their exposition of retaliation or similar conduct more meaningful. as a matter of fact, Nursi considers wild animals’ attacking other living animals for prey instead of eating the carcasses of dead animals, which is their “lawful food,” as a kind of “deviation from their nature.”[411] if these wild animals content themselves with the carcasses of dead animals and remain in a way in their legitimate place, they will not only find their sustenance but they will also be employed in the service of “cleaning” the earth’s surface,[412] an action which is required by the divine name of Most holy (alḲuddūs),[413] which is dominant throughout the universe. another conclusion that can be drawn is that god does not interfere with the actions that animals conduct according to their free will, just as is the case with human beings. in other words it can be claimed that at least some animals to the extent of their partial will, also can act against the decrees of god.

Second: We must indicate that another result brought by will is “responsibility.”[414] We may say that since animals have no intelligence, their will is dependent on their “feelings.” While Nursi deals with the topics of the will and the responsibility of animals, he first explains that the concept of law (Sharia) has two senses, namely “Verbal laws” in revealed religions and “creational laws,” or the “laws of divine Will” in creation/the universe. he then he declares that obedience and disobedience to both laws are possible. While he defines the Verbal Laws as the collection of the laws which has been sent by god to mankind by means of the Prophets and which address only intelligent beings,[415] he describes creational laws as the universal laws dominant in the universe. according to Nursi, having intelligence is not necessary in order to abide by the creational laws. For human beings, “intelligence” and “will” are required conditions for legal responsibility, but for Nursi, “the heart” and “feelings” and “abilities” may also be appealed to for responsibility. in this context, he says that “animals may be considered as mature in the senses or feelings of the self.”[416] Therefore, conduct based on the heart, feelings and abilities could be rewarded or punished. in this respect, while some animals may appear perfect in terms of “the feelings of the self,” children may be considered as mature in the feelings of the heart.[417] For instance, in Nursi’s words: “if a child does not heed his feeling of compassion or pity and kills a honeybee to indulge an impulse, he may have his head broken as a deserved punishment,”[418] even though a lion has great affection towards its young and the feeling of protection towards a member of its kind, if these two feelings do not prevent the lion from tearing an antelope to pieces, it will deserve the bullets of a hunter.[419] Through this idea, Nursi points out the validity of the notion of “retaliation,” suggested by the Kalām scholars, even in this world.

in relation to the fact that powerful animals disturb weak animals, Nursi declares that this situation serves to obtain the results of “acting watchfully, alertness, continual mobility, being swift and quick, using refined skills, and activating the potentials on the part of animals.”[420] in order to point out the useful results of this “disturbance,” he suggests the comparison of domestic animals with wild animals of the same kind.[421] Finally Nursi, who touches on the disturbance of human beings by animals and insects such as mosquitoes, accepts this situation as a sort of “retaliation.” That is, just as many animals endure the disturbances given to them by human beings, so human beings too must tolerate this sort of “retaliation” acts by animals.[422]

5. Perception of Time, Feelings of Pleasure and Pain in Animals

Whether animals feel pain and sorrow is one of the issues discussed in the literature of Kalām. Al-Jurjānī says that some of the Mutazilitas claim that children and animals do not feel pain or sorrow with the fear that it will necessitate their entering paradise and possessing intelligence.[423] at different points, Nursi argues that animals are capable of feeling physical hurt caused by injury or disease.[424] Nursi, who often compares human beings and animals in terms of their duties and functions, explains, in broad terms, that man has a very different creation from animals in that man is multidirectional in skills and abilities; due to intelligence and thinking, his feelings are very developed and therefore his needs are very different. Moreover, the things he is interested in extend outward like concentric circles and cover all the universe; he understands himself and the world around himself as a whole; he can discover the cause-and-effect relationships between events; he is able to perceive the past, present and future times in his mind; he is able to become a sort of mirror for the divine names and to observe their manifestations in creatures; and each of his feelings and abilities has pleasures and sorrows of its own.[425]

if we consider what has been pointed out, the circle of things that concern animals, due to their lack of intelligence, is very limited.[426] on the other hand, the relationships of animals with the members of their kind and other animals, take place only at the level of certain feelings.[427] since animals have no intelligence and conscience, we can not talk about their possessing an extensive perception of time and a sense of permanent life. Furthermore, animals’ benefit from the blessings in this world, being devoid of “intelligence, heart, soul, and humanity/compassion”[428] takes place only in a very limited way.

according to Nursi, animals having no perception of the past and future,[429] and feel “neither the deaths of the creatures in the past and future, nor their eternal separation.”[430] on the other hand, human beings have been created with such a disposition to feel sorrow and pleasure that is incomparable to animals. Furthermore Nursi declares that every feeling and sense in man has its own pleasure and sorrow.[431] in this respect “man falls to a level a hundred times lower than animals.”[432] since the animals’ perception of time is not extensive and they are not rich in abilities and equipment, their feelings of pain and sorrow seem weak but their feeling of pleasure seems dominant. For this reason, a three dimensional perception of time and richness of abilities are among the most important characteristics that distinguish man from animals. since animals have no ideas or thought, they cannot understand the past and future as comprehensively as men; therefore, in Nursi’s words, neither do they receive “sorrows and regrets,” nor do they feel “anxiety and fears.”[433] On the other hand, due to the deficiency in their perception of time, animals “receive perfect pleasure; sleep and rise and thank their creator.”[434] here Bediuzzaman proceeds a step further and puts forward a very interesting idea by saying that: “an animal held down to be slaughtered, even, does not feel anything. it wants to feel it as the knife cuts, but that feeling disappears as well, and it is saved from the pain.”[435] Nursi declares that “a great instance of divine mercy and compassion is not making known the unseen, the things that are going to happen in the future,” and the mercy in question works “more perfectly for innocent animals.”[436] however, he does not clearly say whether this state of “getting rid of pain” is a property pertaining to sacrificed animals or to all animals covered by the quality of “innocent.” nevertheless, when all the remarks made by Nursi, concerning the issue, and especially those about the hardships of animals, are analyzed altogether, we may conclude that this rule does not include every animal.

another point that Nursi brings to our attention is that though animals differ in body and shape, they are very similar in their spiritual nature, as in the examples of birds and fish.[437] human beings are exactly opposite in this point. nevertheless, for Nursi, animal feelings are not at the same level for all animal species. in this respect, for instance, “fish,” which are quite weak in terms of “animal feelings,” can be considered within the class of “plants.”[438] From the perspective of this approach of Nursi’s, we may say that also flies and insects, due to the weakness of their animal feelings when compared to fish, can be included within the class of “plants.” Nursi, touching on the death of animals, argues that death becomes a sort of evolution for them and regards, for instance, their death in the human stomach as a source of rise to human life.[439] he also mentions the shortness of the life span of beautiful animals and the state of small and weak animals whose lives come to an end in the harshness of the winter season. according to Nursi, god does not sustain the lives of these animals in periods of their weakness and desperation. For example, Nursi, mentioning the shortness of the life span of flies, which he describes as “the lovers of roses” or “the friends of the coy flowers,”[440] indicates that the duties these creatures perform under difficult conditions become a source of troubles rather than pleasure, and, therefore their lives must be terminated. in Nursi’s words, “they must be discharged from the duties of their lives.”[441] Nursi bases divine employment, as a general rule, on the conditions of “the easiness of the duties in life, the convenience of life conditions, and the continuation of excitement by living beings.”[442] as a conclusion, Nursi connects the extent of the perception of pleasure and pain in living beings, first, to the wealth of their abilities and feelings, which he defines as “comprehensiveness,” and, secondly, to the perception of three dimensional time. noticing that animals are incomparable with men on these two points, he concludes that pleasure and pain in animals are sudden and passing and that pleasure and pain never take place in animals at the same level as those of human beings.[443]

6. The Particularity of Animal Pain and Secrecy of Trial

The size of evils in the universe and their ratio to good deeds and beauties has always been a matter of discussion.[444] Nursi, by claiming repeatedly that evils and bad things in the universe are little, dependent, and partial, while good deeds and beauties are basic, numerous, and universal, shares the view of Muslim philosophers and Kalām scholars.[445] our thinker bases his opinion that good deeds and beauties are universal on the “universality of order,” which is dominant over all species in the universe,[446] and he connects the claims that evils have prevailed the world and that evils are dominant over good deeds to a misguided regard of things with a headless and heretic viewpoint, originating from atheism, or disbelief in god.[447] in one of his works where he studies the concept of beauty, Nursi states that what we describe as “evil,” is in fact “a beauty through others,” that is, an indirect kind of beauty, in respect to its results. When considered under the light of this concept, “beauties through others” consist of certain partial evils which have to be allowed to occur for the creation of “the universal instances of good.”[448] For instance, cutting off a gangrenous finger, at first sight, is evil, but if it is not cut off then a hand will have to be amputated, which is a greater evil. Therefore the amputation of the finger is an evil which is good in terms of its result.[449]

On the other hand, Nursi, associates the existence of evil with the nature of religion and trial as well. on this matter, he says:

since belief and accountability are a test, a trial, a competition within the bounds of man’s will, matters that are obscure, profound, and in need of careful study and experiment cannot be obvious. They should not be so compelling that everyone has to affirm them willy-nilly. For in this way the Abu Bakrs may rise to the highest of the high and the abu Jahls descend to the lowest of the low. if there is no will, there is no accountability. it is because of this mystery and wisdom that miracles are displayed only rarely.[450]

This world is a field of trial and examination, and a place of obligation and struggle. obligation and examination require that reality remains veiled so that through competition and struggle the abu Bakrs may rise to the highest of the high and the abu Jahls may enter among the lowest of the low. if the innocent remained untouched in such disasters, the abu Jahls would submit just like the abu Bakrs, and the door of spiritual and moral progress through struggle would be closed and the mystery of obligation spoiled.[451] religion is an examination, a test, which distinguishes elevated spirits from base ones. it therefore speaks of matters that everyone shall see with their eyes in the future in such a way that they remain neither altogether unknown, nor self-evident so that everyone would be compelled to confirm them. They open the door to the reason but do not take the will from the hand.[452]

Winning an eternal happiness, which is a universal act of good, necessitates that the bases of belief, which is the subject of trial, should remain theoretical and at such a distance that they should not obligate people to approve by heart and take away their free will.[453] according to Nursi, for the mystery of obligation to continue, the veil of causes must not be abolished, and within this framework innocent animals and human beings have to be exposed temporarily to certain misfortunes and hardships, which superficially seem evil to the human mind.[454] if, during general disasters innocents, in Nursi's words, "are able to stay in safety in a wonderful way, then the mystery of obligation will be spoiled."[455] however these misfortunes and hardships are compensated through "wages" in advance inserted into their services as a requirement of the divine mercy and also through having the most appropriate "rewards" and "perfection" in an everlasting happiness.[456]

7. Human Tyranny and Animal Pain

As we know, in the holy Qur'an it is declared that "Mischief has appeared on land and sea because of (the need) that the hands of men have earned that (god) may give them a taste of some of their deeds: in order that they may turn back (from evil)" (Qur'an 30:41). Taking inspiration from this and similar Qur'anic verses, Nursi thinks that the mistakes made by the majority of people also have a role in the great disasters and misfortunes involving major elements such as air, soil, and water, which give harm not only to human beings but also other living beings.[457][] Nursi presents the great disasters that befell the nations of prophets, beginning with the People of noah, as punishment for their rebellions and heresies throughout history and, therefore, as evidence for this relationship.[458][] in addition to this, Nursi interprets the two World Wars and the great destructions, hunger and deprivation caused by these wars in this frame[459] and compares them to the prophet Muhammad's saying: "Even the fish in the depth of the sea complain of man for they cause the cessation of their appointed sustenance."[460]

 Conclusion

Nursi studies the problem of animal pain very seriously and deals with this topic directly or indirectly in many of his works. he tries to tackle the problem both by adding new elements to the classical/traditional solutions and by expressing his own findings. Since the concepts of Unity (Tawh□īd), hereafter, divine justice, the purpose of creation and indicative meaning (Mā‘nā al-Ḥarfī) have a central place in Nursi’s system, he tries to analyze almost every problem by referring to these principles; the problem of animal pain is not an exception to this general method. in this article, i have tried to analyze some of the solutions presented to the problem of animal pain by Nursi under seven headings. regarding things from the point of view of “indicative meaning” and determining the purposes of their creation as manifesting the divine names, intelligent beings’ contemplation of the Divine Names reflecting on the creatures, and uses such as each being’s personal pleasure and comfort, Nursi indicates that animals have will and self as well as a sort of responsibility based on animal feelings and that they will be rewarded or punished accordingly. on the other hand, Nursi argues that in the partial evils and misfortunes which befall animals as a requirement of universal laws, the pains of animals are little and sudden due to animals’ deprivation of the comprehensive structure possessed by mankind and animals’ deficiency in the perception of time, and that universal [natural] laws are made flexible through special mercy, providence, and assistance by god. Finally, Nursi explains that as a reward for their deeds in the world, pleasures are placed into their services. Furthermore, in his view, the hardships befalling animals in the world will be compensated permanently in the hereafter through being blessed with an eternal soul and a permanent existence in the divine knowledge (‘Ilm al-Ilāhī) and other realms of existence.

 10. Justice, Morality, and Modernity: What Makes the Risale-i Nur Modern?

Dale F. Eickelman

The ideas of justice and morality expressed in the Risale-i Nur are thoroughly modern. To recognize this, we must set aside the idea of modernity dominant from the mid-twentieth century to the 1990s that deflected attention away from the contributions of religious thinkers, public religion, and public values inspired by faith. These mid-twentieth century versions of modernization theory also played a significant role outside Turkey —as within the country—in deflecting attention away from Nursi's contributions and the Risale-i Nur to thinking about religion as it shapes justice and morality in contemporary societies, including of course the contemporary Muslim majority world.

To give a sense of antagonism to the idea that religion could play a constructive role in thinking about justice and morality in modern societies, among other central issues, a leading public intellectual in the 1960s saw the Muslim world as facing an unpalatable choice: either a "neo-islamic totalitarianism" intent on "resurrecting the past," or a "reformist islam" which would open "the sluice gates and [be] swamped by the deluge."[461] another social scientist, who at least had a good ear for alliteration, suggested that Middle eastern societies faced the stark choice of "Mecca or mechanization."[462] at the very least, such views suggest an intensely negative assessment of the role of religion in modern society and of islam in particular. equivalent views were also prevalent among intellectuals in the Middle east. The syrian philosopher sadiq al-'azm, for example, had both christian and islamic fundamentalisms primarily in mind when he wrote of their "principled rigidity" and the eventual triumph of secular reason: "in the longer run the resulting socio-historical secular reality will inevitably burst through the mystical shell of islam."[463] Al-'Azm makes two assertions that flow from the earlier versions of modernization theory. The first is that religion—Islam in the passage cited—has a "mystical" shell and is thus alien to reason, and that the long-term global trajectory is one toward reason that is thoroughly secular.

 The Risale-i Nur and Justice

Thinking in public space about justice and morality involves no necessary incompatibility between religion and reason. The concepts and practices of tradition, like those of “modernity,” must be actively constructed, adjusted, and sustained. Proponents of “tradition” may claim antiquity for practices and ideas, but in the context of modernity, as in the past, these ideas and practices are strongly shaped by context even if the claim is made that they exist outside of ordinary social life. To paraphrase Nursi, it is not just the “worldly” whose ideas and acts are influenced by social context, but also those who aspire to recognize the ideas of justice and balance implicit in what he calls “divine determining.” Nursi’s writings and life suggest by example how religion and reason are compatible, although this compatibility requires struggle and pragmatism. as Nursi maintained, he was not a Sufi shaykh but a hoja,[464] and in his case one who demanded a critical engagement with texts. By example, Nursi stimulated individual critical thought and reflection about justice, morality, and personal responsibility. Said’s point of departure was islam as understood by the scholars of his day, he articulated these ideas of justice and morality so that they transcended islam as a bounded tradition and became more amenable to compatibility with other traditions.

implicit in Nursi’s writings is the idea that religion and reason are not bounded entities, nor are they polar opposites. concepts of reason—the use of the plural is deliberate—must necessarily be understood in specific historical circumstances rather than as disembodied and timeless concepts that exist only in dichotomies such as “traditional” and “modern.” Nursi knew that he was elaborating a system of inquiry that for him unfolded over time. Moreover, his rhetoric[465] advances not through strictly juridical arguments but through allegory, metaphor, and parable that can be continuously interpreted and applied to new circumstances.

Nursi makes a key distinction between “pure” and “relative” justice based on incidents in the early years of islam, but his style obligates his readers to interpret his distinction through metaphors and allegories. Thus he discussed the violent dispute—actually a war—called the “event of the camel” that pitted ‘ali bin abi Talib, the Prophet’s son-in-law and caliph (r. 656–661), against his opponents. ‘ali advocated the application of “pure justice” to resolve the issue. ‘ali’s opponents countered that applying “pure justice was extremely difficult. For this reason, their judgment of the law was to proceed on the basis of relative justice, known as the lesser of two evils."[466]

To explain "pure" and "relative" justice, Nursi invokes a Qur'anic verse (5:32), "if any one slew a person—unless it be for murder or for spreading mischief in the land—it would be as if he slew the whole people." explains Nursi: "a single individual may not be sacrificed for the good of all. In the view of Almighty God's compassion, right is right, there is no difference between great and small." in relative justice, however, "a particular is sacrificed for the good of the universal; the rights of an individual are not considered in the face of the community."[467] Nursi explains that both sides in the "event of the camel" made interpretations "purely for God's sake and for the benefit of Islam." As a consequence, both the killers and the killed "gained Paradise" and "acted rightfully." Nursi's stance had the added benefit of distancing him from a partisan interpretation of events in the first hijri century. Then, to cut off further discussion of the incident, he cites a "learned person who is widely known amongst us" who "wrote in Kurdish: 'don't gossip about the war between the companions, for both killer and killed were destined for Paradise'."[468] his invocation of a learned person writing in Kurdish, whose name he does not disclose, suggests the complex layers of his original Turkish audience and his ability to engage it in seeing the incident's relevance to understanding twentieth-century events.

Nursi's example transcends specifically Islamic concerns. Similar to the example above, his aphorisms are "good to think with," as the anthropologist Claude Lévi-Strauss might say, ranging beyond the specifics of religious thought. "one grain of trust consumes a stack of lies. one grain of reality is superior to a stack of illusions. everything you say should be true, but it is not right to say everything [that is] true."[469] Such phrasing transcends the specifics of particular cultural traditions and facilitates its adaptation to new circumstances.

 Nursi and Western Concepts of Morality and Justice

Nursi's approach to morality and justice has strong parallels in Western moral and legal thought. The noted jurist lon l. Fuller (1902–78) distinguished between the morality of aspiration and the morality of duty, explaining that the morality of aspiration shows a close affinity with aesthetics as a means for making the best use of our short lives.[470] Nursi's notion of divine or "pure" justice has an important aesthetic and moral dimension that resonates with Fuller's notion of the morality of aspiration. Nursi writes:

do you wish for a proof that all things are done with justice and balance? The fact that all things are endowed with being, given shape and put in their appropriate place in accordance with precise equilibrium and in appropriate measure, shows that all matters are done in accordance with infinite justice and balance.[471]

Nursi indicates that humankind cannot experience "the true essence of justice in this transient world," although occasionally he relents, invoking as an example "the pleasure and enjoyment a just ruler who loves to enforce justice and right receives from giving the oppressed their rights," and inviting a comparison by analogy "with the sacred meanings pertaining to the absolutely Wise one" which arise from establishing justice, and not only for men and jinn, but for all creatures."[472]

Fuller regards the morality of aspiration as "the fullest realization of human powers."[473] People might fail to realize their fullest capabilities, but this is a failure of shortcoming, not of wrongdoing.[474] no laws can compel humankind to "live up to the excellences" of which they are capable.[475] citing adam smith, Fuller[476] compares the morality of aspiration to "the rules which critics lay down for the attainment of what is sublime and elegant in composition." it rescues humankind from "the blind play of chance" and places humans "safely on the road to purposeful and creative activity."[477]

The morality of aspiration pervades all of existence, much like Nursi's notion of aspiration to pure justice, or divine determination. Both Fuller and Nursi see morality as the basis for law and justice. Nursi's notion of justice and balance parallels Fuller's argument except that Nursi invokes not only a higher morality, but also divine determination.

Fuller’s morality of aspiration starts at the top of human achievement. his morality of duty starts “at the bottom,” laying down “the basic rules without which an ordered society is impossible.”[478] The morality of duty is prescriptive, much like Nursi’s specific invocations of prescribed punishments in Shari‘ah where he explains that the amputation of the thief’s hand “restrains and prohibits” theft as the conscience of thieves restrain their desire.[479] here Nursi’s reliance on metaphors falters in favor of a literalism. other modernist interpreters of scripture place more weight on the shared values that deter criminals rather than on a literal reliance on scripture as mandating amputation.

in general, Nursi’s arguments on the supposedly prescriptive elements of shari‘ah wear less well than the overall thrust of his argument on justice. if pure justice holds everything in equilibrium, his explanation of the justice in Qur’anic inheritance law that, he writes, opposes the unjust law of “present-day civilization.” it is just, he argues, for a man to receive twice the share of a woman, for men “take a wife and undertake to provide for her,” and because “a girl is “delicate and weak by nature.” The “savage greed” of the present time, Nursi continues, “recalls the appalling tyranny of burying girl children alive in the age of ignorance,”[480] an indeterminate epoch projected into the unbounded jahili past, which he then compares to the twentieth century.

These invocations of conventional and time-bound gender differences contrast to his more enduring reflections, such as his forced exile at the hands of the “worldly.” he describes their actions as wrong, but realizes that god turned his exile into a situation that allowed him to better serve religion. Prohibited from the world of politics, he turned instead to the service of the Qur’an. To Nursi, this service was the morality of aspiration in Fuller’s sense of the term, contrasted to the “swamp” of the transient world in which we live, the “dissolute social life of mankind,” with the “caravan of mankind stumbling forward in stinking and filthy mud.”[481]

In his forceful narrative, Nursi reflects on responsibilities toward the twenty percent of the population who suppose that the “filthy mud” of this world is musk and ambergris, with the other eighty percent understanding that they are in a swamp but unaware of how to get out of it. one choice, writes Nursi, is to bring the “drunken” twenty percent to their senses with a club—Fuller’s equivalent of the morality of duty (or Nursi’s “relative justice”). The alternative choice is “to point out the safe way to the bewildered by showing them a light.”[482] The “lights of the Qur’an” constitute the morality of aspiration, “far superior to all political currents and partisanship” and “exempt from and free of all their biased considerations.”[483]

 Nursi, the Morality of Aspiration, and Modernity

The Risale-i Nur and Said Nursi’s distinction between pure and relative justice exemplify modernity. Most proponents of modernization theory have generally assumed that modernity marks a sharp break with the “traditional” past. in Turkey, as in the Middle east, political reformers exaggerated this great divide, so that only in the last few decades have Turkish social historians and social scientists acknowledged that “modernity,” both political and social, is a much more nuanced and complex process than can be explained by such sudden tectonic political shifts as the collapse of the ottoman empire and the birth of the Turkish republic.

Nursi was acutely aware of the multiple ways in which the ottoman empire was itself a modernizing force, and a more general consideration of his approach to modernity contributes to framing his ideas of justice. even when his proposals failed to be realized, as in his petition on education reform presented to the sublime Porte in May or June 1908 concerning the Zehra madrasa. Nursi advocated joining religious schooling with the best of the mektebs, or new “secular” schools,[484] so that education would be more effectively at the center of social reform than was possible by the late ottoman practice of leaving the religious schools to themselves and unrelated to the “new” schools for nonreligious subjects created in the ottoman empire beginning in the late 1830s.[485] in terms of social reforms and religious understandings, both Turkish and foreign scholars today recognize that many incremental innovations, and not necessarily the “top-down” ones mandated by state authorities, were underway long before the Republican era in fields such as marriage, family, and fertility patterns.[486] republican Turkey constituted a sharp formal political break with the Ottoman era, but informal, incremental innovations were equally significant, such as the emergence of a public sphere in forms as diverse as coffeehouses,[487] women’s fashion, and patterns of consumption.[488] similarly, in spite of a drive to remove religion from public space from the 1920s to the mid-twentieth century, a strong sense of religion remains central to Turkish public life and social institutions that is at the same time compatible with the secular nature of state institutions and mainstream political expression.[489]

 Religious and Secular in Open Societies

open societies claim to respect religion and religious worship. at the same time, however, in the words of the late philosopher richard rorty (1931–2007),[490] religion usually functions as a “conversation-stopper” outside of circles of believers. rorty’s observation points to why the career and writings of Said Nursi have proven such a challenge to conventional ideas of modernity. “Modernity” is seen as an “enlargement of human freedoms” and an “enhancement of the range of choices” as people began to “take charge” of themselves.[491] religion can be seen as fully compatible with these goals. shils[492] argued that only intellectuals attached to these “modern” values had the vision to rise above parochial identities and to attach themselves to the notion of a modern nation-state. Thus were religious intellectuals such as Nursi implicitly marginalized.

yet Nursi saw his role as integrating the norms of “rationality” with science, economic concerns, and a respect for justice in ways that were fully compatible with being Turkish. he addressed the burning issues of his day but at the same time transcended the specifics of place and time in order to aspire to the higher morality of “true justice” and its commitment to the common good.[493]

The modern era has intensified the pace of interaction among believers in different religious traditions. however, for much of islamic history, Muslim societies have been remarkably open to the outside world, incorporating many pre- and co-existing elements through bricolage. an awareness of religious pluralism is not the exclusive byproduct of modernity in the Muslim majority world. The basis for openness to different religious interpretations of ethics and justice within the Muslim tradition and for other religious traditions antedates european modernity. Pluralism was also encouraged by the fact that the boundaries of the Muslim world were never sharply delineated. not only were the boundaries between the Mediterranean Muslim world, including Anatolia, fluid and indistinct, but also those of the Muslim world elsewhere.

 Nursi and Diversity in Justice

The contextual interpretations of Qur'anic verses are multiple, but in contemporary Muslim discussion and debate, the point of departure is increasingly the Qur'an itself and not the scholarly interpretations that have accumulated over the centuries. it would be incorrect to say that there is a single, dominant view among Muslims concerning religious and ethical pluralism. The Qur'an offers a distinctly modern perspective on the role of islam as a force for tolerance and mutual recognition in a multi-ethnic, multi-community world: "To each among you, We have ordained a law and assigned a path. had god pleased, he could have made you one nation, but his will is to test you by what he has given you; so compete in goodness" (5:48). other verses reinforce the concepts and practices of tolerating religious difference: "had your lord willed, he would have made mankind one nation: but they will not cease differing" (11:118). another reads: "o mankind! We created you from a male and a female and made you into nations and tribes, that you may know one another" (49:13). Nursi invokes these verses and the travels of the "old said," as recorded by the "new said," powerfully evoke his recognition of diversity and pluralism.

There have always been several traditions of morality and justice in islam, [494] many of which—as in other religious traditions—are more tolerant and open to alternative ethical positions. Throughout the world, increasing levels of education, greater ease of travel, and the rise of new communications media are leading to more open societies, just as globalization has been accompanied by such developments as Vatican ii, secular transnational human rights movements, and currently the global Risale-i Nur movement. in this context, Nursi's notions of justice and its underlying morality have survived well over time.

Writing in the 1960s, sociologist robert Bellah argued that islam in its seventh-century origins was for its time and place “remarkably modern ... in the high degree of commitment, involvement, and participation expected from the rank-and-file members of the community.”[495] its leadership positions were open, and divine revelation emphasized equality among believers. Bellah argued that the restraints that kept the early Muslim community from “wholly exemplifying” these principles of modernity underscore the modernity of the basic message of the Qur’an, exhorting its initial audience in seventh-century arabia to break through the “stagnant localisms” of tribe and kinship. indeed, Bellah argues: “the effort of modern Muslims to depict the early community as the very type of equalitarian participant nationalism is by no means entirely an unhistorical ideological fabrication.”[496] of course, these “stagnant localisms” offered powerful resistance to the Qur’anic vision of community in the seventh century. another often-cited Qur’anic verse emphasizes that there is “no compulsion in religion. Whoever ... believes in God has grasped a firm handhold of the truth that will never break” (2:256). other verses nonetheless appear to justify coercion and severe punishment for apostates, renegades, and unbelievers who break their agreement with the prophet Muhammad (for example, 4:89, 9: 1–16).

Some commentators conclude that such coercion is specific to the context of the early islamic community and grounded in “emergency conditions”—what Nursi recognizes as “relative” justice. in this view, coercion was needed to emphasize such “basic moral requirements” as keeping promises and treaties, and protecting a community’s “basic welfare and security against aggression.”[497] nonetheless, the overall Qur’anic emphasis is on voluntary consent to the will of god “which is prompted by the universal guidance that is engraved upon the human heart.”[498] The Qur’an advises even the Prophet Muhammad to show tolerance toward his opponents: “if it had been your lord’s will, they would all have believed, all who are on earth. Would you [o Muhammad] then compel mankind against their will to believe?” (10:99).

as Fazlur rahman[499] argued, the prophet Muhammad “recognized without a moment of hesitation that abraham, Moses, Jesus, and other old and new Testament religious personalities had been genuine prophets like himself.”

Their different messages, coming to different peoples and nations at different times, were “universal and identical.” indeed, Muhammad is made to say in the Qur’an, “i believe in whatever book god may have revealed” (42:15), because “god’s guidance is universal and not restricted to any nation or nations.”[500] The idea of “book” (kitab), as rahman points out, is a generic term in the Qur’an, “denoting the totality of divine revelations.” This focus on the text, requiring individuals to “take charge” of their responsibilities and conduct in society, is also at the core of Nursi’s sustained emphasis on texts rather than personalities.

The modern era has intensified the pace of interaction among believers in different religious traditions. however, as the above Qur’anic verses indicate, intense awareness of and interaction with other faiths have been present in the islamic tradition from its inception and are not characteristics unique to the modern era. For much of islamic history, Muslim societies have been remarkably open to the outside world, incorporating through bricolage many preexisting and coexisting elements.

Nursi in his writings and travels exemplifies these trends. According to one account, a policeman in Tiflis in 1909 challenged Nursi about his plans for building a medrese, saying that it was hopeless to envision unity of the “broken up and fragmented” Muslim world. Nursi replied: “They have gone to study. it is like this: india is an able son of islam; it is studying in the high school of the British. egypt is a clever son of islam; it is taking lessons in the British school for civil servants. caucasia and Turkestan are two valiant sons of islam; they are training in the russian war academy. and so on.” in 1911, a half-century before the second Vatican council urged christians and Muslims to resolve their differences and move beyond the conflicts of the past, Nursi advocated such a dialogue, and his successors have taken significant steps to engage in interfaith discussions.[501] an awareness of religious pluralism is not the exclusive byproduct of modernity in the Muslim majority world. The basis for openness to different religious interpretations of ethics and justice within the Muslim tradition and for other religious traditions antedates european modernity. in andalusia, for example, the jurist abu ishaq al-shatibi (d. 1388) advocated the centrality of human reason for interpreting Islamic law and applying it to specific social, economic, and political contexts.[502] such a formulation recognized the possibility of multiple and co-existing interpretations. Pluralism was also encouraged by the fact that the boundaries of the Muslim world were never sharply delineated. it was not only the boundaries between the Mediterranean Muslim world, including anatolia, that were fluid and indistinct but also those of other areas of the Muslim world. In india, the great Mughal ruler akbar (1542–1605) ruled over Muslims, christians, Jains, sikhs, Parsees, Jews, and others.[503]

 Modern Understandings of Justice

The Risale-i Nur bridges older yet thoroughly “modern” ways of explaining justice and morality. unlike other religious intellectuals of his time, Nursi never lost his rural roots and often employed the metaphors and imagery of Turkey’s rural population. other religious modernist contemporaries, in contrast, distanced themselves from popular belief and rhetorical styles. Nursi, while familiar with the structure and content of modernity, recognized the value of fable and metaphor in shaping his message. his use of these tropes also facilitated understandings of his message in different social and historical contexts.

since the mid-nineteenth century, the dramatic rise in mass higher education, the greater ease and rapidity of travel, and the proliferation of means of communication has enabled large numbers of people to raise questions such as “What is my religion?” “Why is it important to my life?” and “how do my beliefs guide my conduct?” This interest in such basic, abstract questions of doctrine and faith by large numbers of people, as opposed to a small elite, is admittedly new. The rise first of literacy in vernacular languages, and subsequently the advent of new media, including the internet, has encouraged less the homogenization of faith, but rather an intensified, multi-polar struggle over people’s imaginations— over the symbols and principles of “islam” and ideas of justice.

Nursi’s vision was thoroughly modern in the sense that his writings, for many decades, copied and disseminated by hand, much like the samizdat publications of the former soviet union, were ready-made for wider distribution once his books were taken off the prohibited list and published in modern Turkish. after the restrictions were lifted in 1956, [504] readers were added to his audience—those whose primary contact with the Risale-i Nur was not necessarily the face-to-face or hand-to-hand contact of an earlier era, but the text itself. if many small groups congregated to read the text together, this was a practice also compatible with a thoroughly modern education.

The Risale-i Nur encourages reflection on core ideas of morality and justice without prescribing particular, context-specific directives. At the same time, its advocacy of multiple systems of learning, including those derived from the colonial experience,[505] encourage the elaboration of habits of thought and practice that facilitate introducing new elements and practices. For Nursi, it is not sufficient simply to “be” Muslim and to follow Muslim practices. One must reflect upon and articulate one’s faith in practice. Pluralism, and a respect for complementary values of justice and ethical conduct, is of necessity constantly negotiated between universal and local ethical values.

The teachings of Nursi readily function to explain, “in accordance with the understanding of the age, the truths of the Qur’an.”[506] his writings represent the islamic tradition as one that enjoins a continuous dialogue over meaning, one that explicitly enjoins tolerance among Muslims and between Muslim and other religious traditions. religious intellectuals such as Nursi may claim strong links with the past, but their practice in the present conveys the idea of the modern at its best, dissolving the artificial frontier between “traditional” and “modern.”

Bridging this gap has challenged Turkish intellectuals, as the career of Şerif Mardin suggests. soon after i met Mardin in the early 1970s, he shared with me the first of multiple successive drafts of what eventually became Religion and Social Change in Modern Turkey (1989), his study of the life and thought of Said Nursi. It took Mardin almost two decades to finish the manuscript.

Mardin told me that it was the most difficult book he ever had to write. He explained that Nursi’s writings and career were impossible to understand through the conventional lens of modernization theory, and the popularity of his work also contravened the tenets of Turkey’s then prevailing secular vulgate. in word and in deed, Nursi showed how faith and modernity worked together. if Nursi’s point of departure was religious studies, that of Mardin was secular modernity. With very different motivations, both men transcended conventional wisdom and practice to understand how the spiritual can be thoroughly compatible with modern notions of responsibility, justice, and ethical pluralism based on critical reason.

 11. Two epistles of consolation: al-shahid al-Thani and Said Nursi on Theodicy

Eric Ormsby

For defenders of god’s justice, no question is thornier or more intolerable than that of the sufferings of the innocent and especially, the suffering and death of young children. it is this issue which provokes ivan Karamazov to declare, in his confrontation with the grand inquisitor in dostoevsky’s The Brothers Karamazov, that the death of an innocent child would force him to “hand back his ticket” to existence. The suffering or the death of a young child not only pierces the heart but baffles the reason. And so the human response is almost always twofold: first, to offer consolation and then, to seek some explanation. The goodness of god and indeed, the established order of nature itself, are thrown into question. our children should die after us; they should not go before us into the next life. in the following i present and compare two islamic responses to this calamity. Both responses attempt to comfort and, in comforting, to find some underlying reason to give to a grieving parent. neither is a formal “theodicy” in the strict theological sense. In the first case, that of the Shi’ite jurist and scholar Zayn al-Din al-‘amili, al-shahid al-Thani (1506–57 or 8), he himself is the bereaved party; it is clear, though he does not say so, that he is writing to ease his own pain. in the second, the charismatic Turkish visionary Bediuzzaman Said Nursi (1876–1960) tries to console a grieving parent.[507] I have chosen these two exemplary figures, despite their wide separation in time, doctrinal affiliation, and personality, because the contrasts, as well as the affinities, between them serve to illumine larger issues.

There are of course obvious points in common, especially in their troubled and shifting relationships with the ottomans, of whom both were uneasy subjects. Thus, Sulayman the Magnificent originally supported Zayn al-Din al-‘Amili, appointing him to the Madrasa nuriyya in Ba'labakk, where he began teaching in 1546, but it was at the same sultan’s instigation that our author was summoned for interrogation on a charge of heresy; according to some reports, he died as a result of the machinations of the grand Vizier rustem Pasha, machinations which led to his murder under obscure circumstances, probably in 1558. in that year he was already being referred to as “the second Martyr.”[508] Bediuzzaman Said Nursi suffered continual reversals, including prolonged exile, under the ottomans, even if his greatest struggles would come during the period of the republic.[509] Both men were embattled thinkers, though each would conduct his spiritual and intellectual campaign in distinctly different ways.

however divergent their views, their positions on the question of innocent suffering often converge. and their arguments illustrate well the surprising range of answers which Muslim thinkers came up with in an attempt to resolve this most excruciating of human problems. each of them was aware that their attempts to console and to explain carried long and lingering echoes from the earliest period of islamic thought. This lent force and credibility to their arguments. But unlike earlier writers on theodicy, for whom the dilemma of theodicy possessed abstract horns, however vexing, these two men had to confront the dilemma head-on, and for them its horns were both sharp and intensely personal. To appreciate fully what this meant, we must step back briefly in time to a period before “theodicy” in any formal sense was possible or even conceivable.

 I. Confronting the Inconsolable: An Early Example

By definition, the problem of theodicy arises only within the context of belief in a sovereign god who may be described as both just and merciful. david hume put it most succinctly when he paraphrased epicurus, as follows: “is god willing to prevent evil, but not able? Then is he impotent. is he able, but not willing? Then is he malevolent. is he both able and willing? Whence then is evil?”[510] The problem of unmerited suffering becomes acute only within such a framework; it is a consequence—and, as it were, a casualty—of such sharp doctrinal formulations. nevertheless, only within such a framework can any cogent attempt at a resolution be articulated. in a pre-theological age, mourning alone offers the possibility of consolation.

one famous example, which vividly illustrates the point, comes from the period shortly after the advent of islam. in the year 638, during the Muslim conquest of egypt, a devastating plague swept through the land. among the dead were the five sons of the poet Abu Dhu'ayb al-Hudhali. The poet, who had been born in the Jahiliyya, lived into islamic times and became himself a Muslim. even so, no islamic allusion, let alone any religious solace, appears in the long and beautiful ode which he wrote to lament his loss. Though a mukhadrim, he might have been born a century before islam, as far as his outlook is concerned. For this great poet, it is Fate, not god, which determines events; and in fact, god is never mentioned, let alone invoked, in his celebrated ode. as alan Jones remarks, “never, perhaps, has the relentlessness of Fate been more tellingly drawn.”[511] This isn’t quite as surprising as it might seem. The genre of lament has its own conventions, its own distinctive tropes; many later islamic laments, as well as many christian and Jewish ones, invoke “fate” as a malign agency.

The poem begins: “is it by Fate and its enormities that you are grieved? But Fate is never indulgent to those who grieve.”[512] When his wife (rather surprisingly!) asks why he has grown haggard, the poet answers, “What’s wrong with me is that my sons have died and bid farewell.” he now gives full expression to his grief:

My sons have died and have brought me to grief with tears that do not stop long after the time for sleep.

They have forestalled my desire and hurried after their desire. They have been destroyed and yet, a time to die comes to everyone.

i have lingered after them in calamitous life though i seem to be hurrying behind them, trying to overtake them.

even more poignantly, in lines 8–9, the poet laments his helplessness to protect his sons from the onslaughts of Fate:

How I longed to protect them; but Fate cannot be deflected when it draws near.

When Fate grips with its talons, every amulet proves useless.

Throughout the poem, Fate (manun or dahr in arabic) is apostrophized but never personalized; it is mechanical, inexorable, and blind. The underlying human sentiment may remain the same: abu dhu'ayb is particularly grieved because his sons have “preceded” him in death. Their premature death appears monstrous, a disruption of the normal order. it is too right that order that the poet expatiates on three parallel instances: the fates of two noble animals—a wild ass and an oryx—and a mighty warrior. despite their heroic stature, Fate did not spare these exemplars. Fate destroys us all, noble and ignoble. all that a man can do is practice endurance before its assaults; this is the ancient notion of sabr (or tajallud, as the poet calls it), a pre-islamic virtue which later underwent profound transformation in the teaching of Sufi masters. But here the implication is that the death of his sons was not the result of some senseless randomness; they perished as all noble things must. an order exists, however arbitrary and indecipherable it may appear. and by the poem’s close, a sober sense of fitness—indeed, of that cosmic order—has been reasserted.

Of course, this is a poem in a well-defined genre—that of the lament—and we wouldn’t expect the poet to engage in theological speculation. But in fact, with this grand ode we stand at point zero. it would take at least another century before Muslim theologians would begin to spin attempts to confront the inconsolable out of revealed scripture and sacred tradition. The two later thinkers i turn to now understood abu dhu'ayb’s grief all too well, but they could draw on a rich repertoire of sources which might serve to allay, if not remove, that grief.

 II. Al-Shahid al-Thani: Reason and Tradition as Solace

Zayn al-din (ibn 'ali ibn ahmad ibn Muhammad) al-'amili, better known as alshahid al-Thani, one of the great jurists of the Twelver shi’a, was born in lebanon on the 13 of shawwal, 911 (9 March 1506), the scion of an illustrious shi’ite family dynasty of scholars and sages. There is no need to rehearse his distinguished career or his prodigious literary output, some 70 volumes on subjects as disparate as grammar, theology, exegesis and tradition. The salient fact for our purposes is that in the month of rajab 954 (september 1547), one of his sons, still an infant, suddenly died. al-'amili had been unlucky in fatherhood: only one of his sons survived to adulthood. But this late death of a small child may have been the final drop in a lifelong distillation of sorrow. For his son’s death prompted him to write a treatise under the title “The soother of hearts upon the loss of loved ones and children” (Musakkin al-fu’ad 'inda faqd al-ahibba wa’l-awlad). [513]

This is a manual of consolation, and frankly intended as such. But the solace it offers seems strange at first sight. The grieving father invokes two sovereign principles in accord with which he will proceed; moreover, much is made throughout, in fine juridical fashion, of the precise distinctions in both age and development of the deceased child, from the foetal stage onward, as a kind of calibration of grief. The guiding principles are, first, the intellect; and second, god’s justice. The intellect ('aql) is the instrument given to humans through which they can come to know god, as well as the authenticity of the prophets and the prescriptions of the sacred law. By the exercise of reason we cultivate virtue and avoid vice; reason sets in order the affairs of both the earthly and the transcendent realms. The human intellect “is a light shining in the darkness” and yet, it is all too scarcely used among people; for most people it is little better than a “blind man’s eye.”[514] More specifically, however, the intellect teaches us “contentment with god’s decree” (al-rida’ bi-qada’ Allah).

This precept is commonplace in islamic discussions of theodicy, especially in Sufi treatments, Said Nursi will invoke it as well. Throughout the Ihya' 'ulum al-din of al-ghazali, for example, it is repeatedly invoked; there, however, contentment arises not only from rational considerations but from an intuitive grasp of the true nature of reality, that is, from what ghazali called “taste” (dhawq), the experience of the truth rather than mere awareness of it.[515] al-shahid al-Thani refrains from such expedients. For him, the intellect alone can lead to a proper understanding of our true condition. only the intellect can, as it were, heal the heart broken by grief, even if the intellect too finds support in edifying examples drawn from tradition. and in fact, in its deft alternation between intellectual and traditional proofs, our treatise offers a perfect example of the ideal equilibrium between 'aql and naql.

We know, for example, that god is supremely just; his justice is axiomatic. so, too, are His wisdom, beneficence and compassion; these attributes are realized in his “perfected providence” (kamal 'inayatihi), in accord with which all that happens in the world has been specifically designed and intended for the maximum good. If we direct our intellects to these tenets, we will understand that because god is “the most compassionate of the compassionate and the most generous of the generous,” all His acts must somehow redound to our benefit. Even death must be seen as one of His benefits to mankind. If your inmost self tells you otherwise, “know that this is tacit polytheism (shirk khafi).”[516] In other words, if death were not a benefit bestowed by god, it would represent something at variance with his will, but that is to associate another agency with god’s. and in fact, such judicious reasoning, such reliance on the intellect, must be conducive to tranquility of mind even in the deepest grief; if not, you are guilty of “downright stupidity.” dissatisfaction with god’s decree betokens ignorance of his wisdom.[517]

The emphasis on the sufficiency of the intellect and on divine justice are, of course, old Mu’tazilite themes. That they resurface almost four centuries after the death of the last distinguished representative of that school—the grammarian, exegete and theologian al-Zamakhshari—is hardly surprising: shi’ite theology had long incorporated key Mu’tazilite notions into its discourse. The problem of the suffering and death of children had constituted a sequence of thorny dilemmas subsumed under the general rubric of atfal [infants] in Mu’tazilite debates. a central dilemma was this: if god does nothing without purpose—indeed, if he does nothing without some intended benefit—how may we explain the sufferings of innocent children, and furthermore, how might there be “benefit” in their afflictions? It couldn’t be claimed that children experienced pain as a means of “grace,” nor could it be plausibly argued that their sufferings were the prerequisite for some reward. children were not responsible under the law; they were not (mukallaf). What possible purpose could a just God have for inflicting suffering and early death upon them?

one solution was to maintain that children would receive some recompense in the next world (the notion of 'iwad), but this possibility still failed to explain the reasons for their suffering. For most Mu’tazilites, infant suffering served as a warning to adults; the pains of their children put parents to the test. it was a sign which the perceptive had, however agonizingly, to interpret for their own ultimate good.[518] such Mu’tazilite rationales struck their critics as frankly ludicrous and they mocked them savagely. The great andalusian theologian ibn hazm (d. 1064) would remark that believers in such arguments appeared to be “absent from the world; or, when they are present, it is as if their intellects had been stripped from them, and their senses numbed.”[519] We all know, he says, that “god is the most compassionate of the compassionate, truly so, not metaphorically so. Whoever denies this is an infidel; both his blood and his property are lawful. In fact, God afflicts infants with smallpox, tumors, mental illness, diphtheria and various aches so that they die, and some even starve to death, and all of that grieves fathers and mothers.”[520] The same ibn hazm pours scorn on the notion that the death of a child might lead anyone to lose his faith; children die every day and no one in the whole history of the world, he exclaims, with typical hyperbole, has ever renounced belief for so “moronic” a motive. This has a brutal ring. But i think its very vehemence suggests how prickly a topic this was.

Though he does invoke the Mu’tazilite conception of “recompense,” al-shahid al-Thani gives it a subtler nuance. There is some recompense for grieving parents even in their children’s death. There is, for example, the knowledge that the child has gone ahead of the parent into paradise. The sense that a child precedes or outstrips its parent by dying hearkens back to the sorrow that haunted our early poet Abu Dhu'ayb whose five sons had gone ahead of him into death; here that grief is transmuted into hopefulness. in the next world, such a child will intercede for his parents; their failings in this world will be set aside because of his, and their, suffering. He will go so far as to affirm that “one son who predeceases his father is better than 70 who succeed him.”[521] and there is a grimmer consolation: a child who dies before his time cannot grow up to disappoint and shame his parents; he has been, as it were, pre-empted from a sinful life. This notion too carries Mu’tazilite overtones but they are somehow softened in the treatise and infused with a personal accent. Perhaps this is because al-shahid al-Thani for all his intellectual rigor makes full allowance for the expression of grief. contentment with the divine decree does not preclude mourning, he affirms. Weeping is “natural to man;” the prophets and the imams wept.[522] after all—and here the shi’ite supersedes the Mu’tazilite—“if the afflicted person considers the fact that he exists in a realm which by its very character involves distress and hardship, a realm rife with calamities and misery, in which what occurs does so as a very prerequisite of its inmost nature; and that if that were not so, it would be contrary to the normal course of events ('adah),”[523] he will gain a truer sense of the way things actually are. This world is a (lacrimarum valle), a “vale of tears.” When we understand that, we will no longer be shocked by the disasters that befall us.

In one particularly magnificent passage he goes on to say: “this world is the abode of him who has no abode; it is the possession of him who has no possessions. The unintelligent heap up this world, the faithless pant after it, those with no knowledge contend within it, those lacking understanding brim with envy of it; in this world the healthy man is sick while the sick man staggers with weariness; in this world the poor man is sad while the rich man is beguiled.”[524] This is the immemorial contemptus mundi—the classic dhamm al-dunya—in full swing. But it is no mere jeremiad. For he adds, “Know that you were created for a specific purpose in this world because god is too exalted to act in vain.” Through this low abode we may come to an everlasting habitation. life is very brief. do not lose your life, do not squander your time, in sorrow, which is “at odds with the purpose for which you were created.” That purpose is nothing less than eternal happiness, god’s ultimate benefit bestowed on human beings. He adds more soberly, “The absent do not come back, the dead do not return.” God afflicts us with loss only so that we may learn patient endurance (sabr) and so come to our rightful place in paradise.[525]grim as this world of trial may be, we have consolations. We take strength from the sufferings of the prophets and the imams. They accompany us in our afflictions; our miseries are lightened by their example. They are our hidden friends whose bliss in paradise we will one day share. Therefore, he exhorts the mourner—and we feel he is bracing himself too—“you must not grieve, even if your sorrow is huge. Even if a lion or a snake pounces on you or a devastating fire [occurs] while you are with your children and those closest to your heart, for a prophet stands with you too, even if you do not discern his presence; even if you lose your child, you and your child are safe.”[526] By “safe” he means, of course, “saved.”

i can hardly do justice to this rather complex work in so short a space. at first, it seems dry and surprisingly technical. Jurist that he is, al-'Amili tabulates the exact circumstances surrounding a child’s death in a list of “compensations” to parents; that is, at what stage of development a child may have died, whether stillborn or miscarried or before the age of “culpability,” and so forth.[527] This lengthy discussion strikes the reader as cold and abstract, but that is, i think, a misapprehension. For it becomes clear as we read that for al-shahid al-Thani, consolation that is vague is meaningless; the only solace that matters is that which is grounded in the actual. and so, he draws on Mu’tazilite arguments, he invokes such venerable precepts as “contentment with god’s decree,” he enumerates the sufferings and the exempla of prophets and saints and imams, but he somehow humanizes and indeed, personalizes, them all to his own ends. Moreover, though he praises “patience” and urges the grief-stricken to practice it, exactly as the early poet had exhorted himself almost a millennium before, he charges it with hope. Patient endurance isn’t just an end in itself, as in the Jahiliyyah. Through patience we gain a place in paradise. But he softens it further; even the man who cannot find patience at the death of a beloved child will still be rewarded in the hereafter, by virtue of his suffering.[528] he accommodates his consolations to the reality of human nature. he avails himself of the theologians’ arguments and distinctions but infuses them with compassion. His little manual of consolation is significant finally not because he constructs a systematic theodicy or comes up with new solutions to immemorial dilemmas; its importance lies in less measurable factors, in the just balance of intellect and the example of tradition, but also in the author’s recognition of human weakness, his sensitivity to the frailty of our hopes and the stubbornness of our sorrow. This is the tone of a man who has not merely speculated but suffered, and that gives his treatise unexpected nobility.

 III. Said Nursi and his Visionary Theodicy

In a letter of condolence, written sometime between 1928 and 1932, to Hafız Halid efendi, whose child had just died, Said Nursi offers several of the same precepts which we have already encountered in our shi’ite treatise; thus, he invokes the venerable notion of “contentment with the divine decree” and affirms that the dead child will be “a supporter and an intercessor” in the world to come.[529] These are, after all, conventional gestures of consolation. nevertheless, it is characteristic of this exuberant and charismatic thinker that he cannot resist elaborating and embellishing his precepts in the most vivid way. What for other writers is little more than a commonplace becomes in Nursi’s hands a fabulous parable. if al'amili held fast to intellect and sacred tradition as the bedrock of acceptance, Nursi takes these as springboards for visionary leaps. imagination of a deeply poetic and mystical nature characterizes his thought throughout.

he begins by alluding to Qur’an 56:17 where paradise is invoked and the phrase “immortal youths” (wildan mukhalladun) occurs. he comments, “The verse indicates and gives the good news that the children of believers who die before reaching maturity will remain perpetually as eternal, lovable children in a form worthy of paradise.”[530] But he is not content to stop there. he spins out the implications of the phrase to create a scene of everlasting parental happiness where parent will enjoy “the sweetest of pleasures,” namely, “loving and caressing children.” and this will be an eternal pleasure, free of pain, and so, utterly incomparable with the ten years or so which we have in this world to enjoy the happiness our children bring us. The death of a much-loved child thus offers us the prospect of endless pleasure in the hereafter. The image, in all its domestic warmth and family coziness, has an irresistible appeal.

Nursi delights in parables and anecdotes. he draws on them constantly to enforce a spiritual point. In this he stands in the long tradition of Sufi masters who knew that a story was often more powerful, and more persuasive, than rational argument. imagine a man thrown into jail. his son is sent to comfort him. now the man suffers both for his own sake and for the sake of his imprisoned child. When a judge offers to take the child and raise him in a beautiful palace, the man refuses, for his child is his only comfort in his captivity. his friends reason with him. The child, they say, would be going to a “spacious and happy” place, whereas if he remains in prison with his father, he will suffer and will cause him to suffer. in the palace, by contrast, the child may act as an intercessor for the father and “attract the king’s mercy.” But for this, trust in the king’s wisdom and benevolence is required. The point of the parable is obvious but effective. When our children die, they are taken to a realm of beauty; there they can intercede for us. They are fortunate; it is we who remain as miserable captives in the dungeon of the world. under such circumstances, grief becomes meaningless.

in his third point, Nursi moves to a profounder level. We own nothing in this world. “The child who died was the creature, possession, servant and together with all his members, the artefact of a Most compassionate creator, and belonging to him, was a friend of his parents, put temporarily under their supervision.”[531] We are reminded of our earlier author’s declaration that this world is the “possession of him who has no possessions.” The notion of god’s “ownership” of everything in creation is Qur’anic but Nursi here discusses it in a manner reminiscent of alghazali’s treatment in his Ihya' 'ulum al-din. Nursi was not himself a Sufi;[532] even so, his works betray the influence of certain great early masters throughout, and in particular, that of al-ghazali (whose work he revered and often quoted).[533] in his next point, Nursi holds up the very transience of the world as a source of consolation. if this world were eternal, and we remained eternally separated from those we love, then sorrow would be appropriate. But the world is only a “guesthouse” and we are only travelers passing through. separation is not everlasting.

In his fifth and final point, Nursi invokes God’s compassion as a consolation, but his words are enigmatic. compassion is “true love” which “binds the heart” to god. The death of their child causes parents, who “love their child more than all the world,” to turn their eyes from this world towards another realm “worthy of the heart’s attachment.” on the face of it, certain of Nursi’s points in this letter are quite conventional. But the letter is merely an outline of hints which must be supplemented by his other works. in the remarkable discourses that make up the Risale-i Nur Collection, we find in fact a powerful Islamic theodicy. It is not systematic but emerges in “rays” and “flashes.” Though he had mastered the traditional disciplines, Nursi was not a methodical thinker after the pattern of al-shahid al-Thani, but a visionary who drew on dreams, parables, sudden insights, and poetic intuitions, all of which were grounded in a profound command of islamic tradition. at the same time, he was a man with his feet firmly planted on the ground; though he saw himself as in a five-fold exile, as expressed in his famous “gurbet” letter written during his exile in Barla,[534] he acted, often with great effectiveness, to carry out practical projects, especially after the establishment of the republic.

in his conception of theodicy, Nursi is a direct successor to al-ghazali. in The Words,[535] he approvingly quotes his controversial statement, “nothing in possibility is more wonderful than what it is” (laysa fi’l-imkan abda' mimma kan).[536] But his use of this notion, which permeates his many writings, is quite original; he takes the ghazalian dictum but develops it in his own distinctive way. here i can indicate only two aspects of this striking originality.

First, though he draws on sources as disparate as the providence of such philosophers as ibn sina (though like al-ghazali with critical reservations!) and a conception of creation as a “locus of manifestation,” derived from ibn al-'arabi, he fuses these in a novel manner. one conspicuous aspect of this is his acute sensitivity to nature. i know of no other thinker in the long history of theodicy who raises the question of why non-human beings in the order of nature must suffer destruction and decline. The Mu’tazilites, to be sure, had raised the issue of animal suffering; but Nursi’s vision is far broader than theirs. For example, in his Twentyfourth letter, he notes that man can hope for eternal happiness, but what about:

the delicate, lovely species of trees and plants, and the flowers, all living creatures, and the species of animals, which are worthy of existence, lovers of life … What compassion and kindness is there in their continuously, without exception, being annihilated, in their swiftly being despatched to non-existence without being allowed to so much as open their eyes, in their being made to work and labour without being allowed to so much as take a breath, in their being changed by calamities with not one of them being left in peace, in their being killed without exception, in their dying with not one of them remaining, in their departing with not one of them being gratified—what wisdom and purpose, what favour and mercy, are there in this?[537]

The passionate tone of this question makes plain that for Nursi, the problem was anguishing; this is no arid school-question devised for debate, but a cry from the heart. Throughout his work, nature—and especially trees and other growing things—are viewed with deep compassion and love.[538] if man is, for Nursi, a “spoiled and delicate child,” pampered by god, the garden in which he has been set by a compassionate creator is still permeated by “the breath of the Merciful.”

Of the five answers which Nursi offers to this question, his third impresses me as the most profound, the most convincing: “Things do not go to non-existence; they rather pass from the sphere of power to the sphere of knowledge; they go from the Manifest World to the World of the unseen.”[539] in this world, all things, including ourselves, including our beloved children, as well as the trees and the animals, are contingent, brought out from nothingness and the realm of infinite possibility, only by the Mercy of god, and all these things—again including ourselves—serve as both signs and manifestations of god during our earthly sojourn; but when we die, we pass from the sphere in which we, and everything else, are “objects of god’s power” to a permanent place in his knowledge. We, and everything in creation, are manifestations of god’s names, and these remain in his omniscience forever. “all species of creatures,” he says, are transformed “into books of the Most Merciful, and all gardens into divine decrees, placing stamps on the letters of the trees to the number of its fruits, and seals to the number of its leaves.”[540] accordingly, there is an intense sense of joy throughout Nursi’s writings, even when he is grappling with the most painful issues. To my knowledge, no other thinker on theodicy has infused his reflections with such palpable jubilation, both in the beauty of creation and in the wonders of the world to come. This finds continual expression in his poetic style with its delicate intuitions—his sense of the world of man and of nature as “a festival”[541] —as well as in his keen eye for the tiniest wonders. even the humble fly is a miracle in his eyes (as the Qur’anic gnat was for al-Ghazali).[542] in a certain superficial sense, Nursi’s theodicy is an aesthetic one; the world is “a work of art,” it is an “embroidery,” fashioned by a supreme artisan. But though he delights in the loveliness of created things, he always looks beyond. his theodicy is visionary; it is a sudden intense burst of light shining into another world.

in this presentation i have only been able to suggest the riches to be found in the works of both these thinkers, at once so different and yet, in a deeper sense, so alike. Both were outsiders in the worlds they inhabited; both came under suspicion from the authorities; both suffered for their beliefs. Whether relying unshakably on intellect and sacred tradition, as in the case of al-shahid al-Thani, or on a profound cosmic vision, as with Said Nursi, they faced the most tormenting questions, questions for which our grieving early poet had no answers and no consolations. as al-shahid al-Thani himself points out, in the Jahiliyya the “arabs neither hoped for reward nor feared punishment; “they practised patience and forebearance ['ilm] and pursued an attitude of ‘manliness’ [muruwwa],” and after the coming of islam, when they learned the merits of these virtues, they cultivated them even more fervently.[543] Perhaps then for all his stoicism abu dhu’ayb too earned merit in heaven. unlike him, both our thinkers could draw on ever more refined speculation on the painful dilemmas of theodicy in fashioning their own efforts at consolation. But in the end, perhaps the finest contribution of both lay in their example. in the nobility of their faith they stood—for many, they still stand—as enduring figures of consolation for the sorrowful.

 12. “landscape and Melancholy:” Said Nursi, dante alighieri and the contexts of Modernism look upon the signs of god’s mercy, and see how he restores life to the earth after death. Verily he it is Who shall bring to life the dead, and he is powerful over all things.[544] in Istanbul: Memories of a City, orhan Pamuk writes:

Gareth Jones

Huzun, the Turkish word for melancholy, has an arabic root; when it appears in the Koran (as “huzn” in two verses and “hazen” in three others) it means much the same thing as the contemporary Turkish word. The Prophet Mohammed referred to the year in which he lost both his wife hatice and his uncle, ebu Talip, as “Senettul huzn,” or the year of melancholy; this confirms that the word is meant to convey a feeling of deep spiritual loss.[545]

Pamuk outlines the way in which this understanding of huzun, with its strong connotations of “loss and the spiritual agony and grief attending it,” found a natural home in modern Turkey after the fall of the ottoman empire.[546] Pamuk also identifies a second tradition of interpreting huzun, however, one he says arises from Sufi mysticism and which suggests a more positive sense for the word. In a signal passage Pamuk writes:

To the Sufis, huzun is the spiritual anguish we feel because we cannot be close enough to allah, because we cannot do enough for allah in this world. A true Sufi follower would pay no attention to worldly concerns like death, let alone goods or possessions: he suffers from grief, emptiness and inadequacy because he can never be close enough to allah, because his apprehension of allah is not deep enough. Moreover, it is the absence, not the presence, of huzun that causes him distress. it is the failure to experience huzun that leads him to feel it; he suffers because he has not suffered enough; and it is by following this logic to its conclusion that islamic culture has come to hold huzun in high esteem.[547]

Pamuk’s description of Turkish and Muslim religious sensibilities also resonates for christian themes in europe, in the sense that medieval notions of spiritual devotion and consolation, current for centuries, were compromised by nineteenth- and twentieth-century ideas of progress and identity (as they were in Turkey with the fall of the ottoman empire). For christian thought as for Bediuzzaman Said Nursi these themes reached a crisis in the 1920s, against a background of political and economic restructuring after the First World War and the intellectual modernism that accompanied it. The grief and melancholy that followed that war inspired divergent responses, some religious some not, but all with a profound sense of the challenges and responsibilities of being human.

i think the concept of huzun informs the question of what was happening in those years, and i want to discover something of what that means for how one interprets both Nursi and european modernism. This argument is not intended to demonstrate that Nursi was a modernist, just as it is not intended to show that literary modernism is inherently religious.[548] rather, my point is that both Nursi and modernism perceive the need to respond to the challenge of an enormous crisis of cultural identity, and even though they respond in very different ways the necessity to respond is marked by the same melancholic realisation that things have unalterably changed. i am interested by the integrity of Nursi’s religious response to that melancholic realisation, and what that integrity tells us about the relationship between christianity and islam on the question of the resurrection of the dead.[549]

The First World War remains the greatest of all assaults on european thought and identity, outstripping the later global conflict in its all-consuming destruction of our social convictions and political beliefs. its impact in the West has been the subject of endless study and debate: in Turkey, too, the questions that return to 1918 and the relationship between ottoman empire and europe continue to shape contemporary discussion (particularly with integration into the european Community a significant issue).[550] The First World War was the great dislocation between past and present – between the high culture of the Victorian era and its dismemberment in the twentieth century – and the 1920s the crucible in which critical responses to that dislocation forged. in the West those critical responses were often fashioned in the guises of a developing secularisation, with the established churches at first relatively incapable of making sustained counter-demonstrations to the social and political changes unleashed by the War.[551] Nursi’s response to these same events, however, was markedly different and sheds remarkable light on the period as one of decisive religious significance, most notably for the writing of the Risale-i Nur.

The First World War was a great trauma for Nursi, as Şükran Vahide notes:

The ottoman defeat, which as the holders of the caliphate was interpreted by the victors as a defeat of Islam, and the final demise of the Empire and occupation by foreign forces, as well as the long years of war and captivity, had all affected Nursi deeply and taken their toll on his health.[552]

in his own way (quite different to those in the West), Nursi then goes through the same catharsis experienced by the West, years of hope then disillusion then the emergence of a renewed understanding of the heart and study of islam. hope and disillusion marked Nursi’s experiences in istanbul and ankara, including his concerns about the developing government of the secular Turkish state. renewed understanding came in the form of Nursi’s Risale, in which his exposition of islamic beliefs about the resurrection of the dead emerges.[553] Nursi’s Risale has been the subject of immense study, of course, and the links between that text and the period 1918–23 are well known.[554] What has been less clearly examined, however, is the degree to which Nursi’s critical response to the aftermath of the First World War, and his return to a deeper understanding of islam, contrasts so revealingly with the situation in Western europe, where the cultural response to social and political crisis for the most part was against faith, not for it. in this chapter i will be concerned with that critical contrast, not in order to make spurious connections between Nursi and a modernist response that he did not know and would have had no sympathy with if he had known it, but rather to demonstrate something of Nursi’s power to illuminate worlds of thought that lie beyond his immediate concerns.

The argument will begin with an identification of some of the key features of Nursi’s thought in 1918–24, before moving on to a contrast with the intellectual origins of european literary modernism in the same period, particularly in the work of T.S. Eliot and Ezra Pound. I will then draw out the influence of dante alighieri on both eliot and Pound before, in the chapter’s main part, comparing the though of Nursi and dante on the question of resurrection, for Nursi discussed in the Tenth Word of the Risale and for dante as revealed in the Divine Comedy.[555] a section drawing together the ways in which Nursi’s achievements cast light on a singularly important period in european thought and culture, one that continues to inform european senses of its unity to this day, will conclude this analysis.

Said Nursi 1918–194 in his essay’s section on istanbul and the emergence of the new said, Vahide notes:

From his own descriptions, it was ‘the contemplation of death (rabita-i-mevt) and the overwhelming realisation of his own age (in fact he was forty-five) and the transitory nature of things that sparked off the mental and spiritual crisis that was finally resolved with the emergence of the New Said.[556]

That transformation can be dated to Nursi’s return to istanbul in June 1918, after two years in a Russian prison camp, and his subsequent reflection on both his experiences and his faith. “The transformation probably began in the second half of 1920 and was completed by the end of 1921,” notes Vahide, after which Nursi set to work developing his new critical perspective.[557] Nursi then travels to ankara towards the end of 1922, where he is disillusioned by the new Turkish government, before leaving for Van in april 1923. Nursi leaves Van in 1925 and, after a short period in Burdur, finds his home in Barla. The key writings of this period, including the Tenth Word on the resurrection of the dead, form the basis of the Risale that Nursi began in Burdur and Barla.

The most interesting intellectual feature of this early period, prior to the great work on resurrection in the Risale and found in the earlier al-Mathnawi al-arabi al-nuri, is perhaps Nursi's work in Katre (A Droplet) on the "four words and phrases" that summed up his insights at the time.[558] The four words and phrases, all related to method or the form of critical inquiry associated with the new said, are that all things signify beyond themselves, demonstrate divine cause, reveal divine intention, and are understood by a distinctive viewpoint or perspective. The first three words or phrases properly understood belong to explicitly theological concerns and will be considered below in terms of Nursi's work on the resurrection of the dead. The question of perspective, however, while axiomatically theological for Nursi, also allows of literary or hermeneutic interpretation, and as such forms a significant bridge to European literary modernism of the same period.

Perspective, as Vahide acknowledges, is the point at which Nursi brings together the heart and intellect, god and the world, the natural and the divine.[559] Properly (that is, theologically) understood, as Nursi insists, perspective means that the viewpoint of the inquirer is itself transformed by the subject viewed, in faith (hence perspective rather than viewpoint, where stance or position is crucial to the former but not the latter). To acknowledge the theological dimension of perspective, however, is also to acknowledge that it can be denied; therefore, that god's order and providence, which the inquirer discerns in perspective, can be rejected or denied because of other concerns or issues. For Nursi such a denial would be both an abomination and strictly nonsensical, since it would involve a denial of one's own existence as much as god's.

it is, however, a denial that lies at the heart of ezra Pound's modernism, as revealed by his famous declaration that "i haven't an aquinas-map; aquinas not valid now."[560] The contrast here between Pound and Nursi is as marked as it could be. Pound, on behalf of modernism, declares the old maps invalid and urges on poetry and thought to discover and embrace new maps for human knowledge and understanding. Nursi, by contrast, argues for something very different: the identification of new ways back to the old maps, to follow the old maps with renewed faith.[561] The tension between old and new is a key distinction between Nursi's response to modernism and that of such western writers as T.s. eliot and ezra Pound.

 Eliot, Pound, Dante

ezra Pound is one of the great mysteries of western religious thought in the 1920s and 30s, because western thought has generally overlooked Pound's influence on such questions.[562] That oversight is unsurprising given Pound's general antipathy to religion, as noted in the comment cited above; but his antipathy holds some useful ideas, too. What Pound really objected to in this comment was the sense in which people attempted to map out a devotional journey, with indexed points of reference along the way. Pound's general point was that any attempt to fix one particular understanding of the world, even one including god, is inappropriate for modernity.[563] at its most charitable, Pound's reading supposes that a dependence upon religious authority (in the guise of Thomas aquinas) is redundant, obsolete in a world that has developed beyond the limits of theological liminality.[564] More harshly, Pound suggests that such a religious loyalty blinds one to the real nature of human journeying, in the sense that for Pound human existence is just such a journey towards knowledge and understanding, rather than a fideistic journey without or beyond knowledge, as Pound thinks it is in religion.

T.s. eliot articulates similar thoughts in his epic poem The Waste Land, dedicated to ezra Pound ("il miglior fabbro" as eliot calls him, quoting dante).[565] eliot is not as explicit as Pound is in his rejection of the religious journey, but some of the lines of "The Burial of the Dead," the first poem from The Waste Land, come close to evoking a similar world:

unreal city,

under the brown fog of a winter dawn, A crowd flowed over London Bridge, so many, i had not thought death had undone so many. sighs, short and infrequent, were exhaled,

And each man fixed his eyes before his feet.

Flowed up the hill and down King William street,

To where saint Mary Woolnoth kept the hours

With a dead sound on the final stroke of nine.[566]

To some degree eliot is developing some of the clearer themes of 1920s modernism, in his allusion to the godless existential journey that all men must make, devoid now of illusions in the aftermath of the First World War.[567] The implicit reference to hell – “i had not thought death had undone so many” – captures the desolation experienced by this generation, a desolation unencumbered by spiritual consolation. The notion here of journey, however, also resonates with a deeper (albeit compromised) religious sense in its evocation of dante’s Divine Comedy, in which dante’s own journey takes him down to similar “unreal cities” that one recognises in The Waste Land. The next lines of “The Burial of the dead’,” moreover – “There I saw one I knew, and stopped him, crying: ‘Stetson! /You who were with me in the ships of Mylae!’ …”[568] – invoke the same collision between the classical and the contemporary that dante made such a feature of his own poem. Whereas in dante the tensions are between the classical and the medieval, however, in eliot they are between the classical, the medieval, and the modern: the extra layer is part of the need to bring dante’s thought world into contrast with some of the modernist sensibilities already seen in Pound.

The concept of huzun sheds light on this question, since to characterize part of eliot’s response as melancholy draws out something of the desire and longing that lies at the heart of The Waste Land, and which is an important feature of eliot’s poetry as a whole. Pound’s response to the same experiences, by contrast, is more one of grief and anger, emotions that while melancholic are viscerally so, without the sense of detachment that one finds at the heart of Eliot’s poem. Nursi, interestingly, echoes something of eliot’s detachment, but does so in a more religiously active sense: as Pamuk notes about huzun, melancholy in this sense is always a matter of detached engagement, or perhaps engaging detachment: either way the abiding human experience is one of a longing that has a focus and a goal: god.

There is an interesting contrast here between this kind of literary interpretation and the model of Qur’anic reading adopted by Nursi.[569] in the opening note to the Tenth Word, Nursi writes:

The reasons for my writing these treatises in the form of metaphor, comparisons and stories are to facilitate comprehension and to show how rational, appropriate, well-founded and coherent are the truths of islam. The meaning of the stories is contained in the truths that conclude them; each story is like an allusion pointing to its concluding truth. Therefore, they are not mere fictitious tales, but veritable truths.[570]

Nursi’s work is to open up the truth of the Qur’an by showing people the character of their relations with god through faith and by telling them parables – “metaphors, comparisons and stories” – that illuminate that truth.[571] Nursi’s stress throughout, though, is upon the continuities between god and the world, whereas in the kind of modernism exemplified by Pound and Eliot it is discontinuity that is highlighted: they are concerned with alienation rather than the reconciliation that Nursi wishes to confess and proclaim for true believers in god. Nursi wants us to have answers to our questions: it is not clear that Pound and eliot agree.[572]

The reference to the ships of Mylae in The Waste Land, and even more the broader reference to Pound’s influence, throws into relief the wider interpretive question, one that starts to make greater sense if one considers the transitions from the classical to dante and on to Pound and eliot in the 1920s. Pound begins his Cantos with an extended reference to Book Xi of homer’s Odyssey:

and then went down to the ship, set keel to breakers, forth on the godly sea, and We set up mast and sail on that swart ship, Bore sheep aboard her, and our bodies also heavy with weeping, and winds from sternward Bore us out onward with bellying canvas, circe’s this craft, the trim-coifed goddess.[573]

The stimulus here is Pound’s interest in the emblematic quality of the sense of journey itself, and he selects a high point of the most heroic journey from antiquity to announce the same virtues that must inform the quintessentially modern journey towards self-understanding.[574] More directly significant, however, is the immediate reference – “Bore sheep aboard her” – that prefigures the fast-approaching confirmation of “A sheep to Tiresias only, black and a bell-sheep.”[575] For it is this same Tiresias whom Odysseus has been commanded to find by Circe in Book X of the Odyssey, across “the stream of ocean to where there is a narrow shore and the groves of Persephone – tall black poplars and willows.”[576] From there he must travel down to hades to consult Tiresias on how he is to return home:

and anticlea came, whom i beat off, and then Tiresias Theban Holding his gold wand, knew me, and spoke first:

“a second time? why? man of ill star,

Facing the sunless dead and this joyless region? stand from the fosse, leave me my bloody bever

For soothsay.” and i stepped back, and he strong with the blood, said then: “odysseus shalt return through spiteful neptune, over dark seas, lose all companions.”[577]

in Pound’s poem Tiresias’ prophecy is at odds with homer’s own description of odysseus’ return to ithaca, echoing instead dante’s unique description of the traveler’s end in canto XXVi of the Inferno:

We all rejoiced, but soon it turned to grief; For from the unknown land a storm blew up and struck against the fore part of the ship.

Three times it turned her round, with all the waters; at the fourth turn it raised the stern aloft, and the head went down, as it pleased another it should, until the sea again closed over us. (Inferno XXVi, 136–42)[578]

The shift here, from Pound to Homer to Dante and back again to Pound, is difficult.[579]

Yet the move has been foretold in Pound’s own poem, as early as Tiresias’ first words to odysseus: “a second time? why? man of ill star, /Facing the sunless dead and this joyless region?” The latin original used by Pound at this point reads: Cur iterum o infelix linquens lumen Solis/ Venisti, ut videas mortuos, et iniucundam regionem? – [Why again, oh unfortunate one, have you come here to see the dead and this unpleasant region?] – and is an echo of Virgil’s quod si tantus amor menti, si tanta cupido est/ bis Stygios innare lacus, bis nigra videre/ Tartara – [But if such love is in your heart, if such yearning, twice to swim the stygian lake, twice to see black Tartarus], from Book Vi of the Aeneid.[580] The echo – impossible to homer, but made real for Pound because of his use of divus’ medieval latin translation of the Odyssey – brings Pound’s odysseus where homer’s can never travel and where, paradoxically but significantly, Homer himself will never come, namely the lower circles of hell.

Nursi is fully familiar with the concept of hell: “in the whole world there is no truer report, no firmer claim, no more apparent truth than this. The world is without doubt a field, and the resurrection a threshing-floor, a harvest. Paradise and hell are each storehouses for the grain.”[581] The point of the concepts of Paradise and hell is not to throw into relief or contrast the nature of our isolation as in literary modernism, however, but rather to confirm the character of belief in god’s creation: “Faith, then, follows inevitably on the observation of the world, unless one is drunk on misguidance.”[582] Nursi is not interested in discussing the resurrection of the dead because he thinks that by describing the nature of these places one can steer people towards a truth that somehow lies within human being. rather, the link between this world and the beyond is one of complementarity: they reveal each other in perfect symmetry:

it is not possible that the Wise, Powerful and Merciful creator of this world, which is like an exhibition, or a testing-ground, or a field, should not also create a hereafter in which the purposes of this world shall be made manifest.[583]

Nursi’s work on the resurrection of the dead is in fact a theological discussion of the meaning of life understood as a pilgrimage, a journey back towards and with god. What there is here in the western modernist tradition, by contrast, is not one intriguing journey, nor even simply two, but rather three (with an allusion to a fourth journey, aeneas’): odysseus’ journey in homer, in Pound, and in dante. The homeric original is simplest, because it works straightforwardly as narrative. Pound’s version, though in truth a poetic corruption, is purposive because it outlines the essential parameters of the modern quest for identity: to achieve knowledge and understanding, up to and beyond death, now stripped of its mythical religiosity and outfitted in a new metaphysics.[584] dante’s account, by contrast – though it agrees with Pound on odysseus’ death by drowning – takes him on a darker road, down beyond the rivers acheron, styx, and Phlegethon, and on to the eighth cleft of Malebolge, reserved for souls guilty of the fraudulent use of intellect and eloquence, as employed by Odysseus in persuading his companions to their final course:

i worked my friends to such a pitch of keenness

With that little speech, for carrying on the journey,

That afterwards i could hardly have held them back ...(Inferno XXVi, 121–3)[585]

odysseus’ crime is far deeper than solely a sin of deceit, however, notwithstanding dante’s forthright condemnation of that failing. odysseus’ true offence is against the divinely imposed limits on natural reason and human knowledge, and in traveling beyond the confines of the known world Odysseus offended not simply against Virgil’s moral injunction, but also against those doctrines of Trinity and incarnation that are so closely related to the quia, the gift of faith.[586] odysseus’ true offence is to depart not simply from the path of right knowledge and understanding, suitably limited, but also from the path of christ – an offence that Pound well understood, since his interest in odysseus is because he offers modernity a model of what stephen sicari has called “the epic ambition.”[587] The literary motif here for that epic ambition (and offence) is descent; for just as odysseus descends to seek out Tiresias, and just as Aeneas descends to the Underworld to find his father Anchises, so Christ too descends unto hell.[588] The purpose of these three descents, however, as with the purpose of the three journeys, is very different. odysseus and aeneas descend to hell to seek information for their own ends, virtuous or not. christ descends to redeem those who might be redeemed, a journey dante repeats, with Virgil as his guide, as he descends in the footsteps of Christ, the first living Christian ever to do so.[589]

 Nursi on the Resurrection of the Dead in the conclusion to the Tenth Word, Nursi writes: “For even a master of philosophy such as Ibn-I Sina said that ‘resurrection cannot be understood by rational criteria’,” an insight that characterizes the entire text.[590] On first sight the modernist themes i have explored here have little in common with the thought world of Nursi's Risale, and his representation of the resurrection of the dead fails to resonate with either Pound's epic ambition or the specific details of the journeys into the afterlife made by aeneas, odysseus, and dante. as Nursi makes clear in the Tenth Word of the Risale, however:

There is … a realm apart from the present one. in it, there is a supreme tribunal, a lofty place of justice, an exalted place of reward, where all this compassion, wisdom, mercy and justice will be made fully manifest (eleventh aspect).[591]

Just as in dante's Divine Comedy, therefore, Nursi's Risale wants to speak of Paradise as a distinct place, with distinct characteristics, "gardens and treasuries full of the pure and elevated originals of the samples and shapes we see in this world."[592] Nursi spends less time than a writer like dante in describing that Paradise, however, preferring instead to concentrate upon the relationship between this world and what lies beyond. That relationship focuses upon the role of a tribunal or court in which just decisions about one's worth in life will be set towards reward (or punishment) after death, as Nursi argues in the Tenth Word in the context of one of his several narratives:

This implies that proceedings at some great concourse and meeting will be based on what happens here. Further, the results of all that occurs here will be permanently displayed at some supreme exposition. all the transient and fluctuating phenomena we see here will yield the fruit of eternal and immutable form (Tenth aspect).[593]

The urgent question for Nursi, therefore, is how one gets from this world to what lies beyond; that is, the resurrection of the dead. The question of resurrection is the question of transition, but a transition that is understood in terms of just continuity between this world and the beyond. it is the point Nursi makes throughout the Tenth Word: "Since man is not called to account and judged in fitting fashion while in this world, it follows that he must proceed to a supreme Tribunal and a final felicity."[594] What one does not find in the Risale, consequently, is any account of a descriptive journey through Paradise or hell. on the contrary, Nursi wants us to understand the world: “For the magnificent cosmos is a palace that has the sun and the moon as its lamps and the stars as its candles; time is like a rope or ribbon hung within it, on to which the glorious creator each year threads a new world.”[595] The point of the new world’s motif is to make us understand our role in worshipping god by embracing his providence: to understand the purity of his purpose by affirming the miracles of creation, a point Islam shares with Judaism and christianity.

There are some interesting things happening in the texts considered here on this question of “transition,” which one might define as the process whereby one moves from one discrete realm to another, however such movement is itself understood. in the Divine Comedy dante famously does not “move” at all, if by “movement” one means some act of agency: he simply finds himself at the entrance to Hell and enters (Inferno ii, 142). aeneas, by contrast, like odysseus, must bid for entrance, and entrance is permitted because of purpose: aeneas and odysseus are suffered to enter the underworld because their journeys there are predestined and in that sense provided.[596] For both dante and aeneas, however, there is some place that they transit to; they change location, though living, to the places of the dead. in eliot and Pound, by contrast, notions of locus and transition are internalized: they are understood rationally not as distinct places but as existential possibilities. resurrection from the dead, if it has any meaning at all in such modernist texts as The Waste Land and the Cantos, is something one must do for oneself: there is no supreme court, to cite Nursi’s own motif from the same period.[597]

The first thing one can say about transition in the Risale, by contrast, is that Nursi does not appear to be interested either in physical relocation (living or dead) or in the internalization of existential possibilities. rather, Nursi appears to deploy a commonplace sense of life and death in which the cessation of the former leads immediately to the latter, as one state gives way to the next. Transition between the two, therefore, is not a complex issue if the kind of complexity one seeks is either descriptive or philosophical. again, Nursi is not interested in setting up a compelling intellectual argument that positions doctrine in some kind of winning position. rather, Nursi’s purpose is always to turn people back towards god’s mercy, which one can know this side of resurrection.

Transition is complex, however, when one considers the causality that lies behind the transition, understood theologically as in the Risale. That causation is god’s, and the way humans know it is morally. We live morally or immorally, argues Nursi: that quality, in turn, is recognized by god and rewarded. resurrection from the dead is not a physical process, therefore, so much as a function of divine grace: it is god’s gift to just lives, and his punishment to the unjust. as Nursi writes in the second Truth:

Is it possible that the Lord of this world, Who in His works demonstrates infinite generosity, infinite mercy, infinite splendour and infinite glory, should not give reward in a manner befitting His generosity and mercy, and not punish in a manner befitting His splendour and glory?[598]

The key question about resurrection as transition, therefore, is finally how we have responded in this life to the mercy, splendor and glory that god has revealed in his bounty, and which we should embrace morally and faithfully. not to do so is not to recognize god, as Nursi makes clear in the Tenth Word: “The worst error and misguidance of the students of philosophy, the people of unbelief and the instinctual soul, lies in not recognising god.”[599] at heart, therefore, Nursi’s doctrine of the resurrection of the dead is a teaching about the love of god and humanity’s right response to that love. i take it that this argument tells us a great deal about Nursi’s understanding of islam, and as much about the new said’s motivation in beginning the Risale with a sustained critique of the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead. it also makes sense of Nursi’s otherwise opaque aphorism from the Tenth Word:

There is nothing that makes impossible the gathering of resurrection, and much that necessitates it.[600] it is this sense of a contrast between the apparent contingency of human existence and the necessity of divine grace that informs Nursi’s entire theology, and which creates a link to the intellectual world of the Divine Comedy.

 Dante and the Resurrection of the Dead

There are some significant similarities between Nursi’s teaching and Dante’s Divine Comedy, therefore, albeit in the latter text articulated via the traditional language of medieval Catholic theology. Significantly, however, Dante places the doctrinal point in the context of a discussion of the salvation of non-christians. The fourth canto of the Inferno is one of the most significant theological passages of the entire poem, because it deals directly with christian doctrine at a key juncture, and because it relates an understanding of that doctrine which will in turn inform some of dante’s most pressing concerns, particularly the clash between the redemption of certain virtuous pagans and, to dante’s great sorrow, the endless grief of many of his greatest heroes. There has already been a way into the issue here in the third canto of the Purgatorio:

“and you have seen some whose desires would Have been satisfied, desiring fruitlessly, Which is their lot in their eternal grief:

i speak of aristotle and Plato and many more.” and here he bent his head, and said no more, and he continued troubled (Purgatorio iii, 40–5).[601]

The central idea here is that aristotle and Plato and many others are “desiring fruitlessly.” Virgil does not tell us why this is the case here, but dante provides a full answer in the fourth canto of the Inferno:

The master said: “are you not going to ask What spirits these are which you see in this place? i think you should know, before you go on;

They have committed no sin, and if they have merits,

That is not enough, because they are not baptized, Which all must be, to enter the faith which is yours.

and, if they lived before the christian era, They did not adore god as he should be adored: and i am one of those in that position.

For these deficiencies, and no other fault,

We are lost; there is no other penalty

Than to live here without hope, but with desire” (Inferno iV, 31–42).[602]

dante immediately shows that he knows exactly whom Virgil is speaking of: “it grieved my heart when i heard him say that, / Because i knew there were people of high value / Who were in that limbo, as it were suspended” (Inferno iV, 43–5).[603] in case there were any confusion, however, dante appends a long list of these “people of high value” in lines 88–144, beginning with homer, horace, ovid, and lucan, and ending with avicenna and averrhoes.[604]

That is not the only significant passage in this canto, however, because prior to the listing of these “people of high value,” Virgil answers dante’s question:

“But sir,” i said, “will you explain to me,” i asked because i wanted to be certain about the faith which overcomes all error:

“did anyone, either through his own merit, or through another’s, ever get out of here and achieve blessedness?” he understood What i implied, and said: “When i was new here, i saw a powerful spirit come this way, crowned with the insignia of victory.

He took away the shade of our first parent, With that of abel and his son, the shade of noah and of Moses, the obedient law-giver,

With the patriarch abraham, and david the king, israel with his father and his children, and with rachel, for whom he did so much;

and many others, and he made them blessed; i think that you should know, that before these,

There were no human spirits who were saved” (Inferno iV, 46–63).[605]

The juxtaposition, therefore, is clear: on the one hand, people of high value who were not redeemed when christ harrowed hell and who yet remain in limbo, living there without hope but with desire; on the other, many patriarchs and mighty figures of the old Testament whom the powerful spirit, crowned with the insignia of victory, took away on holy saturday.[606] What is not as clear in the narrative is why this separation took place, and what it was that these people of high value, who had committed no sin, had done wrong sufficient to deserve their endless grief in Hell.

dante provides an answer in line 38: “They did not adore god as he should be adored …”. The italian here – non adorar debitamente a Dio – echoes the latin found in Thomas’s commentary on the Fourth gospel, 3:5, remarking on the works of pagans: “Nec etiam omnia bene operabantur, quia Deo cultum debitum non reddebant” – [nor were they wont to do all things well, because they did not pay due honour to god.] [607] The point is a significant one because Virgil, too, remarks earlier that even if these pagans have committed no sins and have merits, this by itself is insufficient if either they have not been baptized, or did not adore god as he should be adored (Inferno iV, 34–9).

That Virgil introduces a pair of alternatives here is crucial because it reiterates the distinction between the contingent and the necessary. The key point is not that all must be baptized, because although that is necessary to enter the christian faith, it clearly is not the only means to salvation, as neither adam nor abraham nor any of the others redeemed from limbo were ever baptized. rather, baptism itself is a contingent sign of something deeper, namely the right disposition towards god: to adore god as god ought to be adored. With this disposition, even if born many centuries before christ and many miles from Bethlehem, abraham was redeemed. Without it odysseus, who traveled beyond the limits of the known world and who twice journeyed to the underworld, is condemned to everlasting torment.[608]

This is a crucial tension, one that will be rehearsed throughout the Inferno and the Purgatorio and which will in turn inform dante’s eventual enlightenment in the Paradiso (especially canto XiX). Inferno iV is both about an event – christ’s descent into hell – and also a central theme of theological anthropology. “To adore god as god ought to be adored” is not simply a function of baptism (though baptism should always entail the adoration of god), and certainly not a quality gained by ceaseless study of beauty, truth, and goodness; for if it were the latter, then Virgil would have been redeemed from hell in the company of the others he watched pass by with christ. rather, “to adore god as god ought to be adored” is a point about fundamental ontology: it is an argument about what human beings can do without knowledge of christ, and even before the time and place of the incarnation.

Nursi would recognize this point entirely: “The worst error and misguidance of the students of philosophy, the people of unbelief and the instinctual soul, lies in not recognizing god,” as has been seen before.[609] not recognizing god, or not adoring god as he ought to be adored, is the same failing: the failure to understand one’s life in this world as always being in continuity with god and always before god’s love and justice. Nursi and dante have very different worlds, and very different beliefs in some respects. But in the final analysis they both understand the question of what lies beyond this world not as one of physical location so much as spiritual transfiguration: becoming one with god’s grace and truth, for “to god belongs the mystery of the heavens and the earth” (Qur’an 16:77). That mystery is the mystery of resurrection.

 Said Nursi’s Contribution to An Understanding of Dante, European Literary Modernism and the Question of the Resurrection of the Dead

These parts of the Divine Comedy are overlaid with a deep christological structure, one that shapes the narrative development of dante’s argument: it is, in this sense, a poem about being reunited with Beatrice by encountering the risen lord, his work and his glory. The fact that it is the Risen lord that always shadows dante’s path, however, makes the connection with Nursi that much more evocative. To state the point as bluntly as possible, both dante and Nursi are employing very similar language about the pilgrim way of the believer confronted by eternity.

i think there are three crucial lessons that christian thought, after dante, should learn from an engagement with Nursi. First, “to adore god as god ought to be adored” is not a relic from the medieval past: it is, rather, the prayerful essence of religion, and in a world that is forgetting how to be truly religious – and one which is seeing today the results of western incomprehension of significant religious belief in the Middle east – Nursi’s reminder that prayer is about worship and that worship means the practice of love is an invaluable lesson. Nursi is not concerned about the resurrection of the dead because he wishes to prove certain assertions about the destination and even location of our departed souls. he is concerned because resurrection is about returning to god from our journeys through the world. such oneness is not the opposite of separation. oneness is who we learn we are, through a lifetime of remembering.

second, and in direct response to both the spiritual vacuum created by the First World War and modernism’s responses to it, Nursi insists that a world in which cultural models of eternity replace god’s grace is a world that has lost touch with its own realities. ezra Pound’s “i haven’t an aquinas-map; aquinas not valid here," may therefore be a brilliant insight into the historic character of the 1920s and 30s in europe, but it cannot be an option for truly religious peoples, whatever their faith. in their different ways writers like Pound, eliot, Joyce, Fitzgerald, Mann, Kafka, canetti and hesse give us a wide range of challenging maps for tracing paths through the modernist world. as Nursi rightly observes in a different context, however, the challenge today is not to discover new maps but to learn again how to follow the old ones. The oldest map of all, the one tracing the way with god, is resurrection from the dead.

Third, and arguably most importantly, Nursi reminds us that tracing this map with god is a moral endeavor. Being religious means being ethical, not as an optional extra but as the defining characteristic of being called before God in His creation. even more than that, however, Nursi insists that being ethical is something that we do together: that even though we hear god's word individually, we understand it collectively. The modernist turn, stephen sicari's "epic ambition," realizes itself as a world of individual quests, most powerfully evoked in Joyce's litany for stephen daedalus. Nursi by contrast tells us again and again that other people are not points of collision as we pick out our own route through the debris of life. other people are our life, because in them we meet god. resurrection of the dead, our collective fate, tells us more than that we all share a common fate, therefore. it tells us that we are bound together by god for a purpose, and that god has provided for that purpose. such is Nursi's understanding of god's ordered and provided world: that we rise together as we have lived together, prayerfully and morally.

if the pathway towards such unity is compassion, both god's and ours, then huzun too, melancholy, plays its part. in the Fifth Truth of the Tenth Word Nursi asks us to imagine traveling back in time to the arabian Peninsula, there to imagine the Prophet "performing his duties and engaging in worship." in a wonderful passage, Nursi writes:

he is praying for so universal a need – immortality – that not merely the people of this earth, but also the inhabitants of the heavens and the entirety of creation are participating in his supplications and silently proclaiming, "yes, o lord! grant his prayer; we too desire it." he petitions for everlasting bliss with such touching sadness, in so yearning, so longing, and so pleading

a fashion, that he causes the whole of the cosmos to weep and thus to share in his prayer.[610]

Nursi’s work on the resurrection of the dead, and indeed the Risale as a whole, causes us to remember that, although the landscape of religious belief is too often torn by conflict, not least in tensions between the three great monotheistic faiths, nevertheless we share a faith born of our desire to be one with god and our sadness that this unity appears to lie beyond this world. such appearances, however, point us towards a deeper truth, albeit one grasped in humility: that humanity, “the highest form of life and possessor of an eternal soul,” is drawn constantly towards eternity.[611] No matter what the conflicts of this world, the hope of eternity transcends time and draws us together as one. Nursi’s Risale continues to teach us this truth.

 13. Said Nursi’s approach to Justice and its role for Political reforms in the Muslim World

Leonid R. Sykiainen

The significance of any prominent thinker’s ideas is determined not only by their intellectual content, their orientation to fundamental sources and convincing quality of argument, but primarily by the role those ideas play at the moment when a society is undergoing a crisis or confronting problems which need to be solved in order to secure its future. outstanding thinkers can only be described as great if their views affect not only the consciousness and behavior of some limited groups or even nations, but also if they influence the mode of thinking of the whole of mankind or at least a numerous religious community such as Muslims in our World.

among those thinkers Said Nursi occupies an honorable place for Said Nursi’s thoughts are directly linked with the present situation in the Muslim countries as well as with the role islam plays there. Said Nursi is not a political thinker in the proper sense but the political future of the above mentioned nations can be predicted more profoundly if his ideas are taken into account because he contributed much to the understanding of islam and its role in today's world. But in any case when discussing this issue it is necessary to start with the analysis of Said Nursi's approach to islam and shari'ah in general.

 Islam as Belief and Righteous Action as a Muslim thinker he considers islam and the Qur'an to be a comprehensive universal system of allah's provisions which concern every side of human life and embrace the past, the present and the future of all mankind. stressing this point, Said Nursi underlines that the Qur'an caused a transformation in social life in this world in so luminous, happy, and truthful a fashion, and brought about such a revolution in both men's souls, and hearts, and spirits, and minds, and in their personal lives, social lives, and political lives, and continued and directed that revolution. also, the Qur'an is a founder; it is the basis of the clear religion, and the foundation of the world of islam. it changed human social life, and is the answer to the repeated questions of its various classes.[612]

The thinker believes that in expounding secondary matters of the shari'ah and laws of social life, the Qur'an at once raises the views of those it addresses to elevated, universal points, and transforming a simple style into an elevated one and instruction in the shari'ah to instruction in divine unity, it shows it is both a book of law, commands and wisdom, and a book of the tenets of faith and belief. But for Said Nursi the main feature of islam consists in the indissoluble combining of ideas and religious values together with their implementation in practice. in this regard he intentionally points out that islam, as a religion, does not consist only of belief; its second half is righteous action.[613] Said Nursi's approach to islam becomes apparently clearer when he distinguishes the leading islamic values saying that love, brotherhood, and affection are basic to islam, and they are its bond. Fairness and favorable thinking mark the islamic character.[614] at the same time the thinker pays special attention to the general attitude of islam towards the fundamentals and the main goals of human life arguing that the Qur'anic wisdom supports truth instead of force. it takes virtue and god's pleasure as its aims in place of benefits. It takes the principle of mutual assistance as the principle of life in place of the principle of conflict. And it takes the ties of religion, class, and country to be the ties bonding communities. islam aims at forming a barrier against the lusts of the soul, urging the spirit to sublime matters, satisfying the high emotions, and urging man to the human perfections, making him a true human being. and the mark of the truth is accord. The mark of virtue is solidarity. The mark of mutual assistance is hastening to assist one another. The mark of religion is brotherhood and attraction. islam caused a revolution among mankind, and men drew closer to each other.[615] as a result islam provides for the material progress of man, and indeed urges him towards it. at the same time it provides for man's true progress and development in moral and spiritual matters. This combination forms the basis of true civilization. only in the holy Qur'an and the shari'ah of the Prophet Muhammad the virtues of progress predominate, and the benefits of civilization may be profited from. islam gained for mankind the happiness both of worldly life and of the life of the hereafter; and in the civilization that will grow out of the all-Wise Qur'an, the virtues of civilization will prevail over its evils.[616]

in this respect Nursi acknowledges that the inner look at islam differs from the outside one. For someone who has truly entered into the bounds of islam by conforming precisely to its incontestable matters, the desire to expand is the desire to be perfected. But for someone who may be counted outside those bounds through slackness, the desire to expand is the desire to destroy.[617] The thinker believes that according to its genuine nature the Qur'an is both a book of law and commands and a book of wisdom and guidance, and a book of the tenets of faith and belief, and of invocation and reflection and summons. By its nature the Qur'an comprises many books and teachings. in reality every Qur'an verse has numerous meanings, numerous benefits, and many aspects and levels. In each place its verses are mentioned with a different meaning, for different benefits and purposes. For sure, such a book has no like; it is a wonder, a marvel, a miracle.[618] stressing righteous actions as a real manifestation of the Qur'anic truth Said Nursi pays special attention to the islamic shari'ah which is the practical side of islam and the universal expression of allah's commands given to people. in this regard he distinguishes different levels and meanings of this phenomenon pointing out that there are two shari'ahs. The First is the shari'ah which orders the actions and conduct of man, the microcosm, and proceeds from the attribute of speech. The second is the supreme shari'ah of creation which orders the motion and the rest of the world and proceeds from the attribute of Will.[619] as far as the correlation between these two meanings is concerned Said Nursi draws attention to the fact that the divine command and divine prohibition are the reason in the injunctions and prohibitions of the shari‘ah. advantages and instances of wisdom are to give them weight, and may be the reason for the command or prohibition from the point of view of the divine Will.[620]

Taken as a complex set of practical rules and orders of man’s conduct the shari‘ah comprises different kinds of provisions. Just as there are two sort of rights, personal rights and general rights, which are considered to be a sort of god’s rights, so too in the matters of the shari‘ah, certain matters concern individuals, and others, with regard to generality, concern the public; these last are called “the marks of islam.” since these marks concern all, all participate in them. To interfere in them without the consent of the public is an infringement of the public’s rights. They directly concern the whole World of islam. Thus there are certain matters of the shari‘ah concerning worship which are not tied to the reason, and are done because they are commanded. The reason for them is the command. instances of wisdom or benefits cannot change those matters of “the marks of Islam.”

<right>

Besides, there are other shari‘ah provisions which have “reasonable meaning.”

</right>

That is, they possess some wisdom or benefit by reason of which they have been incorporated into the Shari‘ah. The marks of Islam are sufficient for all peoples in every age. no need has remained for different laws on them. however, in secondary matters which have reasonable meaning the need for different schools has persisted to a degree. Just as clothes change with the change of the seasons and medicines change according to dispositions, so sacred laws change according to the ages, and their ordinances change according to the capacities of peoples. so the secondary matters of the ordinances of the shari‘ah look to human circumstances and come according to them. They could be changed along with the changes in the conditions which people live under. This is the essence of one of the key islamic legal notions which is ijtihad – independent judgments of the law. everyone capable, who is qualified to practise ijtihad, may interpret matters for himself which are not incontestable; and they are binding on himself, but not on others. he cannot make laws and call on the Muslim community to conform to them. his ideas are from the shari‘ah, but they are not the shari‘ah. he may be a mujtahid, but he cannot be the lawmaker.[621]

The practical application of the ijtihad during centuries of islam’s history lead to the emergence of different schools of islamic legal doctrine. Said Nursi touches this issue in detail pointing out the positive results of this process. he recalls a hadith which says: “difference among my people is an instance of divine Mercy.” it is from the confrontation of opinions and the contradiction of views that truth becomes apparent in its full measure. The thinker stresses that the difference intended in the hadith is a positive difference. That is, each party strives to promote and diffuse its own belief; it does not seek to tear down and destroy that of the other, but rather to improve and reform it. negative difference is rejected by the hadith, for it aims in hostile fashion at mutual destruction, and those who are at each other’s throats cannot act positively.

But difference requires partisanship. if it is in the name of truth, it can become a refuge for those seeking their rights. But as for the partisanship which is biased and self-centred, it can only be a refuge for the unjust and a point of support for them. Said Nursi concludes in a very strong manner that if the confrontation of views takes place in the name of justice and for the sake of truth, then the difference concerns only means; there is unity with respect to aim and basic purpose. such a difference makes manifest every aspect of the truth and serves justice and truth. But what emerges from a confrontation of views that is partisan and biased, and takes place for the sake of a tyrannical, evil-commanding soul, that is based on egotism and fame-seeking – what emerges from this is not the “flash of truth,” but the fire of dissension.[622]

This leads us directly to Said Nursi’s attitude to justice.

 “God Commands Justice”

The starting point of Nursi’s approach to justice is recognition that besides the law of human justice there is divine justice which determines the genuine nature of this phenomenon.[623] Such conclusion reflects the fact that justice is one of the leading features of allah and the universe created by him. The whole world manifests his overwhelming justice. That is why one of his names is all-Just.[624]

When explaining this feature, Said Nursi argues that the universe is a palace, but it is such a palace that in it is a city which is being constantly shaken by destruction and reconstruction. and in the city is a country which is being continuously agitated by war and emigration. and within the country is a world which is unceasingly revolving amid death and life. But such an astonishing balance and equilibration prevail in the palace, city, country and world that it self-evidently proves that the transformations, incomings and outgoings apparent in these innumerable beings are being measured and weighed every moment on the scales of a single Being Who sees and supervises the whole universe. Thus, everything is ordered and weighed with so sensitive a balance, so fine a measure, that the human mind can nowhere see any waste or futility.[625] allah demonstrates his dominical sovereignty in the wisdom and order, the justice and equilibrium that pervade all things. all the worlds are within the grasp of his order and balance, and ordering, balancing and his justice.[626] Said Nursi believes there is a proof that all things are done with justice and balance. The fact that all things are endowed with being, given shape and put in their appropriate place in accordance with precise equilibrium and in appropriate measure, shows that all matters are done in accordance with infinite justice and balance. Similarly, the fact that all things are given their rights in accordance with their disposition, that they receive all the necessities of their being and all the requirements of life in the most fitting form – this too is the sign left by a hand of infinite justice. Again, the fact that answer is always given to every petition and request made by the tongue of disposition, and of natural need or necessity, demonstrates the existence of infinite justice and wisdom.[627] all this is seen in a clearest manner in the Qur’an. Said Nursi quotes its famous verse: “god commands justice, the doing of good, and liberality to kith and kin, and he forbids all shameful deeds, and injustice and rebellion” (16:90). The thinker explains this verse and other Qur’anic provisions saying that the politics of civilization sacrifice the minority for the comfort of the majority. Indeed, the despotic minority sacrifices the majority of people for itself. Qur’anic justice would not take the life of a single innocent, spill their blood, or sacrifice him even for all mankind, let alone the majority.

The verse, “if anyone slew a person – unless it be for murder or for spreading mischief in the land – it would be as if he slew the whole people” (5:32), lays two mighty mysteries before the eyes. one is pure justice. This sublime principle deems equal the individual and the community, the person and mankind; divine justice sees no difference between them; this is a constant sunna. an individual may sacrifice his rights himself, but they cannot be sacrificed otherwise, even for all mankind. The canceling of his rights, or the spilling of his blood, or the smearing of his name is equal to the canceling of the rights of all humanity, or the besmirching of it, and is its equivalent. The second mystery is this: if a selfish man murders an innocent out of greed or passion, he will lay waste the whole world if he can, should it be an obstacle to his desires, and wipe out all humanity.[628]

The total justice in the universe proceeding from the greatest manifestation of the name of all-Just, administers the balance of all things. Mentioning the word “balance” four times, these verses in Sura al-Rahman “And the firmament has He raised high, and He has set up the balance [of justice], * In order that you may not transgress [due] balance. * So establish weight with justice and fall not short in the balance” (35:7–9), indicate four degrees and four sorts of balance, showing its immensity and supreme importance in the universe. yes, just as there is no wastefulness in anything, so too in nothing is there true injustice and imbalance.

so, we may understand how basic to human life are the principles of justice, frugality, and cleanliness, which are truths of the Qur’an and islamic principles. and know how closely connected with the universe are the injunctions of the Qur’an, having spread their firm roots everywhere, and that it is impossible to destroy those truths like it is impossible to destroy the universe and change its form.[629]

To sum up, Said Nursi underlines that the pure justice of the Qur’an does not spill the life and blood of an innocent, even for the whole of humanity. The two are the same both in the view of divine Power, and in the view of justice. But through self-interest man becomes such that he will destroy everything that forms an obstacle to his ambition, even the world if he can, and he will wipe out mankind.[630]

The entire balance of the universe enjoins the supreme justice on man. in early history of islam this principle was exercised. For instance the rightly-guided caliphs were leaders of a religious republic the meaning of which was true justice and the freedom of the shari‘ah.[631] But afterwards unfortunately people very often did not act in accordance with the justice which is the principle by which the whole universe and all beings act. it is not by chance for man, whose life is so brief, cannot experience the true essence of justice in this transient world; it is for this reason that matters are postponed for a supreme tribunal. For true justice requires that man, this apparently petty creature, should be rewarded and punished, not in accordance with his pettiness, but in accordance with the magnitude of his crime, the importance of his nature and the greatness of his function. since this passing and transient world is far from manifesting such wisdom and justice for man, who is created for eternity, of necessity there will be an eternal hell and everlasting Paradise of that Just and awesome Possessor of Beauty, that Wise and Beauteous Possessor of awe.[632]

There are two varieties of justice, one affirmative, the other negative. The positive variety consists in giving the deserving his right. This form of justice exists throughout the world in the most obvious fashion, because, as proven in the Third Truth, it observably bestows, in accordance with special balances and particular criteria, all the objects of desire requested by everything from its glorious creator with the tongue of innate capacity, the language of natural need, the speech of necessity, and all the requirements of life and existence. This variety of justice is, then, as certain as life and existence itself.

The other variety of justice, the negative, consists in chastising the unjust; it gives wrongdoers their due by way of requital and punishment. This type of justice is not fully manifest in this world, even though there are countless signs and indications that permit us to sense its true nature. For example, all the chastising blows and punitive lashes that have descended on all rebellious peoples, from the Ad and Thamud to those of the present age, show definitely that an exalted justice dominates the world.[633] in this regard Said Nursi points out that certainly and without doubt, just as the sun cannot be without the day, so that pre-eternal wisdom and eternal justice cannot be without the hereafter. There is no contradiction between the existence and ghastly torments of Hell, and infinite mercy, true justice, and wisdom with its balance and absence of waste. indeed, mercy, justice, and wisdom require its existence. For to punish a tyrant who tramples the rights of a thousand innocents and to kill a savage animal which tears to pieces a hundred cowed animals, is for the oppressed a thousand-fold mercy within justice. While to pardon the tyrant and leave the savage beast free, is for hundreds of wretches a hundred-fold pitilessness in place of that single act of misplaced mercy.[634]at the same time the all-Just provides a positive and negative responsibility for man’s conduct on the earth which represent his unlimited justice for out of his perfect munificence, compassion, and justice, Almighty God has included in good works an immediate reward and in bad actions an immediate punishment.[635] Taking into account the supreme value of the Qur’anic injunctions Said Nursi concludes that justice should be executed in the name of religion so that it may be effective over the mind, heart, and spirit, and they may conform to it. otherwise it affects only the imagination. a criminal is then frightened only of the penalty set by the state, if it is enacted, or he shrinks from the reproaches of the public, if they occur.[636] Said Nursi draws out attention to the fact that even severe punishments established in the Qur’an are more just than any sanctions provided for in criminal codes adopted by state authorities. That is for when the punishments are carried out in the name of the divine commands and dominical justice, both the spirit, and the intellect, and the conscience, and man’s innate subtle faculties are affected and influenced. It is for this reason that the execution of a punishment once in fifty years is more effective than your imprisoning numerous people every day. your penalties affect only your imaginations, for when one of you decides to steal something, suffering a penalty on account the country and nation and its benefits seems imaginary; or he thinks others will condemn him if they know about it; or it occurs to him that if it turns out unfavorably the government will send him to prison. so only his power of imagination feels minor discomfort. and the powerful desire issuing from his instinctual soul and emotions – particularly if he is needy as well – will overpower him. Then the penalty will be ineffective in making him refrain from committing the bad deed. anyway, because they are not a divine command, the penalties are not justice. They are vain and futile like performing the prayers without taking ablutions and not facing the (qibla). That is to say, true justice and effective penalties are those which are in accordance with the divine command and executed in its name. others can have only a minimal effect.[637]

 Social, Economic and Legal Sides of Islamic Justice

When discussing islamic justice Said Nursi distinguishes its different modes and among them a social and economic one. in his view the origin of all revolutions and corruption, and the spur and source of all base morals are just two sayings: “so long as i’m full, what is it to me if others die of hunger?” and “you suffer hardship so that i can live in ease; you work so that i can eat.” The thinker believes that the only remedy for extirpating the First saying is the obligatory payment of zakat. While the remedy for the second is the prohibition of usury and interest. Qur’anic justice stands at the door of the world and says to usury and interest: “no entry! it is forbidden! you don’t have the right to enter here!” Mankind did not heed the command, and received a severe blow. so it must heed it before it receives one even more severe.[638]

The other side of justice manifests itself in equality. Said Nursi underlines very strongly that just as there is obedience and rebellion in the face of the commands of the shari‘ah, so too there is obedience and rebellion in the face of the creative commands in the universe. With regard to the first, the reward and punishment are mostly in the hereafter, while with the second, they are mostly in this world.

For example, the reward of patience is victory; the punishment for idleness is poverty; the reward of effort is wealth, and the reward of constancy, triumph. Justice without equality is not justice. unequal justice is not justice.[639]

This manifestation of justice is apparently seen in accordance with the meaning of the verses: “no bearer of burdens can bear the burden of another” (6:164) and: “if anyone slays a human being – unless it be [in punishment] for murder or for spreading corruption on earth- it shall be as though he had slain all mankind” (5:32). These two verses teach the following principle: others are not answerable for a person’s crime, and, without his consent, an innocent person may not be sacrificed, even for the whole of mankind. If he voluntarily gives his consent and sacrifices himself, his self-sacrifice is a sort of martyrdom and is another matter.

Said Nursi is convinced that these Qur’anic injunctions establish true justice for man and express pure justice. To nurture rancor and enmity towards a believer is like condemning all the innocent attributes found in him on account of one criminal attribute, and is hence an act of great injustice. if you go further and include in your enmity all the relatives of a believer on account of a single evil attribute of his, then, in accordance with the following verse in which the active participle is in the intensive form: “Verily man is much given to wrongdoing” (14:34) you will have committed a still greater sin and transgression, against which truth, the shari‘ah and the wisdom of islam combine to warn you.[640] Said Nursi gives some convincing examples of practical application of islamic justice linked with court decisions. it is because in the administration of justice its essence and the rights of everyone who applies have to preserved without discrimination and the duty of those involved is to work solely for the sake of right. according too this principle during his caliphate, imam ‘ali sat together with a Jew in court and they were tried together. On another occasion, a just judge saw that an official was angry with a delinquent thief when he was cutting off his hand as demanded by the law. he immediately sacked the official, and full of regret said: “Those who up to now have been influenced by their feelings in this way while executing the law have perpetrated great wrongs. yes, even if in executing the law he does not pity the convicted man, he may not be angry; if he is, he is acting tyrannically. if he carries out capital punishment angrily, even if it is in retaliation (qisas), he becomes a sort of murderer.” Thus, in courts of law it is this pure, unbiased truth which rules.[641] Said Nursi mentions another event occurred to imam ‘ali. once he threw an unbeliever to the ground. as he drew his sword to kill him, the unbeliever spat in his face. he released him without killing him. The unbeliever said: “Why did you not kill me?” he replied: “i was going to kill you for the sake of god. But when you spat at me, i became angered and the purity of my intention was clouded by the inclinations of my soul. it is for this reason that i did not kill you.” The unbeliever replied: “if your religion is so pure and disinterested, it must be the truth.” interpreting this Said Nursi underlines that when once a judge showed signs of anger while cutting off the hand of a thief, the just ruler who chanced to observe him dismissed him from his post. For if he had cut the hand in the name of the shari‘ah, his soul would have felt pity for the victim; he would have cut it off in a manner devoid of both anger and mercy. since the inclinations of his soul had had some share in his deed, he did not perform the act with justice.[642] it is therefore totally reasonable that through reviving the shari‘ah of Muhammad and his sunna and the reality of the Qur’an at the end of time, and proclaiming them and putting them into practice, they should display to the world the perfect justice. in other words justice can be achieved only through direct application of the way shown by the Qur’an.[643]

 Mutual Consultation, Freedom and Equality as Pillars of Islamic Justice in Politics

The approach of Said Nursi to justice is a grounding of his attitude towards state power and politics. he stresses that truth and right, and conscience, severely prohibited him from politics and from interfering in government. at the same time the thinker formulates five principles which are necessary, essential, in order to save the social life and nation from anarchy: respect, compassion, refraining from what is prohibited (haram), security, the giving up of lawlessness and being obedient to authority.[644] But these requirements are to be observed only if the politics of the present are not founded on self-interest. unfortunately the politics of civilization sacrifice the minority for the comfort of the majority. Indeed, the despotic minority sacrifices the majority of people for themselves. Politics which revolves around benefit is savagery.[645]

The last estimation is of major interest for the despotism arises from opposing the shari‘ah. Very often tyranny dons the hat of justice.[646] But as we know the true justice and law are found only in the shari‘ah. But if the principles of wisdom, codes of government, laws of right, and rules of force do not aid and support one another, they will be neither fruitful nor effective among the mass of the people. The marks of the shari‘ah will be neglected and remain in abeyance. The people will not rely on them in their affairs, nor have confidence in them.[647] it is very important to remember that anyone who is capable may make interpretations of the law for his own self; but he cannot make the law.[648] at the same time man-made laws are not to be based on the shari‘ah rules as the only natural law. if the laws of government are not combined with the principles of wisdom, and the bonds of force not combined with the laws of truth, they will not be fruitful among the mass of the people.[649] Said Nursi is convinced that power must reside in the law, otherwise arbitrary rule spreads. so the law is a measure of just power as well as of any democratic rule. republicanism consists of justice, mutual consultation, and the restriction of power to the law. Taking into account that all these notions are directly linked with the shari‘ah, Said Nursi addresses to political leaders with the question: “if you apply the title of the illusTrious shari‘ah to the justice, mutual consultation, and restriction of power to the law which is the constitution and constitutionalism, and make it the authority for your rulings and apply its principles, what will you lose?” his own answer is quite clear: the shari‘ah is the source of absolute justice; establishes constitutionalism on a firm base; delivers “Divine rights,” that is, the rights of the public, from wrongful exploitation; gives rise to public opinion, the spirit of consensus; shows the collective personality of the government to be Muslim; makes the government and its activities serve licit constitutionalism; teaches the principles of good morals and elevated emotions. since the illustrious shari‘ah proceeds from pre-eternal divine speech, it will continue for all eternity. our salvation from the vile tyranny of the evil-commanding soul is through reliance on islam. if you want success, conform to the divine laws! otherwise you will be unsuccessful.[650] Said Nursi considers freedom and mutual consultation as main pillars of any just rule. For him freedom in accordance with the shari‘ah and the consultation enjoined by the shari‘ah have demonstrated the sovereignty of our true nationhood. The thinker adopts any political regimes under the condition that they preserve the freedom which is in accordance with the shari‘ah and public order. as for the key to Muslims’ happiness in the life of islamic society it is the mutual consultation enjoined by the shari‘ah. The verse, “Whose rule is consultation among themselves” (42:38) orders consultation as a fundamental principle. Just as the consultation of the ages and centuries that mankind has practiced by means of history, a conjunction of ideas, formed the basis of man’s progress and sciences, so too one reason for the backwardness of asia, the largest continent, was the failure to practice that true consultation. The key and discloser of the continent of asia and its future is mutual consultation. That is to say, just as individuals should consult one another, so must nations and continents practice consultation.[651] Said Nursi pays special attention to another feature of islam and the shari‘ah which is of great importance in nowadays Muslim world. That is moderation as one of the fundamentals of islamic mode of life and thinking. Moderation is the main principle of the Qur’an. The noble Prophet was created with a most moderate character and in the most perfect form. his actions and rest all proceeded on moderation and equanimity. his biography shows clearly that in all his actions he proceeded with moderation and equanimity, avoiding excess and negligence. and therefore moderation is apparent in all his acts, words, and conduct. For example, free of wiliness and stupidity, which are the excess and negligence, like the corruption and darkness, of the power of reason, his reasoning faculty always worked from the point of wisdom, the middle way and means of moderation. in all his practices, daily conduct, and injunctions of his shari‘ah, he chose the way of moderation, and avoided excess and negligence, and wastefulness and prodigality, which are wrongdoing and darkness.[652]

Today, the Muslim world is torn between two contradictory trends: advancing along the road toward democratization and upsurges of radicalism. Modern islam approaches these phenomena in quite a different way. until recent times, balanced islamic thought did not manifest the necessary dynamism when issues of democratization and political reforms or the possibility of the Muslim world joining the globalization process came up for discussion. in other words, even some decades ago this moderate trend of Islamic political and legal thought hadn’t proposed definite and convincing solutions of the above mentioned problems based on the genuine islamic mental tradition. We couldn’t help but feel that, at the ideological level, islam had so far been unable to meet the challenges of our times. no wonder, in the absence of a clear islamic strategy, most contemporary authors remained reserved, or even pessimistic, about the future of the islamic civilization. Those who would like to detach it from the world came up with a much clearer message.

There is still a widely shared opinion outside countries with predominantly Muslim populations that democracy and traditional islamic values are incompatible. islamic extremists share this view for different reasons: they are convinced that the contemporary developments threaten islam. The global “islamic project,” or islamization of mankind, is seen as the only adequate answer.

This leads to a question of fundamental importance: is islamic ideological potential big enough to finally arrive at a formula that would bring Islamic values and the latest achievements of contemporary civilization together?

When trying to answer this question, we should take account of the fact that islamic thought abounds in various trends, three of which until recently were considered the main ones. One of them, the traditional trend, justifies conservation of sorts of Muslim society's present state; another, the fundamentalist trend, insists that the public and state structures should undergo radical changes and return to the literally understood shari'ah. The modernist approach uses the outwardly islamic interpretation in an attempt to justify liberal reforms patterned on the West.

until recently, another of the many trends that interprets the contemporary world along islamic lines remained lost to the public, which has its attention riveted on the three prominent trends. We have in mind the idea of tapping islam's internal potential, which says that reality should be measured against the shari'ah cornerstones, values, and general principles rather than its petty rules related to minor things and interpreted in a narrow-minded manner.

This is very close to what the Muslim reformers of the turn of the twentieth century thought, even though they never got beyond the calls to return to ijtihad and never tried to apply the other shari'ah principles to put their purely islamic idea of the changing world on firmer ground. It should be added here that since the mid-twentieth century this position has been limited to the works of those scholars who preferred to concentrate on the immutable principles of the shari'ah as opposed to its particular, and never consistent, solutions. Just recently, this theoretical construct had absolutely no influence on political and legal practices.

now the situation is obviously changing: the formerly ignored trend has come to the fore as the most promising soil on which the strategy of contemporary islam and the Muslim world will probably grow. Said Nursi together with the other prominent Muslim thinkers laid the theoretical foundation of this evolution.

 The Dialogue between Western Culture and Islamic Tradition is Possible

Said Nursi’s thoughts are also very useful for tackling another urgent problem of the modern islamic world which is the process of globalization as well as the relationships between the Western and islamic political cultures together with formulating islamic approach to the theory of clash of civilizations.

Beginning from the late twentieth century islam developed into a major issue of contemporary world politics. it left the realm of academic deliberations to be discussed by political scientists, publicists, and journalists. They normally concentrate on several subjects: islam and international terrorism and political extremism inherited from the past as well as several recent ones, namely the Muslim world’s future in the context of political changes and the role of islam in the process. all these issues cannot be properly discussed outside the main trends of islamic thoughts: ideas hold a special place in the Muslim world, in which all deep-cutting changes and important projects of national dimension are scrutinized through the prism of islamic principles. What is more, devoid of an islamic foundation they will never take off. This means that all positive solutions for the above-mentioned issues should be sought within islam. in other words, to discuss the prospects of political transformation of the Muslim world today means first of all to interpret Islam in the light of contemporary world realities.

Said Nursi defines the differences between the Western culture and Islamic traditions. He stresses that modern Western civilization has been founded on five negative principles:

1.its point of support is force, the mark of which is aggression.

2.Its aim and goal is benefit, the mark of which is jostling and tussling.

3.Its principle in life is conflict, the mark of which is strife.

4.The bond between the masses is racialism and negative nationalism, which is nourished through devouring others; its mark is collision.

5.its enticing service is inciting lust and passion and gratifying the desires. But lust transforms man into a beast.

however, the civilization the shari‘ah of Muhammad comprises and commands is this: its point of support is truth instead of force, the mark of which is justice and harmony. Its goal is virtue in place of benefit, the mark of which is love and attraction. its means of unity are the ties of religion, country, and class, in place of racialism and nationalism, and the mark of these is sincere brotherhood, peace, and only defense against external aggression. in life is the principle of mutual assistance instead of the principle of conflict, the mark of which is accord and solidarity. And it offers guidance instead of lust, the mark of which is human progress and spiritual advancement.[653] so to attribute to christianity the virtues of civilization, which are not its property, and to show retrogression, the enemy of islam, to be its friend, is to suggest that the firmament is revolving in the opposite direction.[654] at the same time Said Nursi distinguishes two different european cultures and acknowledges some of the Western achievements. he underlines that europe is divided into two parts. one follows the sciences which serve justice and right and the industries beneficial for the life of society through the inspiration it has received from true christianity. The second corrupt europe through the darkness of the philosophy of naturalism, supposing the evils of civilization to be its virtues, has driven mankind to vice and misguidance.[655] in Said Nursi’s view the progress of our World is determined not only by military force or by economical achievements but also by other factors. islam and its truths possess the perfect capacity to progress, both materially and in moral and non-material matters. despite serious obstacles which previously prevented the truths of islam completely overwhelming in the future, in place of weapons, the immaterial, moral swords of true civilization, material progress, and truth and justice will defeat and scatter the enemies. Through the strength of islam in the future, the virtues of civilization will prevail, the face of the earth cleansed of filth, and universal peace be secured. These needs can be brought about through the sacred commands of religion, and fear of God, and firm adherence to religion. The future shall be islam’s and islam’s alone. and its ruler shall be the truths of the Qur’an and belief. it is only through the truths of islam that the islam will prosper and flourish. Islamic society can function only through the Shari‘ah of islam and its worldly happiness be achieved. otherwise justice will disappear, public security will be overturned, immorality and base qualities will prevail.[656] Today most Muslim states are developing in a rather contradictory way in the political and legal sphere where islamic traditions coexist with universally accepted standards and Western liberal values. We should always bear in mind that politics and the principles of state power functioning form a very specific sphere of interaction (cooperation and competition) between islamic principles and Western patterns. Islamic thought believes that the most specific feature of this sphere is created by the fact that the traditional Muslim legal doctrine (fiqh) offers no detailed, exact, and unambiguous answers to the vast majority of specific questions. it limits itself to identifying the most general landmarks, such as consultation, fairness, and equality to be realized in different, including borrowed, versions. When applied, these general principles may produce different results. The consultation principle, for example, can be put into practice in the form of a consultative council accountable to the head of state or as representative body with full legislative powers elected by universal suffrage.

Today, Muslim legal postulates are invoked to prove that Western experience of parliamentary elections, political pluralism, the division of powers, and even human rights should be tapped. in these spheres, however, the borrowing is limited to outward features, yet the very fact that islamic legal thought does not issue rigid instructions about the power system in general opens the road to the widest possible reliance on the experience of political democracy.

What is more, today any modernization and democratization project has good prospects in most Muslim states if realized within the islamic political and legal tradition, or at least with due account of it. The opposite is also true: no political reform stands a chance of survival if it is aimed at setting up formally democratic institutions that go against the grain of islamic thought. objectively, the people at the top and the public at large are interested in democratic developments if they are accompanied by political stability and security. This can be done if democratization is realized within the Muslim political and legal traditions, islamic interpretation of all the changes included.

The strategy of political and legal reforms of the Muslim world should aim at incorporating it into the globalization process together with its islamic values (legal and political among other things) that are compatible with the universal democratic principles and remodelled to fit contemporary reality. This can be achieved if the positive potential of islamic political and legal thought is tapped in a very active way and if the thinkers are encouraged to work on the problems connected with new realities and islam’s role in the globalizing world. it is impossible to solve this problem without referring to Said Nursi’s intellectual heritage.

 14. Reflections on Prayer and Social Justice in the Thought of Thomas Merton and Bediuzzaman Said Nursi it might seem surprising to hear Thomas Merton and Bediuzzaman Said Nursi mentioned together in the same breath. Merton, after all, was an american Trappist monk. Nursi, on the other hand, was a Turkish-Kurdish sunni Muslim theologian. There are, of course, obvious differences between these two thinkers. as a christian Merton is committed to the doctrine of the incarnation and conceives of god in Trinitarian terms. As a Muslim Nursi naturally takes the Qur’an as the definitive source of god’s revelation to humankind, and stresses the unity of god.

David R. Law

despite these differences, however, there are some interesting points of contact between Merton and Nursi. Both men were open to each other’s respective faiths. Merton states in a letter to a Muslim friend that he “read the Koran with deep attention and reverence”[657] and was “stirred to the depths of my heart by the intensity of Moslem piety toward [god’s] names, and the reverence with which he is invoked as the compassionate and Merciful.”[658] Nursi, too, holds a positive view of true followers of Jesus christ and saw in christianity an ally in the struggle against aggressive atheism. since there is a solidarity of irreligion, he argues, there needs to be a solidarity of religion to oppose it. Nursi thus calls on Muslims and christians to unite against the forces of irreligion.[659] another point of contact between these two scholars is their concern at the increasing inroads materialism and secularism were making in their respective societies. Merton’s works are full of references to the impoverishment of spiritual life in Western society due to the increasing influence of materialism and the commodification of human beings through technology, while Nursi was concerned at the decision of the new, post-ottoman Turkey consciously and deliberately to turn its back on islam. Both men worked to make clear to their contemporaries the dire spiritual consequences of their respective society’s rejection of faith and the need to recover and cultivate the relationship with god.

Most important of all, both were men of prayer. Through his numerous writings on prayer Merton has become acknowledged as one of the great christian spiritual writers of the twentieth century. The biographies of Nursi indicate not only that he conscientiously followed the five obligatory prayers, but also, as Mosher points out, was “a man who spent legendary numbers of hours in supererogatory supplication.”[660]

Both men were aware of the problematic status of prayer in modern society. Prior to the rise of the modern scientific worldview, prayer took place against the backdrop of a theistic cosmology. The existence of god was taken for granted and the world and humankind’s place in it were understood in terms of the divine will. The rise of the scientific worldview, however, has shattered this easy confidence in the divine presence. Both Merton and Nursi are arguably struggling with the consequences of this for faith. in his writings Merton is attempting to show that we can still pray to a living god in a world dominated by secularism, individualism, technology, and commercialism, while one of the aims of Nursi’s Risale-i Nur is to defend the centrality of islam in a Turkey that was attempting to abandon its religious past in favor of modern secularism. in this chapter i wish to explore the role of prayer in these two theologians' thinking. how do these two thinkers understand prayer and how does it provide a resource for their struggle against the threat of secularism?

This concern with the role of prayer in the struggle against secularism will in turn lead us on to consider the social dimension of prayer. as we shall see, prayer is not a private affair. it is not something reserved for the individual's interiority practised in private in the individual's own free time. on the contrary, genuine prayer must express itself in the individual's relations with his fellow human beings. genuine prayer has a social dimension. at the same time, however, this social dimension cannot be divorced from the individual's god-relationship. Prayer and social action exist in a dialectical relationship. The believer – whether christian or Muslim – lives in a relationship with god and cultivates this relationship in individual prayer. But this god-relationship is not a self-centered relationship. although true prayer has an introspective dimension, for in prayer the believer reflects on themself in the presence of God and how they have fallen short of God's will, the believer should not remain at the level of introspection. The believer's spirituality must manifest itself outwardly in the believer's relations with other human beings as suggested in the quotation: "To be with god with the people on your heart."[661] This phrase, taken from archbishop Michael ramsey's addresses to candidates for ordination in the church of england, expresses the dual task of the believer: to sustain a relationship with god and to express this relationship in his or her dealings with his fellow human beings. it is Merton's and Nursi's understanding of this relationship that i wish to explore in this chapter.

 Merton on Prayer

For Merton, Western society has become increasingly affluent and technologically advanced, but these developments have been accompanied by increasing secularism, materialism, and moral and religious decline.[662] Indeed, for Merton "the affluent, secularized society of modern europe and america has ceased to be genuinely christian."[663] europeans and north americans now live in a society with "a worldview in which money and power are held to be of greater importance than man himself."[664] action in modern society is governed not by morality, nor by the needs of human beings, but by political expediency and the demands of technology.[665] Modern society has reduced its citizens to cogs in an industrial machine, degraded them to the level of automatons, robbed them of their freedom, and stunted their spiritual growth.[666] in its most frightening form the soullessness of modern Western society expresses itself in the insanity of the arms race and humankind's potential for nuclear self-destruction. in such a society human beings have lost the ability to trust and consequently the capacity for faith. in this frenetic, faithless, soulless, egotistical society it is difficult for the individual to find the solitude in which he can discover the deeper sources of his self and become attentive to the voice of god. ours is an age when "the murderous din of our materialism" seeks to drown out the independent voices of saints and sages of every faith.[667]

The moral and religious decline of Western society has profound consequences for social justice. Modern society's impoverishment of the spiritual and moral integrity of its citizens creates self-centered individuals incapable of loving their fellow human beings. Without this love, however, society disintegrates and can be held together only "by a violent and abusive authority."[668] The consequences for a society in which human beings have lost their spiritual interiority and the love which flows from it are severe: "When men are violently deprived of the solitude and freedom which are their due, the society in which they live becomes putrid, it festers with servility, resentment and hate. no amount of technological progress will cure the hatred that eats away the vitals of materialistic society like a spiritual cancer."[669]

For Merton, the only cure to this crisis "is, and must always be, spiritual."[670] as he puts it in The Ascent to Truth, "The only thing that can save the world from complete moral collapse is a spiritual revolution.”[671] What is needed is to recover “the desire for unworldliness, detachment, and union with god [which] is the most fundamental expression of this revolutionary spirit.”[672] This revolution, Merton argues, must begin with the individual. society, Merton notes, “does not exist all by itself in a void, but is made up of the individuals who compose it.” consequently, “the problems of society cannot ultimately be solved except in terms of the moral life of individuals. if the citizens are sane, the city will be sane. if the citizens are wild animals, the city will be a jungle.”[673] if the ills of society are to be addressed, then, we must begin with the moral and spiritual state of the individuals that comprise society.

This is where prayer becomes important. Prayer for Merton is a vital weapon in the struggle against the secularizing and dehumanizing forces of modern society. human beings have been made by god for god. We are thus only truly free and only truly ourselves when we live our lives in the knowledge and love of god. We must therefore be spiritually awake to his presence. Merton emphasizes that this does not mean that the human being must always and constantly be conscious of the divine presence. That, he claims, is not possible for “we cannot always, or even often, remain clearly conscious of him.”[674] spiritual wakefulness consists not in our constant consciousness of god, but “demands only the habitual awareness of him which surrounds all our actions in a spiritual atmosphere without formally striking our attention except at certain moments of keener perception.”[675] spiritual wakefulness, then, is a mode of being in which we orientate our lives according to the divine presence, even when we are not overtly aware of this presence. spiritual death is when we have lost our consciousness and love of god.[676]

Prayer is of the absolute essence for the cultivation of spiritual wakefulness. Prayer is both a “deep and vital contact” with god and also the means by which we are what we really are.[677] according to Merton, in prayer “our being is brought to a high perfection” and prayer “is one of the most perfect activities” our being can carry out.[678] indeed, Merton can claim that when we cease to pray we cease to exist in the deeper sense of the word. as Merton puts it, “When we cease to pray, we tend to fall back into nothingness.”[679] it is of course true that we do not physically cease to exist. Merton’s point is that without the contact with god that prayer brings

we lose touch with our reason for existing and with the deeper, most significant levels of our being.[680]

For Merton spiritual wakefulness and attentiveness to god in prayer have social consequences. Becoming our true selves in a prayerful relationship to god brings with it responsibility for our fellow human beings. Merton comments that it is god's will that each human being should become his or her true self. But, Merton adds, "since no man is an island, since we all depend on one another, i cannot work out god's will in my own life unless i also consciously help other men to work out his will in theirs."[681] Consequently, the divine will "is our sanctification, our transformation in christ, our deeper and fuller integration with other men."[682] our attentiveness to god's will must manifest itself in action. as Merton puts it: "Once we have heard the voice of the Almighty fulfilling his own command by speaking it in our hearts, we realize that our contemplation can never again be a mere looking or a mere seeking: it must also be a doing and a fulfillment."[683]

There are many different levels of prayer and spiritual wakefulness, and Merton is particularly skilful at exploring them and the challenges they present to us. in our exploration of the connection between prayer and social justice in Merton's thought we shall focus on the impact of prayer on the conscience, the role of petitionary prayer, and the relationship between prayer and social action.

Prayer, Freedom, and Conscience

Western society, Merton notes, makes much of "freedom." its understanding of freedom, however, is questionable. There are, Merton points out, two difficulties with the Western notion of freedom. Firstly, if our choices are really to be free, they "must perfect us in our own being."[684] That is, "we must make the choices that enable us to fulfil the deepest capacities of our real selves."[685] secondly, "we too easily assume that we are our true selves, and that our choices are really the ones we want to make."[686] Merton points out that what we believe to be free choices are "largely dictated by psychological compulsions, flowing from our inordinate ideas of our own importance. our choices are too often dictated by our false selves.”[687] The fact that freedom is not self-sufficient and is frequently based on a false self is indicated by the fact that exercising free choice does not bring about our happiness. If freedom were absolutely self-sufficient we would expect that exercising our freedom would make us happy.[688] This, however, is not the case. on the contrary, according to Merton, “if i do nothing except what pleases my own fancy i will be miserable almost all the time.”[689] Merton takes this phenomenon as evidence that the human being’s will has been “created to use its own freedom in the love of other.”[690]

On the basis of these reflections Merton concludes that we are only truly free when we exercise our freedom not selfishly, but on behalf of others. As Merton puts it, “My free will consolidates and perfects its own autonomy by freely coordinating its action with the will of another.”[691] Merton takes this to indicate that, “There is something in the very nature of my freedom that inclines me to love, to do good, to dedicate myself to others.”[692]

Merton then turns to discuss the relationship between freedom and conscience. “conscience,” he writes, “is the soul of freedom, its eyes, its energy, its life. Without conscience, freedom never knows what to do with itself.”[693] it is conscience that provides the purpose for freedom, for without a purpose freedom degenerates into aimless choice. it is not enough, however, that our freedom has any purpose, it must have the right purpose. This is where the conscience plays an important role, for conscience is what “teaches us how to choose the right purposes.”[694] “conscience,” Merton writes, “is the light by which we interpret the will of god in our own lives.”[695] it is conscience that guides the freedom in making good choices.

The light that is the conscience has a twofold form. First, there is what Merton calls “the psychological conscience, which is better called consciousness.”[696] The psychological conscience “reports to us the actions we perform. it is aware of them, and through them it is aware of itself.”[697] second, there is what Merton calls the “moral conscience.” in contrast to the psychological conscience, the moral conscience “tells us not only that we act, and how we act, but how well we act.”[698] The moral conscience thus has a judgmental function. For Merton “it judges the value of our acts.”[699]

Prayer plays an important role in the cultivation of the moral conscience. For Merton, “one of the most important functions of the life of prayer is to deepen and strengthen and develop our moral conscience.”[700] Prayer is the means by which the believer makes the transition from external to internal observance. The role of prayer is to strengthen the believer’s moral conscience so that the believer may come to express the divine law in his or her very being by living according to the divine will. as Merton puts it:

The whole function of the life of prayer is, then, to enlighten and strengthen our conscience so that it not only knows and perceives the outward, written precepts of the moral and divine laws, but above all lives god’s law in concrete reality by perfect and continual union with his will. The conscience that is united to the Holy Spirit by faith, hope, and selfless charity becomes a mirror of God’s own interior law which is his charity. it becomes perfectly free. it becomes its own law because it is completely subject to the will of god and to his spirit.[701]

The strengthening of the moral conscience necessarily has an impact on society at large. The moral individual does not live in a social vacuum, but must exercise his moral conscience in and for the society of which he or she is a member. The connection between prayer and social action is thus evident in the fact that prayer is a vital resource in strengthening the moral conscience in its action in society. Petitionary Prayer it is in the context of the individual’s inner relationship with god that petitionary prayer has its place. For Merton “all true prayer somehow confesses our absolute dependence on the lord of life and death.”[702] it is this acknowledgement of dependence that accounts for the importance of petitionary prayer, which for Merton expresses the human being’s deep need of God. Merton writes: “The man whose prayer is so pure that he never asks god for anything does not know who god is, and does not know who he is himself: for he does not know his own need of god.”[703] Petitionary prayer, however, should not be seen simply as asking god for things one wants. it is rather only an aspect of a much richer relationship with god. as Merton puts it, “celebration and praise, loving attention to the presence of god, become more important than ‘asking for’ things and ‘getting’ things. This is because we realize that in him and with him all good is present to us and to mankind: if we seek first the Kingdom of Heaven, all the rest comes along with it.”[704]

Petitionary prayer, then, is only one aspect of the more comprehensive relationship the believer sustains with god. But this deeper inner relationship with god brings with it responsibility towards other human beings. it is this responsibility towards others that leads the believer to bring both his own problems and the problems of the world to god. Merton writes: “this inner awareness and openness makes us especially sensitive to the urgent needs of the time, and grace can sometimes move us to pray for certain special needs.”[705] The prayerful individual, then, brings to god the troubles of the world and integrates them into his prayer. in doing so, the prayerful individual draws his society’s problems and troubles into his relationship with god.

Prayer and Social Action

For Merton, prayer is the source of christian action and the struggle for social justice. Merton rejects the notion that the contemplative can cultivate his relationship with god only by turning his back on the world, and stresses that “the active life is essential to every christian.”[706] action is not opposed to contemplation and prayer, but should be understood “as an expression of charity and as a necessary consequence of union with god by baptism.”[707] Merton cites several reasons for the necessity of the prayerful person’s engagement with the world.

Firstly, the spiritual person is a member of broader society and is thus caught up in society’s problems: “The christian cannot separate his life of faith from the real world of work and struggle in which he lives."[708] This need for faith to manifest itself in concrete action applies also to the monk, for according to Merton, "even the cloistered 'contemplative' is inevitably implicated in the crises and problems of the society in which he is still a member (since he participates in its benefits and shares it responsibilities)." consequently, even the monk "must to some extent participate 'actively' in the church's work, not only by prayer and holiness, but by understanding and concern."[709] secondly, the christian is a member of the body of christ. cultivating one's god-relationship through prayer thus entails engaging with the problems of other human beings for they too are members of the body of christ or have the potential to become members of his body. indeed, the holiness of the spiritual individual is dependent upon this action towards others. as Merton puts it, "it can be said that our holiness is proportioned to our capacity to serve as instruments of [christ's] love in establishing his kingdom and building up his Mystical Body."[710] Consequently, "All the secret influx of mystical life into our souls is intended not only for ourselves but for others."[711]

Thirdly, since the god with whom i commune in prayer loves other human beings, so too am i called upon to love them. Merton writes: "There is … one universal basis for friendship with all men: we are all loved by god, and i should desire them all to love him with all their power."[712] My love of my fellow human beings stems from my awareness of god's love for my fellow human beings: "if i am to love my brother, i must somehow enter deep into the mystery of god's love for him."[713] indeed, "Without love and compassion for others, our own apparent 'love' for Christ is a fiction."[714]

This raises the question of how the prayerful individual should engage in action. For Merton "active life" means "the life which, in response to divine grace and in union with the visible authority of the church, devotes its efforts to the spiritual and material development of the whole human community."[715] But this must manifest itself in concrete action. Merton is scathing in his criticism of the common misconception of christian charity as "no more than gentleness, kindness, and affability."[716] True charity must go beyond these qualities and include justice. This will involve not token acts of mercy, which merely condone social injustice, but will require christians to "give not only our possessions but ourselves to our brother.”[717] Merton warns that, “until we regain this deep sense of charity, we cannot understand the full depths of christian perfection.”[718] in short, christian social action “must be at the same time supernatural and concrete, practical and alive. and i mean these words in no metaphorical sense. The truth i must love in my brother is god himself, living in him. i must seek the life of the spirit of god breathing in him.”[719] social action must not be detached from the individual’s relationship with god, however. For Merton genuine social action cannot exist independently of the godrelationship, but must be based on spiritual foundations. grace and interiority, not energy, will-power, and action, “are the true principles of supernatural activity.” Merton warns that, “an activity that is based on the frenzies and impulsions of human ambition is a delusion and an obstacle to grace. it gets in the way of god’s will, and it creates more problems than it solves.”[720] social and political action without a spiritual basis becomes hollow, frenetic activity.[721] indeed, if action is not rooted in the god-relationship, it can become positively harmful, not spreading social justice but imposing the sickness of the individual’s sinful ego on society at large. Merton comments: “What is the relation of [prayer] to action? simply this. he who attempts to act and do things for others or for the world without deepening his own self-understanding, freedom, integrity and capacity to love, will not have anything to give others. he will communicate to them nothing but the contagion of his own obsessions, his aggressiveness, his ego-centered ambitions, his delusions about ends and means, his doctrinaire prejudices and ideas.”[722]

Prayer and social action thus exist in a dialectical relationship. Prayer without social action is individualistic and egocentric, while social action without prayer results in the imposition of the individual’s damaged and sinful ego on society.

 Nursi on Prayer

The centrality of prayer in Nursi’s life and theology is evident on virtually every page of the Risale-i Nur,[723] and we find a wide variety of different types of prayer throughout Nursi’s writings.[724] here i wish to focus on his understanding of prayer as reform of the soul, his notion of prayer as supplication, his critical engagement with Sufi conceptions of prayer as an inner spiritual journey to God, and the connection he makes between prayer and social action.

Prayer as Reform of the Soul

For Nursi, the whole of creation is a mirror reflecting the divine names and attributes.[725] Thus he can describe trees and “the face of the earth itself” as mirrors “to the power and mercy of an absolutely Powerful one, the one of absolute riches.”[726] it is above all the human being, however, who plays the pre-eminent role in reflecting the divine names. The human being, Nursi writes, “is a most subtle and graceful miracle of [god’s] power whom he created to manifest all his names and their inscriptions, in the form of a miniature specimen of the universe.”[727] It is in this capacity to manifest and reflect the Divine Names that the meaning of human existence lies. as Nursi puts it in the eleventh Word: “now the true meaning of your life is this: its acting as a mirror to the manifestation of divine oneness and the manifestation of the eternally Besought one.”[728] it is this mirror role that accounts for what we might regard as the negative characteristics of human existence: poverty, misery, weakness, and so on. although Nursi describes the human being as god’s “work of art,” he also recognizes that the human being is “impotent, heedless, ignorant, diseased, abject, sinful, old, wretched and fugitive.”[729] These apparently negative attributes, however, allow human nature to reflect the divine glory. That is, the negative backdrop of human existence allows god’s presence to become all the more apparent when the human being allows the divine names to manifest themselves in his or her life. in the Fourth ray Nursi writes: “Through its impotence, weakness, poverty, and need, my life acts as a mirror to the power, strength, wealth, and mercy of the creator of life.”[730]

To reflect the divine names, however, the human soul must be reformed. It must put aside its selfishness and make God the center and focus of its being. This reform must begin with the soul of each and every one of us. Before we embark on the task of reforming others, we must first ensure that our own individual souls are in order: “since my soul commands to evil, one who does not reform his own soul cannot reform others. in which case, i shall begin with my own soul.”[731] That is, i must begin with the reform of my soul before i presume to reform that of my fellow human beings.

it is in this reform of the soul that prayer plays an important role. Nursi describes the prescribed prayers and worship as like the training that the soldier undergoes in wartime. The war the believer is fighting consists of “struggles with Satan and his own soul in order to give up serious misdoings and not to commit sins.”[732]

Prayer as Supplication

Perhaps the most distinctive feature of Nursi’s understanding of prayer is his notion of prayer as supplication. The starting-point for Nursi’s reflections on supplication is Sura 25.77: “say: no importance would your sustainer attach to you were it not for your supplication.” on the basis of this verse Nursi claims that supplication “is the basis of worship of god and servitude to him.”[733] among the clearest and most sustained expositions of Nursi’s conception of prayer as supplication are the discussions in the first addendum to the Twenty-Fourth Letter and in the Twenty-Third Word.

Nursi distinguishes between four types of supplication. The first sort of supplication occurs through what Nursi calls “the tongue of latent ability.”[734] This is the type of supplication offered up by the natural world and the animal kingdom. There are several different sorts of “tongue of latent ability.” The first of these is that “through which all seeds and grains supplicate to the all-Wise creator, saying: ‘Make us grow! Make our tiny truths sprout and transform us into the mighty reality of a tree, so that we may display the elaborate embroideries of your names!’”[735] a further type of “tongue of latent ability” Nursi describes as “the gathering together of causes [which] is a supplication for the creation of the effect. That is to say, the causes acquire a position whereby they become like a tongue of disposition through which they supplicate for and request the effect from the all-Powerful one of glory.” as an example of this type of tongue of latent ability, Nursi cites the way water, heat, earth and light join together to petition to god to make a tree out of a seed.[736]

The second type of supplication is that which takes place “through the tongue of innate need.”[737] in the Twenty-Third Word Nursi writes that supplications through the tongue of innate need are “the supplications for all their essential needs – beyond their power to obtain – offered by animate beings.” Through this form of supplication “the animate beings seek certain things from the absolutely generous one for the continuance of their lives, like a sort of sustenance.”[738] in the Twenty-Fourth letter Nursi tells us that the tongue of innate need “is a sort of supplication made by all living creatures to the all-compassionate creator to give them the things they need and desire, which are beyond their power and will, from unexpected places and at the appropriate time.”[739]

These first two forms of supplication – supplication through the tongue of latent ability and supplication through the tongue of innate need – express the fact that the whole of creation exists in a relationship of supplication to the creator. as Nursi puts it, “all that rises to the divine court from the universe is a sort of supplication.”[740] in a footnote to the Tenth Word he comments that, “all the motions and workings of the cosmos are in their essence prayer. For example, the progress of a seed until it becomes a tree is a form of prayer to the creator.”[741] in the Twenty-Third Word Nursi adds to these two forms a third form of supplication, namely “supplication through the tongue of exigency,” which he defines as supplication “through which all beings with spirits who find themselves in some plight or predicament make supplication and seek urgent refuge with an unknown protector; indeed they turn to the all-compassionate sustainer.”[742] according to Nursi, “if there is nothing to prevent it, these three sorts of supplication are always accepted.”[743]

The fourth type of supplication is “the supplication of conscious beings arising from need.”[744] This form of supplication, Nursi says, “is the most well-known,”[745] and is the kind of supplication that is distinctive to human beings. This form of supplication can be divided into two distinct sorts, namely supplication which is “active and by disposition,” and supplication which is “verbal and with the heart.”[746] in the Twenty-Fourth letter Nursi describes these two forms of supplication as supplication by action and by word. as an example of supplication by action Nursi cites ploughing. Ploughing, he writes, “is not seeking the sustenance from the earth, rather, the earth is a door to a treasury of mercy, and the plough knocks on the earth, the door to divine Mercy.”[747]nursi concentrates, however, on the second kind of “supplication of conscious beings arising from need,” namely supplication by word. in the Twenty-Third Word Nursi describes this type of supplication as “supplication with the tongue and the heart,” which “seek[s] certain wishes which the hand cannot reach. [748] The most important feature of this type of supplication, Nursi writes, is that: “The one who offers the supplications knows that there is someone Who hears the wishes of his heart, Whose hand can reach all things, Who can bring about each of his desires, Who takes pity on his impotence, and answers his poverty.”[749] When the human being makes use of this supplication, he rises above his poverty and need and ascends to the highest peaks of humanity. indeed, the human being comes to represent the whole of the universe in his supplications to god.[750] in the Twenty-Fourth letter Nursi begins his exposition of this form of supplication by emphasizing its effectiveness. indeed, for Nursi the very existence of the universe is the result of supplication: “it may even be said that one of the reasons for the creation of the world was supplication. That is to say, after the creation of the universe, the supplications of chiefly mankind, and of them principally the islamic world, and mainly the sublime supplications of Muhammad the arabian (upon whom be blessings and peace) were a cause of it being created.”[751] in view of the importance of supplication, it is clear, Nursi goes on to argue, that the supplications of millions of Muslims over the fourteen centuries of the Muslim era cannot have been without effect. it is inconceivable that they could have been rejected. indeed, “these supplications have acquired universality, extensiveness, and continuousness to this extent and have reached the level of tongues of latent ability and innate need.”[752] Nursi seems to be saying that not only was the universe created proleptically in response to the supplications of humankind, but that these human supplications, led by the Prophet Muhammad, permeated to the unconscious levels of the universe. The whole of creation thus exists in a relation of supplication to god, a prayer which god in his mercy and compassion always answers.

This universal prayer of supplication is expressed in its fullest form by the Prophet Muhammad. in his discussion of the meaning of “salutations” in the tashahhud section of the prescribed ritual prayers, Nursi comments that, “with the word ‘salutations,’ god’s Most noble Messenger (PBuh) intentionally offered to god all the worship living creatures perform through the mode of their creation.”[753] Because Muhammad embodies and represents the fulness of creation’s supplication to god, he is able to make intercession for his community, for whose happiness he is concerned, [754] and is able to intercede for Muslims on the day of resurrection. consequently, Nursi calls on Muslims to follow Muhammad’s example. he writes: “in order to attract the intercession of this intercessor towards yourselves, follow his Practices!”[755]

A further question with regard to Nursi’s understanding of supplication concerns the fact that “sometimes supplications are offered for matters that are definite,” while on other occasions “supplications are made for things which will never come about.”[756] The point of this question seems to be: what should we make of supplications that do not appear to be answered during our lifetime? Nursi’s answer to this is first to point out that “supplication is worship.” Furthermore, “through supplication, the servant proclaims his own impotence and poverty.”[757] That is, one of the significant features of supplication is not what is asked for but the very act of asking itself. Nursi’s point seems to be that in supplication the believer acknowledges his need for and dependence on god. he then goes on to argue that in view of God’s omnipresence and omniscience we can be confident that god always responds to the prayers of believers. [758] god, however, Nursi points out, may choose to answer the supplicant’s prayers in unexpected ways: “if one does not obtain the result for which one prayed, one should not think that the prayer has not been accepted, but rather, that it was accepted in a better form.”[759] he cites as an example someone who asks god to give him a son, but whom “almighty god gives a daughter like Mary.”[760] in such a case, Nursi comments, “it may not be said: his supplication was not accepted," but that "it was accepted in a better form."[761] Furthermore, if an individual's supplication for happiness is not actualized in this life, it may be because it has been accepted for the hereafter. consequently, when god appears not to answer prayer, it "should rather be said that the time for the supplication is not yet over."[762] in short: "To answer is one thing, to accept is something quite different. every supplication is answered, but its being accepted and exactly what was sought being given is dependent on almighty god's wisdom."[763]

Nursi's next point is that, "the best, finest, sweetest, most immediate fruit and result of supplication is this, that the person who offers it knows there is someone who listens to his voice, sends a remedy for his ailment, takes pity on him, and whose hand of power reaches everything. he is not alone in this great hostel of the world; there is an all-generous one Who looks after him and makes it friendly."[764] it is the comfort of knowing that one is in the hands of the almighty, all-generous god that is the greatest gift the believer receives in the act of supplication.

Finally, Nursi argues that "supplication is the spirit of worship and the result of sincere belief."[765] in making supplication the believer shows through his very act of supplication that "there is someone who rules the whole universe; one Who knows the most insignificant things about me, can bring about my most distant aims. Who sees every circumstance of mine, and hears my voice."[766] That is, supplication is the correct expression of the human being's relation to god. it is the human being's recognition of his status as a creature before his creator and an acknowledgement of his dependence on and need of god. Sufism and the Inner Spiritual Journey

Nursi recognizes the importance of going beyond the prescribed ritual prayers to an ever deeper personal relationship with god. This is evident in his recognition of the spiritual depth of Sufism. Nursi comments: "Underlying the terms 'Sufism,' 'path,' 'sainthood,' and 'spiritual journeying,' is an agreeable, luminous, joyful, and spiritual sacred truth."[767] The Sufi path, he writes, "is an elevated human mystery and human perfection."[768] in the ninth section of the Twenty-eighth letter Nursi is concerned to draw attention to "a few droplets" from the "vast ocean" of Sufism.

Sufism, Nursi argues, is concerned with journeying to God with “the feet of the heart under the shadow of the ascension of Muhammad” in order “to manifest the truths of belief and the Qur’an through illumination and certain states, and to a degree by ‘witnessing.’”[769] For Nursi, “The keys and means to this journeying of the heart and spiritual progress are remembrance of God and reflective thought.”[770] Nursi unpacks these ideas by considering the two ways on the Sufi path, which he denotes as “inner journeying” and “outer journeying” respectively.[771] he describes the inner journeying as follows:

The inner way starts from the self, and drawing the eyes away from the outer world, it looks at the heart. it pierces egotism, opens up a way from the heart, and finds reality. Then it enters the outer world. The outer world now looks luminous. it completes the journey quickly. The reality it sees in the inner world, it sees on a large scale in the outer world. Most of the paths which practise silent recollection take this way. The most important basis of this is to break the ego, give up desires of the flesh, and kill the evil-commanding soul.[772]

The outer journeying, on the other hand, “starts from the outer world; it gazes on the reflections of the Divine Names and attributes in their places of manifestation in that greater sphere, then it enters the inner world. it observes those lights on a small scale in the sphere of the heart and opens up the closest way in them. it sees that the heart is the mirror of the eternally Besoughted one, and becomes united with the goal it was seeking.”[773] Nursi recognizes the danger of the inner journey. it is all too easy for the “spiritual” individual to become puffed up with his alleged spiritual greatness. When this occurs, the inner spiritual journey is no longer a tool for taming the ego and placing it at god’s service, but has become an instrument for the ego’s selfishness. Nursi comments:

Thus, if people who travel on the first way are not successful in killing the evilcommanding soul, and if they cannot give up desires of the flesh, and break the ego, they fall from the rank of thanks to that of pride, then from pride to conceit. if such a person experiences a captivation arising from love, and a sort of intoxication arising from the captivation, he will pour forth high-flown claims far exceeding his mark, called ecstatic utterances (shatahat). This is harmful both for himself and for others.[774] in the “eighth allusion” of the Twenty-eighth letter Nursi draws his readers’ attention to the “eight abysses” into which spiritual travelers can fall when they do not conform to the practices of Muhammad.[775] The shari‘ah and the instructions of great scholars of the past such as ghazali and rabbani act as a check upon such allegedly “spiritual” persons, whom Nursi calls upon to “constantly accuse their own souls, and attribute nothing to their souls other than fault, impotence, and want.”[776] Further dangers facing the spiritual traveler are that of converting experience into knowledge.[777] Nursi also points out that absorption into god and renunciation of the world has the danger of conceding the world to the materialists.[778]

Nevertheless, when properly understood and exercised, Sufism has important spiritual benefits. The Sufi path preserves the believer from the threat of atheism. indeed, “in the face of the stratagems of the atheists at the present time, it has become difficult for one who is not connected with the Sufi path and whose heart has not been brought to action, to preserve himself completely, even if he is a learned scholar.”[779] Furthermore, “It is the Sufi paths which are the first and most effective and fervent means of expanding and developing brotherhood, a sacred bond within the World of islam.”[780] in the struggle against modern secularism and in the cultivation of brotherhood among believers, then, the spiritual values of Sufism are of central importance. Prayer and Social Action

Nursi does not systematically develop a plan of social action on the basis of prayer. it is, however, often an issue which he touches upon or is implied by the thrust of his argument as he discusses other issues. it is implicit, for example, in his teaching concerning the solidarity of all believers. in their congregational worship believers are welded together into a community of mutual support. in the Al-Mathnawi al-Nuri Nursi compares the solidarity of prayer with the solidity of a building: “Each believer resembles a brick in a firm building benefiting from the multiplied strength of innumerable fellow believers in their worship and supplication.”[781] in this community of prayer each believer supports the other by working and interceding for the other. Nursi writes:

When belief brings them together, each works for the whole, becomes an intercessor and supplicant for them, and asks mercy for them while declaring their innocence. Together, they extol the Prophet, their leader. every believer takes pleasure in others’ happiness, just as a mother, although hungry, takes pleasure in satisfying her children, or like a compassionate brother who takes pleasure in his brother’s happiness. as a result, people can worship the creator of the universe in a comprehensive way and earn eternal happiness.[782] in the Twenty-Third letter, First Question Nursi provides guidance on the best way believers can pray for one another by laying down the following criteria for acceptable supplications on behalf of others.[783] First, the believer should prepare himself. For Nursi this preparation consists in asking for god’s forgiveness. as Nursi puts it, “a person should be purified spiritually by seeking forgiveness.” second, the believer “should recite benedictions (salawat) for the Prophet (PBuh).” These benedictions should be followed by “an acceptable prayer, for intercession.” Following his supplication the believer should again recite the salawat, “for a prayer offered between two such acceptable prayers itself becomes acceptable.” Nursi suggests that prayers from the Qur’an and the hadiths should be offered and recommends the following: “o god! i beseech you to bestow forgiveness and well-being on me and on so-and-so in religion, this world, and the hereafter;”[784] and “o our sustainer! give us good in this world and good in the hereafter, and defend us from the torment of the Fire.”[785] When such prayers are offered sincerely and with humility and tranquillity of heart,[786] “it is to be strongly hoped from divine Mercy that such supplications will be accepted.”[787]

Thus in contrast to “philosophy,” that is, Western secularism and atheism, faith draws people together. Nursi contrasts the divisiveness of secularism with the solidarity brought about by faith. in faith, the believer recognizes that all things are of value because all things make supplications to god. in the seventeenth Flash he writes:

The student of philosophy flees from his own brother for his own sake and files a lawsuit against him. Whereas, considering all the righteous worshippers in the heavens and on the earth to be his brother, the student of the Qur’an makes supplications for them in the most sincere fashion. he is happy at their happiness and he feels a powerful connection with them in his spirit, so that in his supplications he says: ‘oh god, grant forgiveness to all believing men and women!’ Furthermore, he considers the greatest things, the divine Throne and the sun, to be each subservient officials, and servants and creatures like himself.[788]

consequently, in contrast to the student of “philosophy,” the believer “does not see himself as superior to the lowest of almighty god’s creatures,” but “combines the utmost dignity with the utmost humility.”[789]

Faith, then, is radically democratic. it recognizes the dependence of all things on God. All things and all human beings exist in a solidarity of finitude and dependence on god. all things exist in solidarity by virtue of their capacity to act in their poverty and wretchedness as mirrors of the divine richness and glory. This has consequences for human beings’ use and enjoyment of property. Because human beings are creatures, we do not own our property. rather, property does not belong to human beings, but is placed in their trust by god.[790] another aspect of his thought that has implications for social action is Nursi’s teaching on love. in the Twenty-Fourth Word, Fifth Branch Nursi writes that “love is the cause of the universe’s existence, and what binds it; and it is both the light of the universe and its life.”[791] Because the human being “is the most comprehensive fruit of the universe,” Nursi continues, “a love that will conquer the universe has been included in his heart."[792] This love, however, can be turned in two different directions. Nursi argues that the human being has been created with the two faculties of love and fear. These exist in a dialectical relationship which when directed towards their proper object are beneficial for human beings. as an example Nursi cites the mother who gently scares her child so that he clings more firmly to her loving embrace. Human beings have a similar relationship with god. Nursi comments: "Fear is a whip; it drives you into the embrace of his mercy."[793] love and fear can, however, be directed to the wrong objects. if love and fear are directed to creatures or to unreliable human lovers, the human being will be disappointed and will experience only calamity.

love of oneself is a particularly harmful misdirection of the human being's capacity to love, for to "ascribe to [one's soul] a sort of dominicality" is a fundamental misunderstanding of human nature. Time and again Nursi emphasizes that the human being's "essential nature is kneaded out of fault, deficiency, poverty, and impotence," qualities which should act as a mirror through which the divine perfection is reflected. The self-loving soul, however, has usurped God's place. Nursi comments: "your intense love for yourself and your soul is love for the divine essence which you misuse and spend on your own self."[794] Nursi calls upon the self-loving soul to rend its egotism and to show forth god. Worship plays an important role in this process for it places the human being in the correct relation to god. as Nursi puts it in the Twenty-Fourth Word, worship "is a line of union which turns [the human being's] face from transience to permanence, from creation to creator, from multiplicity to unity, and from the extremity to the source, or it is a point of union between the source and the extremity."[795]

When the human being directs both his love and fear toward the correct object, namely god, then he will also learn to love everything else in the proper manner. Nursi writes: "When you give [love] to its true owner, you will be able to love everything without distress in his name and as his mirrors. That means this love should not be spent directly on the universe. otherwise, while being a delicious bounty, it becomes a grievous affliction."[796] Nursi's point seems to be that the human being must learn to set the right priorities.

The center of the human being’s existence should be god and the human being should focus his energies on cultivating his relationship with god.

When we place god at the center of our lives, our other relations are placed in their proper position. in the Thirty-second Word, Third stopping-Place, Nursi enumerates the relations that proceed from the fundamental relationship between god and the believer: enjoyment of food as the bounty of god; love for parents, children, friends and acquaintances, wife, prophets and saints, life, youth, spring, and the world. in short, Nursi writes, “love this world and the creatures in it as pointing to a meaning beyond themselves, like a word. do not love them just for themselves… . do not give any opportunity to other loves to enter into your inner heart because the inner heart is the mirror of the eternally Besought one and pertains only to him. say, ‘o god, grant us love for you, and love for that which will draw us closer to you.’”[797] When the believer’s relationship with god is on the right footing, then all other relationships fall into place. The believer can again love the world, but not in and for itself, but because it expresses the divine presence.[798]

Finally, we might note that in Nursi’s notion of the whole of creation being in supplication to god we have the basis of an environmental theology. if all of creation is engaged in supplication to god, then we should take responsibility for creation, for all beings in creation are supplicants to the almighty, compassionate and merciful god.

 Prayer as the Foundation for Social Justice

Both Merton and Nursi were concerned at the inroads secularism was making in their respective societies. Both men see prayer as an important resource in addressing the challenge of materialism and atheism. Both consider prayer to be the source of social solidarity, action, and justice. Both conceive of petitionary or supplicatory prayer not simply as asking god for things but above all as an acknowledgment of one’s creatureliness and eo ipso of the correct relationship of the human being to god. in short, for both Merton and Nursi, prayer is part of the solution to the crisis caused by secularism.

Both Merton and Nursi are committed to the notion of god as a personal god with whom each human being can and should sustain a relationship. indeed, the reason for existing at all is to exist in relationship with god. in this divine-human relationship prayer plays a central role, for it is through prayer that human beings open themselves up to the divine presence. Prayer involves self-transformation. This transformation has both personal and social consequences. it has personal consequences, because in prayer human beings break out of the confines of their egocentricity in order to become one with god. it has social consequences because the transformation of individuals has consequences for society. indeed, there can be no long term transformation of society without personal transformation. in prayer i open myself up not only to god but also to other human beings, for they too exist in relationship to god. They are my brothers and sisters in god to whom i, as a creature of god, have a duty of care.

Prayer and social conscience are thus intimately linked. There is no division between prayer and social responsibility. on the contrary, the former is an essential resource for the latter. Prayer without social action is individualistic and selfish. To cultivate one's god-relationship with no acknowledgement of the obligations which that relationship creates towards one's fellow human beings is not true worship of god, but is worship of the idol of one's egotism. Without prayer we have only frenetic action without focus. indeed, without prayer the individual's social action is corrupted by his egotistical, sinful self. Thus Nursi emphasizes the necessity of reform of the soul before one dares to embark on the reform of others, while Merton points out that without establishing a god-relationship through prayer, all the politically and socially active individual achieves is to spread the contagion of his own ego to others. Prayer is an important way not only of drawing closer to god but also of confronting the false selves that human beings construct for themselves.

This raises the question of political engagement. neither man set about implementing or recommending a specific programme of political action. although taking a lively interest in the great political questions of his day, Merton did not align himself with partisan politics. The Nursi of the Risale-i Nur believed that involvement in party politics would compromise his task and that of his followers of serving the Qur’an and keeping the faith alive in an increasingly secular age. [799] nevertheless, Merton and Nursi can be said to be political in an apolitical sense. That is, they did not adopt a party line, but were concerned rather that politicians should be aware of the religious and spiritual sources of genuine political action. Their point is that political action must have its source in each individual human being’s relationship with God. The focus of Merton and Nursi is first and foremost on getting the god-relationship right. When this is right, then correct political action will follow as a matter of course. in getting right with god prayer is of the essence. only in a prayerful relationship with god can we overcome our egotism, turn in love to our fellow human beings, and truly begin to build a healthy and just society.

 15. God’s Justice in relation to natural disasters

Thomas Michel, s.J.

In the name of god, the Merciful, the compassionate.

When the earth shall quake violently, and the earth shall bring forth its burdens, and man shall say: “What is happening to it?” on that day, it shall relate its tales; that its lord has inspired it (Qur’an 99:1–5).

at the time of the indian ocean tsunami on 26 december 2004, in which over 300,000 persons where killed, 168,000 in indonesia alone, i was lecturing in central Java in indonesia. The island of Java was relatively unaffected by the tsunami, since it is sheltered from the indian ocean by the larger island of sumatra. nevertheless, everyone in indonesia was shocked at the widespread destruction and loss of life, and there was much soul-searching in an effort to understand god’s will in such a terrible disaster.

For Muslims, the questioning was especially acute, because aceh, the north sumatran province most severely affected, was well-known as being the most pious and faithful islamic region of the country. aceh is known in indonesia as “the threshold of Mecca.” consequently, many Muslims were asking how god could permit such an event to occur in the most god-fearing region of indonesia, and they wondered where god’s justice could be found in an event in which good and bad perished indiscriminately.

The experience of discussing with indonesian friends the mystery of god’s will in relation to the tsunami provoked me to learn what Said Nursi had to say about natural disasters and how he reconciled such events with faith in god’s justice and mercy. There is a passage in the Risale-i Nur[800] which specifically treats these questions. it was penned in response to many queries put to Said Nursi following upon a severe earthquake which occurred on 27 december 1939 in the Turkish province of erzincan. The quake, which caused more than 30,000 deaths, was actually a series of seven powerful shocks (the most violent registering 7.9 on the richter scale), that together went to produce the most lethal and destructive disaster to hit anatolia in modern times. in his response, Said Nursi treats seven questions which people had put to him in regard to the earthquake.

First Question. What is the reason for the anxiety that people experience as a result of the earthquake? They are terrified that there will be another one. While admitting that the physical destruction and loss of life caused by earthquakes and other natural disasters are matters of great distress, Nursi notes that the spiritual and psychological crises that follow upon such calamities are often more severe than the material damage. The reason for this is that people who have experienced this type of disaster are traumatized; they are fearful that another quake will occur, and they live in despair since they do not know how to avoid this imminent danger or save themselves from it. The result of this fear and despair is that people lie awake nights worried about another earthquake, losing sleep and becoming depressed.

Said Nursi’s answer is that licentious, blasphemous lifestyles lie at the heart of this fear and despair. he suggests that if people were truly engaged in pious behavior and faithfully living according to god’s will, they would not be caught in the grip of torment, fear, and despair. They would see the hand of god even in the occurrence of natural calamities. “The reins of all those things that are hostile to you, from microbes to plagues, storms, famine, and earthquakes, are in the hands of the compassionate, Wise one. Being wise, he does nothing in vain. Being compassionate, his mercy is superabundant. There is a form of grace and favor contained in everything he does.”[801] if people were living in accord with god’s will, they would not fear death because they would have a peaceful afterlife to look forward to. They would have the inner resources to confront disaster realistically and rationally and in this way find strength to overcome their fear as well as hope to overcome their despair. Nursi says elsewhere in the Risale-i Nur that if one views natural events with the eyes of faith, “he will realize that the storms and earthquakes and tempestuous events are all submissive officials, and understand that they are the means for instances of wisdom which though apparently harsh are in fact most gentle.”[802] it is noteworthy that Said Nursi’s concern here is not to interpret the earthquake as a punishment for licentious living, but rather to note that the inner defects and inadequacies that people experience in confronting such disasters come from a lack of faithful, observant lives. however, the matter is complex. elsewhere in the Risale-i Nur, he makes clear that at least some of the disasters that befall humanity are indeed the result of pride and obstinacy, of people thinking they know better than god. certainly, this does not mean every individual is guilty, but it is the erroneous ideas and attitudes of the majority of people that bring down disasters upon the whole nation. Nursi states this view clearly in a dream debate with supporters of the secular state: “The error of the majority is always the cause of general disasters. Mankind’s misguided ideas, nimrod-like obduracy, Pharaohlike pride, swelled and swelled on the earth till it reached the skies. it upset the sensitive mystery of creation and it caused to descend from the heavens the plague and storm of the last war’s quakes; it caused a heavenly blow to be visited on the infidel.”[803] in other words, there is a mysterious connection between the way that humans live, exemplified in the Qur’anic narratives of prophets such as Noah, hud, salih, lot, and shuayb, the cosmic forces that sometimes “rebel” against human obstinacy and assail earthly society.

Second Question. Why don’t these disasters happen in countries populated by non-believers? Why do they seem to occur very frequently in Muslim regions?

Said Nursi’s answer is that chastisement for small sins and errors is made quickly, on-the-spot, while the punishment for great matters is deferred to a more august assembly. For example, one might be forced to pay a trivial traffic fine immediately, but a serious case, such as that of homicide or sedition, will be deferred to an important tribunal. in the same way, god punishes Muslims' less grievous sins in this world immediately by disasters like earthquakes, while the more serious sins of evildoers are deferred to the Final Judgment.

Third Question. if an earthquake is a punishment for sin, why are the innocent also punished for the sins of a few? obviously, in any given region, not all people are evildoers, yet in a natural disaster, everyone suffers.

Said Nursi's answer is that it is not correct to say about any human society that only a few people have sinned. in every society, most people are in one way or another involved in the general wrongdoing. Whether it be the injustices visited upon the poor, the corruption of politicians and businessmen, public promiscuity, or general disbelief, many people cooperate silently in such misdeeds in various ways. Whether by complacently ignoring the wrong, by profiting from the wrongdoing in one way or another, by passively putting up with it and doing nothing to stop it, or by defending the rights of miscreants to carry out their offences, guilt is more widespread than that for which a relatively small number of perpetrators is responsible. Nursi here is raising the question of what might be called "social sin," the general wrongdoing of a society for which no individual is responsible, but in which all are to a greater or lesser extent complicit.

Fourth Question. it could be argued that disasters like earthquakes atone for the sins that the people have committed. in other words, they are occasions by which people begin in this world to atone for the punishment due to their sinful deeds. But if this is so, it would seem unjust on the part of god to punish the innocent along with the guilty.

Said Nursi replies that the issue is bound up with the mystery of divine determining, that is, god’s omnipotent power over all things and the reality of human freedom to choose good or evil. he cites a Qur’anic verse to the effect: “Fear tumult or oppression, which affects not only those of you who do wrong (8:25).” Nursi interprets this verse to mean this world is like a proving ground or examination hall in which each person’s level of responsibility and accountability is being tested. if in the case of disaster the innocent were spared while the guilty were being punished, then evildoers would do what is right, not because they wanted to obey and believe in god, but simply out of self-interest, to avoid worldly destruction. The upright “abu Bakrs” of this world would have no opportunity to show their positive, god-fearing qualities, nor would the self-serving, evildoing “abu Jahls” be shown up for the cowardly, desperate people they had made out of themselves. Thus, it is necessary that in a disaster, both good and bad undergo the same misery, so that the spiritual stuff of which each is made will become evident.

Moreover, god does not forget his faithful, upright servants in time of disaster. god shows them mercy and treats their suffering as a type of martyrdom which will gain for them a great reward in the afterlife. Just as the deaths of innocent victims can be considered a kind of martyrdom, so also their property and livelihood which were destroyed in the disaster take on the status of alms, which will earn the faithful victims eternal benefit.

Nursi concludes that men have no right to complain in the case of disasters and illness, nor are they justified in accusing God of injustice. He gives three reasons for his view. Firstly, god as creator and Provider has disposal over his creation to do as he wishes. disasters provide an opportunity for god to display his beautiful names by consoling and caring for the innocent victims. secondly, “by means of disasters and sicknesses, life is refined, perfected, strengthened and advanced; it yields results, attains perfection and fulfils its own purpose. Life led monotonously on the couch of ease and comfort resembles not so much the pure good that is being, as the pure evil that is non-being.”[804] Thirdly, this world is a testing-ground where patiently endured suffering purifies the person and becomes equivalent to an act of worship of god.

Fifth Question. Would it not be more in keeping with god’s justice and mercy for him to punish individual sins one-by-one, rather than by sending a general and indiscriminate punishment like an earthquake? Why doesn’t god step in preemptively to prevent an earthquake or similar natural disaster from happening before such widespread destruction occurs?

Said Nursi answers that there are times when god allows the natural elements to rise up in anger against human sinfulness. The Qur’an recounts, for example, the flood visited on the people of Noah, the anger of the air at the denial of the peoples of ‘ad and Thamud peoples, the fury of the sea and water at the people of Pharaoh, the rage of the earth at Qarun, and the anger of hell at the unbelievers in the hereafter.[805] obviously, Nursi is not claiming that the natural world has the capacity for an emotional response such as anger, but it is clear from the Qur’an that human sin is so disruptive of the cosmic order that on occasion the earth itself rebels against the corruption done by humans.

even though god sometimes permits an element of the natural world to rise up in rebellion against human sin, if god were then to step in and prevent that element from following its set course, then in the long run, as many instances of good as of evil would have been prevented. Nursi recognizes that it is the function of some elements of nature to control and balance others. he expresses this view in the form of a prayer and says: “Just as the seas with their strange creatures recognize you and make you known, so do the mountains through the wise services they perform. They ensure that the earth is released from the effects of earthquakes and internal upheavals, save it from being overrun by the seas, purify the air of poisonous gases, function as tanks for the saving and storage of water, and act as treasuries for the minerals and metals necessary for living beings.”[806] god’s intervention to contravene and override the processes of nature, which had been decreed by god from the beginning, would be contradictory to god’s own wisdom in creation.[807]

The function of a natural element cannot be canceled in order to prevent a possible unwanted result. This would mean canceling as well all the good results tied to the intended action of that particular element. if an element were thus prevented from carrying out its given duty, it might avoid bad results, but at the same time, would cause the cancellation of an equal number of good results. since god is good and without fault, such an action would not be in keeping with his divine nature. in his mercy and wisdom, god selectively allows the occurrence of lesser evils for the greater good. For example, a disaster like an earthquake, while it causes serious destruction, also produces positive results in keeping with divine providence, such as testing people’s faith, rewarding faithful believers to the status of martyrs, and serving as a salutary warning to miscreants.[808]

Sixth Question. Many modern people deny that divine intervention is in any way involved in earthquakes, tsunamis, floods and similar disasters. They hold that such disasters can be explained by purely natural causes, such as an earthquake occurring because of a shift in the rock strata inside the earth or architectonic plates sliding against each other. They see no need for recourse to god, sin, punishment or any other religious reference to explain these events. For them, the universe consists entirely of matter, and disasters are entirely due to an unfortunate combination of material factors.

Said Nursi answers that the marvellous complexity of creation shows that not even the tiniest element of the cosmos can be outside the control and awareness of the creator. god’s providence, decision, and purpose are sovereign, and nothing occurs in the universe that is outside of god’s determination. however, sometimes god in his wisdom conceals his power and acts through secondary causes. an earthquake is a case in point. it is in keeping with god’s habitual way of acting that he will on occasion command the terrestrial strata to shift at a fault line, thus producing an earthquake.

Nursi offers an image to illustrate his point that god’s ultimate agency must be affirmed for everything that happens in the universe. When a man is shot with a gun, it is not the gun that is blamed but rather the person who fired it. To presume the gun as uniquely at fault is ridiculous, for common sense tells us that one has to go beyond the material instrument to discover the true agent who employed that instrument. similarly, to pretend that the earth is the ultimate cause of earthquakes and other natural events is to disregard the true actor, who is god the creator. nevertheless, those who do not believe in god are forced to relegate all natural events to the status of chance occurrences within the natural order, ignoring the one who set forth and directs the forces of nature.

